BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA.

VOLUME THE SIXTH;

PART I.

A Character of this Work, by GILBERT WEST, Esq; at the Concluſion of his Poem on EDUCATION, in Note on the Words Great Lives explain.

'I CANNOT forbear taking occaſion from theſe words, to make my 'acknowledgments to the writers of Biographia Britannica, for the 'pleaſure and profit I have lately received from peruſing the two firſt 'volumes of that uſeful and entertaining work, of which the monumental 'ſtructure abovementioned, decorated with the ſtatues of great and good 'men, is no improper emblem. This work, which contains The Lives of 'the moſt eminent Perſons who have flouriſhed in Great Britain and Ireland, 'from the earlieſt Ages, down to the preſent Time, appears to me, as far as 'it has hitherto gone, to be executed with great ſpirit, accuracy, and 'judgment; and deſerves, in my opinion, to be encouraged by all, who 'have at heart the honour of their country, and that of their particular 'families and friends; and who can any ways aſſiſt the ingenious and labo- 'rious authors, to render as perfect as poſſible, a deſign ſo apparently 'calculated to ſerve the Public, by ſetting in the trueſt and fulleſt light, 'the characters of perſons already generally, though perhaps too indiſtinctly, 'known; and reviving from obſcurity and oblivion, examples of private 'and retired merit; which, though leſs glaring and oſtentatious than the 'former, are not, however, of a leſs extenſive, or leſs beneficial influence, 'to thoſe, who may happen not to have ſeen this repoſitory of Britiſh 'glory. I cannot give a better idea of it, than in the following lines of 'Virgil:

'Hic manus ob Patriam pugnando vulnera paſſi;
'Quique Sacerdotes caſti, dum vita manebat;
'Quique pii Vates & Phœbo digna locuti;
'Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes;
'Quique ſui memores alios fecere merendo.'

VIRG. Æn. Lib. vi. ver. 660.

'Here Patriots live, who for their Country's good,
'In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
'Prieſts of unblemiſh'd lives here make abode,
'And Poets worthy their aſpiring God:
'And ſearching Wits of more mechanic parts,
'Who grac'd their age with new invented arts;
'Thoſe who to worth their bounty did extend,
'And thoſe who knew that bounty to commend.'

SCOTT [JOHN], an excellent rational Divine, and one of our beſt and moſt pious Engliſh Writers, in the XVIIth century, was the ſon of Thomas Scott, a grazier, and born at Chipenham in Wiltſhire (a), in the year 1638 [A]. Not being at firſt deſigned for a ſcholar, he ſerved about three years in London as an apprentice; but it being againſt his inclination, which was rather bent upon piety and learning, he left his trade and went to Oxford, where he was admitted a Commoner of New-Inn, in 1657, under the tuition of Mr Chriſtopher Lee. Having made a great proficiency in Logic and Philoſophy, he quitted the univerſity without a degree, and entering into Holy Orders, reſorted to London, where he became an eminent and admired Preacher. His firſt Preferments were the Chaplainſhip of St Thomas Southwark (b), and the perpetual Curacy of Trinity in the Minories (c). But, on the firſt of February 1677, he was inſtituted to the Rectory of St Peter's-Poor in Broadſtreet, to which he was preſented by the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's (d). He was alſo Lecturer of one of the churches in Lombard-ſtreet (e). In 1681, he publiſhed the Firſt Part of his moſt excellent work, intituled The Chriſtian Life [B]; and dedicated it to Biſhop Compton: by whom

[B] In 1681, he publiſhed the Firſt Part of his moſt excellent work, intituled The Chriſtian Life.] The whole title is, 'The Chriſtian Life, Part I. from its 'beginning to its conſummation in Glory; Together 'with the ſeveral Means and Inſtruments of Chriſtia-'nity conducing thereunto; With Directions for pri-'vate Devotion, and Forms of Prayer, fitted to the 'ſeveral States of Chriſtians.' London, 8vo. In this very ſenſible and rational Diſcourſe, he ſhews, 1. That the peculiar and ultimate End of the Chriſtian Life, is Heaven. 2. That the way of obtaining heavenly Happineſs, is by uſing the Means conducing thereunto: of which means there are two ſorts, namely, The Practice of the heavenly Vertues, in the perfection whereof conſiſts the ſtate of Heaven; and the other the Practice of certain Inſtrumental Duties. The former being the proximate Means, and the latter the more remote Means. 3. The Heavenly Part of the Chriſtian Life, or the Proximate Means, he divides into Humane, Divine, and Social Virtues. The Humane Virtues, are Prudence, Moderation, Fortitude, Temperance, Humility: The Divine Virtues, are, Contemplation of God's nature, Adoration of his Perfections, Love, Imitation, Reſignation, Truſt and Dependance: And the Social Virtues, Charity, Juſtice, Peaceableneſs, Modeſty, and Courteſie. 4. The Inſtrumental Duties he ſubdivides into Initial, Progreſſive, and Perfective. The Initial, are, Faith, Conſideration, a deep and thorough Conviction of our need of a Mediator, ſorrow ſhame and remorſe for our paſt Iniquities, earneſt Prayer for divine Aſſiſtance, and a ſerious and ſolemn Reſolution of Amendment, &c.—The reſt we ſhall not mention, as the book is very common, and indeed ought to be more common, by being in every pious Chriſtian's hands.——In 1685, he publiſhed Part II. 'Wherein the Fundamental 'Principles of Chriſtian Duty are aſſigned, explained, 'and proved.' This is alſo dedicated to Biſhop Compton, and our author 'expreſſes the grateful ſenſe 'he had, and ſhould always retain, of the perſonal 'Obligations he had laid upon him (2).' In this volume, no ways inferior to the former, he treats of theſe important points. Of the nature of Moral Goodneſs, which

Two Volumes of his Practical Diſcourſes upon ſeveral Subjects, were printed after his deceaſe [H] His Character, as drawn up by Dr Iſham at the end of his funeral Sermon [I], is given below. Biſhop Burnet ranks him, among thoſe worthy and eminent Clergymen in this nation, who 'deſerved a high character; 'and were indeed an honour, both to the Church, and to the Age in which they 'lived (m).

[H] Two volumes of his Practical Diſcourſes upon ſeveral ſubjects, were printed after his deceaſe.] The firſt volume was publiſhed in 1697, 8vo. without the editor's name. But the dedication to the ſecond volume is ſubſcribed by Humphrey Zouch. This ſecond volume is particularly intituled, 'Practical Diſcourſes 'concerning Obedience, and the Love of God.' Lond. 1698. 8vo.

[I] His Character, as drawn up by Dr Iſham at the end of his funeral Sermon, &c.] 'I ſhall, ſays the 'Doctor (11), briefly conſider him in theſe two heads; 'his Private Vertues, and his Services for the Church. 'He had many Vertues of no ordinary growth: and 'we may call them to mind, by reviewing his much 'applauded work of the Chriſtian Life: Which he 'intended to continue, and perfect, if Providence had 'not put a ſtop to his uſeful deſign, firſt by a long 'Crazineſs, and then by taking him ſuddenly from us. 'Next to his Piety towards God, his Social Vertues '(as his own diſtinction is) were thoſe for which we 'ſhall be moſt ſenſible of our loſs in him; for his 'Kindneſs, and Humanity, and amicable Diſpoſition, 'and Affability, and pleaſantneſs of Temper, and 'Condeſcenſion, and Sincerity, and readineſs to do all 'good Offices for any that had recourſe to him. In 'helping others, and laying out for their advantage 'the Authority which he had gained; in giving coun'ſel, and directions; and in cementing Amity and 'Peace, he exhauſted very much of his time; and de'lighted as much in doing any friendly turn, as if the 'profit had redounded to himſelf. In works of Mer'cy he took a peculiar Pleaſure; and did as zealouſly 'promote them, as if he had relieved himſelf by ſup'porting the Poor: he was a common Father to the 'perſecuted and afflicted; and the Brethren, and 'Strangers, whoſe bowels he hath refreſhed, will 'bear witneſs of his Charity before the Church. Friend'ſhip is one of the nobleſt ornaments of human na'ture; and if God himſelf is Love, 'tis the portraiture 'of God drawn upon the Soul: and for this Vertue he 'was exceedingly valued by thoſe that were intimate 'with him; he was not infected with any of thoſe 'Vices which blaſt it, with Pride or Moroſeneſs, or 'Envy, or Selfiſhneſs; his inclinations were to refreſh 'and cheriſh all men, and only to neglect himſelf: 'his doors, and his heart were open to all; and he 'hath left behind him the indelible commendation of 'a true, and ſtedfaſt, and faithful Friend.

(11) Funeral Sermon, p. 21, &c.

'Again, let us look upon him in his Publick Cha'racter; and if they that be wiſe ſhall ſhine as the 'brightneſs of the firmament, and they that turn many 'to righteouſneſs as the ſtars for ever and ever; we 'may be humbly confident of his having a propor'tionable reward. His Education happened to be in 'the times of Confuſion, and yet without any detri'ment to him: for he imbibed the principles of that 'renowned Univerſity in which he was bred, and not 'of the Men who then governed it; the ſame good 'Spirit, that called him thither from another Em'ployment, directing him what to doe; and when the 'Church was covered in Ruins, he diſcerned her beau'ty; and received holy orders from one of thoſe eject'ed Confeſſors, who during the deva ſtation did ſecret'ly preſerve the Apoſtolical diſcipline. His appear'ance in the world was early; and as God had fur'niſhed him with extraordinary talents, and had ena'bled him to improve them well, and to poſſeſs abili'ties equal to his high profeſſion; the ſame divine 'Goodneſs choſe a fitting theatre for them to be ma'nifeſted upon. His eloquent, and ſolid, and fervent 'Preaching, commanded the applauſes of men; and 'his conſtancy in it procured their love: and though 'his frequency in this work, and his diligence in his 'paſtoral charge, and his induſtry in reſolving Caſes of 'Conſcience, and his reſtleſs application to the labours 'of his calling, waſted him by degrees; yet he could 'not be ſatisfied without doing his duty: and that 'which ſent him the ſooner to God, will enlarge his 'recompence from him. He ran his courſe in times 'of great trial, and diſcrimination; and in all of them 'he approved his inflexible, and uncorrupted integri'ty; and adhered ſtedfaſtly to the Principles of our 'Church ——When Popery invaded our eſtabliſhed 'Religion, he was one of thoſe worthy Champions 'that defended it with an upright zeal; they held up 'their ſhields together, and united their counſels and 'endeavours as one man: they ſaw their Dioceſan '(whom they mightily honoured) ſingled out for the 'firſt ſacrifice, becauſe he would not ſurrender them; 'they ſaw the Roman Eagle advancing every day, and 'freſh attempts made to demoliſh our Church; and 'then it was that by preaching, and praying, and 'writing, they gained an univerſal eſteem, and ſup'ported our holy religion. In this Cauſe our Friend 'whom we are waiting upon did cordially concur 'with his Brethren; and was prepared to ſuffer as 'much as any of them. He underſtood our Conſtitu'tion entirely, and that made him the more hearty in 'aſſerting it upon all occaſions.——Therefore, 'he did upon all emergencies maintain an unſpotted 'fidelity to the Church; and acted conſonantly to 'what he had profeſſed concerning it, in theſe words: 'Whatſoever her fate may be, I am chained to her for'tunes by my Reaſon, and Conſcience; and ſhall ever 'eſteem it more eligible to be cruſhed in pieces by her 'fall, which God avert, than to flouriſh, and triumph 'on her ruins (12). This reſolution he kept to the 'laſt, and ſtill with a peaceful, and charitable ſpirit; 'and without aiming at his own intereſt through that 'of the Church: for when offers were made to him of 'higher Stations in the Church, he declined them up'on the ſenſe of decays creeping upon him; and he 'rejoiced more in the advancement of other worthy 'men, than he would have done in his own. His in'herent Greatneſs wanted no outward acceſſions; and 'the Preferment he was ambitious of, was to go from 'his flock unto the Shepherd and Biſhop of our Souls.'

SEDLEY [Sir CHARLES], Bart. one of the gay wits that enlivened the pleaſurable Court of King Charles the Second, was grandſon of Sir William Sedley, Bart. the munificent founder of the Sedleian lecture of Natural Philoſophy at Oxford (a), and ſon of Sir John Sedley of Aylesford in Kent, Bart. by his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Henry Savile, Knt. [A], the learned Warden of Merton-college in Oxford, and Provoſt

(a) See Sir H. Savile's article. The ſalary of the lecture is now reckoned to be 200 l. a year. Dr Edward Lapworth of Magdalen college, who accumulated his degrees in Phyſic in 1611, was the firſt Profeſſor. Wood's Faſti, Vol. I. col. 189.

[A] By his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir to Sir Henry Savile.] We have the following particular concerning this lady, from that indefatigable collector of private memoirs Mr Wood. Who tells us, he had been credibly informed, that Sir A. Weldon, author of the Court and Character of King James, did, at the beginning of the Long Parliament, communicate the manuſcript of it to the lady Elizabeth Sedley, (mother to Sir William and Sir Charles) accounted a very ſober and prudent woman; who, after peruſal, did lay the vileneſs of it ſo much to Sir Anthony's door, that he was reſolved never to make it public; which, perhaps, continues

Provoſt of Eton. Sir Charles was born probably at Aylesford, about the year 1639; and, after a proper foundation of Grammar learning, was ſent to Oxford, where he was admitted a Fellow-Commoner [B] of Wadham-college, in Lent term, 1655-6. But he left the univerſity without taking any degree, and retiring into his own country, lived privately there; out of humour, as it ſhould ſeem, with the governing powers, 'till the reſtoration of King Charles the Second: when he came to London (b), in order to join in the general jubilee, the gaiety of which was both agreeable to his years, and exactly ſuitable to his taſte and temper. He was ſoon introduced to the King, and it was not long before they who recommended him to his Majeſty, found they had thereby in ſome meaſure ſupplanted themſelves (c). Sir Charles had ſuch a diſtinguiſhingly polite eaſineſs in his manner and converſation, as ſet him higher in the royal notice and favour, than any of the courtiers his rivals, notwithſtanding they all aimed at the ſame turn, and ſome of them even excelled in it. In the view of heightening their pleaſures, our author, among the reſt, did not neglect to exert his talents in writing. The productions of his pen were ſome plays, and ſeveral delicately tender amorous poems (d); in which, the ſoftneſs of the verſes was ſo exquiſite, as to be called by the Duke of Buckingham Sedley's Witchcraft. There were no marks of genius or true poetry to be deſcried; the art wholly conſiſted in raiſing looſe thoughts and lewd deſires without giving any alarm, and ſo the poiſon worked gently and irreſiſtibly [C]. Our author, we may be ſure, did not eſcape the infection of his own art, or rather was firſt tainted himſelf, before he ſpread the infection to others. Diſſoluteneſs and debauchery were the ſcandalous characteriſtic of the times; and Sir Charles ambitioned to diſtinguiſh himſelf for being moſt extravagantly in the faſhion. He was confeſſedly the hero of the frolic with Lord Buckhurſt and Sir Thomas Ogle, in 1603, at a tavern in Bow-ſtreet Covent-garden (e), and as ſuch was fined heavier than his comrades, being ſentenced to pay five hundred pounds to his Majeſty; and to go completely through the part he had begun, he gave the Judge himſelf ſome highly indecent language (f); who thereupon aſking him, if he had ever read a book called the Compleat Gentleman, he replied, that he had read more books than his Lordſhip. However, ſome time before the day appointed for payment, Sir Charles deſired Mr Henry Killigrew *, and another gentleman, to apply to his Majeſty to have the fine remitted; which, 'tis ſaid, they promiſed, but inſtead of ſupplicating in their friend's behalf, they begged the money for themſelves, and did not abate him a ſing'le farthing. By ſuch ways as theſe, Sir Charles found his eſtate much hurt; yet did he not ſeek to repair it by aſking favours of his Majeſty, the uſual reſource of favourite courtiers. He is ſaid, indeed, to have received ſome marks of the King's bounty (g). But the temper of that Prince is well known; he knew not how to deny an importunate craver, though he hated his forwardneſs; neither could he remember, to any good purpoſe, the ſilent indigence of his friend, though he applauded the modeſty of it. After the laſtmentioned affair, Sir Charles took a more ſerious turn, applied himſelf to buſineſs, and was choſen a Recruiter † of the Long Parliament in this reign, to ſerve for New Romney in Kent. He ſat likewiſe in the three ſucceeding Parliaments of the ſame reign, and was a frequent ſpeaker in them. We find him alſo in the Houſe of Commons in the ſucceeding reign of King James the Second, whoſe attempts upon the conſtitution he vigorouſly withſtood. When the defeat of the rebels in the Weſt, under the Duke of Monmouth, made it neceſſary, in the language of the Court, to have a ſtanding army, it was oppoſed ſtrongly by the Country Party in the Parliament, among whom were the Earl of Dorſet and Sir Charles Sedley; one of which bore a great ſway in the Houſe of Peers, and the other in that of the Commons. Their intereſt was ſo great in both, eſpecially Sir Charles Sedley's, that the King, foreſeeing it would be a work of the greateſt difficulty, to gain their conſent for the payment of more troops than what were upon the eſtabliſhment of the laſt reign, contented himſelf with dropping the purſuit of it, by a diſſolution of the Parliament (h). In the ſame ſpirit, our patriot was very active in bringing on the Revolution. This was thought more extraordinary, as he had received favours from King James: But that Prince had taken a fancy to Sir Charles's daughter (tho' it ſeems ſhe was not very handſome ‖ [D]); and, in conſequence of

And if this be true, our exceptions may willingly fall upon the publiſher of the ſaid libel, who, by his additions, may abuſe us with a falſe ſtory; and therefore in ſome manner gives us occaſion to ſpare our cenſure on Sir Anthony, who was dead ſome time before the ſaid libel was publiſhed. The ſecond edition of it, printed at London, in 8vo. 1651, is dedicated to the ſaid noble lady, Elizabeth Sedley (1).

[B] He was admitted a Fellow-Commoner.] Was he then only a younger ſon, and his elder brother, Sir William †, ſtill living? Otherwiſe, as the eldeſt ſon of a Baronet, he would have had a right to be admitted a Nobleman, inferioris ordinis, by Archbiſhop Laud's ſtatutes: but, indeed, thoſe ſtatutes were little regarded at this time.

† So he is called in the preceding remark.

[C] The poiſon worked gently and irreſiſtibly.] We have a moſt picturesque deſcription of it in the following lines, by Wilmot Earl of Rocheſter.

Sedley has that prevailing, gentle, art,
That can, with a reſiſtleſs charm, impart,
The looſeſt wiſhes to the chaſteſt heart;
Raiſe ſuch a conflict, kindle ſuch a fire,
Betwixt declining virtue and deſire,
That the poor vanquiſh'd maid diſſolves away,
In dreams all night, in ſighs and tears all day (2).

(2) Imitation of the 10th ſatire of the firſt book of Horace, among Rocheſter's Poems.

[D] She was not very handſome.] She is ſatiriſed by the Earl of Dorſet, that beſt natured man with the worſt natured muſe, in the following lines; which, bitter as they are, intimate, however, that ſhe had been once, at leaſt, miſtreſs of a good face.

To

of his intrigues with her, he created Miſs Sedley Counteſs of Dorcheſter [E]. This honour, ſo far from pleaſing, greatly ſhocked Sir Charles; however libertine as himſelf had been, yet he could not bear the thoughts of his daughter's diſhonour; and, with regard to this her exaltation, he only conſidered it as rendering her more conſpicuouſly infamous. He therefore conceived a hatred for King James, and readily joined to diſpoſſeſs him of the throne [F]. Sir Charles lived many years after the Revolution in full poſſeſſion of his wit and humour, and was an agreeable companion to his death; which ſeems not to have happened before he had arrived to a good old age, and perhaps not much before the year 1722 (i); when his Works were publiſhed, in two volumes, 8vo. with a preface to the ſecond volume, by Mr Ayloff, a relation of the author's, who ſpeaks with pleaſure of the happineſs he had enjoyed in Sir Charles's company, during the then long interval of peace. We ſhall give ſome account of his Works below [G]; which, however cenſured, it is certain the author was, in Charles the Second's time, the oracle of the poets; and it was by his judgment every performance was approved or condemned: which made the King jeſtingly tell him, that Nature had given him a patent to be Apollo's Viceroy [H]. He was alſo a good friend to his brother poets (k).

(i) However, the ſtory, that he lived to the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, and died at an age near ninety, in Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. III. ſuggeſts at leaſt a great inconſiſtency.

(k) Among others, he was particularly inſtrumental in bringing Charles Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, into the notice of the world. That Earl's Memoirs, ubi ſupra.

To the Counteſs of Dorcheſter, miſtreſs to King James II.

Tell me, Dorinda, why ſo gay,
Why ſuch embroidery, fringe, and lace;
Can any dreſſes find a way,
To ſtop the approaches of decay,
And mend a ruin'd face.

Wilt thou ſtill ſparkle in the box,
Still ogle in the ring,
Can'ſt thou forget thy age and pox;
Can all that ſhines, in ſhells and rocks,
Make thee a fine young thing.

So have I ſeen, in larder dark,
Of veal a lucid loin,
Replete with many a brilliant ſpark,
As wiſe philoſophers remark,
At once both ſtink and ſhine (3).

[E] She was created Counteſs of Dorcheſter.] Biſhop Burnet, another dealer, like Wood, in ſecret hiſtory (4), introduces an account of this creation in the following ſtory. 'An accident happened, ſays he, at this time, 'that gave the Queen great offence, and put the King '[James] much out of countenance. The King continued to go ſtill to Mrs Sedley, and ſhe gained ſo 'much on him, that at laſt ſhe prevailed to be made 'Counteſs of Dorcheſter (5). As ſoon as the Queen 'heard of this, ſhe gave orders to bring all the prieſts 'that were admitted into a particular confidence, into 'her cloſet; and when ſhe had them all about her, 'ſhe ſent to deſire the King to come and ſpeak to her. 'When he came, he was ſurprized to ſee ſuch a company about her, but much more when they fell all on 'their knees before him, and the Queen break out 'into bitter mourning for this new honour, which 'they expected would be followed with the ſetting 'her up openly as miſtreſs. The Queen was then in 'an ill habit of body, and had an illneſs, that, as 'was thought, would end in a conſumption; and it 'was believed, that her illneſs was of ſuch a nature, 'that it gave a very melancholy preſage, that if ſhe 'ſhould live, ſhe could have no children; the prieſts 'aſſured the King, that ſuch a blemiſh in his life 'blaſted their deſigns, and the more it appeared, and 'the longer it was continued, the more ineffectual all 'their endeavours would prove. The King was much 'moved with this, and was out of countenance for 'what he had done; but to quiet them all, he pro'miſed them that he would ſee the lady no more, and 'pretended that he gave her this title in order to the 'breaking with her more decently; and when the 'Queen did not ſeem to believe this, he promiſed 'that he would ſend her to Ireland, which was done 'accordingly; but after a ſtay for ſome months, ſhe 'came over again, and the ill commerce was ſtill con'tinued (6). The prieſts, continues the Right Reve'rend Hiſtorian, no doubt were the more apprehenſive 'of this, becauſe ſhe was bold and lively, and was 'always treating them, and their proceedings, with 'great contempt.' After King James's abdication, ſhe married the Earl of Portmore (7).

(4) It is remarkable, that his Lordſhip is ſevere upon the Oxford antiquary for this very quality. So true it is, that two of a trade can never agree.

[G] Some account of his works.] Theſe are, beſides his poems and ſpeeches in Parliament, which have been already mentioned, the following plays. 1. The Mulberry-Garden, a comedy, acted by his Majeſty's ſervants, at the theatre royal, 1668; dedicated to the Dutcheſs of Richmond and Lenox. 2. Anthony and Cleopatra, a tragedy, acted at the Duke of York's theatre, 1667. This met with great applauſe. The ſtory is taken from Plutarch's life of Anthony. 3. Bellamira: or, The Miſtreſs, a comedy, acted by his Majeſty's ſervants, 1687. It is taken from Terence's Eunuch. While this play was acting, the roof of the playhouſe fell down, but very few were hurt, beſides the author, whoſe merry friend, Sir Fleetwood Shepherd, told him, there was ſo much fire in the play, that it blew up the Poet, houſe, and all: Sir Charles anſwered, No; the play is ſo heavy, it brought down the houſe, and buried the Poet in his own rubbiſh. 4. Beauty the Conqueror: or, The Death of Mark Anthony, a tragedy. To him are alſo aſcribed, 5. The Grumbler, a comedy of three acts; ſcene, Paris. And 6. The Tyrant King of Crete, a tragedy; both of them firſt printed with his works, in two volumes 8vo. 1722.

SELDEN [JOHN], the famed Antiquarian, was born December 16, 1584, at a ſmall village called Salvinton, near Tering, a ſea-port town in Suſſex; where his anceſtors, though not above the common rank, had lived for ſome time in good repute [A]. He was

(1) Mr Wood tells us he was a Plebeian, but excellently ſkilled in Muſic, and obtained his wife thereby. Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 179.

[A] A family of common rank.] In our author's epitaph wrote by himſelf, he obſerves that his father John Selden (1), ſon of Thomas Selden, was born in 1561; that he married Margaret, only daughter and heir of Thomas Baker of Ruſhington, deſcended from the equeſtrian family of that name in Kent; that from this match there iſſued beſides himſelf the eldeſt, two other ſons George and Henry, who both died in the cradle, was first put to the free-school at Chichester, and gave a remarkable specimen of his genius at ten years of age [B]; and at fourteen, the schoolmaster (a) seeing him fit for the university, recommended him to his brother Mr Anthony Barker, Fellow of New-college in Oxford, who had him admitted of Hart-hall [C] in 1598 (b). He went through his academical studies with unusual eagerness, absolutely mastering every difficulty that occurred to him in any of the sciences. He continued at the university four years; after which, fixing his choice upon the Law for his profession (c), he removed to Clifford's-Inn in 1602 (d); where, having instructed himself in the ordinary forms and practice of the Courts, he was admitted Socius of the Inner Temple in May 1604: but being perswaded that his talents did not suit for making a figure at the Bar, he resolved to pursue the bent of his inclinations, and employed himself in searching into the origin of the Law in all it's branches. This plan he pursued with indefatigable diligence and extraordinary success. The first fruits of his studies was, A Treatise of the Civil Government of our Island, before the coming in of the Normans, which he drew up in 1606. This being done at the age of two and twenty, when the manuscript was shewn to some persons versed in this kind of antiquities, it was much applauded (e), and esteemed an extraordinary performance for his years [D]. Continuing to push his researches the same way, he soon became acquainted with the most eminent in it [E], and published in a few years several other tracts relating to the same subject [F], and, in 1614, enriched the learned world with his incomparable piece upon the Titles of Honour [G]. This was followed by cradle, and an only daughter, afterwards married to John Bernard of Goring in Sussex, to whom she brought two boys and four girls, nephews and nieces to our author, who by his last Will bequeathed a hundred pounds to each of them.

[B] Specimen of his genius.] This was a smart epigram contained in a Latin distich, which was wrote over the door of the house where he was born, as follows:

(2) Dr Wilkins says it was still to be seen in his time.

Gratus, Honeste, mihi; non claudar, inito, sedebis;
Fur abeas, non sum facta soluta tibi (2).

The house it seems was distinguished by the name of Lacies. The practice of putting mottoes over doors was more in use at that time than it is at present. That which the late Lord Bolingbroke put over the door of his house aptly bespeaks the admiral genius of it's author (3). This of our author seems to be drawn in imitation of that famous one set over his school by Plato ἀδεὶς ἀγεωμέτρητος εἰσίτω. Let no one unskilled in geometry enter here; which he might not improbably have met with in some of his school books.

[C] Admitted of Hart-Hall.] This custom of tutors in colleges procuring chambers for their pupils in the neighbouring halls, has been already mentioned in the course of the present work (4). Dr Wilkins has given our author, besides Mr Barker, another tutor, Mr Thomas Young, but both Fellows of New-college.

[D] An extraordinary piece for his years.] The title runs thus: Analectôn Anglo-Britannicôn Libri duo; quibus ea maxime quæ ad civilem illius, quæ jam Anglia dicitur, Magnæ Britanniæ partis antiquitus administrationem, res domi publicas, sacras, profanas, statusque catastrophas usque ad Normanni adventum attinent, ex antiquis simul & neotericis deprompta, temporum juxta seriem digesta, historice & arctissime componuntur. It was put into the hands of a printer as soon as finished, but was not printed 'till 1616, at Francfort, and then so defective and incorrect, that he would not acknowledge it for his work (5). Degory Whear, Professor of history at Oxford, recommends it to young students, as a fit book to begin with in the study of the English history (6); but then he will find it necessary to consult others in many points, since the analectica do not so clearly account for the religion, government, and revolutions of state, as to give full satisfaction (7); and this is insinuated by our author, where he says it was his first piece, and not ill performed for one of his years, quod primo meum & ætatula non ita indignum (8).

[E] He became acquainted with some of the most eminent in it.] Dr Parr tells us (9), that Archbishop Usher became acquainted with him in his third voyage to England in 1609; therefore he must have been known to Camden and Sir Robert Cotton before that time; whether with Sir Henry Spelman so early may justly be doubted, since that knight did not settle in London 'till the year 1611 (10). But that he was not a member of the Society of Antiquaries, upon the revival of it in 1614 is highly probable, since his name is not expressly mentioned by Sir Henry Spelman in his account of it, a distinction which would surely have been made to his merit at that time: it seems a little hard to suppose him concluded in the words 'among others.' However that be, 'tis most likely that he was intimate very early with that Prince of Poets, as he calls him (11), Ben Jonson, who 'tis said, first gave him a true relish for Horace. Our author, whose ambition seems to have aimed at universal scholarship, did occasionally attempt to play the Poet, figuring it in Greek and Latin, as well as English verses, to his friends in various measures. On account of his prodigious learning, he is called the great dictator of learning of the English nation *: and for the same reason Sir John Suckling has given him the precedence in his session of poets.

[F] Tracts relating to the same subject.] These are first, Jani Anglorum facies altera; secondly, England's Epinomis; the latter of these served for a foundation to the former, and both were printed in 1610, 8vo. †, the former at his own expence, and dedicated to Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and Lord High Treasurer of England (12). Dr Adam Lyttleton, author of the Anglo-Latin, &c. dictionary, published a translation of it into English, with large notes, under the name of Redman Westcot, Gent. Lond. 1683, folio (13). They contain several curious remarks upon the English history under the Normans, but is observed, that the laws quoted in the Jani Anglorum, &c. are as faulty as Lambard's translation of them, and want William Somner's emendations (14). Our author published also, in 1610, a third tract, De Duello, or of single Combat ‡; and a fourth, intituled, Notes and illustrations on the first eighteen songs in Michael Drayton's Polyolbion, 1612, folio.

[G] Titles of honour.] This learned piece is dedicated to his friend Edward Heyward of Cardeston in Norfolk, Esq; who was his chamber-fellow in the Temple, and had prefixed a commendatory copy of verses in Latin, to Selden's Jani Anglorum, &c. and a Recommendatory Poem, by his friend Ben Jonson, is also prefixed to it. In the second edition printed in 1631, folio, there are many additions. It was reprinted there in 1672, folio. From this edition it was translated into Latin, by Simon-John Arnold, Inspector of the churches of the Bailywick of Sonenburg, and printed at Francfort 1696, 4to. And Monf. Briot (who published the French version of Sir Paul Rycaut's history of the Turks) had designed to translate it into French for the use of the French nobility ||, but was prevented by death. Dr John-Christopher Beeman took an occasion from it of writing a treatise upon the same subject; and Eric Mauritius in his Dissertationibus has one p. 237, de Nobilitate imprimis Germaniæ, in which the subjects of several of Mr Selden's chapters in this book, are handled in the same manner. Dr Nicolson observes, that 'as to what concerns our nobility and gentry, all that come within either of those lists by ſome notes on Sir John Forteſcue de Laudibus Legum Angliæ, and Sir Ralph Hengham's Sums, printed in 1616, 8vo. The next year, 1717, he publiſhed his Treatiſe upon the Idolatry of the Ancient Syrians [H]; and in the mean time he wrote a Diſſertation upon the State of the Jews, formerly living in England, publiſhed in Purchaſs's Pilgrimage [I] the ſame year. His reputation for profound learning was raiſed at this time to the higheſt pitch, and therefore the Clergy were greatly alarmed, by an attempt which he made to leſſen the general opinion of their divine right to tythes, in 1618. This was thought a matter of ſo much importance, that complaint being made of it to King James, his Majeſty was greatly incenſed thereby; and, when this firſt ſtorm ſeemed to be blown over, ‡ Hiſtorical Library.

‘ liſts will allow, that Mr Selden's Titles of Honour ‘ ought to be peruſed for the gaining of a general no- ‘ tion of the diſtinction of a degree, from an emperor ‘ down to a country gentleman ‡.’ Our author in this tract, col. 727, delivers his opinion, that the biſhops and other principal governors in the Church, were ſubject under William the Conqueror, to a military tenure, by act of Parliament: which is confirmed alſo, by a paſſage of William of Malmſbury, in vita Sci Wulſtani §. Dr White Kennett in his third Letter to Biſhop Merks, p. 85, takes notice of an inadvertency of our author, upon a paſſage from Froiſſard, which mentions the Cinque Pers d'Angleterre, who ſat at the table next the King. ‘ I know not, ſays Selden, what to make of this paſſage, though I cannot judge of it by any manuſcripts of him having none by me, yet I am forward to think Cinque Pers may be miſ-publiſhed in him for Cinquante Pers, which does not notify any eſtabliſhed but an accidental name only for thoſe that ſat with the King at that time.’ A ſtrange and remote conjecture, ſays Kennett, to make a plain thing ſeem intricate, for moſt certainly Froiſſart's placing the King at the head table at the coronation dinner, with the Cinque Pers at the ſecond table, and the commonalty of London at the third, muſt intend the Cinque Barons, or the Barons of the Cinque Ports, who then had, and ſtill have, that precedency of dining at every King's Coronation. The ſame author, in his Parochial Antiquites, p. 418, ſpeaking of the revenues, which were formerly given out of the profits of the county, for the better ſupport of the dignity of an Earl, convinces Selden in this Treatiſe of the Titles of Honour of a miſtake, in aſſerting, that Hugo de Aldithly Earl of Gloceſter, was not the firſt Earl, who by his creation-charter had this revenue granted him in lieu of the third penny out of the pleas of the county *.

§ C. 16. apud Anglicam Sacram, Vol. II. fol. 264.

* Before this book was finiſhed at the preſs, our author fell dangerouſly ill of a fever, but was recovered by the aſſiſtance of Dr Fludd, which he gratefully acknowledges in the dedication.

[H] Idolatry of the Ancient Syrians.] The title is De Diis Syris ſyntagmata duo. It was wrote as a commentary upon all the paſſages of the Old Teſtament, where mention is made of any of the heathen gods, as Bel, Aſtaroth, &c. and therefore beſides the Syrian, gives an account of the Arabian, Ægyptian, Perſian, African, and European Idolatry. The firſt edition was all bought up in a few years, whereupon Ludovicus de Dieu, Profeſſor of Hebrew at Leyden in Holland, wrote a letter to our author, deſiring leave for Elziver to print another edition there; Mr Selden complied with the requeſt (15), reviſed it, making ſome additions, and dedicated it to Daniel Heinſius, who aſſiſted de Dieu in the care of the preſs. This ſecond edition came out in 1629, 8vo. After this it was reprinted at Leippe in 1668, 8vo. and again in 1672, by the ſame editor Andrew Boyer. Dr Richard Mountagu (16) charged Selden, with having ſtolen a great part of this book out of Peter Faber's Semeſtres, but he vindicated himſelf from that imputation in the preface to the ſecond edition. Mr Le Clerc cenſures our author (17) for three miſtakes common to him, he ſays, with other writers upon the idolatry of the ancient nations. Firſt, that in treating of the hiſtory and deities of theſe nations, together with thoſe writers who might know ſomething of theſe matters, either by the advantage of the times and places of their living, or from the ancient hiſtories, he cites the Rabbins as of equal authority, who 'tis well known had no ancient remains of the writers of their nation, except the Old Teſtament, and never read the heathen authors to inform themſelves; but when they attempt to explain any place of the Old Teſtament, which alludes to the idolatry of the people bordering on the Jews, relate meer romantic ſtories, as if they were exactly true. Secondly, he taxes Selden, with perpetually confounding the gods of the Greeks with thoſe of the barbarous nations, without making the leaſt diſtinction. The third error, he ſays, is, that Selden and others admit in ſomes places, an allegorical meaning of the fables to repreſent under them certain myſteries. Dr Wilkins's edition has this advantage, that ſeveral additions are therein made from the author's manuſcripts; among the reſt he had ſome manuſcript notes, by Henry James, given him by Dr Tanner, then Chancellor of Norwich, one of theſe was taken from Sir John Marſham's Canon Chronicon. p. 481, where mention being made of Selden's opinion, de ſorte fortunæ, that Leah's acclamation, when ſhe congratulates Zilpah's having born a child to Jacob, is to be underſtood of this ſors fortunæ, in the ſenſe of the aſtrologers: Sir John ſays, it does not ſuit with the age of the Patriarch, ſince there is no inſtance of the Syrian's art ſo ancient, unleſs we allow, with ſome, that all Mathematicks had their original in Seth. Again, in p. ii. c. 4 Selden ſays, the Mahometans borrowed their cuſtom of dedicating the ſixth day, Friday, to Venus from the Saracens, of which he makes a great doubt in lib iii. c. 20. de jure N. & G. apud Hebræos; Dr Wilkins has likewiſe given us a curious letter from Selden (18), in anſwer to one from Ben Jonſon, inquiring into the true ſenſe of that text in Deuteronomy xxii. 5. The woman ſhall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither ſhall a man put on a woman's garment; which Mr Selden is of opinion does not relate to confounding of the dreſs peculiar to each ſex, about their ordinary occaſions; obſerving that the original is, The woman ſhall not put on the armour of the man; a practice much uſed by the Syrians and other neighbouring nations to the Jews, in their idolatrous worſhip of Mars and Venus, to which he ſays this prohibition refers. In the ſame letter, having given the ſtate of this ſpecies of idolatrous practice among the Eaſtern nations, he excuſes himſelf from entring into that of the Greeks and Romans, ‘ Mr Jonſon being, ‘ as he ſays, a perfect maſter of the moſt recondite ‘ parts of that learning.’

[I] The ſtate of the Jews in Purchaſs's pilgrimage.] In this peice he obſerves, that the time when the Jews firſt came into England is uncertain; but that their condition was ſervile both before and after the Conqueſt; and it appears by the laws of the Confeſſor, that all they had was the king's right. In the 17th of Henry the Third, the Domus Converſorum [now the Rolls, in Chancery-lane] was built for the converts, their goods being then confiſcate to the Crown. Their cuſtom was to ſteal a young boy, whom they firſt circumciſed, and then crucified him at Eaſter. That five Jews were dragged at horſe tails, and hanged on gibbets, for this offence in the reign of Henry the Third; and in the the thirty-ninth of the ſame reign eighteen of them were executed for the like offence. That the lands they held were ſubject to executions for debt, when other lands were not; ſo that particular judges were aſſigned to hear and determine their cauſes, ſecundum leges & conſuetudines Judaiſmi, according to the laws and cuſtoms of Judaiſm. That in moſt caſes, two Chriſtians and two Jews were appointed public notaries, for ſigning all debts of contracts; which inſtruments were lodged in a cheſt, of which all four had each a different key. That they were expelled the kingdom for extortion and uſury in the eighteenth of Edward the Firſt. This tract is printed very defectuouſly in the Pilgrimage, as Dr Wilkins informs us, from Mr Prynne, who, in a piece intituled, A ſhort Demurrer to the Jews diſcontented Remitter, obſerves, that our author complained much of it. What complaints ſoever he might make of that kind they did not hinder him from inſcribing a copy of Greek verſes in commendation of Mr Purchaſs's work (19); and the marginal notes in that work are cited by Gataker, as made by Selden (20).

over, by the intereſt of his friend Ben Jonſon the poet, he was ſoon after proſecuted in the High-Commiſſion-Court, and obliged in a ſolemn manner to acknowledge himſelf guilty of a fault, in publiſhing that Hiſtory. The book was likewiſe ſuppreſſed, and he was reſtrained from printing any thing in defence of it [K]. In 1621, King James having [K] The divine right of tithes.] As our author's conduct had yet raiſed no ſuſpicion of his diſaffection to the Clergy, this piece, without any difficulty, obtained the licence from the Archbiſhop's chaplain; ſince he declares, in the preface, that it was not written to prove tithes are not due by divine right; or, that the laity may detain them, or ſtill enjoy impropriations, nor at all againſt the maintenance of the Clergy. But, after it came out, being more diligently peruſed, it was preſently obſerved, that though he had indeed, ſtrictly ſpeaking, given only the hiſtory of the authorities on each ſide, concerning that right, without making any abſolute determination upon it; yet in weighing theſe authorities, he had managed it ſo, that every one might plainly ſee which way the ballance turned in his hand; and that though he had cautiouſly forbore to decide the queſtion himſelf, yet he had taught others to do it for him. Complaints being made of this to the King, Sir Robert Naunton, Secretary of State, brought him a ſummons, about the middle of December, to appear before his Majeſty, then at Theobalds, in his return from Newmarket: being himſelf a ſtranger yet at Court, he got Ben Jonſon and Edward Heyward, of Ruffam, in Norfolk, Eſq; to introduce him. He ſtaid three days at Theobalds, where his Majeſty, among other things, objecting to an incidental paſſage in his book upon Chriſtmas day; wherein he had intimated, that the 25th of December was not the true birth-day of our Saviour, as had been aſſerted in the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions; and being apprehenſive, that the Preſbyterians might make an ill uſe of it againſt the obſervation of that feſtival, deſired Selden to write ſomething further upon it. In obedience to his Majeſty's requeſt, he drew up his piece upon Chriſt's birth-day, and preſented it to the King in a month's time (21); after hoping, as he ſays, his Majeſty's anger was well pacified: but, in the latter end of this month, he was cited before ſome Lords of the High Commiſſion, which occaſioned the following act to be regiſtered in that Court:

'Viceſimo octavo die menſis Januarii, anno domini, 'juxta computationem eccleſiæ Anglicanæ, 1618, 'coram Reverendiſſimo in Chriſto Patre Domino 'Georgio, Providentia divina, Cantuarienſi Archie- 'piſcopo, totius Angliæ Primate & Metropolitano; 'Johanne London, Lancelot Winton (22), & Johanne 'Roſſen, eadem providentia reſpective Epiſcopis; 'Johanne Bennet, Wilhelmo Bird, & Georgio New- 'man, Militibus in Manerio Epiſcopali apud Lam- 'behith, in comitatu Surrey, judicialiter ſedentibus, 'præſente Thoma Motterſhed, officiali dominorum 'contra Johannem Selden, de Interiori-Templo, 'London, Armigerum.

'This day appeared perſonally, John Selden, Eſq; 'and made his ſubmiſſion, all under his owne hand- 'writing, touching the publication of his book, in- 'tituled, The Hiſtory of Tithes; ſub tenore verborum 'ſequente.

'My good Lords,

'I moſt humbly acknowledge my errour, which 'I have committed, in publiſhing the Hiſtory of 'Tithes; and eſpecially in that I have at all, by 'ſhewing any interpretation of holy Scriptures, by 'meddling with Councils, Fathers, or Canons, or by 'what elſe ſoever occurres in it, offered any occaſion 'of argument againſt any right of maintenance, jure 'divino, of the miniſters of the Goſpell; beſeeching 'your Lordſhips to receive this ingenuous and humble 'acknowledgment, together with the unfeined pro- 'teſtation of my griefe, for that through it I have ſo 'incurred both his Majeſties and your Lordſhips diſ- 'pleaſure conceived againſt mee in behalfe of the 'Church of England.

'John Selden.'

The ſame Court proceeded alſo in the ſame ſpirit, to prohibit the ſale of the book; neither did the matter reſt here. The following year, Sir James Sempil, a Scotch Knight, publiſhed a treatiſe, intituled, Sacrilege ſacredly handled; in the appendix to which, he takes our author's hiſtory to taſk. 'By his 'title, ſays he, and by his preface, he diſclaims it to 'be written to prove, that tithes are not due by the 'law of God; wherefore, I have no reaſon to ſuſpect, 'much leſs to account him an adverſary to my poſition. 'The moſt is, he may doubt, (and ſo do many of 'great note) but he who ingenuouſly doubteth, may, 'when God pleaſeth, find reſolution (23).' In proceeding, he makes it a remark, that Mr Selden hath given us veram hiſtoriam, as he found it recorded, ſed hæc ipſa hiſtoria, non eſt vera, but leaves dangerous inſinuations and prejudicial impreſſions on the jus divinum (24). In return to this, our author drew up a paper, which he called The Admonition; wherein he treats the Scotch Knight with great contempt (25). About this time, his Majeſty being informed, that an anſwer to the hiſtory was preparing by Dr Richard Mountagu, he ſent for Mr Selden, and acquainting him with Dr Mountagu's deſign, ſaid theſe words, 'If thou preſumeſt, either thy ſelf, or by any of thy 'friends, to write any anſwer to that book, I will 'throw thee into priſon.' Our author had alſo ſome diſcourſe with the Marquis of Buckingham, upon this ſubject, at Greenwich; ſoon after which, he wrote a letter to that Miniſter (26), wherein he takes notice, that his Lordſhip had ſpoke of the great prejudice the Clergy had ſuffered by the publication of his book. 'I doubt not, ſays he, but both his Majeſtie and your 'Lordſhip have been moved only by information, to 'ſpeak of any ſuch prejudice; ſeek for an example 'of it, I dare venture the loſs of my life, if any ſuch 'can be produced.' The Marquis had alſo told him, that the Clergy alledged, that his whole book was written to no other purpoſe than to prove that tithes are not due, jure divino; to which he declares, that, 'in England, tithes are not recovered by that right; 'but I have, ſays he, delivered other mens concluſions 'for and againſt it, but have not judged of their reaſons, 'nor made any reſolution either way about them:' this the Marquis, it ſeems, had preſſed him to do, but he declined it, yet, ſo as ſufficiently to intimate his opinion. Complaining of his Majeſty's prohibition, he ſays, all that will, have liberty, (and ſome uſe it) to write and preach what they will againſt me, to abuſe my name, my perſon, my profeſſion, with as many falſehoods as they pleaſe, and my hands are tied: I muſt not ſo much as anſwer their calumnies. I am ſo far from writing more, that I have ſcarce ventured, for my own ſafety, ſo much as to ſay, they abuſe me, though I know it. However, animadverſions upon the hiſtory being publiſhed by Dr Tilleſly, Archdeacon of Rocheſter (27); who, in the preface, took notice of the abovementioned ſubmiſſion; Mr Selden wrote an anſwer, ſeveral copies of which he diſperſed among his friends, wherein he has theſe words: 'He tells 'you I made a ſubmiſſion in the Court of High Com- 'miſſion. That I was ever preſent in that Court, or 'called thither, as I live, it is more than I know; but 'I wonder not that the doctor ſhould begin with 'playing falſe with you, it is common with him 'through the whole. I confeſs that I did moſt 'willingly acknowledge, not only before ſome Lords 'of the High Commiſſion (not in the High Commiſſion 'Court) but alſo to the Lords of his Majeſtie's Privy- 'Council, that I was moſt ſorry for the publiſhing of 'that hiſtory, becauſe it had offended; and his 'Majeſtie's moſt gracious favour towards me, received 'that ſatisfaction of the fault in ſo untimely printing 'it; and I profeſs ſtill to all the world, that I am 'ſorry for it; and ſo ſhould I have been, if I had 'publiſhed a moſt orthodox catechiſm that had 'offended; but what is that to the doctrinal con- 'ſequences of it, which the doctor talks of. Is there 'a ſyllable of it of leſs truth, becauſe I was ſorry for 'the publiſhing of it? Indeed, perhaps, by the 'doctor's Logic, there is; and juſt ſo might he prove, 'that there is more truth in his animadverſions, 'becauſe he was glad of the printing them, and be- 'cauſe he hopes, as he ſays, that my ſubmiſſion hath 'cleared my judgment, touching the right of tithes. 'What dream made him hope ſo? There is not a word 'of having, in his ſpeech to the Parliament, aſſerted that their privileges were originally grants from the Crown, Mr Selden was conſulted by the Houſe of Lords on that occaſion, who gave his opinion in favour of the Parliament; which being diſſolved in June, he was committed to the cuſtody of the Sheriff of London, as a principal promoter of the famous proteſt made by the Houſe of Commons, immediately before that diſſolution (f). During this confinement, which laſted only five weeks [L], he prepared the Hiſtory of Eadmer

'of tithes in that ſubmiſſion more than in mentioning 'the title; neither was my judgment at all in queſtion, 'but my publiſhing it, and this the doctor knows too, 'as I am aſſured: for the ſubmiſſion, he talks of, was 'through the favour of ſome of the Lords, (to whoſe 'noble regard towards me I owe all ſervice) given 'by me in writing in ſome ſix lines, leaſt by miſre-'ports of ſome ſuch as the doctor is, I might be 'injured, by falſe relations of what I ſhould ſpeak 'only, and copies of it I diſperſed into many hands; 'and I know the doctor hath ſeen one. In ſum, 'I was and am ſorry that I publiſhed it, and that 'I ſo gave occaſion to others to abuſe my hiſtory, 'by their falſe applications of ſome arguments; but 'there is not a paſſage in it, but that I ever did think 'and do now think to be moſt conſtant truth, as I have 'there delivered it.' An anſwer to Mr Selden, was publiſhed the ſame year by Dr Tilleſly in a ſecond edition of his Animadverſions; before which (in the title page is) in lieu of the two firſt chapters, purpoſely pretermitted, is premiſed a catalogue of ſeventy two authors before the years 1215, maintaining the jus divinum of tithes, or more, to be paid to the prieſthood under the Goſpel. In the preface, he remarks Selden's prevarication, in diſtinguiſhing between making a ſubmiſſion to the Court, and in the Court; and then to anſwer even that ſhift produces a copy of the very act of the Court itſelf, as above. Dr Mountagu's learned performance came out likewiſe this year, 1621, intituled, Diatribæ upon the firſt part of the late hiſtory of tithes, dedicated to the King. He begun his attack upon our author's ſtrongeſt fort, and that which would moſt ſenſibly touch him; namely, his ſcholarſhip. In the introduction (28), addreſſed to Mr Selden, he writes thus, 'I can tell you, you are vehemently ſuſpected to ſteal other men's children, and ſend them into the world for your own. Is all your own which your hiſtory repreſenteth? I can ſay, no: it is as your ſyntagma δεῖνον συνηρίσμενον, and you know what that is; if you will ſay it was not ſtolen, but borrowed, I will ſay ſo too, and confeſs it lawful ſo long as you profeſs per quos profeceris, in what place you had it and of whom. But to drive away, without leave, other men's cattle out of their grounds; for a man to employ or ſell them in markets as his own, to alter or embezzle the marks of them, as Siſyphus and Autolycus uſed of old, to draw them backward into dens and caves with Cacus by the tails; and laſt of all, which is worſt of all, to deny them upon enquiry and demand; this is not thrift, but theft, that is, as I take it, flat felony; is it not ſo in law? Yet well fare a little ingenuity at laſt. You profeſs yourſelf beholden to Mr Allen, of Glouceſter-Hall; you are very much; and you acknowledged it unto that worthy gentleman, Sir Robert Cotton (29); you could not but profeſs this, becauſe it was apparent, that you owed much unto his excellent library, that magazine of Antiquity; and do you not owe much alſo to his pains, as well as to his books? I do but aſk you the queſtion, who did mark out, with black lead, in his manuſcripts, all places, concerning tithes, with one mark, as other paſſages with another.' In the ſame vein, the doctor ſuggeſts his taking, at ſecond hand, paſſages from Plutarch in Lucullo, and in Camillo Diodorus Siculus, lib. v.; and Herodotus in Clio; of Xenophon and Pliny, from Dr Carleton's book of tithes; beſides, continues he, you are to be taxed deeply for dealing ungenteely and unthankfully with your much admired, and almoſt deified, Joſeph Scaliger, your whole diſcourſe of Jewiſh tithing is transfuſed out of his Diatriba, even the very inſtances and examples are the ſame. Likewiſe, in the body of the work (30), he keeps up the ſame ſtrain. 'Good 'counſel, ſays he, was given you, before you 'meddled with the hiſtory of tithes, not to begin it, 'by a friend of your's and mine, in Somerſetſhire, 'which you would not follow (31).' This laſt ſtroke is evidently in return to our author's alledging in his preface, that his book had been ſhewn to, and approved by, men of the beſt learning, and even ſuch as were (as he terms them) Decimatiſſimi. The other repartees are given to be even with him for reproaching the Clergy with their ignorance; as if they had nothing but beard, title, and habit; as alſo for the character which he gives of his piece, that it was drawn from originals never before ſhewn. He ſpeaks very ſlightly, without naming them, of all that had gone before him upon this ſubject. Theſe were, 1. The anatomy of Anania's and Sapphira's Sacrilege, by Robert Goſtwicke, 1616, 4to. 2. The Writers of the Goſpel ſay, Tithes are due to the Miniſters of the Word by that Word, by Foulke Roberts, B D. Camb. 1613, 4to. 3. Tithes examined and proved to be due by Divine Right, by George Carleton, 1611, 4to. 4. Biſhop Andrews alſo had written to prove the ſame in his tract, de Decimis, printed among his works (32). Biſhop Kennett, in his Parochial Antiquities, ſays, this tract leaſt deſerves Selden's name. But Dr Thomaſin (33), declares, that he was the firſt that left off trifling upon this ſubject, primus qui hic deſipere deſiit; and he received the following letter from Dr Langbain, in relation to it, to this purpoſe, That although the learned world differed about the divine right of tithes, yet the legal right was greatly ſtrengthened by what he had ſaid: ſome, whoſe fears led them thereto, inquired of me, what I thought of this legal right; to whom I had no better anſwer, than to ſend them to your Hiſtory of Tithes; this will ſeem ſtrange to them, but I make no doubt, but that work, which has greatly deſtroyed the divine right, will build up the legal right moſt firmly; and if that ſhould be allowed to be the principal deſign of that book, I ſhould not diſpair of it's meeting with good ſucceſs *. The three firſt chapters of this Hiſtory were turned into Latin, by Mr Le Clerc, and inſerted in his Commentaries upon the Pentateuch, with corrections.

[L] Laſted only five weeks.] After ſome time, he ſent to Biſhop Williams, then Lord-Keeper, deſiring his intereſt with the Marquis of Buckingham, with which he readily complied, and diſpatched Mr Selden's letter incloſed in one to that favourite, wherein, having firſt applied for the releaſe of the Earl of Southampton, committed to his own cuſtody, he proceeds thus: 'Now poor Mr Selden falls to the 'ſame letter of mercy, and humbly petitions your 'Lordſhip's mediation and furtherance. He and the 'world take notice of that favour your Lordſhip hath 'ever afforded my motions; and myſelf, without the 'motion of any, do ſo addreſs my language to in-'treat for him The which I do the more boldly, 'becauſe, by his letter incloſed, he hath abſolutely 'denied, that ever he gave the leaſt approbation of 'that power and judicature lately uſurped by the 'Houſe of Commons. My Lord, the man hath ex-'cellent parts, which may be diverted from an affecta-'tion of pleaſing idle people, to do ſome good and 'uſeful ſervice to his Majeſty. He is but young, and 'it is the firſt offence that ever he committed againſt 'the King. I preſume, therefore, to leave him to 'your Lordſhip's mercy and charity.' Accordingly, ſays Dr Hacket (34), he was releaſed by the next packet, that came from the Court in progreſs. Our author's own account of this matter is very agreeable to this letter; he tells us, that after five weeks impriſonment, he was ſent for to Court; where, coming before the King, he was examined by ſome of the Council, and aſked particularly, what power the Parliament had without the King? Biſhop Andrews, being preſent, ſtood his friend againſt that enſnaring queſtion, and further aſſured his Majeſty, that he had been falſly accuſed. This ſeems to be the ground of attributing his diſcharge, as ſome do (35), to this laſt Biſhop, without mentioning the former, which perhaps did not occur to thoſe writers. This letter of Biſhop Williams helps to explain Selden's meaning; where he ſuggeſts, that when he was ſent for by the Parliament, he ſpoke freely, as well in defence of the prerogative, as of their Eadmer for the preſs (g), and it was publiſhed in 1623 [M], in folio, with a dedication to the Lord Keeper Williams; wherein he gratefully acknowledges that Biſhop's favour, in procuring his releaſement. He was choſen Member of Parliament for Lancaſter on the 12th of February the ſame year; but there happening no occurrence which called for his profound knowledge in the conſtitution of his country, he ſtuck cloſe to his books, not ſuffering the diviſions of the times to interrupt him in the purſuit of his darling ſtudies (b). In the ſame humour, he obſtinately refuſed to comply with an order of the ſociety of the Inner Temple, appointing him Reader at Lyon's-Inn in 1624 [N]. In the next Parliament that was called the following year, upon the acceſſion of King Charles the Firſt to the Throne, Mr Selden was returned a Burgeſs for Great-Bedwin in Wiltſhire (i). In this Parliament, he declared himſelf warmly againſt the Duke of Buckingham; and in the enſuing Parliament, which was called the next year, 1626, being elected again for the ſame borough, he was firſt choſen of the committee for drawing up articles of impeachment againſt that Miniſter, and afterwards appointed one of the managers for the Houſe of Commons at his tryal [O]. After the Parliament was diſſolved, the King being their privileges (36). Dr Wilkins tells us, he complained then, that the King's mind was alienated from his Parliament, by his courtiers; I wiſh he had given us his vouchers for it. Rapin obſerves, that this attempt of King James, to ſtretch the prerogative, increaſed the number of State-Puritans, as he calls them, greatly, which was inconſiderable before the diſſolution of this Parliament; and that, joining with the Church-Puritans, they became formidable (37). Among the former, he reckons Mr Selden as a principal one. However, that be, 'tis certain, he very much abhorred the principles of the latter. For, when Dr Tilleſly charged him with ſome Puritanical conceits, he very briſkly anſwers, he hopes that was not pointed to him; 'For, ſays he, I was never 'yet, I truſt, either mad enough or fool enough 'to deſerve that name (38).'

[M] Eadmer was publiſhed in 1623.] In the dedication, after ſpeaking of the odium raiſed againſt him on account of his Hiſtory of Tithes, in ſuch a manner as muſt be grounded upon a knowledge, that his patron thought with him upon that ſubject, he expreſſes his gratitude to Williams in theſe terms: Non modo inſigni benignitate, atque ea opportuniſſime prius fere quam tibi omnino innoteſcerem, in ſummis primæ reipublicæ faſtigiis poſitus me obſtrinxiſti, ſed fronte etiam continenter exporrecto variatim, & perpetuo mibi non defuiſti, etiamnum accumulare gratuito. The title of this piece is, Spicilegium in Eadmeri vi libros hiſtoriarum; conſiſting of explanatory notes upon that author, whoſe obſcurity had before buried him in oblivion (39). It was reprinted in 1673, at the end of the life of St Anſelm. Dr Nicolſon obſerves, that the laws of the Conqueror are here wretchedly tranſlated. But theſe were afterwards publiſhed more correctly, by Sir Henry Spelman. Then Abram Wheelock, Profeſſor of Arabic, at Cambridge, publiſhed them with Selden's Latin verſion, in ſua Archaionomia. The editor of the manuſcript of the Croyland Monaſtery added them to his work without a verſion, p. 88. Nath. Bacon wrote a commentary upon them, in his Diſcourſe hiſtorical, of the uniformity of the government of England, part i. cap. 50, 51, 52. They were publiſhed by Dr Brady, with an Engliſh verſion, in his introduction to the old Engliſh hiſtory †. Laſtly, a new edition was given of them by Dr David Wilkins, in his edition of the Anglo-Saxon laws.

[N] He refuſed to read at Lyons-inn.] This is entered in the regiſter of the Inner-Temple, under Michaelmas term, that year, as follows: 'Whereas 'an order was made at the Bench-table this term, 'ſince the laſt Parliament (40); and entered into the 'Buttery-Book in theſe words:

'Jovis 21 die Octobris, 1624.

'Memorandum, That whereas John Selden, Eſq; 'one of the Utter-Barriſters of this Houſe, was in 'Trinity term laſt choſen Reader of Lyon's-inn, by 'the Gentlemen of the ſame Houſe, according to the 'order of the houſe; which he then refuſed to take 'upon him, and perform the ſame, without ſome 'ſufficient cauſe or good reaſon, notwithſtanding 'many courteous and fair perſuaſions and admonitions 'by the Maſters of the Bench made to him; for 'which cauſe, he having been twice convented be-'fore the Maſters of the Bench, it was then ordered, 'that there ſhould be a ne recipiatur entered upon 'his name, which was done accordingly; and in 'reſpect the Bench was not then full, the further 'proceedings againſt him were reſpited until this term. 'Now, this day, being called again to the table, he 'doth abſolutely refuſe to read; the Maſters of the 'Bench, taking into conſideration his contempt and 'offence; and for that it is without precedent, that 'any man elected to read in Chancery has been diſ-'charged in like caſe, much leſs has with ſuch 'wilfulneſs refuſed the ſame; have ordered that he 'preſently pay to this Houſe the ſum of twenty pounds 'fine, and that he ſtand and be diſabled ever to be 'called to the Bench or to be a Reader of this Houſe. 'Now at this Parliament the ſaid order is confirmed. 'And it is further ordered, that if any of this Houſe, 'who ſhall hereafter be choſen to read in Chancery, 'ſhall refuſe to read, every ſuch offender ſhall be 'fined, and be diſabled to be called to the Bench, or 'to be a Reader of this Houſe.'

However, in Michaelmas term, 1632, it was ordered, that 'Mr Selden ſhall ſtand enabled and 'be capable of any preferment in the Houſe, in ſuch 'a manner as other Utter-Barriſters of this Houſe are, 'to all intents and purpoſes, any former act of Parlia-'ment to the contrary notwithſtanding.' Accordingly, he was called to the Bench in Michaelmas term following.

[O] One of the managers againſt the Duke of Bucks.] Six articles being brought in againſt him by Dr Samuel Turner, they were explained by our author, as well as Sir Thomas Wentworth and William Noy. At laſt, it being voted that common fame was ſufficient to ground an impeachment upon; May 8, 1626, the Commons ſent up thirteen articles to the Lords; of which Selden had the defence of the fourth and fifth. They related to the diſcharge of his office of Lord-High-Admiral; as firſt, for not guarding the ſeas. In proving this to belong to the office of Lord-High-Admiral, he takes notice, that the ſeas of England and Ireland are part of the demeſne and poſſeſſions of the Crown of England; and that thereby, the Admiral had not only juriſdiction, as in the caſe of the Admirals of France and Spain, but aſſerts, that the laws of the States of Genoa, Catalonia, and other maritime parts of Spain; as alſo the maritime towns of Germany, Zealand, Holland, Friezland, Denmark, Norway, and divers other parts of the Empire, ſhew that the kings of England, by reaſon that their ſaid realm hath uſed, time out of mind, to be in peaceable poſſeſſion of the ſeas of England and of the iſlands belonging to them; and altho', ſays he, Grotius, the Hollander, writes of purpoſe to deſtroy all dominion in the Eaſtern ocean, yet he ſpeaks nothing againſt the dominion of our Engliſh ſeas; however, he hath been miſrepreſented, but expreſsly elſewhere ſaith, Meta Britannicis littora ſunt oris. The utmoſt limits of the dominions of the Crown of England are the ſhores of the neighbouring countries. Epiſc. p. 7. and a correct copy of this conference is given by Dugdale, in Origines Juridicales; and by Henry Wharton, in Anglia Sacra, Vol. I. p. 334. Again, in p. 1683. Selden makes Godwin, when he wrote De Præſulibus, to be Biſhop of Landaff, whereas he was only then Subdean of Exeter, and was made a Biſhop by Queen Elizabeth upon writing that book.

being adviſed to impoſe a loan by virtue of his prerogotive, Mr Selden was very active in oppoſing that meaſure, prevented the printing of Dr Sibthorp's ſermon in defence of it [P], and November 22, 1627, and pleaded at the King's-Bench as Counſel for Mr Hampden [Q], who had been impriſoned for refuſing to ſubmit to it. In the third Parliament of King Charles the Firſt, our author ſat as one of the repreſentatives a ſecond time for Lancaſter (k), when he had a principal ſhare in all the leading ſteps towards preparing and eſtabliſhing the famous Petition of Right [R]; which being granted, and a prorogation enſuing for a ſupply. 3. To go himſelf upon great occaſions to ſea. He then proceeds to eſtimate the greatneſs of the Duke's offence, by the conſequences of it; which were, 1. The loſſes ſuſtained by the Merchants. 2. The weakneſs of the naval ſtrength. 3. The neglect of chivalry not regarded nor rewarded. 4. The decay of trade. 5. The loſs of the quiet poſſeſſion of ſo large a territory as the ſeas of England and Ireland, by the free uſe of which the ancient glory and greatneſs of the Crown of England hath ſo conſtantly ſubſiſted. He concludes, with giving inſtances of the Parliament's juriſdiction in theſe matters. The conſequences he obſerves, beſides the damage of the Merchants, and the diſcouragements to thoſe that are ſubject to the marine juriſdiction, that it tends to place an abſolute authority in the Admiral, without law or legal courſe, over the ſhips and goods of all Merchants whatſoever (41); and inſtances in the Duke of Suffolk, who being adjudged in Parliament for treaſon, in Edward the Sixth's time, it was alledged, among other things, that he took to his own uſe goods piratically taken, and expreſsly againſt an order by the Lord Protector, and of the whole Council, whereunto his hand had been ſet for the reſtitution of them.

(41) The fifth article againſt the Duke was, the ſtaying the ſhip called Peter of Newhaven, and detaining part of her cargo. This he pleads to be againſt all laws marine of common merchants, and therefore againſt the law of nations.

[P] He hindred the printing of Sibthorp's ſermon.] This famous ſermon being preached at the aſſizes at Northampton, February 22, 1626; the author firſt offered it to Archbiſhop Abbot for a licence, and being refuſed, he applied to the Biſhop of London, whoſe chaplain, Dr Worral, a man of great learning, ſigned an imprimatur; but before he returned it to the party, he ſent the ſermon, with a letter, to Selden, deſiring his opinion of it. Selden having peruſed the ſermon, and not caring to give his opinion in writing, ſent for Worral, and ſaid to him, 'What 'have you done here? You have given your approbation 'to a book full of errors; which if they were true, 'there could be no meum & tuum in England, no 'body could have any property; and upon a change 'of the times, when the paſt tranſactions will be 'brought under examination, you will certainly be 'hanged for this imprimatur.' The other then aſking him, in a fright, what could be done, ſince his name was actually ſet to it; Selden adviſed him to be at the pains of erafing his name ſo perfectly that no traces of it might be diſcernible; which was done accordingly, and the ſermon was not printed 'till 1628 (42).

(42) Life, by Dr Wilkins.

[Q] He was counſel for Mr Hampden.] In his ſpeech on this occaſion, our author obſerves, among other things, that if Magna Charta, cap. xxix. was fully executed, as it ought to be, every man would enjoy his liberty better than he does. The law ſays expreſsly, no free man ſhall be impriſoned without due proceſs of law; the words are ſecundum legem terræ; by which muſt be meant, either by preſentment or indictment; for without that interpretation, the free man will have no privilege above the villain, which both the King and the Barons had, and could impriſon for it; but if I impriſon another man's villain, that villain may have an action of falſe impriſonment againſt me.

[R] Leading ſteps to the petition of right.] Before the meeting of this Parliament, our author made a long ſpeech or argument concerning the Habeas Corpus (43); and upon the aſſembling of the Parliament, March 17, 1727, when the debates upon the impriſonment of Hampden and others begun in the Houſe, March 25, 1628, he got up in great warmth, ſaying, I riſe not to make an argument in this point, the greateſt that ever was in this place or elſewhere. He then obſerves, that the liberties of the ſubject had been violated in other inſtances, but never, he was confident, had been adjudged before, that upon any commitment of the King and Council, no enlargement can be. I do deſire, ſays he, that ſome of the King's Counſel may ſpeak what they can, to ſatisfy us of the power (44). This being done by the Sollicitor General, on the twenty-ſeventh, our author, the next day, made a reply, wherein he took notice, that, in ſpeaking of the judgements given in the King's Bench, the precedents are ſaid to be miſrecited; let a ſub committee ſearch into judgments and precedents. I heard here a quouſque, and there is nothing but a remittitur. The courſe of the officer is to enter quouſque, &c. and that is, 'till they be delivered by law, and is all the judgment that can be. Upon this a ſub-committee was appointed, and he was choſen chairman; and upon his reporting to the Houſe, that in the precedents relating to Habeas Corpus they found only a remittitur; thoſe reſolutions were made which are printed in Ruſhworth (45). In the debate upon confinement, April 2, Selden ſpoke thus: 'For the liberties already concluded (which are the chief) let us determine how we ſhall right ourſelves in them; for confinement is different from impriſonment, and it is againſt the the law, that any ſhould be confined to his houſe or elſewhere. Every Chriſtide many are confined to their houſes by proclamation, this will be taken for a law. I know not what you call a puniſhment, but that there is ſome ground of it, or mention in acts of Parliament, law books, or records, but for this I find none. Alſo, it is a puniſhment itſelf. Bracton, p. 36. lib. de corona; ſpeaking of abjuration, ſaith that exilium eſt triplex, certorum locorum interdictio, ſive villæ, vel comitatus, &c. So it is with him a baniſhment. In 35 of Eliz. there was then a deſire of this Houſe to confine recuſants, and they petitioned the Queen about it; but that was not held a ſafe way, but they made a law for it. In all the queſtions ſtirred among us, we cannot better determine them, than by comparing ourſelves to villains. A villain regardant muſt not be out of his lord's manor, 22 Hen. VI. 31. but liber homo eſt qui poteſt ire quo vult *, ſaith the book of Domeſday. Jews were confined to certain places, as here in London to the Old Jewry. So Civilians have perpetual priſons and coërcive priſons, upon judgments in court, and carcer domeſticus, and that is in Engliſh confinement. Madmen may be confined. Upon which it was ordered, that no perſon ſhould be confined in his houſe or elſewhere. This was ſucceeded by another queſtion, concerning the violation of the property of goods by deputy-lieutenants. Sir Thomas Wentworth calling for the queſtion to determine this article. Selden ſaid, I am glad to hear we are ſo nigh the queſtion, but we are near a miſtake; no man doth this but as deputy-lieutenant, he is but deputy to the lord-lieutenant, and his authority is derived from him. Thoſe people who are deputy-lieutenants have orders of direction from their lords. After theſe debates it was reſolved, that neither the King, nor any of his miniſters, could impoſe a tax, or tribute, or ſubſidy, upon the people, without conſent of Parliament. Thurſday April 3, in the debate upon the employment of the ſubject in foreign ſervices (46), Selden obſerved, that there were three courſes for levying forces, (1.) By calling them together who were bound to ſerve upon tenure. (2.) By ſending to thoſe who by covenant were engaged to ſerve the King. (3.) By this new way of preſſing. Upon the firſt way he obſerves, that the Conqueror gave 6000 knights fees, at 20 l. a year each, to have armed men by their tenure, which he would not have done, if he could have compelled men by his prerogative. Theſe were obliged to ſerve the King upon any occaſion within the kingdom, but no man is to go out of his country but for defence of the realm. (2.) For the point of covenant with the King to ſerve him in his wars, thoſe only were obliged who held by tenure. The King's right of ſummoning them to go out of the realm, upon any other occaſion, was conteſted in Edward the Third's time. The Parliament declared againſt it. This was the way of raiſing forces from Edward II. to Henry VIII. The barons and and great men could raiſe 1000 men at any time. (3.) For preſſing one may tell whence it came. When covenants were in uſe, the great men could raiſe armed men; but when theſe great mens greatneſs ended, then their officers began to preſs. There is not a word in any ſtatute of any ſoldiers being preſſed or ſent away by compulſion, and ſo then the law knew no preſſing. Upon the votes of the Lower Houſe being ſent to the Upper Houſe, ſeveral conferences between the two Houſes enſuing, our author made a ſpeech at the firſt of theſe; and April 7, he made a long ſpeech, touching perſonal liberty, out of precedents, records, and reſolutions of Judges in former times. Upon this affair, one Kirton declared, that the Earl of Suffolk had ſaid, Selden deſerved to be hanged for erafing publick inſtruments, and promoting ſedition. To which Selden ſaid, 'As for erafing records, I hope no man believes I ever did it; I cannot gueſs what the lord means. I did deliver in whole copies of divers records, examined by myſelf and divers other gentlemen of this Houſe. Theſe I delivered into the Lords Houſe, and the Clerk of the Crown brought in the records of the office before the Lords. I deſire that it may be a meſſage from this Houſe to the Lords at the Bar, to make out a charge againſt the Lord that ſpoke this, and I hope we ſhall have juſtice.' This was done, but his Lordſhip denied the words. April 14, when the King's orders and inſtructions, about the right of arms, were publickly read in the Houſe, Selden ſaid, this matter is of the greateſt conſequence of any that we have yet meddled with. This concerns our lives. We find the Juſtices dare not meddle with the law, by reaſon of theſe commiſſions. The commiſſion concerns ſoldiers, and all diſſolute perſons that meddle with them. He made ſeveral ſpeeches upon this argument, in the debates that were held about it (47). May 14, in the debate about proſecuting Dr Mainwaring, for his ſermon, intituled Religion and Loyalty; it being moved in the committee, that an information ſhould be lodged againſt him, Mr Pym alledged, that this might create a diſpute between the two Houſes. Selden ſaid, we cannot fitly go otherwiſe than by the Lords; this is a temporal crime, to have Parliaments thus ſcandaled in pulpits. To go by bill I do not think fit. In ſuch caſes there was never any bill of attainder. In Henry the VIth's and Edward the IVth's time, many attainders were; but in the bills, time was given to the party to come in, or elſe to ſtand attainted. He may be fetched from the Convocation into the Lords Houſe, and there anſwer for himſelf, and then there may be a bill of attainder. Upon this queſtion, May 16, a bill was propoſed for reſtraining the tumults which might ariſe from miniſters of God's word; When Sir Henry Martyn was for maintaining the privileges of the Clergy, and quoting Magna Charta for them, Selden ſaid, as for Magna Charta, the Church has many liberties, but theſe liberties, by many acts of Parliament, are leſſened and varied. All Clergymen were not to be tried by the Laity, for any offence under treaſon; as for that, that miniſters muſt be under lay juriſdiction, they were ever in part, and, ſince the 2d of Hen. VIII. have been totally. As for the points of ſcandal, we do but the ſame as the canons, and all councils in former times, did. We have titles de concubinatu Epiſcoporum, & de ebrietate eorum; but I think the bill is not to paſs. May 20, an emendation being offered to the Petition of Right, concerning the oath ex officio, Mr Selden explained how that oath was unlawful, thus: This oath is not lawful. No new oath is lawful, that is not warranted by the common law, or by act of Parliament, the ground of this appears, by a reſolution in the Queen's time, that Under-Sheriffs did take oaths; but it was reſolved they could not, 'till the ſtatute was made of 13 Eliz 1. That Judges of Aſſize may take aſſizes and oaths in time of Lent and Advent, becauſe before that they could not. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 14. againſt hereſies, it is ſaid to be againſt juſtice and equity, that any man ſhould ſuffer without accuſation and witneſſes. It was never heard of, that at the firſt daſh a man ſhould be put to his oath, without accuſation or witneſs. May 21. upon the queſtion about the clauſe added to the Petition of Right by Biſhop Williams (48), Selden having ſhewn, by many inſtances, that ſuch a clauſe was unprecedented, and would render the whole petition fruſtrate, continues to anſwer the arguments urged in it's favour, thus: For this [ſaving of the King's ſovereignty] it was objected, that in the 28th of Edw. I. in the end of articuli ſuper chartas, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta, there is a clauſe, ſavant le droit & ſignory. The words are extant in that roll that is now extant, but but the original roll is not extant. In the bill there was no ſavant, but it was put in afterwards; and to prove this, it is true there is no parliament-roll of that year, yet we have hiſtories of that kind. In the library at Oxford, there is a journal of a Parliament of that very year, which mentions as much. Alſo in the publick library of Cambridge, there is a manuſcript that belonged to an abbey, 'tis alſo of the ſame year; it mentions the parliament, and the petition, and articulos quos petierunt, ſic confirmaverat Rex, ut in fine adderet ſalvo jure coronæ Regis, and it came by a proclamation ſo in London. When the people heard this clauſe added in the end, they fell into execrations for that addition, and the great Earls that went away ſatisfied from the Parliament, hearing of this, went to the King, and after it was cleared at the next Parliament. Now there is no Parliament-roll of this of that time. Only in one roll, at the end of Edw. III. there is a roll that recites not the Parliament bill, but the ſtatute that was the effect of the roll that was proclaimed. June 5, a meſſage being ſent from the King, requiring them not to enter upon any new buſineſs, Selden made ſeveral warm ſpeeches againſt the Duke of Bucks, of which the following is an extract. Let a declaration be drawn under four heads. (1.) Let us expreſs our dutiful carriage towards his Majeſty. (2.) Of our liberties that are violated. (3.) To preſent what the purpoſe of the Houſe was to have dealt in. (4.) To preſerve our aſſurance, that that great perſon, fearing himſelf to be queſtioned, did interpoſe himſelf, and cauſe the diſtraction. All this time, we have caſt a mantle upon what was done laſt Parliament; but now being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed with that which was then well begun (49). Ye know the charge that was laſt Parliament, to which he made an anſwer; but the particulars were ſufficient to demand judgment on that anſwer only. This debate held to the 14th of June, when Selden put the finiſhing hand to the reſolution which was taken, of petitioning his Majeſty againſt him, in theſe words. As for the laſt clauſe, concerning our grievances, it is certain that the power of the Duke is the cauſe of all this evil. Now we offer it, whether it be fit for ſo much power to be in one hand; but all here refer it to the exceſs of his power; let us mention the abuſe of his power, and pray that this man may be removed from his Majeſty. June 18, there happened a debate, whether the goods of baſtards dying inteſtate belonged to the King. Selden having ſeconded Sir Edward Coke againſt this prerogative, alledged, among other things, It is a prerogative I know attempted, but all men may be queſtioned by it; and then having ſhewn, that the inſtances alledged in favour of it, extend only to the King's ſervants and accomptants, he concludes thus: This prerogative is fetched from beyond ſea. In France, the King hath the goods of men inteſtate that are baſtards. He obſerves on this occaſion, that baſtard was originally not a term of reproach, and that King William the Conqueror, a baſtard from a mother whoſe name was Arlot, gave riſe to the appellative word harlot, i. e. ſtrumpet. June 21, Edmund Sawyer, Knt. a member of the Houſe, being found to have exacted a rate of 12d. a pound, againſt the goods of one Dawes, Selden ſpoke thus: I find theſe two things, (1.) His offence to the commonwealth; that is, his project, as far as he could, to double the book of rates. (2.) A ſcandal of his offence to this Houſe, to plot beforehand, that we might not know the truth; let it be reported to the Houſe; let us commit him to the Tower, and turn him out of the Houſe; 'tis ſubornation; let him alſo ſtand for ever diſabled to ſit here. Our juriſdiction here extends to the members of our own Houſe, to maintain the privileges of the Houſe, we can fine as well as the lords; and as they diſable Lords from ſitting there, ſo can we diſable any member of our Houſe from ſitting here.

Arundelian Marbles [S]. In the next ſeſſions, he continued among the warmeſt of the members in oppoſition to the Court [T], and joined vigorouſly in the remarkable proteſtation that was made by the Houſe of Commons, while the Speaker was held by force in the chair, and the doors locked [U]: ſoon after which he was committed to the Tower by an order of the Privy-Council, and his ſtudy ſealed up, March 24th, 1628. Here he was kept a cloſe priſoner for three months [W], but magnificently ſupported at the King's expence; and being afterwards allowed the uſe of ſuch books as he deſired, he proceeded in his ſtudies. On the third of October, 1629, a demand being made of ſecurity for his good behaviour, upon a propoſal of the Judges to diſcharge him (m), he ſteadily rejected that propoſition, as entirely unwarranted by Law; and continuing immovable in that reſolution, he was, in purſuance of his own ſuit at the King's Bench, in Hilary term, 1629, removed to the priſon of that Court, where he remained above a year (n), but had the liberty of going abroad in the day-time, obſerving the common rules of that priſon. It was at this time that he wrote his piece, De Succeſſionibus in Bona Defuncti, ſecundum Leges Hebræorum [X]; and he was now proſecuted in the Star-Chamber, for diſperſing a libel,

June 24, in the famous debate upon tonnage and poundage. Selden ſpoke as follows: The King's Counſel objected, that it was granted time out of mind to the King. I fear his Majeſty is told ſo, and ſome body doth aſcertain him ſo; but we may clear that, and ſhew how far it is from truth. As for 1 Eliz. it was ſo alſo in 1 Jac. but the words time out of mind are, that whereas Henry VII. and other your progenitors, have had ſome ſubſidies for the guarding of the ſeas; there was never a King but had ſome ſubſidies, and ſo in that ſenſe it is indeed time out of mind. This is a matter of free gift: for publick bills, the King ſaith, Le Roy le veut; for petitions of right, ſoit fait comme il eſt deſiré. For the bill of ſubſidy, it is thus; the King heartily thanks his ſubjects for their good wills. In all the bills for tonnage and poundage, it is the ſame anſwer ſave one, which was the 1ſt of Elizabeth; and, but for that only miſtake of the clerk, it hath ever had the ſame aſſent as the bill of ſubſidies *. Upon the 26th of June the Parliament was prorogued.

* All theſe extracts of our author's ſpeeches are printed from a MS. of Mr Pym, by Wilkins.

[S] Arundelian Marbles.] Selden was recommended to this work by his friend Sir Robert Cotton, to the Earl of Arundel, who had brought theſe excellent antique monuments from Conſtantinople the year before, and placed them in his houſe and gardens in the Strand: ſo that our author in this book gave a new treaſure to the learned world, which no doubt was the principal motive for his undertaking it. But the edition being found very faulty, after theſe monuments were removed to Oxford, another edition of them was printed by order of that Univerſity, and a third has been ſince printed by Michael Mattaire, Gent. (50). Selden's miſtakes were ſeverely cenſured by Tho. Lydiat, which, Mr Wood tells us, ſo much provoked our author, that when Lydiat was afterwards thrown into jail for a debt contracted by being bound for a relation, he refuſed to contribute any thing towards his diſcharge †.

[T] He appeared warm againſt the Court.] Feb. 12, complaining of the reſtraint put upon them, in ſelling books againſt Popery and Arminianiſm; and as the liberty of the preſs depended on a decree of the Star-Chamber only, Selden promoted the petition of the Printers, and propoſed that a law might be made about it; otherwiſe, he ſaid, the Printers and Bookſellers might, by virtue of that decree, be fined, impriſoned, and any ways ill uſed, contrary to the liberties of the ſubject. This was chiefly levelled at Archbiſhop Laud, who had the chief hand in theſe decrees (51).

(51) As appears by his article.

[U] Proteſtation, while the Speaker was held in the chair.] While the cauſe of Chambers, a member of the Houſe, was before the Star-Chamber, Selden furniſhed them with a precedent for impriſoning the Sheriff of London, for that ſeizure. He ſaid, indeed, he did not remember where one of the Sheriffs was impriſoned, but he did where they both were, upon Roll's complaint. Feb. 10, he ſaid, if there be any near the King, that doth miſrepreſent our actions, let the curſe light on him, not on us. I believe it is high time to vindicate ourſelves in this cauſe, elſe it is in vain for us to ſit here. Upon this ſpeech, a committee was appointed; and, on Feb 22, after a long and warm debate, a motion being made, to vote any ſuch ſeizure to be a breach of privilege, the Speaker refuſed to put the queſtion, ſaying, that it was contrary to the King's command. Mr Selden ſaid, Dare you not, Mr Speaker, put the queſtion, when we command you? If you will not put it, we muſt ſit ſtill. Thus we ſhall never be able to do any thing. They that come after, they may ſay they have the King's command not to do it. We ſit here, by the command of the King, under the Great Seal; and you are by his Majeſty, ſitting in his royal chair before both Houſes, appointed for our Speaker, now you refuſe to do your office. After which, the Speaker being held in the chair, and the doors locked, the proteſtation was read (52).

(52) For this, and more of this affair, we muſt refer to Mr Hampden's article.

[W] Cloſe priſoner for three months.] About a fortnight after his commitment, the Earls of Arundel, Dorſet, and Mancheſter were ſent with the Attorney to examine him more ſtrictly, and objecting to him ſome words ſpoken again the King's right to tonnage, he gave ſuch an anſwer, that the Earl of Dorſet, always his friend, told him, he hoped he would be releaſed, but was deceived; and in the Eaſter holidays, inſtead of an Habeas Corpus, which they pleaded for, it was hindered by a letter from his Majeſty, ordering the Lieutenant of the Tower to detain them in cloſe cuſtody, for a notable contempt (thoſe are the words) againſt us and our government; and for moving ſedition againſt us. This being ſent to the Judges, they were remanded to priſon, May 7; they remained cloſe priſoners 'till the latter end of November, when they were ſuffered to walk about the Tower; which Selden ſays he imagines was done to ſave expence, for they were, 'till this time, magnificently entertained at the King's charge *.

[X] De ſucceſſionibus, &c.] This piece is dedicated to Dr Laud, then Biſhop of London, whoſe library, he acknowledges, was of great help to him in it; and in the prologomena † he profeſſes his opinion againſt the Fanatics, that the only true way of interpreting ſcripture is by the Fathers; Cordatiores Chriſtianorum qui eccleſiæ Romanæ renunciarunt, idque ob compluria in ea ſancita ſeu ſententias repertas quæ ſibi viſa ſunt divinis contraria ſine prudenti priſcarum ejuſce eccleſiæ hiſtoriarum, annalium, Patrum, Conciliorum, Canonum, ſententiarum receptarum, uſus forenſis, id genus aliorum delectu, ſuam formari noluere. Et qui moroſe hæc & delectum hujuſmodi reſpuunt, ſui duntaxat ingenii vi ſacras literas temere explicantes, ridiculis atque impiis pacem Chriſtianam novationibus perturbare ſolere paſſim videmus. In libro de ſucceſſione in Pontificatum primo, cap. xii. he gives it as his opinion, that by the High-Prieſt mentioned in the Goſpel and the Acts of the Apoſtles, is not underſtood the High Prieſt properly, but the Prince or Ruler of the Synagogue; and that when mention is made of two High-Prieſts at the ſame time, it is to be underſtood of thoſe Rulers. This paſſage is attacked by Dr Hody, in his Caſe of Sees vacant by unjuſt or uncanonical Deprivation, ſtated. 'I deny, ſays he (53), Selden's conjecture 'to be true; and againſt it I offer the following con- 'ſtructions, 1. Neither Joſephus nor any of the 'Jewiſh writers any where tell us, that the High- 'Prieſts, properly ſo called, were deprived by the 'Romans of their power and authority in juridical 'matters, and confined to the offices of the temple. 'Selden does not pretend to the authority of any 'writer; and had there been any ſuch thing, Joſephus 'would certainly not have failed to have mentioned 'it; eſpecially, ſince he mentions, that in ſuch and 'ſuch parts of Judæa there were courts of judicature 'erected by the Romans. 2. Joſephus is ſo far from 'warranting any ſuch opinion, that he ſpeaks, through- 'out his whole Hiſtory, of the High-Prieſts, properly 'ſo called, as of perſons of great power and authority 'in libel, intituled, A Propoſition for his Majeſty's Service, to bridle the Impertinence of Parliaments, which was proved before the Court to be written by Sir Robert Dudley, in the preceding reign [Y]. Hereupon, the King made it one expreſſion of his joy, on the birth of Prince Charles, on the 29th of May, 1630, to diſcharge this cauſe. Our author taking this favourable opportunity, applied next day to the Earl of Portland, Lord-Treaſurer, who procured him to be removed to the Gate-Houſe in Weſtminſter, May 30 (o). By this means, he was ſo much at liberty, that he paſſed the long vacation at Wreſt [Z]. But when his habeas corpus was brought as uſual, in Michaelmas term enſuing, it was abſolutely refuſed by the Court as before; and the Judges complaining likewiſe of the illegality of this removal to the Gate-Houſe [AA], he was remanded by an order from them to his former priſon, where he continued, though with the ſame liberty as before, 'till May 1631; when, upon a diſpute in Law between the Earls of Arundel, Shrewſbury, Kent, and Pembroke, he was admitted to bail, to have the liberty of appearing in any of the Courts of Law, upon the buſineſs of that ſuit [BB]. After this, he was bailed from term to term, and never more detained in priſon; 'till at laſt, petitioning his Majeſty [CC] for the purpoſe, in the end of July, 1634, he was freed likewiſe from this bail, by the favour of Archbiſhop Laud, together with the Lord Treaſurer (p). During theſe troubles, he wrote his book De Jure Naturali & Gentium, juxta Diſciplinam Hebræorum [DD], as he did alſo his Uxor Hebraica *, and finiſhed the ſecond edition of his Titles of Honour. As he gave no freſh matter of provocation, the King's diſpleaſure againſt

'in civil affairs. 3. It is likewiſe confirmed by the 'frequent and continual changing of the High Prieſt 'under the Romans; for if they were not concerned 'in civil government, only in ſacred, how could 'they come under the diſpleaſure of the Romans. '4. When St Paul was told, that the perſon he had 'reviled was God's High-Prieſt, that is, High Prieſt 'properly ſo called, he ſtrait infers, that he was the 'ruler of the people. 5. Thoſe difficult places of 'ſcripture, upon which Selden's opinion is grounded, 'may fairly admit of another explication.' Againſt this opinion of our author, that there were two rulers of the ſynagogue, one ſtiled the Prince, and the other the Father of it, and that the high-prieſthood of Annas was a civil dignity; Baſnage, who oppoſes it, obſerves, that Lightfoot was once of this opinion, but retracted it afterwards, when he perceived that there was none of that name ever Prince of the ſynagogue. Baſnage thinks Annas and Caiaphas were both High-Prieſts, only held the office yearly by turns (54).

[Y] He was proſecuted in the Star Chamber.] Dr Wilkins tells us, that he was impriſoned, and, together with him, the Earls of Bedford and Clare, Sir Robert Cotton, and Mr [Oliver] St John. Our author mentions this proſecution (55), but ſays nothing of any impriſonment upon that account, and 'tis certain he was already a priſoner on another account. Another author tells us, this paper was induſtriouſly ſpread about by the Fanatics, to diſcover the importance of Parliaments; and how, by the peoples purſes, to keep the nation in a good defence againſt the King's enemies. And it was ſuggeſted, that the King had not only ſuch a deſign on foot, but that by him, or his means, this plot firſt took birth; whereas, if any credit may be given to Sir David Foulis, one not ignorant of State affairs, being therein ſeveral times employed by King James, it was diſcovered by him that this paper was contrived ſeveral years before; to wit, about 1613, by Sir Robert Dudley, then living at Florence, with the title of the Duke of Northumberland. The ſame author alſo informs us, that this paper was afterwards publiſhed under the title of Strafford's Plot diſcovered, &c. endeavouring thereby to make that Earl odious to the people, as if he had been the compoſer of it, and that only becauſe a copy of it was found in his ſtudy (56).

[AA] The illegality of his removal to the Gate-houſe.] When the Judges returned to their ſeats in Weſtminſter-Hall, in Michaelmas term, they ſent for the Marſhal of the King's-Bench Priſon, and demanded his priſoner, Selden; and when he produced the Treaſurer's warrant, he was reprimanded by the Court for letting his priſoner go without a breve from them; obſerving, that if the King's mandate had been notified to the Court in time, it might eaſily have been done in due form of that Court. The Judges added, that in this buſineſs, the Clerk of the Crown ſhould have given the writ to be ſubſcribed by the Judges, upon their return to Weſtminſter; and leaſt the like error ſhould be committed for the future, the Court ſent Whitlock to the Treaſurer, alledging, that Selden deſpiſed all Courts and forms of law, and that he had ſuggeſted to him [the Treaſurer] this new and irregular method of removing himſelf only in the ſpirit of oppoſing them; the Treaſurer profeſſed, that he would not have granted this favour to Selden, had not that gentleman aſſured him, that it was quite regular; and, therefore, as it was by no means in the King's deſire to oppoſe their proceedings in form, he delivered him up to their pleaſure; whereupon, a writ was made out for remanding him to the King's-Bench Priſon (58).

[BB] Was admitted to appear in any of the Courts of Law.] At this time, he was retained as counſel for Donald, Lord Rea, in the famous cauſe of treaſon, againſt David Ramſay; the King determined that it ſhould be decided by arms, and in duello, or ſingle combat. In order to which, the cauſe being according to form, in that way of trial, to be adjudged by the Civil Law; Selden, as a common Lawyer, was excluded. He ſpoke this year, in Hilary term, as counſel, before the Houſe of Lords (59), for Charles Longueville, in his application for the Barony of Grey and Ruthien; the claim to which, was derived from his mother, Suſanna, ſiſter to Henry, Earl of Kent, who died without iſſue; but the cauſe was given againſt him, in favour of the Earl of Kent (60).

[CC] Upon petitioning his Majeſty, &c.] Dr Wilkins well obſerves, that this petition was not at all inconſiſtent with his former refuſal to petition upon the firſt commitment. That would have implied an acknowledgment of the offence for which he was ſaid, in the King's letter, to be committed, which was even dangerous; but that order was ſuperſeded by the ſecond, for admitting him to go out of priſon upon bail for his ſurrendering on demand (61).

(61) The bail were Herbert and Gardiner, both of the Inner-Temple; they were bound in 150 l. each, and himſelf in 500 l. Vindiciæ, &c. p. 1433.

[DD] His book, De Jure Naturali & Gentium, &c.] This piece has been variouſly cenſured. Le Clerc (62) and Barbeyrac (63) condemn it, not only for that obſcurity of ſtile and perplexity of method obſerved in all our author's performances; but becauſe in it he derives not his principles from the light of reaſon; laying down as certain, the Rabbinical tradition, concerning the ſeven precepts, ſaid by them to be given by God to Noah for all mankind to obſerve. The author of a piece, intituled, Polygamia Triumphans (64), goes ſtill further, and obſerving, that Selden here aſſerts, polygamy not to be contrary to the law of nature (65), produces his teſtimony in defence of that practice. On the other hand, this piece is highly applauded by Puffendorf, who declares, that our author would have been equal to the beſt writers, if he had undertaken to accommodate the jus naturale to mankind in general, with the ſame accuracy as he has done to the traditions of the Jews.

against him gradually wore away; and the ſhare that he took, as one of the committee for managing the maſk exhibited by the gentlemen of the Inns of Court, before their Majeſties, on Candlemas-night, 1633, muſt needs have been very acceptable to them, ſince it was done expreſsly to ſhew, how greatly thoſe gentlemen diſapproved of William Prynne's Hiſtriomaſtix (q). Beſides, there was a particular reaſon againſt ſuffering ſuch a mark of the King's unkindneſs towards him, to ſtand any longer unremoved. For the diſputes with the Dutch about the herring-fiſhery, began at this time to run to an extremity, the latter having lately ſet up a claim to that fiſhery, even upon the Britiſh coaſt. Theſe pretenſions were grounded chiefly upon the arguments in a treatiſe of the celebrated Hugo Grotius, wherein this liberty was aſſerted to be a matter of common right. It was well known, that our author had compoſed a piece in defence of the King's dominion over the Britiſh ſeas, not long after the firſt riſe of this diſpute in the preceding reign (r); but ſome accidents having hindered the immediate publication of it [EE], he was eaſily prevailed on (s), at this juncture, to put it to the preſs, where it was finiſhed in the beginning of the year 1636 (t) [FF]; and a copy of it placed among the records of the Crown, in (q) See Lord Chancellor Clarendon's article.

(r) This ſhips had been formerly granted by a treaty in 1495, between Henry VII. and Philip Archduke of Auſtria, who was then ſovereign of the Netherlands. Article XIV. of that treaty, long before the Dutch had erected themſelves into a ſovereign power, by the treaty of Munſter in 1654.

(t) An edition of it was printed the ſame year in Holland, with a defence of their right prefixed by Boxhornius, intituled, Apologia pro Navigationibus Hollandorum, &c. The importation of it into England was prohibited.

[EE] The publication was hindered by ſome accidents.] This treatiſe was written in the year 1618, as we are told by our author himſelf, as follows: That when he brought his diſcourſe on Chriſtmas-day to the King, the Lord-High-Admiral hearing that he had written a diſcourſe about the dominion of the ſea, in the ſpring of 1618, ordered him to finiſh it and preſent it to his Majeſty; and that, in the ſummer of the ſame year, he preſented a fair copy of it, at his Majeſty's own requeſt, who gave it to the Lord-High-Admiral, to be communicated to Sir Henry Martyn, Judge of the Admiralty-court; who having read it, had the pen in his hand to give an imprimatur, but threw it down; ſaying, it was better to be done by the King himſelf: that his Majeſty was about ſigning it when he ſtopt ſuddenly; ſaying, he remembered ſomething in the book about the northern ſea, which might perhaps diſpleaſe his brother of Denmark, which he would not willingly do, ſince he owed him a large ſum of money already, and muſt deſire him to lend more ſhortly. It was the laſt chapter of the ſecond book. 'I accordingly, ſays Selden, took it again, and filled up the method again in a ſhort time, and carried it to Court; where having waited for his Majeſtie often, and long, in the Admiralty-chamber to no purpoſe, and not being received as I thought was my due, I put the book in my ſtudy, giving over all thoughts of deſiring it to be publiſhed; neither, concludes he, did I ever, of my own accord, go to the Admiral afterwards. A little after this, William, Earl of Pembroke, a friend of mine, had the book to review it, and reſtoring it in a month or two, it lay by me in oblivion for ten years and upwards. I heard, and and believe it, that ſome creatures of the Admiral's had inſinuated, that I had in this book ſaid ſomething in diminution of the juriſdiction of the Admiralty, when he grew looſe about the publication of it, behaved himſelf unfriendly to me at Court. I was told alſo, by ſome about the King, that his Majeſtie, upon ſecond thoughts, imagined it might be of ſome diſſervice to him with the United Provinces. In the beginning of the ſpring 1619, the Marquis of Bucks ſent for me into the Parliament-chamber, and aſked me in good humour, why I had not brought my book to be licenced; I anſwered, that I had often waited in his chamber to no purpoſe, both for him and my admiſſion to his Majeſty; upon which ill uſage I had abſtained from Court. He then invited me thither, but I never had more words with him upon the ſubject afterwards (66).

[FF] It was publiſhed in 1636.] The dedication to King Charles the Firſt, in which he gives the following account of the hiſtory of the publication, is wrote, not only in elegant Latin, but in a courtly and polite addreſs: Divi parentis tui juſſu tentata olim adumbrataque, inter ſebedas ſive neglectas ſive dijectas per annos amplius ſedecim mecum latuit, ut imperfecta nimis, ſic etiam ceu intermortua. Poſtquam autem recognitioni ejus inſtaurationique totus, idque ea intentiſſimi ſtudii alacritate, qua, clementiſſimis utpote Majeſtatis tuæ auſpiciis excitus, carere nequibam, per menſes aliquot vacaveram, non tam ut evocata revixit, quam plane renata eſt. Tot ſcilicet in ea ſunt emendata, tot diſpuncta, recocta, limata, immutata, tanta inſuper acceſſio ubique facta eſt, ut priſtino, quantum erat, lineamento plerumque diſparente, exeat omnino nova; tam nimirum ex iterata origine, quam ex natura ſui, tua. Archdeacon Nicholſon thinks, that the Engliſh right, excluſive both of French and Dutch, from fiſhing in the four ſeas, is clearly made out, from the records againſt the objections of Hugo Grotius, in his Mare liberum. But we muſt obſerve, that Grotius's book had been of ſo much ſervice to our author, as to bring the queſtion to this point, that if an occupancy could be proved it would conſtitute a right; that point, therefore, was laboured by Selden from the records. 'Tis in this view, that Selden denies that he oppoſes Hugo Grotius in this diſpute. He ſpeaks highly of that great man's abilities, Virum ingentis eruditionis, & rerum divinarum humanarumque (id eſt juris) ſcientiſſimum *; and again, ſpeaking of the ſpeech made in defence of the Engliſh right to the fiſhery, by Sir Dudley Carleton, againſt Grotius; and of this latter's complaint, of an inſinuation in that ſpeech, as if he was impriſoned to deter other from defending his opinion, our author has theſe words: Dicta hæc ſhere non tam in Hugonem Grotium, quam in ipſum (quod perperam oſtenditur) communionis marinæ jus naturale: cui expreſſius & ſimplicius multi quam ipſe patrocinantur, tam docte & ingenioſe nemo †. Grotius too ſpeaks in the like handſome manner of Selden's work, in a letter from Paris this year (67). Ex Magna Britannia nihil habes boni, poſt marmora Arundeliana, niſi quod Johannes Seldenus, ſpectatum jam multis operibus ingenium, mare clauſum addidit mari libero oppoſitum, ſi forte legeris. Eo in libro multa ſane eruditione aſperſo, totum id mare quod ab Anglia ad littora uſque Hiſpaniæ, Galliæ, Belgicæ, Germaniæ, Daniæ, patet, Anglico *regno jure proprietatis vindicat. In another letter alſo from Paris, May 7, 1636, he writes thus to his brother William Grotius: Seldenus ſumpſerit egregium libri ſui epiphonema, in quo locutiones meas figuratas oppoſuit feriis. Ego vero illi & humano & erudito, quod me & humane & erudite tractaverit, multum debeo. Epigrammate tamen hoc puto me non læſiſſe jus amicitiæ, quæ inter nos eſt:

In the ſecond book of this treatiſe, cap. vii. our author endeavours to prove, that the words litus Saxonicum, in the Notitia, which was under the dominion of the comes littoris Saxonici per Britanniam, comprehends, not only the Britiſh, but the oppoſite ſhore of France and Holland. The words littoris Saxonici being equivalent to limitis tranſmarini. This Mr Somner thinks is a miſtake of our author's, in not underſtanding rightly the words in the Notitia. 'Indeed, ſays he, admitting limes for litus, Britannicus had been enough; nay, it had been proper, 'and only proper, without any further paraphraſe ſuch 'as that of per Britanniam. But if we grant that 'the litus tranſmarinum was the limes, or limit, or 'frontier, of the Britiſh maritime court's dominion; 'then of neceſſary conſequence, the ports, havens, 'creeks, harbours, &c. on the oppoſite coaſt one

In the mean time, how hearty ſoever Mr Selden ſhewed himſelf, by this performance, in maintaining the prerogative of the Britiſh ſceptre, againſt the encroachment of foreigners, yet he was by no means well affected to the Court doctrine of the King's power, to levy money for this purpoſe upon the ſubject, without their own conſent. He had been a confeſſor in that cauſe, and continued ſtill as much out of humour as ever with the oppoſers of it. Therefore, in the two enſuing Parliaments, of 1640 and 1641, being returned for the Univerſity of Oxford, he both ſpoke and acted with the ſame ſpirit, not only in procuring ſatisfaction for himſelf and his fellow-ſufferers, from the Court, but joined with the moſt violent, in proſecuting the Earl of Strafford and Archbiſhop Laud (w) [HH]. He was likewiſe very inſtrumental in depriving the Biſhops of (u) General Hiſtory of England.

(w) Several of his ſpeeches are printed in the laſt edition of his Works, by Dr Wilkins.

'and all were appertaining to the Britons; nor might 'the Dutch, French, or thoſe of Britain Armoric, 'then, or at any time ſince, juſtly challenge or uſe 'them as their own, nor of right ſtir or put out 'to ſea by them, much leſs claim or have any toll, 'fallage, tax, tribute, impoſt, wreck, or any other 'cuſtoms or rights in any part of the maritime tracts 'there; nor yet might they or any other nations, 'without a treſpaſs, or as invaders of the Britiſh 'empire and dominions, paſs or repaſs by the channel 'though never ſo near the tranſmarine ſhore; nor, 'but by curteſy of the Britons, make any other 'uſe of it, which for all that I have ſeen or read, 'I cannot believe to have been obſerved or practiſed 'in thoſe times (68).' Dr Wilkins well obſerves, that this matter has been ſettled by treaties between the two nations, which are much more firm than the arguments of theſe learned men. However, a Stateſman muſt not be unacquainted with them, in the view of being prepared in caſe of future diſputes. Archdeacon Nicolſon tells us, that when our author penned this book, he was not ſuch an inveterate enemy to the prerogative doctrine of ſhip-money as afterwards; for he profeſſedly aſſerts, that in defence of their ſovereignty at ſea, our Kings conſtantly practiſed the levying great ſums of money on their ſubjects, without the concurrence of their Parliaments. And he inſinuates, that it was upon this account that the book was commanded by the King's council to be laid up as an ineſtimable jewel among the choice records which concerned the Crown. In anſwer to this, Dr Wilkins obſerves, that the levies for the ſupport of the navy, 'till the end of Henry the Second's reign, are mentioned by our author, from the laws and ſtatutes of the times when he mentions them, and 'tis well known were not paſſed without conſent of the people; ſo that there was no occaſion for taking expreſs notice of the matter, and had it been otherwiſe underſtood at that time, when our author oppoſed the ſhip money without an act of Parliament, can it be imagined that his antagoniſts would have been ſilent on this head, and yet we do not find that this was ever done or that this book was then ever objected to him. It was afterwards † tranſlated into Engliſh by Merchmont Nedham, the ſcurrilous news writer, as Mr Wood calls him, who ſuppreſſed the Epiſtle Dedicatory, interlarding it with ſeveral treaſonable comments and falſe gloſſes of his own; beſides which, he added a few old evidences, ſuppoſed to be communicated to him by John Bradſhaw, of infamous memory. After the Reſtoration it was reviſed and corrected by James Howel, Hiſtoriographer Royal. The book was attacked by Theodorus Graſwinckell, Knight of the order of St Mark, and Advocate of the Finances in Holland, in Vindiciis Maris Liberi, &c. (69); in which the author having taxed Selden with proſtituting his pen to the ſervice of the Court-party in order to obtain his liberty, cites the following words, as from Petrus Burgus: Seldenus nuperrime integrum opus ſcripſit *; and then adds, ſays Selden, moſt inſolently, Non mirum: virorum enim ille inter ſæculi noſtri primicerios numerandus, & meliori fortuna dignus, fati ſui infelicitate, carceris ſe non digni colonus erat. Hinc ut exiret, ſeque libertati amiſſæ redonandum ſperare daretur, animum ad ſcribendum appulit, &

Id ſibi negotii credidit ſolum dari,
Domino ut placerent quos feciſſet fabulas;

Neque talia agitantem ſucceſſus deſtituit ‖. And the following year Selden publiſhed, in his own defence, his Vindiciæ, &c. which we have often quoted in the courſe of this memoir, and of which ſomething more will be remarked above at the end of the text.

[II] A piece in defence of the Presbyterian parity.] This was a passage in the annals of Eutychius, concerning the government of the Church of Alexandria. Our author printed it with this pompous title, Eutychii Egyptii Patriarchæ Orthodoxorum Alexandrini, Scriptoris ut in Oriente admodum vetusti ac illustris ita in Occidente tum pauciſſimis visi, tum perraro auditi, Ecclesiæ suæ origines, ex ejusdem Arabico nunc primum typis edidit, ac versione & commentario auxit Johannes Seldenus;

——Non si quid TURBIDA ROMA,
Elevet, accedas; examenve improba in ILLA
Castiges trutina.—— PERS.

In the preface he observes, that the disputes about the order of Bishops, turn greatly upon the authenticity of a passage in the eighty-fifth epistle of St Jerom, relating to the Patriarchate of the Church of Alexandria; in which, any superiority of order is expressly denied. He obtrudes this author as an Egyptian Bede, and makes no doubt but these annals were, for the most part, taken out of the archives of the Church of Alexandria; whereas it appears, from the history of Abul Farajus, published by Dr Pococke, that in the tenth century, when Eutyches wrote, there were no archives of that Church. For when the city was taken by the Saracens, many years before, in the reign of Sultan Omar; his General, Annas Elmal, as by a particular order from his master, commanded all the books and writings in it to be sent to the baths as fuel for heating them, where they were all consumed. Eutyches was extremely ignorant in the ecclesiastical affairs of that time, to which Selden's passage relates; as is evident from the instance of Origen, than whom no person was more famous in the Church at that time, the latter part of the third century, when he flourished; yet Eutyches has thrust him down to the middle of the sixth century, makes a Bishop of him, and brings him to the Council of Constantinople, called by the Emperor Justinian, to be there condemned. Selden had imbibed a great opinion of this author from Erpenius, who, as he says, gave him a copy of it at London; to whom it was recommended by Isaac Casaubon as a very useful work. Selden, therefore, in the year 1652, prevailed with Dr Pococke to undertake a translation of it, and put that, with the original Arabic, to press at Oxford, engaging to be at the whole expence of the edition himself. Dr Langbaine, Provost of Queen's college, was also desired by him to assist in the business. This appears from several letters of this last to Selden, (72) Epist. 732. in one of which (72), upon Pococke's disliking one of the characters of the Arabic font at Oxford, and desiring him to procure a new puncheon and matrice, with five or six pounds of letters, the request was preferred to Selden, by Dr Langbaine, in the words of the Friars in Chaucer, who begged money for completing their cloyster;

Now help Thomas, for him that harrow'd hell,
Or else mote we all our books sell.

In another, wrote to Dr Pococke, presently after Selden's death, Langbaine acquaints him, that he saw Selden the day before he died, 'who told me, says he, in the hearing of one of his executors, Mr Hayward, how he had disposed of his impression of Eutychius to you and myself; and so he did, by a codicil made to his will in June 1653. I mentioned to him, continues the doctor, that he had often spoken of intended notes; upon that, he gave orders, that all letters or notes concerning that author should be delivered to us.' The codicil here mentioned runs thus: 'Whereas 'there is in the press, at Oxford, Eutychius, Patri-'arch of Alexandria, his annals, in Arabic and Latin, 'under the care of my loving friends Dr Gerard 'Langbaine and Dr Edward Pococke, Professor of 'Hebrew and Arabic; if at the time of my decease 'there should not be left by me, in the hands of 'Dr Langbaine, money enough to pay for the 'finishing of the work at the press, my mind and 'will is, that so much shall be given into his hands 'to finish it, as he and Dr Pococke shall direct. 'And further, that when the impression is finished, 'all and every the copies of the said impression be 'left wholly to the said Langbaine and Pococke; 'to whom I hereby give and bequeath them, 'which I think will be five hundred in number. 'There are indentures in my behalf, between the said 'Dr Langbaine and the Printer, which direct the 'business for the charge of the press (73).' Accordingly, Dr Pococke published the work in 1658, in two volumes folio; in the preface to which, he declares, that it was not undertaken by him from his own choice and inclination, but upon the persuasion and importunity of Selden. That there are many fabulous things in these annals relating to Ancient History, and that the author gives as absurd accounts of the transactions in the western parts of the world, as our Western writers do commonly in those of the Eastern. As to the paragraph of these annals, that had been printed and published by Selden, who had done it very incorrectly; Dr Pococke sets it in a true light (74). In justice to Selden, his picture was put before this edition, and underneath Illustrissimo Johanne Seldeno ☞ μαγάσιλε Chorago. Whence the compiler of the Bodleian catalogue of printed books, in 1674, imagined, that Selden began this translation, which was only finished by Pococke, whereas the word choragus (75) expresses in a beautiful figure, that it was printed at Selden's charge.

(73) Dr Langbaine died in 1654.

(74) It had been censured before by Abraham Echellensis, Part I. c. ix. p. 29. and Morinus de Ordinationibus, P. iii. c. 7. and Renaudot.

(75) It denotes originally the person who was at the charge of exhibiting the scenes in a play, and is taken from Plautus in Perf. Act I. scene 3. where Saturn asks, τοῦτον ornamenta, Tom. answers, Ab: Chorago. Du Pin has made the same mistake in Bibl. Eccles. Tom. VIII.

[KK] And further upon the power and privileges of Parliaments.] These are, 1. A discourse concerning the rights and privileges of the Subjects, in a conference desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses, in the Year 1628. 2. The privileges of the Baronage of England when they sit in Parliament. 3. A brief discourse concerning the power of Peers and Commoners in Parliament, in point of Judicature.

[LL] The King's commission of array.] Lord Clarendon assures us, that our author 'declared himself very positively with much sharpness against it, as a thing expressly without any authority of law; the statute upon which, being, as he said, repealed; and discoursed very much of the ill consequence which might result by submitting to it. He answered the arguments which had been used to support it, and easily prevailed with the House not to like a proceeding, which they knew was intended to do them hurt, and to lessen their authority. But his authority and reputation prevailed much further than in the House, and begot a prejudice against it in many well-affected without doors. When the King was informed of it, he was much troubled, having looked upon Mr Selden as well disposed to his service (76). We have in the General Dictionary a letter of Selden's to Lord Falkland, wrote, after the vote against this commission had passed the House, as follows:

(76) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. I. p. 667. edit. 1707.

'That of the vote your Lordship speaks of is true, 'as I presume you by this time see in print. But in 'what degree it was grounded on my authority (which 'doubtless goes here for little or nothing), you may 'ghesse by this, that I was not in the House at that 'voteing, or any other time when any agitation or 'mention of it was there, 'till yesterday, being 'Tuesday, when there was a declaration voted 'there to shew the reasons of that vote. But it 'is true, that I was of the committee of Lords 'and Commons, to whom some ten days since it was 'referred. And among the rest, my opinion (and 'that upon the best consideration I could make) was, 'that it is against law; and so is my opinion still, 'which shall, as in all other things, change, when 'I shall be taught the contrary. Your Lordship had 'sooner received answere, if I could sooner have 'put my reasons together, and have them transcribed: 'As they are, I humbly thus offer them to you, and 'am most devotely,

But that jealouſy appearing upon examination not to be well grounded [OO], and our author having, moreover, purged himſelf by his oath, on the ſixth of June; when the Aſſembly of Divines at Weſtminſter was erected on the 12th of that month, he was appointed one of the lay-members, and frequently ſat in it [PP]. [MM] Yet he aſſerted the King's prerogative over the militia.] The laſt mentioned Noble Hiſtorian informs us, that 'Lord Falkland, with his Majeſty's 'leave, wrote a friendly letter to Mr Selden, to 'know his reaſon, why, in ſuch a conjuncture, whate- 'ver his opinions were, he would oppoſe the ſubmiſſion 'to the commiſſion of array, which no body could 'deny to have had it's original from law, and which 'many learned men ſtill believed to be very legal, to 'make way for the eſtabliſhment of an ordinance 'concerning the militia, which had no manner of 'pretence to right. He anſwered this letter very 'frankly, as a man who had believed himſelf in the 'right upon the commiſſion of array, and that the 'arguments he had uſed againſt it could not be 'anſwered, ſumming up ſome of thoſe arguments in 'as few words as they could be comprehended in. 'But then he did as frankly inveigh at the ordinance 'for the militia, which he ſaid was without any 'ſhadow of law or pretence of precedent, and moſt 'deſtructive to the government of the kingdom; and 'he did acknowledge, that he had been the more 'inclined to make that diſcourſe in the Houſe againſt 'the commiſſion, that he might the more freely argue 'againſt the ordinance, which was to be conſidered 'upon a day then appointed; and was moſt confident 'that he ſhould likewiſe overthrow the ordinance, 'which he confeſſed could be leſs ſupported; and 'he did believe, that it would be much better, if 'both were rejected, than if either of them ſhould 'ſtand and remain uncontrolled. But his confidence 'deceived him, and he quickly found, that they who 'ſuffered themſelves to be intirely governed by his 'reaſon, when thoſe concluſions reſulted from it, 'which contributed to their own deſigns, would not 'at all be guided by it, or ſubmit to it, when it 'perſuaded that which contradicted, and would diſ- 'appoint thoſe deſigns. And ſo upon the day ap- 'pointed for the debate of their ordinance, when 'he applied all his faculties to the convincing them 'of the illegality and monſtrouſneſs of it, by arguments 'at leaſt as clear and demonſtrable as his former had been, 'they made no impreſſion upon them, but were eaſily 'anſwered by thoſe who with moſt paſſion inſiſted 'on their own ſenſe; he had ſatisfied them very well 'when he concurred with them in judgment, but his 'reaſons were weak, when he croſſed their reſolu- 'tions. So moſt men, concludes his Lordſhip, are 'deceived in being too reaſonable; concluding, that 'reaſon will prevail upon thoſe men to ſubmit to 'what is right and juſt, who have no other conſidera- 'tion of right or juſt, but as it advances their intereſt, 'or complies with their humour and paſſion (78).'

[NN] He declined the firſt overture of that intention.] This is grounded upon the following letter, to the Marquis of Hertford, concerning that affair, copied by the ſame hand as the former to Lord Falkland, from Mr Harding's papers.

'My Lord,

'I received from his moſt excellent Majeſtie a 'command for my waiting on him at York; and he is 'moſt graciouſly pleaſed to ſay, that I ſhould make as 'much haſte as my health will permit. I have been 'for many weeks, my Lord, very ill, and am ſtill 'ſo infirme, that I have not ſo much as any hope of 'being able to endure any kind of travell, much leſs 'ſuch a journey. Yet if that were all, I ſhould 'willingly venture any loſs of myſelf rather than not 'perform my duty to his Majeſtie. But if I were 'able to come, I call God to witneſſe, I have no 'apprehenſion of any poſſibilitie of doing his Majeſtie 'ſervice there. On the other ſide, it is moſt probable 'or rather apparent, that a member of the Houſe 'of Commons, and of my condition, by coming 'thither, might thereby ſoon be a cauſe of ſome 'very unſeaſonable diſturbance; by this name, I call 'whatſoever will, at this time, (as this would) doubt- 'leſſe, occaſion ſome further or other differences 'twixt 'his Majeſtie and that Houſe. My legal and humble 'affections to his Majeſtie and his ſervice are, and ſhall 'be, as great and as hearty as any man's; and, there- 'fore, when I am able, I ſhall really expreſſe them. 'But I beſeech your Lordſhip, be pleaſed, upon what 'I have here repreſented, to preſerve me from his 'Majeſtie's diſpleaſure, which I hope too, from his moſt 'excellent goodneſs towards me; your Lordſhip's great 'and continual favours to me, imboldned me to make 'this ſuit; which granted, will be a ſingular happineſs 'to,

Your Lordſhip's moſt humble ſervant,

J. S.

This letter is very agreeable to, and even confirms, Lord Clarendon's account of this affair; which is, that 'the Lord Falkland and himſelf, to whom his Majeſty referred the conſideration of a proper perſon for it, did not doubt of Mr Selden's affection to the King; but withal, they knew him ſo well, that they concluded he would abſolutely refuſe the place if it were offered him. He was, continues his Lordſhip, in years, and of a tender conſtitution; he had for many years enjoyed his eaſe, which he loved; he was rich, and would not have made a journey to York, or have lain out of his own bed for any preferment which he had never affected (79).'

[OO] The ſuſpicion appeared not to be well grounded.] Mr Waller was examined about it; and 'being aſked, whether Selden, Pierpoint, White- 'locke, and others by name, were acquainted with 'that deſign; he anſwered, that they were not; but 'that he came one evening to Selden's ſtudy, where 'Pierpoint and Whitelocke then were with Selden, 'on purpoſe to impart it to them all; and ſpeaking 'of ſuch a thing in general terms, thoſe gentlemen 'did ſo inveigh againſt any ſuch thing as treachery 'and baſeneſs, and that which might be the occaſion 'of ſhedding much blood, that he ſaid, he durſt not, 'for the awe and reſpect which he had for Selden 'and the reſt, communicate any of the particulars 'to them, but was almoſt diſheartned himſelf to 'proceed in it (80).'

[PP] Sat in the Aſſembly of Divines.] Mr Whitelocke, who was himſelf a member, tells us, that in the debates of that aſſembly, Mr Selden ſpoke admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own learning; and ſometimes, when they had cited a text of ſcripture to prove their aſſertion, he would tell them, perhaps, in your little pocket bible with gilt leaves, which they would often pull out and read, the tranſlation may be thus, but the Greek or the Hebrew ſignifies thus or thus; and ſo would often totally ſilence them (81). Of this there are ſome inſtances: as when Gilaſſius Scotus, from Deuteronomy xvii. 12. endeavoured to prove there were two courts of Prieſts and Judges, and that there lay an appeal from one to the other; Selden denied that two courts were intended by thoſe words. The Vulgate, 'till forty years ago, read the place in queſtion ſo, Qui non obediverit ſacerdoti, ex decreto Judicum morietur; if this be the true reading, there is not the leaſt ſhadow of two courts, as included there. If the Judges, in any inferior courts, were doubtful in their opinions and went to Jeruſalem for a ſolution therein, and brought back a ſolution of their doubt, and yet did not give judgment accordingly, they were put took the Covenant, and, on the eighth of November, he entered upon the poſt of Keeper of the Records in the Tower, at the appointment of the Parliament. However, upon the attainder of Archbiſhop Laud (x), in 1644, when the Commiſſioners ſeized his endowment of the Arabick lecture at Oxford, Mr Selden, always a friend to learning, defended the Profeſſor's right againſt that ſeizure, and procured a reſtitution [QQ]. He publiſhed his treatiſe De Anno Civili & Calendario Judaico the ſame year. In 1645, he was appointed a Commiſſioner of the Admiralty, but that commiſſion determined in a few days (y); and, upon the death of Dr Eden in July following, being elected unanimouſly Maſter of Trinity-hall in Cambridge [RR], with the direction and approbation of to death. Thoſe Judges were called rebels by the law of the Hebrews—Upon the point of the Chriſtians aſſembling immediately after the Aſcenſion, Acts xi. 46. he gave this explication, that they were περιτκαρλεραῦντες ἐν ἱερῷ, not as Chriſtians, but as Judaizing Gentiles. For the Jews, who were divided into Scribes and Phariſees, did not acknowledge the Chriſtians to belong to their nation; 'tis ſaid they were called Eſſenes. Now the Jews of Jeruſalem, converted to the Chriſtian faith there, held themſelves obliged to obſerve the law of Moſes; and what wonder, if in this opinion they were conſtantly in the temple. Whence as there is ſaid to be four hundred and eighty ſynagogues in Jeruſalem, in Megillan, folio 73; ſeventy of which conſiſted at leaſt of ten families, as appears from Maimonides, חפלה; ſo the ſame cuſtom was obſerved by the Chriſtians; and they divided themſelves into different ſynagogues or aſſemblies. After the manner of Jews, they feaſted at the temple; after the manner of Chriſtians, they broke bread, κατ' οἶκον; בית כנסת the houſe of the ſynagogue was ſome houſe ſet apart for this uſe; as to preſerve the Chriſtians in Jeruſalem, κτήματα καὶ ὑπάρχεις, ſo no houſe could be called his own by any Chriſtian; but in this place κατ' οἶκον means the houſe where all had public prayer.—When the diſcourſe turned upon Acts ii. about the different languages heard at Pentecoſt, ſome aſſerted that it was only different dialects of the ſame language, which yet was underſtood by all: Selden contradicted them, and ſaid, that variety of languages was not neceſſary in the miniſtry of holy things; and that, except in the words of the woman taken in adultery, and of the ſacerdotal benediction, which are pronounced in Hebrew, the benedictions in the temple were made in any language that was underſtood by the people. That the Helleniſtic Jews, wherever they were diſperſed, ſpoke in the Greek language; and Phœbe is affirmed by Druſius to be ignorant of the Hebrew; that when a Judge, to be admitted into the Sanhedrim, was required to be inſtructed in the knowledge of LXX languages, it was to be underſtood that he muſt underſtand various languages. Synagogues of the freedmen, Grecians, &c. manifeſt a diverſity of nations, and why not therefore a diverſity of languages. That in Acts vi. a plain and evident diſtinction is made between the Helleniſts and the Hebrews living ſeparately at that time, when all things were common.

Here we ſee how good a reaſon Cleveland, the Poet, had for the following words in his mixt aſſembly:

> And Selden is a galliard by himſelf,
> And well may be, there's more Divines in him
> Then in all this their Jewiſh Sanhedrim (82).

[QQ] He procured a reſtitution, &c.] This was an eſtate of about forty pounds a year, called Budd's paſtures, in the pariſh of Bray, in Berkſhire. John Greaves acquainted Selden with the injury done by this ſeizure to his friend Dr Pococke, then Arabic Profeſſor, appointed by the Archbiſhop himſelf; and begged his intereſt in the matter. No body could be more ready than Selden was, to grant the requeſt; he told Mr Greaves, that he had a due ſenſe both of the injuſtice and ſcandal of the proceeding, and that the perſons concerned in it could have no countenance for it, from the order of Parliament, by which they pretended to act; for the ſequeſtration appointed by that order could only relate to particular perſons, as Tetius and Sempronius, (that was his expreſſion) and not to corporations, which was the caſe of theſe lands. He alſo promiſed, that he would himſelf ſearch the rolls, where this donation was recorded, and make the beſt uſe of it he could when he had found it. Accordingly, he afterwards commended the matter to ſome of the leading men of that time, with much earneſtneſs, with whom he had a conſiderable intereſt, and by their means this donation was at length reſtored to Dr Pococke, about the middle of the year 1647, after it had been detained from him about three years (83).

[RR] He was elected Maſter of Trinity-Hall in Cambridge.] Some time after the election, Selden, deferring his anſwer, not being, as it ſeems, determined in his mind about the acceptance, to which he was ſollicited by ſeveral of his friends; the Fellows of the ſociety ſent him the following Latin letter:

'Clariſſime Vir,

'Cum primum te in præfecturam aulæ Trinitatis 'cooptavimus, illud nobis ſolum incubuiſſe arbitrati 'ſumus, ut uno eodemque negotio collegio magiſtrum, 'rei literariæ ornamentum, & academiæ patronum, '& præſidium proſpiceremus. Qua quidem in re 'poſtquam ſummis utriuſque ordinis viris viſum ſit 'electionis noſtræ album calculum adjicere, nihil 'denique reſtare ſperavimus, niſi ut deſideriis noſtris 'graviſſima, jam Pan-Anglii hujus authoritate munitis 'ſuccumbes, & voluntatem tuam, adhuc fluctuantem 'in utilitatem, atque commodum noſtrum dirigi ac 'defigi patiaris. Te igitur repetitis denuo votis 'ambimus, ut & nos tanti ſenatus judicio fruamur, '& tu ſuffragiis tandem noſtris ſupremam manum 'imponas: in cujus omnino poteſtate eſt, ne orbi-'tatem noſtram importune lugeamus. Fruſtra ſtatu-'torum interpretamentum ſollicitamus, cum am-'pliſſimus ille conventus (niſi ipſe nobis teipſum 'invideas) ſocietatem noſtram ditioni tuæ addixerit. 'Satis cum modeſtia tua certatum eſt, ad humani-'tatem tuam provocamus, quam ſi expugnari demum 'ſiveres curatum erit, ne aut noſtris nos obſequii 'aut tuæ te facilitatis pœniteat. Fac quod te factu-'rum & ſperamus & ardemus, vir exoptatiſſime, ut 'te præſentem cominus ſalutemus, quem eminus mirati 'ſumus; ut qui in Edeno ſecuri fuimus, in Seldeno 'felices eſſe poſſimus.

'Humillimi tui clientes.'

And to leave nothing undone, that might be done, to teſtify their ardent deſires to have this honour, they denounced the election to the Chancellor of the univerſity, the Earl of Holland, in form, for his ratification, to this effect, That the Maſterſhip of the ſaid Hall being vacant by the death of Thomas Eden, the late Maſter, on the eighteenth of July; they, the Fellows, or at leaſt the major part of them, aſſembled for the choice of a new Maſter, and due regard being had for a fit perſon for the ſame, did, on the twenty-third of the ſame month, direct their votes upon John Selden, Eſq; Therefore, ſay they, and becauſe it did and doth belong to your office, we have ordered Robert Wiſeman, LLD. William Forth, and John Begs, LLB. jointly and ſeverally to appear before you, and preſent our election and this inſtrument of it to you. In witneſs whereof, we have ſet our common college ſeal to theſe preſents, dated 19 Auguſt, 1645.

Dr Wilkins obſerves, it does not appear what moved Selden to make this refuſal; and is of opinion, that it was not, however, out of any ſecret hatred to the Clergy, ſince, though he denied the Clergy's divine right to their poſſeſſions, he was very zealous for maintaining them in their rights eſtabliſhed by the laws of England. One would be apt to think, from this reaſon of the doctor's, that he miſtakes Trinity-hall for Trinity-college, which indeed is a ſociety chiefly of Clergy, and the Maſter alſo obliged to be in Orders; a reaſon ſufficient for Selden's refuſal; whereas, of ſome of the principal members in both Houſes of Parliament (z), he renounced the election: yet, in 1646, he ſecured a donation of Archbiſhop Bancroft's to that univerſity [SS]. In 1647, he publiſhed Fleta, ſeu Commentarius Juris Anglicani ſic nuncupatus *; and being appointed one of the ſtanding Committee for hearing and receiving reports from the viſitors of the two univerſities (aa), he was very ſerviceable to that of Oxford, upon many occaſions, both this and the following year [TT]. whereas, Trinity-hall is a foundation appropriated to the ſtudy of Civil and Canon Law, and entirely conſiſting of ſuch Fellows; and, therefore, Selden's obſtinacy muſt be attributed to the cauſes aſſigned by Lord Clarendon, for his opinion, that he would have refuſed the Great-Seal, which was deſigned for him; otherwiſe ſeveral particular motives concurred to incline him to make this acceptance of the Maſterſhip; beſides it's being a ſociety dedicated to his ſtudy, he muſt have been well acquainted, and probably have had ſome degree of friendſhip with Dr Eden, not ſo much on account of his eminence in his profeſſion, as that the doctor had ſat in the Houſe of Commons with him in every Parliament, notwithſtanding he he was Chancellor to Dr Matthew Wren, Biſhop of Ely, from the firſt year of King Charles's reign, and lately had been joined with him in the committee for examining into the complaints againſt the Lord Marſhal's court, or Court of Honour, October 4, 1640; and in 1643, in that for managing the affairs of the Admiralty. The doctor had likewiſe taken the Covenant as well as Selden, had been a ſingular benefactor to his college, and effectually ſaved them from thoſe injuries which had been voted to other colleges, and which is well hinted in the concluſion of the Fellows letter above cited, as an inducement for Selden to take them under his protection; Ut qui in Edeno ſecuri fuimus, in Seldeno felices eſſe poſſimus.

(84) See a further account of this worthy perſon, in Ward's Lives of the Profeſſors of Greſham-college, p. 240, & ſeq. of which he was ſome time Law Profeſſor.

[SS] He ſecured a donation of Archbiſhop Bancroft's to Cambridge.] The Archbiſhop, by his Will (85), bequeathed all the books in his ſtudy to the Archbiſhops his ſucceſſors, upon this condition, that his immediate ſucceſſor ſhould give his bond, or other ſecurity, that he would leave them entire, and without embezzlement, to his ſucceſſor, and ſo on, from one to another, for ever; but if his ſucceſſor ſhould refuſe to give ſuch ſecurity, then he bequeathed them to his Majeſty's new-erected college at Chelſey, but conditionally again, that the ſaid college was finiſhed in ſix years after his deceaſe; and, if that did not take effect, then to the univerſity of Cambridge. Whether his ſucceſſors, Abbot and Laud, gave the ſecurity demanded, or no, is uncertain; however, the books continued at Lambeth 'till this time, when the firſt deſign of building Chelſey-college having been ſet aſide, and the order of Biſhops being voted down, Mr Selden, of his own mere motion, and without any application at all, ſuggeſted to the univerſity their right to the ſaid books; and, by his direction and aſſiſtance, not only Archbiſhop Bancroft's books, but likewiſe his ſucceſſor Abbot's, were delivered into the poſſeſſion of the univerſity. However, after the Reſtoration, when Archbiſhop Juxon demanded them back, and he dying in a ſhort time, his ſucceſſor Sheldon purſued the demand, as founded upon Bancroft's Will, they were reſtored to the Archbiſhop, and remain ſtill in the library at Lambeth (86). The univerſity of Cambridge wrote ſome letters of thanks to Selden on this occaſion, in one of which they expreſs themſelves thus: Illud propenſiſſimum in nos animum non parum commendare poſſit, quod præter ſpem expectationemque omnem quaſi Deo quopiam procurante dormientibus fere hæc evenerint, idemque dies & conſilium tuum, & feliciſſimum eventum obtulerit. And in another letter they write as follows: Tua primum ſolertia hunc theſaurum nobis detexit, tua animi benevolentia academiæ vovit, tuis auſpiciis & diligentiæ ſuffragia omnium adjudicarunt (87).

[TT] He was very ſerviceable to Oxford on many occaſions.] The committee was appointed May 1, this year; and on the 15th a citation was fixed by the viſitors upon the doors of the Convocation-houſe, appointing both the Proctors, and all the Heads of colleges, to appear before them in that place, on the 19th of the next month, between the hours of nine and eleven in the morning; when it happened, that Harris, one of the Viſitors, preaching before them at St Mary's, held them 'till paſt eleven. Upon which, the Vicechancellor, Dr Samuel Fell, having gotten a teſtimonial of the attendance of thoſe that had been ſummoned, atteſted on the place in due form by a publick notary, immediately diſmiſſed the aſſembly. However, the citation being renewed, both Dr Fell and the reſt were ejected; among theſe was Dr Payne, Hebrew Profeſſor, and Canon of Chriſt-Church. Selden, upon the death of Dr Morris, the Hebrew Profeſſor, next year, procured an order from the committee, appointing Dr Pococke to ſucceed him in that Profeſſorſhip, and to Dr Payne's Canonry. There are ſeveral letters expreſſing Selden's protection to the univerſity, in his Life by Dr Wilkins; and a long one upon this occaſion, in which they applied to him as their only hope and refuge In one of theſe letters, Dr Gerard Langbaine, dated March 20, 1648, writes thus: Notwithſtanding thoſe common endearments, by which you have purchaſed ſo great an intereſt in their diſconſolate univerſity.——However, the condition of this place be now ſo deſperate, that ſalus ipſa ſervare non poteſt; yet we are all abundantly ſatisfied in your unwearied care and paſſionate endeavours for our preſervation. Pococke was ſummoned, it is ſaid, by the Viſitors, to take the Covenant; upon which, his friend Greaves wrote to Selden, who adviſed neither to provoke them, nor to give them any advantage by appearing before them, but to keep out of the reach of their quarter-ſtaff, which would ſtrike down all before it, and againſt which there was no ward, but ſuffering or complying. Pococke's name being returned to the committee, as one that contemned their authority, Mr Greaves found the ſame continuance of affection from Selden as formerly; but he complained greatly of ſuch injuſtice and wilful baſeneſs, as made him weary of ſtriving againſt the ſtream, tho' he ſaid he deſpaired not entirely of doing Pococke ſome good. As Pococke, it is certain, was never before the Viſitors upon this occaſion, and yet kept his place, Dr Timothy Halton being aſked about it, ſaid, the Viſitors never had the opportunity of preſſing the Covenant upon any members of that univerſity, nor was any removed for not taking it. That though, in their commiſſion in 1647, the clauſe of tendering the Covenant was inſerted, yet that commiſſion

the violent measures that were then pursued against the King, and when the Εικων Βασιλικη came out, presently after his Majesty's death, our author could by no means be prevailed upon to draw his pen against it, notwithstanding Cromwell employed his utmost interest to engage him thereto. After this, the management of publick affairs fell into hands, upon whom our author had no influence; he therefore spent his time altogether in his study, where he was sure both to gratify his own private humour, and at the same time to do eminent service to the publick. In 1650, he printed his first book De Synedriis & Præfecturis Hebræorum [UU]. He prosecuted this subject as long as he lived afterwards; to which he added a second book in 1653, and in the interim published, in 1652, a preface to the Decem Scriptores Anglicanæ, containing an account of those writers, with some remarks upon their several histories in folio (bb). In 1653, he published his Vindiciæ secundum integritatem existimationis suæ, &c. and made his Will the same year. In the beginning of 1654, being near seventy years old, he began to decline very sensibly, and in some months grew apprehensive of his approaching dissolution; when, sending for Dr Usher and Dr Gerard Langbaine, he discoursed with them upon the vanity of learning, and declared, that all his hopes of salvation was upon the promises in Scripture. Not long after, having a mind to make some alterations in his Will, he wrote a letter to his friend Bulstrode Whitelocke, Esq; in these terms:

(bb) Dr Wilkins, in his preface, has given us a dissertation of Rudd, keeper of the Durham library, asserting the History of the Church of Durham to Simon Dunelmensis, Monk and Precentor of that monastery, against Selden, who ascribes it to Turgotus Prior of the same monastery.

'My Lord,
'I am a most humble suitor to your Lordship, that you would be pleased that I might 'have your presence for a little time tomorrow or next day. Thus much wearies the 'most weak hand and body of your Lordship's most humble servant,
'J. SELDEN (cc).'

This letter is dated November 10, 1654, from White-Friars. He had resided for some years in the Friary-house there, being possessed of it in the right of Elizabeth, Countess-dowager of Kent, who had appointed him executor of her Will, having before, from the first of her widowhood, committed the management of her affairs to him *. Mr Whitelocke came according to his request, but found his weakness so much increased, that he was not able to perform his intentions. He died the last day of November, 1654, and was buried, according to his own request †, in the Temple-church, Archbishop Usher preaching his funeral sermon. He wrote an inscription for his monument [WW], which was found in the same box with his Will (dd). By this last it appeared that he died very rich [XX], as well in other effects, as in books and monuments of literature. These he bequeathed mission was vacated; and in the next, granted November 28, 1648, the clause was omitted by the interest of Mr Selden (88). Mr Wood, who says this clause was inserted likewise in the second commission, tells us, that this commission was clandestinely obtained, only six or seven of the committee being present. It is not unlikely, that Mr Selden was one of the absent members; and, upon hearing what had been done, might procure either a revocation, or an order for this clause, which required the taking of the Covenant not to be put in execution (89). Dr Pococke was not the only person who felt the good effect of Mr Selden's friendship in these times; for, when Mr Greaves was ejected, this friend rescued the chest of his papers and mathematical instruments from the hands of the soldiers, and procured them for the owner (90).

[UU] De Synedriis & Præfecturis Hebræorum.] Among many other singular notions started in this treatise, he speaks of these Courts assembling before Moses; to which Sir John Marsham (91) remarks, that it does not appear that any of the Patriarchs before Moses, exercised any forensic jurisdiction, and much less that Courts of Law were constituted in the cities and villages: that the family of Heber, from Sem to Abraham, lived in Mesopotamia, and that it was not sufficiently clear that they were sui juris; that the posterity of Abram were in continual peregrination, 'till they were settled in Egypt, where they were far from having their own laws; that there was no republick of the Hebrews, no courts of Judicature, nor forensic practice, before they came out of Egypt; that the laws concerning the Judges were given at Marah, where God gave them statutes and judgments. (92) Wilkins.

[XX] He died very rich.] It appears by his Will, dated July 11, 1653, that his estate in land consisted of the manor, lordship, or Grange, of Cheadle in Staffordshire, and of diverse lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in Cheadle; and also of one third part of certain lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in the county of Lincoln. The whole of these, as well as all his personal estate and sums of money belonging to him, either in his own right, or as executor of the last Will and Testament of the Lady Elizabeth, late Countess-dowager of Kent, he bequeathed, after discharging his funeral expences, debts, and legacies, to his executors, Edward Heyward, of Reysham in Norfolk, Esq; John Vaughan, of Troescoed in the county of Cardigan, Esq; Rowland Jewks the elder, Esq; all of the Inner-Temple; and Matthew Hale, of Lincoln's-Inn, Esq; to be divided equally among them. Bishop Burnet having observed, that Judge Hale raised his fortune from a hundred a year, to near nine hundred, assures us, that a considerable part of this increase was the share he had in Selden's estate. Besides the legacies mentioned in remark [A], and those taken notice of in remark [YY], he bequeathed to the College of Physicians in London, Hippocrates's Aphorisms in Arabic, and such pieces of Galen as he had in Arabic, bequeathed to his executors, deſiring them rather to part them among themſelves, or otherwiſe diſpoſe of them, or the choiceſt of them for ſome publick uſe, than to put them in any common ſale; 'it may do well,' theſe are his words, 'in ſome convenient pub-'lick library, or of ſome college in one of the univerſities.' The executors, reſolving, in honour to Mr Selden's memory, to keep the collection entire, firſt intended it for the ſociety of the Inner-Temple, of which he was ſo many years a member; and it was removed to ſome chambers in the King's-Bench-walks there, for that purpoſe: but this ſociety neglecting, for the ſpace of five years, to provide a proper room to receive it, they gave it to the univerſity of Oxford [YY], where a noble room was added to the Bodleian Library for it's reception (ee), and all due reſpect was ſhewn by that learned body to their worthy benefactor [ZZ]. As to Mr Selden's character, his profound learning,

Theſe legacies are left in a codicil annexed to his Will, and of the ſame date with it; after which he proceeds in theſe words: 'Item, Whereas the Right Honou-'rable the Lady Elizabeth, late Counteſs dowager of 'Kent, did put to ſchool in Holland, under the care 'of Mr Francis Junius, William Lyddell, a young 'boy, to be brought up there, and made fit for ſome 'courſe of life; being now paſt the age of twelve 'years, I give and bequeath to him, for his mainte-'nance and education yearly, to begin at the firſt half 'year after my deceaſe, the ſum of 50 l. until he be 18 'years old, if he ſhall ſo long live, and no longer: or 'otherwiſe, and if he the ſaid William Lyddell, ſhall live 'until he be of the ſaid age of 18 years, then I give and 'bequeath to him the ſum of 500 l. for a ſtock to ſet 'up with for himſelf, or otherwiſe to enjoy it for his beſt 'advantage. Item, And whereas Jane Lyddell, ſiſter 'to the ſaid William Lyddell, was put to be an ap-'prentice with , in St Martin's; if 'ſhe ſhall live to be out of her apprenticeſhip, I give 'and bequeath unto her, the ſaid Jane, the ſum of '300 l. for a portion to marry her with. Item, My 'will and deſire is, that my ſervants of my family be 'competently maintained with diet together in my 'houſe, for ſome ſpace after my deceaſe, under the 'direction of my ſervant William Richardſon; and 'that every one of them have the whole half-year's 'wages, for that half-year current wherein I ſhall 'happen to die. Item, I give and bequeath to my 'ſervant, Thomas Gill, 300 l. and to my ſervants, 'James Gill, William Richardſon, and Clement La-'vander, 100 l. a piece, to every of them. Item, 'To Philip Rumball, of Sileſko in Bedfordſhire, 100 l. 'Item, to Snead, my porter, 50 l. All theſe, 'and the aforeſaid ſums, to be paid within three 'months after my deceaſe. Item, I give unto Wil-'liam, Lord Marquis and Earl of Hertford, my cry-'ſtal cabinet, with the two caſes thereto belonging, 'together with all the agate ſtones, and the reſt that 'are in it. Item, I give and bequeath to the Right 'Hon. Algernoon Earl of Northumberland, a baſon and 'ewer of ſilver gilt in yellow caſes, the one marked A, 'the other B. Item, to the Right Hon. Jocelyn 'Lord Piercy, my cryſtal ſhip, a galley, with all it's 'tackling, and the caſe belonging to it; together 'with my ſquare nicomy marble table, ſet in ebony 'and ivory. Item, To Sir Thomas Cotton, Bart. a 'dozen of ſilver plates, parcel gilt, of Hercules's la-'bours, in a yellow caſe, marked G; and a cryſtal 'kind of flagon, ſet in ſilver gilt, marked H, in a 'yellow caſe; and a cup of pearl ſhell, ſet in ſilver 'gilt, in a black caſe, Marked I; and my cabinet, 'covered with crimſon velvet, which is in perſpective 'the repreſentation of the entrance into Hampton-'court. Item, To Mr Grey Longueville, a baſon 'and ewer, and two dozen plates, all parcel gilt, in 'ſeveral red caſes, marked C, D, E, F, which were 'his great-uncle's, Henry Earl of Kent, and after-'wards continued to Charles Earl of Kent, his grand-'father, and then to Henry Earl of Kent, his uncle, 'the brother of Earl Charles, a fit heir-loom for his 'family; together with a hat-band ſet round with 'diamonds, which his ſaid uncle uſually wore, and is 'increaſed by me about the buckle with a broad dia-'mond, and ſome other beſides (93).'

[YY] They gave it to the univerſity of Oxford.] Dr Gerard Langbaine, in a letter to Pococke, written ſoon after Selden's death, ſaith,

SIR,

I came here only time enough to ſee and ſpeak with our good friend Mr Selden, who died on Thurſday night, about 8 o'clock.—Yeſterday I had the ſight of ſo much of his Will as concerns the univerſity. He has given to our publick library all his manuſcripts of the oriental tongues, and Greek, not otherwiſe particularly diſpoſed of; and all his Rabbinical and Talmudical books, which are not there already, or not of the ſame edition. Theſe to be taken out of his library by you and myſelf. Item, All his marble ſtatues, heads, and Greek pieces, to be conveyed to Oxford at the charge of his executors, and there placed on the walls of the library (94). The executors are, Juſtice Hales, Mr Vaughan, Mr Heyward, and Mr Jewx, who deſire that you would ſpeedily repair hither, to view and ſelect what belongs to the univerſity, before his library be otherwiſe meddled with. And to that purpoſe, I have written to the Vicechancellor and Mr Barlow, to ſend up the moſt perfect catalogue of the publick library, for our direction, and the executors ſatisfaction. To their diſcretion he hath left all the remainder of his books, not otherwiſe particularly bequeathed, either to be divided among themſelves, or to be ſent to the univerſity, or ſome college or colleges, as they ſhall think fit. Biſhop Burnet tells us, 'The executors were a little put to it, 'in making this donation to the univerſity, without 'croſſing the Will of their deceaſed friend. Mr Sel-'den, continues he, had once intended to give his li-'brary to that univerſity, and had left it ſo by his 'Will; but having occaſion for a manuſcript which 'belonged to their library, they aſked of him a bond 'of 1000 l. for it's reſtitution. This he took ſo ill 'at their hands, that he ſtruck out that part of his 'Will, by which he had given them his library, and 'with ſome paſſion declared they ſhould never have it. 'The executors ſtuck at this a little; but having con-'ſidered better of it, came to this reſolution: That 'they were to be the executors of Mr Selden's Will, 'and not of his Paſſion.' There was the more room for ſuch a conſtruction in favour of the univerſity, if it be true what we find in the Hiſtory of the Bodleian Library, prefixed to the manuſcripts of England and Ireland, the writer of which declares, he knew nothing of ſuch a ſtory as is told by Biſhop Burnet, there being no publick evidence of it; but that it appeared from the univerſity regiſter, that Mr Selden had the liberty granted him in 1654, of borrowing any book out of the library, upon condition that he ſhould take no more than three at a time, and give a bond of 100 l. to reſtore them within a year.

(94) He gave them alſo a map of China, made there, fairly done in colours, together with a ſea-compaſs of their making, and deviſions, which were both taken by an Engliſh commander, who being preſſed exceedingly at a great ranſom, and would not part with it.

[ZZ] Reſpect ſhewn to their benefactor.] In the room where his books were repoſited, they put the following inſcription at the entrance:

learning, it is well known, was the diſcouſe of all the Literati in his time; but he ſeems to have been chiefly pleaſed with the atteſtation given of it by the famous Hugo Grotius, who intituled him, in this reſpect, the Honour of the Engliſh nation. Yet he is allowed to have ſome very ſingular opinions [AAA]. Beſides the manuſcripts which he left, that have been already mentioned, there were ſome others found among his papers [BBB]; and, in 1671, came out his Diſcourſe of the Office of Lord Chancellor of England, in folio. To which was added, Dugdale's Catalogue of Lord Chancellors and Lord Keepers of England, from the Norman Conqueſt. In 1675, there was printed at London in 4to. Johannis Seldeni Angli Liber de Nummis; in quo antiqua pecunia Romana & Græca metitur pretio ejus quæ nunc eſt in uſu. Huic accedit Bibliotheca Nummaria. But our Antiquary's name was abuſed, by ſetting it to that ſuperficial tract, which was not written by him, and had been publiſhed before he was born (ff). In 1683, Dr Adam Littleman, together with his Engliſh tranſlation of Jani Anglorum facies altera, publiſhed the two following pieces of our author; one, Of the Original of Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction of Teſtaments; and the other, Of the Diſpoſition or Adminiſtration of Inteſtates Goods. In 1689, his amanuenſis, Richard Milward, publiſhed a piece in 4to. intituled, Mr Selden's Table-talk, being diſcourſes of his ſenſe of various matters of weight and high conſequence, relating eſpecially to Religion and State. Yet many of theſe have been thought not genuine, as containing inconſiſtencies in the ſeveral parts, and ſome remarks not worthy of our author's learning and judgment (gg). In 1725, Dr David Wilkins publiſhed an edition of Mr Selden's Works, in three volumes in folio, containing ſeveral ſpeeches, arguments, debates, and letters, never before printed. To which is prefixed, an Account of the Author's Life [CCC]; where among other things he tells us, that Selden, notwithſtanding his opinions concerning the power of the Church, yet was a friend to the Church of England. Mr Baxter aſſures us, that Sir Matthew Hale told him, Selden was a reſolved ſerious Chriſtian, and a great adverſary to Hobbes's errors; and that Sir Matthew Hale affirmed, he had ſeen Selden openly oppoſe Hobbes ſo earneſtly, as either to depart from him, or drive him out of the room (hh). Mr Whitelocke ſays, his mind was as great as his learning, being very generous and hoſpitable, and a good companion, eſpecially where he liked. Dr Wilkins obſerves (ii), that he was charitable, eſpecially to ſcholars; and Mr Wood gives a remarkable inſtance of this, in the caſe of Henry Jacob, a man of more learning than prudence (kk). Dr Wilkins produces ſome others, but obſerves that he was naturally of a ſevere temper, which was ſoured by his ſufferings; ſo that he was free only with [AAA] He had ſome ſingular opinions.] Many ſuch have been already mentioned in the courſe of theſe memoirs, and another will be the ſubject of the enſuing remark. To theſe may be added, his opinion concerning Excommunication, which was animadverted on in a piece written expreſsly for that purpoſe, by Dr Henry Hammond, and printed under the title Of the Power of the Keys.

[BBB] Some others were found among his papers.] Mr Selden ordered all the papers and notes that were in his own hand-writing, except thoſe relating to Eutychius's Annals, to be burnt. Thoſe that were ſaved, muſt have been wrote by his amanuenſis. Theſe were, (1.) The Life of Friar Bacon, written in Latin. Selden had been at ſome expence in procuring the materials, and gave the copy to Sir Kenelm Digby, in order to have it printed at Paris; but Mr Wood, who tells us this (96), tells us alſo, that all the papers were embezzled and loſt. To which muſt be added, two letters of our author to Mr Thomas Greaves, inſerted in the account of Mr John Greaves's Life, prefixed to his Miſcellaneous Works, by Dr Thomas Birch (98). Mr Wood likewiſe tells us, our author 'had a conſiderable hand, and gave directions and 'advice, towards the edition of Plutarch's Lives, 'printed in 1657, with an addition of the year of the 'world, and the year of our Lord, together with ma-'ny chronological notes and explications, out of di-'vers authors (99)' with a few. As to his writings, his ſtyle is univerſally condemned. Budd has well obſerved, that it is a melange of all that is bad, as well as all that is good, in the Latin language (ll). Le Clerc complains of the trouble cauſed to the reader, by his obſcurity, as well as the perplexity of his method (mm), of which he has given a remarkable inſtance. We have given another in the article of Sir Henry Spelman, and a third is ſuperadded by a miſtake in the General Dictionary, the writer of which, in the concluſion of his account of the Mare Clauſum, tells us, that this book of our author was attacked by Peter Baptiſta Burgus, which occaſioned him to publiſh at London, in 1653, Vindiciæ ſecundum integritatem exiſtimationis ſuæ per convitium de ſcriptione Maris Clauſi petulantiſſimum & mendaciſſimum inſolentius læſæ in Vindiciis (nn) Maris Liberi, adverſus Petrum Baptiſtam Burgum, Liguſtici maritimi Dominii adſertorem, Hagæ Comitum jam nunc emiſſis. Whereas we have already obſerved (oo), that Selden's Vindiciæ, &c. Maris Clauſi, was wrote againſt Graſwinckel's Vindiciæ Maris Liberi, which was levelled againſt Peter Burk's book adverſus Petrum Baptiſtam Burgum, who agreed with our author in general, that the ſea, as well as the earth, is ſubject to ſome ſtates, but maintained, that the dominion of the former belonged to the Genoeſe. Nor, indeed, to do Selden juſtice, is his meaning ſo obſcurely expreſſed, as to lead a reader of common attention into any miſtake, which too the firſt words of the piece would have diſcovered. Notwithſtanding this cenſure of his ſtyle and method, his writings are allowed, by the ſeveral cenſurers, to be full of various and uncommon erudition, and uſeful obſervations; and, in juſtice to him, we muſt not conclude, without ballancing their animadverſions with the following elogium, made alſo by a foreigner (pp), who, ſpeaking of our author, writes thus: 'Felix tunc erat atque beata Terra Angliæ, &c. England was then bleſſed and happy, when ſhe brought forth that inexhauſtible treaſure of Hebrew antiquities and various erudition, in the 44th year * of the laſt century, at Salvington. Nor did he keep it to himſelf alone, but communicated it to the whole learned world; for Nature had given this man that force of ſagacity and quickneſs of wit, that whatever ſubject he turned his thoughts upon, he ſeemed not then to learn it, but to have learned it before, and with Plato to remember it. She had endued him alſo with a firmneſs and conſtancy of mind, equal to his wit, in undertaking and executing the moſt conſummately arduous labours; and, whatever he had once reſolved upon, for the benefit and advantage of letters, he never ſuffered it to ſlip out of his hands, either by a laſſitude or liſtleſneſs (with which learned men are ſometimes ſeized), and much leſs by any lazineſs or languor. Hence ſprung that profound knowledge in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Rabbinical, Syriac, and Arabic, tongues (qq); as alſo his perfect acquaintance with all parts of Philoſophy, and of the laws both divine and human: ſo that, whatever was any where extant, concerning the opinions of Philoſophers, or the commentaries of the Lawyers, this Hercules daringly attempted all the difficulties, and, by turning the books over with incredible care, did not fail, as it were, to diſpatch them; after which, tempering them with the laws, maxims, and opinions, of the Hebrews, he converted every thing to his own uſe, that is, to the illuſtration of ſacred and venerable antiquity.' After all, the moſt endearing part of Mr Selden's character is elegantly touched by himſelf, in the choice of his motto, Περὶ παντὸς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν. i. e. LIBERTY ABOVE ALL THINGS. P

SHADWELL [THOMAS], Poet-Laureat to King William the Third and Queen Mary, was deſcended from a younger branch of an ancient family in Staffordſhire (a), and was born about the year 1640, at Lanton-Hall in Norfolk, a ſeat of his father, who was bred at Caius-college in Cambridge, and thence removed to the Middle-Temple, to ſtudy the Law; but having an ample fortune left him by an uncle, did not trouble himſelf with the practice, chuſing rather to ſerve his country as a Juſtice of Peace. He was in that commiſſion for three counties, Middleſex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, and diſcharged the office with diſtinguiſhed ability and exact integrity. In the Civil Wars he ſided with the King, and was a great ſufferer for the Royal Cauſe; ſo that, having a numerous family (b), he was reduced to the neceſſity of ſelling and ſpending a conſiderable part of his eſtate, to ſupport it (c). In theſe circumſtances, he reſolved to breed this ſon to his own profeſſion; and for that purpoſe, he ſent him firſt to the ſame college, and then to the ſame ſeminary of Law, in which he had compleated his own education: but the ſon, after ſpending ſome time in both, took a reſolution to travel abroad, having, as it ſhould ſeem, no diſpoſition to plod in the drudgery of the Law. He had a taſte, and ſome genius, for polite literature; and, upon his return home, falling into the acquaintance of ſome of the moſt celebrated perſons for wit and diſtinguiſhed quality in the age, he thought no more of the Law, but applied himſelf wholly to cultivate thoſe elegant ſtudies, which were the faſhionable amuſements of the times: and it was not long before he became eminent in dramatick poetry, a ſpecimen of which appeared in a play called The Sullen Lovers; or the Impertinents. A Comedy, which was acted at the Duke of York's theatre, and printed in 1668. In this piece, our author repreſented variety of humours, according to the practice of Ben Jonſon, whom he ſays all dramatick poets ought to imitate, though none are like to come near, he being the only perſon that appears to have made perfect perfect representations of human life [A]. As the play was well received, he puſhed his genius on in the ſame road, and wrote a great many more comedies, which met with good ſucceſs.

[A] All the dramatic Poets ought to imitate Ben Jonſon] Shadwell certainly did not judge amiſs of the turn of his own genius, when he ſets Father Ben for his pattern in humourous characters; in which reſpect, Jonſon will always ſtand a monument of honour to the Poetic Tribe. 'Tis true, Shadwell followed his leader at an humble diſtance, as he ſucceeded him, after many intermediate ſteps, as Poet-Laureat; to which title Ben too was the occaſion of procuring a remarkable honour from his friend Mr Selden; who, at his requeſt, drew up the following account of it's antiquity; it is in his Treatiſe of the Titles of Honour; where, in ſpeaking of the Counts Palatine, he gives an inſtance of the form made uſe of by that Count in creating a Poet-Laureat; the awful ſolemnity of which is not a little entertaining, as follows.

The courſe alſo uſed by Counts Palatine, in giving the crown of Laurel to Poets, is ſeen eſpecially in that of Johannes Cruſius, who received it at Straſburg in anno 1616, from the hands of Thomas Obrechtus, a Profeſſor of Law and Count Palatine. Firſt, the time and place were ſolemnly appointed by a public inſtrument from the Count; where he ſhews, how much degrees in learning conduce to the advancement of it; and then, that Paulus Cruſius, having firſt received the dignity of Maſter of Arts, now out of his happy vein in verſe, deſerved alſo the laurel of Poetry; and, therefore, by virtue of the power and licence that he had from the Emperor, he appointed the twenty-third of December* for the ſolemnity of giving it him. Quamobrem, ſays he, omnes literarum ſtudiorumque amantes, ac inprimis illuſtres & generoſos Dominos, Comites, atque Barones, Patres Academicos omnes, omnium ordinum Doctores, Licentiatos, Profeſſores, Magiſtros; auditores nobiliſſimos, præſtantiſſimos, doctiſſimos, ea quæ decet animi veneratione, invitamus, ut felicitatem hujus actus literarii, illuſtri ac honorifica ſua præſentia, non ſolum illuſtrare atque exornare, verum pia etiam vota, hac præſertim conclamata tempeſtate, pro ſalute eccleſiæ ſcholæ & reipublicæ, ad Deum facere nobiſcum velint, majorem in modum rogamus ac obteſtamur.

* The inſtrument was datèd the 20th of that month.

At the day appointed, the aſſembly being full, Cruſius begins with the recital of this petitory epigram:

Cæſarei comes alme fori, clariſſime Thoma,
Si merui laurum, Phœbus adeſto mihi:
Si minus, hic reddas juſtæ argumenta repulſæ.
Parebo monitis, parte in utraque, tuis.
Fallor? an adſpicio viridem ſub veſte coronam.
O Dii! quam pulchre laurus amœna viret!
Cæſaris hoc munus, vigeat cum Cæſare laurus:
Prævaleat vulgo gratia Cæſarea
Quæ mihi contingit per te, celeberrime Conſe,
Si mihi continget laurea Cæſarea.

Then the Count Palatine made a long ſpeech in praiſe of the art of Poetry; which he concluded with—Audiviſtis hactenus ſatis ſuperque, uti ſpero, auditores nobiliſſimi, intellexiſtis artem Poëticam reipublicæ & utilem & neceſſariam eſſe, ejus cultores dignis officiendos præmiis, titulum & privilegia Poëtæ laureati, non quibuſvis promiſcue & ſine diſcretione, ſed iis tandem conferenda eſſe, in arte Poëtica ſingulares qui fecerunt progreſſus. Then directing himſelf to Cruſius, that was to be honoured with the laurel, Cum itaque, ſaith he, tu magiſter Johannes Paulus Cruſius, Poëſeos candidate, ad eundem honoris & dignitatis titulum aſpirare cupias; tui jam officii tuarumque partium erit, ut antequam petitus honoris titulus, ſolenni cum applauſu tibi conferatur, eruditionis tuæ inſigne ac nobile aliquod ſpecimen illuſtri huic auditorio edas, exhibeas te talem, qualem te commendo, ut omnibus & ſingulis liquido conſtet, te eum eſſe, quem ipſa eruditio ac doctrina commendet, & ipſa virtus & morum integritas condecoret, ipſa juſtitia honore petito condecorandum dignum judicet, nec ipſa etiam invidia, virtutis comes, idem deneget.

Then Cruſius recited a poem of above three hundred verſes; his theme (choſen by himſelf) being, Quam nihil omnis homo! And theſe verſes are called in the act of creation, Specimen pro impetranda laurea. Next the Count Palatine, (to the end, that this act of conferring the laurel might have the fuller credit and authority with all that were preſent) produces the Emperor's patent, that made him Count Palatine, and gave him this authority, and hath it recognized, upon a ſolemn obſervation of the ſeal and ſubſcription, by a public notary, and openly read by him alſo. Thence he ſums up the authority given him, and ſhews, that the courſe is, that whoſoever is to be crowned with the laurel ought firſt to take an oath to the Emperor and his ſucceſſor; which he bids the public notary read to Cruſius, and he carefully to hearken to it. The oath was,

Promittes & jurabis, quod velis eſſe invictiſſimo, potentiſſimo, & ſereniſſimo, Principi ac Domino Domino Matthiæ primo Romanorum Imperatori ſemper auguſto, & eidem ſacro Romano Imperio omnibus ſucceſſoribus ejus Romanorum Imperatoribus ac regibus legitime intrantibus, fidelis; nec unquam aſſiſtes conſilio, ubi periculum eorum tractetur, ſed bonum & ſalutem eorum defendes fideliter & promovebis; damna eorum pro tua poſſibilitata & facultate vitabis & avertes; quæ in laudem & honorem Romani Imperii ſpectabunt aliquando carminibus celebrabis, amplificabis; nec licentia data in maledicentiam & convitia prorumpes; ab omnibus famoſis libellis abſtinebis; & omnia, quæ Cæſareum verum, ſincerum, & Germanum Poëtam jure vel conſuetudine decent, modo ſint honeſta & juſta, diligenti exercitio & morum ornatu, facies & præſtabis.

By direction then of the Count, he lays his hand on the book, and ſwears, Hæc omnia prælecta ſumma, qua potero, obedientia & diligentia obſervabo & faciam, ut me Deus adjuvet & hæc ſancta Dei Evangelia. The oath thus taken; becauſe, ſays the Count, I doubt not, but that, during your whole life, you will truly obſerve what you have thus ſworn, it remains only, that I now give you the laurel appointed for you.

Te itaque Johannem Paulum Cruſium Argentinenſem, liberalium artium & diſciplinarum magiſtrum, in hac florentiſſima aſſidentium & adſtantium corona ob inſignes ingenii tui dotes, præſertim vero artis Poëticæ doctrinam ſingularem, peritiam eximiam, ut moris eſt, vigore ac tenore Cæſarei hujus noſtri diplomatis, tanquam Comes Palatinus auguſtiſſima imperatoriæ ac Cæſareæ Majeſtatis auctoritate, hac laurea Poëtica coronamus, condecoramus, donamus, ac Poëtam ac Vatem-Laureatum, pronuntiamus, proclamamus, facimus, creamus, promovemus, aureoque hoc annulo ornamus, condecoramus, & hoc ipſo laureæ Poëticæ inſignibus ac titulis inſignimus, inveſtimus, aliorumque Poëtarum numero ordini & conſortio cooptamus, adſcribimus, & aggregamus. With a laurel we ſee alſo a ring was given him; and after the Count had made another ſpeech, touching the laurel and ring, the crowned Poet recites another poem of thanks for his dignity; and ſo the act ended.

In proceeding, Mr Selden further obſerves, that this cuſtom of giving crowns of laurel to Poets, as the enſigns of a degree of maſterſhip in poetry, had continued above an hundred and fifty years † in the empire

ſucceſs. In the mean while, as it was impoſſible in theſe times to ſhine among the great ones, which is the poet's ambition, without ſiding with one of the parties, Whig or Tory, Mr Shadwell's lot fell among the Whigs; and, in conſequence thereof, he was ſet up as a rival to Mr Dryden. Hence there grew a mutual diſlike between them; and, upon the appearance of the Laureat's tragedy, called The Duke of Guiſe, in 1683, our author was charged (d) with having the principal hand in writing a piece, intituled, Some Reflections on the pretended Parallel, in the Play called The Duke of Guiſe, in a Letter to a Friend; which was printed the ſame year, in four ſheets, 4to. Mr Dryden wrote a vindication of the Parallel, and ſuch a ſtorm was raiſed, both againſt Shadwell, and his friend Hunt, who aſſiſted him in it, that this latter was forced to fly into Holland (e); and we find our author complaining, that in theſe, which he calls, the worſt of times, 'his ruin was deſigned and his life ſought; and that for near ten years he was kept from the exerciſe of that profeſſion, which had afforded him a competent ſubſiſtence (f).' However, he was abundantly rewarded for theſe ſufferings, whatever they were, after the Revolution, by ſeeing himſelf crowned with the laurel which was ſtripped from the brows of his antagoniſt; who thereupon, by way of revenge, wrote the bittereſt ſatire againſt him that ever was penned, under the name of Mac Flecnoe [B]. Our new Laureat had the misfortune alſo to enjoy his honour but a very few years; for, being ſeized, as was thought, with an apoplexy (g), he died ſuddenly in November, 1692, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, at Chelſey; in which church he was interred on the 24th of the ſame month (b), when his friend Dr Nicholas Brady preached his funeral ſermon; wherein he aſſures us, that our author was 'a man of great honeſty and integrity, and had a real love of truth and ſincerity; an inviolable fidelity and ſtrictneſs to his word; an unalterable friendſhip, wherever 'he profeſſed it; and (however the world may be miſtaken in him) a much deeper ſenſe 'of religion, than many others have, who pretend to it more openly.' The Doctor proceeds with obſerving, that 'His natural and acquired abilities made him ſufficiently 'remarkable to all that he converſed with, very few being equal to him, in all the becoming qualities and accompliſhments, which adorn and ſet off a complete gentleman; 'that his very enemies, continues this preacher, if he has any left behind him, will give 'him this character, at leaſt if they knew him ſo thoroughly as I did.' By a remark which the ſame friend makes afterwards, we are led into an opinion, that he fell a ſacrifice to a habit of taking of opium to exceſs. 'His death, ſays the preacher, ſeized him 'ſuddenly; but he could not be unprepared, ſince, to my certain knowledge, he never 'took his doſe of opium, but he ſolemnly recommended himſelf to God by prayer (i).' After his death came out The Volunteers, or the Stock-Jobbers, a Comedy, acted by their Majeſties ſervants, with a dedication to the Queen by Mrs Anne Shadwell, our author's widow; and an epilogue, wherein his character as a poet is ſet in the beſt and moſt advantageous light; which, perhaps, was judged neceſſary to ballance the very different drawing, and even abuſive repreſentation, of it, by Mr Dryden [C], who is generally condemned for empire at leaſt. That in the latter empire, it proceeded from a kind of example which was under the old Roman Emperors. That ſuch crowns were made proper to the gift of Emperors, by an inſtitution of Domitian; and as from the uſe of the old empire the latter took the example of crowning Poets, ſo from that of the latter, ſome uſe of giving the laurel was anciently received in England; John Skelton had the title of Laureat * under Henry the Eighth; and in the ſame time, Robert Whittington called himſelf ‡ Grammaticæ magiſter & Protovates Angliæ in florentiſſima Oxonienſi Academia Laureatus: Under Edward the Fourth, one John Kay, by the title of his humble Poet-Laureat, dedicates to him The Siege of Rhodes in proſe † But John Gower, a famous Poet under Richard the Second, buried in St Mary Overy's church, hath his ſtatue crowned with ivy mixed with roſes ‖. Habet ibidem ſtatuam, ſays Bale §, duplici nota inſignem, nempe aurea torque, & hederacea corona roſis interſerta (1).

[B] Dryden revenged this affront in his Mac Flecknoe.] Dryden ſeems to have carried his reſentment even to the friends of his rival; in this ſpirit we find him expreſſing great contempt for Otway, with whom our author was a great favourite, and lived in a moſt friendly intimacy (2). 'Tis certain, this contempt for Otway was againſt his clear judgment, and he afterwards recanted it (3). To ſpeak freely, this promotion of our Poet to the laurel was apparently the effect of party, and the exigency of the times upon the Revolution, which made it prudent, in diſpoſing of all offices in the State, to have an eye chiefly to a firm attachment and warm zeal for the new eſtabliſhment. Accordingly, we are told, that when ſome perſons urged to the then Lord-Chamberlain, that there were others who had better pretenſions to the laurel; his Lordſhip replied, he would not pretend to ſay how great a Poet Shadwell might be, but was ſure he was an honeſt man (4).

[C] The advantageous character in The Epilogue to the Volunteers might be a ballance to the abuſe of him by Dryden] It will be proper to lay them both before the reader, that, by contraſting them to each other, his true character may at laſt be fixed. In Mac Flecknoe, the God of Dulneſs is introduced, making this ſpeech upon the choice of a proper perſon as a ſon to ſucceed him:

Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dulneſs from his tender years.
Shadwell alone of all my ſons is high,
He ſtands confirm'd in full ſtupidity.
The reſt to ſome faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into ſenſe.
Some beams of wit on other ſouls may fall,
Strike thro' and make a lucid interval.
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray,
His riſing fogs prevail upon the day.
Beſides, is goodly fabric fills the eye,
And ſeems deſign'd for thoughtleſs majeſty.

The character in the Epilogue is as follows:

Shadwell, the great ſupport 'oth' comic ſtage,
Born to expoſe the follies of the age.
To whip prevailing vices, and unite
Mirth with inſtruction, profit with delight.
For large ideas and a flowing pen,
Firſt, of our times, and ſecond, but to Ben.

for treating our author a little too unmercifully, his reſentment carrying him even beyond the bounds of truth; for that, though it muſt be owned he fell vaſtly ſhort of Jonſon, whom he ſet to himſelf as a model of excellence, yet it is certain there are high authorities in favour of many of his comedies, and the beſt judges of that age gave their teſtimony for them. They have in them fine ſtrokes of humour [D]; the characters are often original, ſtrongly marked, and well ſuſtained. Add to this, that he had the greateſt expedition imaginable in writing, and ſometimes produced a play in leſs than a month (k). Beſides ſeventeen plays, he wrote ſeveral other pieces of poetry [E], ſome of which have been commended. An edition of his Works, with ſome account of his Life and Writings prefixed, was publiſhed in 1720, in four volumes, 8vo.

(k) Dedication to the Earl of Dorſet, of his comedy called The Miſer.

Whoſe mighty genius and diſcerning mind,
Trac'd all the various humours of mankind.
Dreſſing them up with ſuch ſucceſsful care,
That every fop found his own picture there;
And bluſh'd for ſhame at the ſurprizing ſkill,
Which made his lov'd reſemblance look ſo ill.
Shadwell, who all his lines from nature drew,
Copied her out, and kept her ſtill in view:
Who never ſunk in proſe, nor ſoar'd in verſe;
So high as bombaſt, or ſo low as farce.
Who ne'er was brib'd by title or eſtate,
To fawn and flatter with the rich and great.
To let a gilded vice or folly paſs,
But always laſh'd the villain and the aſs.

[D] Some of his Plays have in them fine ſtrokes of humour.] Mr Langbaine, ſpeaking of his comedy called The Virtuoſo, tells us, that no body will deny this play it's due applauſe: at leaſt, I know, ſays he, that the univerſity of Oxford, who may be allowed competent judges of Comedy, eſpecially of ſuch characters as Sir Nicholas Gimcrack and Sir Formal Triſſle, applauded it. And as no man ever undertook to diſcover the frailties of ſuch pretenders to this kind of knowledge before Mr Shadwell, ſo none ſince Mr Jonſon's time ever drew ſo many different characters of humour, and with ſuch ſucceſs (5). The ſame Critic alſo obſerves, that our author's comedy called Epſom Wells is ſo diverting, and withal ſo true a comedy, that even foreigners, who are not generally the kindeſt to the wit of our nation, have extremely commended it; and, continues he, 'tis no ſmall credit to our author, that the Sieur de St Evremond, ſpeaking of our Engliſh comedies in his Eſſays, has ranked this play with Ben Jonſon's Bartholomew-Fair, as two of our moſt diverting comedies (6).

SHAKESPEARE [WILLIAM] was deſcended of a gentleman's family [A], at Stratford upon Avon, in the county of Warwick; but his father entering into the wool-trade,

[A] Deſcended of a gentleman's family.] Mr Betterton, the player, who took a journey to Stratford, on purpoſe to get ſome informations concerning our author, found by the regiſter and public writings relating to that town, that the family of the Shakeſpeare's was of good figure and faſhion there, and mentioned as gentlemen (1). But this was put beyond diſpute by Mr Pope (2); who procured the following tranſcript from the inſtrument in the Herald's-Office:

(1) Rowe's Life of Shakeſpeare.

(2) Preface to his edition of Shakeſpeare's Works.

'To all and ſingular, noble, and gentlemen of all 'eſtates and degrees, bearing arms, to whom theſe 'preſents ſhall come. William Dethicke, Garter-'Principal King at Arms of England, and William 'Cambden, alias Clarencieux King at Arms for the 'ſouth, eaſt, and weſt parts of this realm, ſend 'greeting. Know ye, that in all nations and king-'doms the record and remembrance of worthy men 'have been made known and divulged by certain 'ſhields of arms and tokens of chivalrie; the grant 'and teſtimony whereof appertaineth unto us, by 'virtue of our offices from the Queen's Moſt Excellent 'Majeſty, and her Highneſs's moſt noble and victo-'rious progenitors: wherefore, being ſolicited, and 'by credible report informed, that John Shakeſpere, 'now of Stratford upon Avon, in the county of 'Warwick, Gentleman (3); whoſe Great Grand-'father, for his faithful and approved ſervice to the 'late moſt prudent Prince, King Henry the Seventh, 'of famous memory, was advanced and rewarded 'with lands and tenements, given to him in thoſe 'parts of Warwickſhire, where they have continued, 'by ſome deſcents, in good reputation and credit; 'and for that the ſaid John Shakeſpere having married 'the daughter and one of the heirs of Robert Arden, 'of Wellingcote, in the ſame county; and alſo pro-'duced this his ancient Coat of Arms, heretofore 'aſſigned to him, whilſt he was her Majeſty's officer 'and bayliff of that town: In conſideration of the 'premiſes, and for the encouragment of his poſterity, 'unto whom ſuch blazon of Arms and Atchievements 'of inheritance from their ſaid mother, by the ancient 'cuſtom and law of Arms, may lawfully deſcend; 'we the ſaid Garter and Clarencieux have aſſigned, 'granted, and confirmed, and by theſe preſents, ex-'emplified unto the ſaid John Shakeſpere and to his 'poſterity, that ſhield and Coat of Arms, viz. In a 'field of gold, upon a bend, ſables; a ſpear of the 'firſt, the point upward, bended, argent; and for 'his creſt or cognizance, A falcon, Or; with his 'wings diſplayed, ſtanding on a wreath of his colours, 'ſupportin a ſpeare, armed, headed, or ſteeled, ſilver, 'fixed upon an helmet, with mantles and toſſils; as 'more plainly may appear depicted in this margent. 'And we have likewiſe impaled the ſame with the 'ancient Arms of the ſaid Arden of Wellingcote; 'ſignifying, thereby, that it may and ſhall be lawful 'for the ſaid John Shakeſpere, Gent. to bear and 'uſe the ſame ſhield of Arms, ſingle or impaled 'as aforeſaid, during his natural lyfe; and that it 'ſhall be lawful for his children, iſſue, and poſterity, 'lawfully begotten, to bear, uſe, and quarter, and 'ſhew forth, the ſame, with their due differences, 'in all lawful warlike feats and civil uſe or exerciſes, 'according to the laws of Arms, and cuſtom that to 'gentlemen belongeth, without let or interruption 'of any perſon or perſons for uſe and bearing 'the ſame. In witneſs and teſtimony whereof, we 'have ſubſcribed our names, and faſtned the ſeals trade, dealt conſiderably that way (a). He married the daughter and one of the heirs of Robert Arden, of Wellingcote in the ſame county (b). This gentlewoman brought him ten children, of whom our poet was the eldeſt, being born in April 1564. At a proper age he was put to the free-ſchool in Stratford, where he acquired the rudiments of Grammar-learning. Whether he diſcovered at this time any extraordinary genius or inclination for the Claſſics, is very uncertain; to make the beſt of any, he might be endued with, in that kind, was not the point in his father's view. He had no deſign to make a ſcholar of his ſon, but, on the contrary, took him early from ſchool into his own buſineſs. He did not continue very long in this employ, as a minor, under the immediate guidance of his father; he reſolved to write man ſooner than ordinary, and at ſeventeen years of age married a woman of twenty-five. However, in reſpect to fortune, it was no imprudent match [B]; and thus young Shakeſpeare not only commenced maſter of a family, but became father of two if not three children, before he was out of his minority [C]. So ſettled, he had no other thoughts than of purſuing the wool-trade, when happening to fall into acquaintance with ſome perſons, who followed the practice of deer-ſtealing, he was prevailed upon to engage with them in robbing Sir Thomas Lucy's park, at Cherlcot near Stratford. The injury being repeated more than once, that gentleman was provoked to enter a proſecution againſt the delinquents; and Shakeſpeare in revenge made him the ſubject of a ballad [D], which tradition ſays (for unluckily the piece is loſt) was pointed with ſo much bitterneſs, that it became unſafe for the author to ſtay any longer in the country. To eſcape the hands of the Law, he fled to London, where, as might be expected from a man of wit and humour in his circumſtances, he threw himſelf among the players. Thus, at length, this grand luminary was driven, by a very untoward accident, into his genuine and proper ſphere of ſhining in the univerſe. His firſt admiſſion into the play-houſe was ſuitable to his appearance; a ſtranger, unacquainted and uninformed in this art, he was glad to be taken into the company in a very mean rank. Neither did his performance recommend him to any diſtinguiſhed notice (c). The part of an actor neither engaged nor deſerved his attention; it was very far from filling, or being adequate to, the prodigious powers of his mind: he turned the advantage which that ſituation afforded him, to a higher and nobler uſe; and having, by practice and obſervation, acquainted himſelf with the mechanical part of the theatre [E], his native genius inſpired all the other moſt eſſentially ſuperior qualities of a play-wright [F]. But the whole view of

' of our offices. Given at the Office of Arms, London, ' the day of in the forty-ſecond ' year of the reign of our Moſt Gracious Sovereign, ' Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God, Queen of ' England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the ' Faith, &c. 1599.'

[B] He married a woman of twenty-five, &c.] She was the daughter of one John Hatheway, a ſubſtantial yeoman, in the neighbourhood; ſo that 'tis not improbable, that Shakeſpeare had an eye to his intereſt in the match; eſpecially, if we conſider her age; however, ſhe ſurvived her huſband ſeven years, dying in 1623, at the age of ſixty-ſeven (4).

(4) See her monument in the church of Stratford.

[C] Before he was out of his minority.] He had three children by his wife, but we have an account only of two, they were both daughters. The younger was born in 1583, as appears by the inſcription on her monument (5); ſo that, by the courſe of nature, the father, who was born in 1564, could not well be full eighteen years of age on his marriage, unleſs we ſuppoſe (what ought not to be ſuppoſed, there being no evidence of it) that her firſt child was the fruits of antenuptial fornication.

(5) In the ſame church. It is there ſaid, ſhe died July 2, 1649, aged 66.

[D] He made a ballad upon the Knight.] This ballad was not the only ſhaft which he let fly againſt his proſecutor, whoſe anger drove him to the extreme end of ruin, where he was forced to a very low degree of drudgery for a ſupport. How long the Knight continued inexorable is not known; but it is certain, that Shakeſpeare owed his releaſe at laſt to the Queen's kindneſs. When he found, therefore, the character of Falſtaff, in the two parts of Henry the Fourth, had won her Majeſty's favour to that degree, that ſhe ordered him to bring it once more on the ſtage; his addreſs to her upon this occaſion is admirable, in making this favourite a deer-ſtealer; which gave him, at the ſame time, ſuch a natural opening againſt his proſecutor. The fléche is pointed with excellent humour, and the archer's aim hinted in ſuch an alluſion, as is not to be diſcerned but by thoſe, who were in the ſecret. Juſtice Shallow appears conſpicuouſly and ſplendidly ridiculous, whilſt the particular merit that procured him the atchievement of the dozen white luces (6) would be obſerved only by the knowing ones in Heraldry. By this management of the Knight's reputation, a due reſpect is paid to his quality; he is ſaved from falling into the rude and undiſtinguiſhing hands of the vulgar; ſuch a management was no leſs due to the length of twenty years, which had paſſed for the manager's reſentment to cool in. It was ſtill more due to the ſenſe he muſt have then of his abſolute ſecurity from any further harm; and, eſpecially, to the advantage he had luckily made in his fortune thereby.

(6) Theſe were the arms of the Lucies. Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickſhire.

[E] The mechanical part of the theatre.] He uſed the help of his function in forming himſelf to create and expreſs that ſublime, which other actors can only copy and throw out in action and graceful attitude. His diſregard to the two unities of time and place, are evidently owing to this ſkill, which had taught him the exact temper and diſpoſition of the ſpectators. Theſe he obſerved were ſuſceptible of a deception in both thoſe points, and he never ſuffered either of them to cramp the native force of his genius. In forming the plan of his plays, his deſign was to obſerve the unity of action only: this was ſufficient to impoſe the neglect of the other upon the audience; and Mr Upton is of opinion, that he is the beſt Poet who can impoſe upon his audience, and that he is the wiſeſt man who is eaſieſt impoſed on. The ſtory, which is the principal part, and as it were, the ſoul of the tragedy, being made a whole, with a natural dependance and connection, the ſpectator ſeldom conſiders the length of time neceſſary to produce all the incidents, and as to place, there is an artificial contrivance of the ſcenes. ' For my own part, con- ' tinues this writer, I ſee no great hurt likely to ' accrue to the underſtanding, in accompanying the ' Poet in his mechanical operations, and in helping ' on an innocent deceit, while he not only raiſes or ' ſooths the paſſions, but tranſports me from place ' to place, juſt as it pleaſes him, and carries on the ' thread of his ſtory (7).'

(7) Upton's Remarks upon Shakeſpeare.

[F] The moſt eſſentially ſuperior qualities of a play-wright.] Theſe are generally reckoned to be, manners, ſentiments, and diction; and in theſe there are four requiſites, which are all remarkably obſerved by Shakeſpeare. 1. That they be good. 2 Suitable. 3. True, with reſpect to hiſtory, or common report. 4. Uniform and conſiſtent. As to the firſt of theſe, 'tis remarked, by the laſt-mentioned critic, that they were of this firſt attempt in ſtage-poetry [G] being to procure a ſubſiſtence, he directed his endeavours ſolely to hit the taſte and humour that then prevailed amongſt the meaner ſort of people, of whom the audience was generally compoſed; and therefore his images of life were drawn from thoſe of that rank [H]. Theſe had no notion of the rules of writing, were the natural expreſſions of his own mind. Shakeſpeare being a good and honeſt man, as Ben Jonſon teſtifies in his Diſcoveries (8); and in another place he ſays,

——Look how the father's face
Lives in his iſſue, even ſo the race
Of Shakeſpeare's mind and manners brightly ſhines
In his well-torned and true-filled lines (9).

This is produced by Jonſon, as a proof of Shakeſpeare's art and ſkill in play-writing But however true Ben's remark undoubtedly is in general, yet a late author has pointed out a ſingular deviation from the fourth requiſite of conſiſtency, running through the whole fable in one of our author's moſt finiſhed plays, Macbeth; where the incongruity of all the paſſages, in which the Thane of Cawdor is mentioned, appears prominently conſpicuous. In the ſecond ſcene of the firſt act, the Thanes of Roſſe and Angus bringing the king an account of the battle, inform him, that Norway,

Aſſiſted by that moſt diſloyal traytor,
The Thane of Cawdor, 'gan a diſmal conflict.

It appears, that Cawdor was taken priſoner, for the king ſays, in the ſame ſcene,

——Go, pronounce his death,
And with his former title, greet Macbeth.

Yet, though Cawdor was thus taken by Macbeth in arms againſt his king, when Macbeth is ſaluted in the fourth ſcene, Thane of Cawdor, by the weird ſiſters, he aſks,

How of Cawdor? The Thane of Cawdor lives
A proſperous gentleman.——

And in the next line, conſiders the promiſes, that he ſhould be Thane of Cawdor and King, as equally unlikely to be accompliſhed. How can Macbeth be ignorant of the ſtate of the Thane of Cawdor, whom he has juſt defeated and taken priſoner; or call him a proſperous gentleman, who has forfeited his title and life by open rebellion? Or why ſhould he wonder, that the title of the rebel, whom he has overthrown, ſhould be conferred upon him? He cannot be ſuppoſed to diſſemble his knowledge of the condition of Cawdor, becauſe he inquires with all the ardour of curioſity and the vehemence of ſudden aſtoniſhment, and becauſe no body is preſent but Banquo, who had an equal part in the battle, and was equally acquainted with Cawdor's treaſon. However, in the next ſcene his ignorance ſtill continues; and when Roſſe and Angus preſent him, from the king, with this new title, he cries out,

——The Thane of Cawdor lives;
Why do you dreſs me in his borrow'd robes?

Roſſe and Angus, who were the meſſengers that, in the ſecond ſcene, informed the king of the aſſiſtance given by Cawdor to the invader; having loſt, as well as Macbeth, all memory of what they had ſo lately ſeen and related, make this anſwer,

——Whether he was
Combin'd with Norway, or did line the rebels
With hidden help and vantage, o. with both
He labour'd in his country's wreck, I know not.

Neither Roſſe knew what he had juſt reported, nor Macbeth what he had juſt done. This ſeems not to be one of the faults that are to be imputed to the tranſcribers; ſince though the inconſiſtency of Roſſe and Angus might be removed, by ſuppoſing, that their names are erroneouſly inſerted, and that only Roſſe brought the account of the battle, and only Angus was ſent to compliment Macbeth; yet the forgetfulneſs of Macbeth cannot be palliated, ſince what he ſays could not have been ſpoken by any other (10).

[G] His firſt attempts in Poetry.] We have no certain authority which was the firſt play he wrote; Romeo and Juliet, acted in 1597, was the higheſt date of any that Mr Pope could find, next to which was Richard the Second and Third, in 1598. The firſt part of Henry the Fifth, proves that play to be wrote while the Earl of Eſſex was General in Ireland. If Titus Andronicus were his, it would bid faireſt for this right of primogeniture; ſince Ben Jonſon, condemning it in his induction to Bartholomew-Fair, mentions it's being then of twenty-five or thirty years ſtanding; if we take the leſſer number, this play muſt have been wrote in 1589, when our author was twenty-five years old. But Mr Theobald takes Ben's words neceſſarily to extend to the largeſt time; and infers from it, that the play, on it's firſt appearance, could not be the work of Shakeſpeare's pen, who had not at that time left Warwickſhire; and this argument is alſo eſteemed unanſwerable by Mr Upton. Mr Pope excludes this piece from the liſt of Shakeſpeare's offspring, becauſe openly condemned by Ben Jonſon while Shakeſpeare was living; for he will have it, that theſe two great Poets were good friends, and that they lived on amicable terms with each other, notwithſtanding the warm conteſts that were carried on with leſs temper by their partizans (11). It is acknowledged, ſays he, that Ben Jonſon was firſt introduced upon the ſtage, and his firſt works encouraged by Shakeſpeare, and after his death that author writes to the memory of his beloved William Shakeſpeare (12), which ſhews as if the friendſhip had continued through life. He thinks likewiſe, that the commendations of Shakeſpeare in Ben's Diſcoveries proceed from a perſonal kindneſs; he tells us, he loved the man as well as honoured his memory, celebrates the honeſty, openneſs, and frankneſs of his temper, and only diſtinguiſhes, as he reaſonably ought, between the real merit of the author and the ſilly and derogatory applauſes of the players. But, however reaſonable this might be, there is a very ſtrong proof, that the players had a greater ſhare in Shakeſpeare's friendſhip than Ben had: In his Will, he bequeaths to three of them, each a gold ring, ranking them among ſome of his firſt friends (13). In reality he had no reaſon to rank Ben among theſe; the frequent ſneers which are vented in the induction to Bartholomew Fair againſt Shakeſpeare, while, as Mr Pope obſerves, he was ſtill living, are undeniable proofs that Jonſon's was ſuch a kind of love as made him blind to ſome of his friend's moſt diſtinguiſhing excellencies. 'If 'there be never a ſervant monſter 'ith fair (they are 'his words) who can help it; he ſays, nor a neſt 'of antiques? He is loth to make nature afraid in 'his plays, like thoſe that beget tales, tempeſts, and 'ſuch like drolleries, to mix his head with other men's 'heels.' Here the ſervant monſter is the character of Caliban, in the Tempeſt; the neſt of antiques, is the clowns, who dance in The Winter's Tale; and leſt he ſhould be thought not to ſpeak plainly enough, he expreſsly mentions thoſe plays in the next ſentence. I am afraid the reader will think but ill either of Jonſon's judgment or his candour, when he thus ridicules what has been generally admired by men of real taſte (14). This is the remark of Mr Whalley, who, however, ſo far agrees with Mr Pope, as to believe the ſneer was deſigned not ſo much, though not abſolutely without any deſign, to ridicule Shakeſpeare for his invention, as the paſſion of the mob for ſpectacles of this kind (15).

[H] His images of life are drawn from that rank.] There being no external proofs to give light into this point, which was the firſt play of Shakeſpeare, recourſe has been had to the internal evidence, for aſſiſtance therein, from the progreſs of his improvement by uſe and exerciſe. But all that could be diſcovered, was firſt, in regard to his comedies, that he fell into the general practice followed then, of laying his ſcene among tradeſmen and mechanics; and in the hiſtorical plays, ſtrictly copying the common old ſtories or vulgar traditions of that kind of people; and as in tragedy, nothing was ſo ſure to ſurprize and raiſe their admiration, as the moſt unnatural events and incidents, the moſt exaggerated thoughts, the moſt verboſe and bombaſt writing, or the model of the Ancients [I]. Shakeſpeare alſo ſet out without the advantage of education, and without the advice or aſſiſtance of the learned [K]; equally without the patronage bombaſt expreſſion, the moſt pompous rhymes and thundering verſification. So in comedy, nothing was ſo ſure to pleaſe, as the mean buffoonry, idle ribaldry, and unmannerly jeſts of fools and clowns (16).

[I] Theſe had no notion of the rules, &c.] Not only the common audience had no notion of the rules of writing, but few, even of the better ſort, piqued themſelves upon any degree of knowledge or nicety that way. Their tragedies were only hiſtories in dialogue; and their comedies followed the thread of any novel as they found it, no leſs implicitly than if it had been true hiſtory.

[K] Without the aſſiſtance of the learned.] Notwithſtanding the remark of Ben Jonſon, who knew our author when living, that he had little Latin and leſs Greek; yet his teſtimony hath not been ſufficient to ſatisfy all his admirers. We are told, that in a converſation between Sir John Suckling, Sir William Davenant, Endymion Porter, Mr Hales of Eton, and Ben Jonſon; Sir John Suckling, who was a profeſſed admirer of Shakeſpeare, having undertaken his defence againſt Ben with ſome warmth, Mr Hales, after ſitting ſtill for ſome time, told them, that if Shakeſpeare had not read the Ancients he had likewiſe not ſtolen any thing from them; and that if Ben would produce any one topic finely treated by any of them, he would undertake to ſhew ſomething at leaſt as well written by Shakeſpeare (17). This was a very genteel turn of Ben's cenſorioufneſs into a high compliment of Shakeſpeare's genius; and Mr Rowe ventured further, peremptorily 'declaring it to be beyond all controverſy, that Shakeſpeare had no knowledge of the writings of the ancient Poets; and that, in his works, no traces could be found of any thing which looked like an imitation of the Ancients. For, ſays he, the delicacy of his taſte, and the natural bent of his own great genius (equal, if not ſuperior, to ſome of the beſt of theirs), would certainly have led him to read and ſtudy them with ſo much pleaſure, that ſome of their fine images would naturally have inſinuated into, and been mixed with, his own writings. So that his not copying ſomething from them may be an argument of his never having read them' Mr Pope afterwards preſerved the compliment of Mr Hales, but with the ſame caution that he firſt made it, in the following paraphraſe: 'There is 'certainly, ſays he, a vaſt difference between learning and languages; how far Shakeſpeare was ignorant of the latter I cannot determine, but 'tis plain 'he had much reading at leaſt, if they will not call 'that learning. Nor is it any great matter, if a man 'has knowledge, whether he has it from one language 'or another. Nothing is more evident, than that 'he had a taſte of natural Philoſophy, Mechanics, 'Ancient and Modern Hiſtory, Poetical Learning, 'and Mythology. We find him very knowing in the 'cuſtoms, rites, and manners of Antiquity. In 'Coriolanus and Julius Cæſar, not only the ſpirit, but 'manners of the Romans are exactly drawn, and ſtill 'a nicer diſtinction is ſhewn, between the manners 'of the Romans, in the time of the former and 'of the latter. His reading on the ancient hiſtorians 'is no leſs conſpicuous in many references to particular paſſages; and the ſpeches copied from Plutarch 'in Coriolanus may as well be made an inſtance of his 'learning as thoſe copied from Cicero in the Cataline 'of Ben Jonſon are of his. The manners of other 'nations in general, the Egyptians, Venetians, French, '&c. are drawn with equal propriety. Whatever 'object of nature, or branch of ſcience, he either 'ſpeaks of, or deſcribes, it is always with competent, 'if not extenſive, knowledge; his deſcriptions are 'exact; all his metaphors appropriated and remarkably 'drawn from the true nature and inherent qualities 'of each ſubject. When he treats of ethic or politic, 'we may conſtantly obſerve a wonderful juſtneſs of 'diſtinction as well as extent of comprehenſion. No 'one is more a maſter of the poetical ſtory, or has 'more frequent alluſions to the various parts of it. 'Mr Waller (who has been celebrated for this laſt 'particular) has not ſhewn more learning this way 'than Shakeſpeare. We have tranſlations from Ovid, 'publiſhed in his name, among thoſe poems which paſs 'for his, and for ſome of which, we have undoubted 'authority, being publiſhed by himſelf, and dedicated 'to his noble patron the Earl of Southampton. He 'appears alſo to have been converſant with Plautus; 'from whom he has taken the plan of one of his 'plays. He follows the Greek authors, and particularly Dares Phrygius in another, although I will 'not pretend to ſay in what language he read them. 'The modern Italian writers of novels he was manifeſtly acquainted with; and we may conclude him 'to be no leſs converſant with the Ancients of his 'own country, from the uſe he has made of Chaucer, 'in Troilus and Creſſida; and in the two Noble Kinſmen, if that play be his, which Mr Pope thinks 'was ſo (18).' He then proceeds to obviate an objection, which threatned to overſet all theſe arguments, from the perpetual blunders and illiteracies which diſgrace his writings. Theſe he imputes, either to the neglect, imprudence, or ignorance, of the firſt tranſcribers and editors of his works; and ventures to ſay, that when the nature and kinds of theſe are enumerated and conſidered, not only Shakeſpeare, but even Ariſtotle and Cicero, had their works undergone the ſame fate, might have appeared to want ſenſe as well as learning. The reader will perceive, that Mr Pope inclines, againſt Mr Rowe, to the opinion that our author's fine imitation of the Ancients is none of the leaſt of his excellencies, and ſo raiſes a monument to Shakeſpeare's glory, though ſet upon a different foundation; which being obſerved by Mr Theobald, he ſums up the whole in theſe words: 'The reſult of the controverſy moſt certainly, ſays he, 'either way terminate to our author's honour: how 'happily he could imitate the Ancients, if that point 'be allowed, or how glorioufly he could think like 'them, without owing any thing to imitation (19).' However, in purſuing this controverſy, he takes the ſide againſt Mr Pope, as follows:—'Though, ſays he, I ſhould be very unwilling to allow Shakeſpeare ſo poor a ſcholar as many have laboured to repreſent him, yet I ſhall be very cautious of declaring too poſitively on the other ſide of the queſtion; that is, with regard to my opinion of his knowledge in the dead languages; and, therefore, the paſſages, that I occaſionally quote from the claſſics, ſhall not be urged as proofs, that he knowingly imitated thoſe originals, but brought to ſhew, how happily he has expreſſed himſelf upon the ſame topics. A very learned critic, of our own nation, has declared, that a fameneſs of thought and fameneſs of expreſſion too, in two writers of a different age, can hardly happen, without a violent ſuſpicion of the latter's copying from his predeceſſor. I ſhall not, therefore, run any great riſque of a cenſure, though I ſhould venture to hint, that the reſemblance in thought and expreſſion of our author and an Ancient (which we ſhould allow to be imitation in learning, was not queſtioned) may ſometimes take it's riſe from ſtrength of memory, and thoſe impreſſions which he owed to the ſchool; and if we may allow a poſſibility of this, conſidering, that when he quitted the ſchool, he gave into his father's profeſſion and way of living; and had, 'tis likely, but a ſlender library of claſſical learning; and conſidering what a number of tranſlations, romances, and legends ſtarted about his time and a little before; (moſt of which, 'tis very evident, he read) I think it may very eaſily be reconciled, why he rather ſchemed his plots and characters from theſe later informations, than went back to thoſe fountains; for which he might entertain a ſincere veneration, but to which he could not have ſo ready a recourſe (20).' This reaſoning of Mr Theobald undoubtedly deſerved a leſs ungrammatical ſtile and a more coherent method; ſo that if he does not prove Shakeſpeare's want of ſcholarſhip, he does that of his own. As on the other hand, Mr Upton, who has entered into the liſt in this diſpute, has confeſſedly demonſtrated his own ſcholarſhip, however he may have failed in evincing that of Shakeſpeare; 'I have often wondered, ſays 'he, with what kind of reaſoning any one could be 'ſo far impoſed on, as to imagine, that Shakeſpeare 'had no learning, when it muſt, at the ſame time, 'be acknowledged, that without learning he cannot 'be read, without any degree of underſtanding or 'taſte (21).' Juſt ſo the author of Chevy Chace comes patronage of the better ſort, as without any acquaintance among them. But when his performances had merited the protection of his Prince, and the encouragement of the Court, had ſucceeded to that of the Town, the works of his riper years are manifeſtly raiſed above thoſe of his former [L]. The dates of his plays ſufficiently evidence, that his productions improved, in proportion to the reſpect he had for his auditors. In this way of writing he was an abſolute original [M], and of ſuch a peculiar caſt, as hath perpetually comes within this conſtruction of a man of learning, ſince without the learning of Mr Addiſon's notes, he cannot be read with any kind of underſtanding or taſte; and to do this writer juſtice, it muſt be allowed too, that, like Mr Addiſon in that old ſong, his deſign was not ſo much to produce proofs of his author's learning, as to communicate the excellent uſe he made of his own. This is undeniable from a great number of inſtances, where he ſhews the cloſeſt connection between Shakeſpeare and the Greek and Latin writers, which yet he plainly ſuppoſes to be merely accidental and utterly unknown to Shakeſpeare. In the mean time, he has juſtly ridiculed all the attemptors to modernize Shakeſpeare; who, he obſerves, is ſet forth by theſe vampers as a meer mechanic, a fellow, 'tis true, of genius, who ſays now and then very good things, but wild and uncultivated; and one who is by no means proper company for Lords and Ladies and Court Pages, 'till ſome Poet or other, who knows the world better, takes him in hand, and introduces him in the modern dreſs to good company. He has ventured alſo (with what candour or ſucceſs the reader muſt judge) to aim a ſtroke of his critical wand at Lord Shafteſbury, whoſe account of Shakeſpeare is given in a few words: Our old dramatic Poet may witneſs for one good ear and manly reliſh, [notwithſtanding his natural rudeneſs, his unpoliſhed ſtile, his antiquated phraſe and wit, his want of method and coherence, and his deficiency in almoſt all the graces and ornaments of theſe kind of writings] yet by the juſtneſs of his morals, the aptneſs of many of his deſcriptions, and the plain and natural turn of ſeveral of his characters he pleaſes his audience and even gains their ear, without a ſingle bribe from luxury or vice. 'Thoſe lines, ſays Mr Upton, that I have placed between two 'hooks, ought certainly to be omitted, as they carry 'with them reflections falſe in every particular. 'Tis 'certain, his Lordſhip leaves us no room to doubt 'of the little opinion he had of Shakeſpeare's claſſical 'learning.' And Mr Hurd (22) inclines the ſame way ſo ſtrongly, that he does not ſcruple to ſuggeſt, the want of what is called the advantage of a learned education, to have been a particular felicity to his genius, which by that means preſerved it's natural freedom uninfluenced with the bond of claſſical ſuperſtition. However, the ſame critic, ſpeaking of the poſition of known words and an eaſy deduction of new ones, recommends the ſtudy of Shakeſpeare, who he ſays, of all the Moderns, hath moſt ſucceſsfully practiſed this ſecret (23).

[L] Are manifeſtly raiſed above thoſe of his former years.] This is the aſſertion of Mr Pope, advanced, as it ſhould ſeem, to prevent any miſtake that might be occaſioned by a remark of Mr Rowe; who ſuggeſts, that we are not to look for Shakeſpeare's beginnings, like thoſe of other authors, among their leaſt perfect writings. 'Art, ſays that gentleman, had ſo little, 'and nature ſo large, a ſhare in what he did, that, 'for ought I know, the performances of his youth, 'as they were the moſt vigorous, and had the moſt 'fire and ſtrength of imagination in them, were the 'beſt (24).' Mr Pope confines this improvement to thoſe plays only which were writ for the Court. 'I make no doubt, ſays he, in this obſervation, that 'he improved in proportion to the reſpect he had 'for his auditors, would appear in every inſtance, 'were but editions extant, from whence we might 'learn the exact time when every piece was compoſed; 'and whether he wrote for the town or the Court, 'directing us to look for this improvement only in the 'latter, which are his beſt.' And, as to the fire and ſtrength of imagination, which is made by Mr Rowe, the characteriſtic of his beſt pieces, Mr Pope thinks this only a proof that his wit often buoys up and is borne above his ſubject, when that is not well choſen, as in fools and clowns. 'Shakeſpeare's genius, ſays 'he, in thoſe low parts, is like ſome prince of a 'romance, in the diſguiſe of a ſhepherd or peaſant, 'a certain greatneſs and ſpirit now and then breaks 'out, which manifeſt his higher extraction and 'qualities.' Mr Rowe, in ſupport of his opinion, ſays, that he would not be thought to mean, that Shakeſpeare's fancy was ſo looſe and extravagant as to be independent on the rule and government of judgment, but that what he thought was commonly ſo great, ſo juſtly and rightly conceived in itſelf, that it wanted little or no correction, and was immediatly approved by an impartial judgment at the firſt ſight. On the contrary, Mr Pope declares, that 'moſt of our author's errors are not ſo much defects 'as ſuperfœtations, and ariſe purely from want of 'thinking or judging, which yet was not owing ſo 'much to any real defect in the faculty or power 'of his own judgment, but from a compliance to 'the want of it in the loweſt of the people *, whom 'he was obliged to pleaſe, and depreſs his judgment; 'or elſe from being miſled, by keeping the worſt 'of company, as a player, and forming himſelf upon 'the judgment of that body of men whereof he was 'a member. As theſe men live by the majority, 'they know no rule but that of pleaſing the preſent 'humour, and complying with the wit in faſhion; 'a conſideration, which brings all their judgment to 'a ſhort point. Players are juſt ſuch judges of what 'is right, as taylors are of what is graceful. In this 'view, it will be but fair to allow, that moſt of our 'author's faults are leſs to be aſcribed to his wrong 'judgment as a Poet, than to his right judgment as 'a player (25).' However, it ought to be obſerved, that if thoſe diſadvantages were ſufficient to miſlead and depreſs the greateſt genius upon earth, yet they were recompenſed by ſome extraordinary advantages, flowing from the particular taſte and humour of the times. Thus, the univerſal belief of the power of witches, fairies, and enchantments, among the loweſt of the people eſpecially, gave full room for his boundleſs imagination to roam in. We need not take notice, that two of his beſt pieces † are formed upon this belief; to ſay nothing of his Midſummer Night's Dream. The two Gentlemen of Verona, one of the firſt, as well as one of the worſt, of Shakeſpeare's plays, cannot be ſaid to derive it's faults from any of the cauſes aſſigned by Mr Pope. Beſides, his employment as a player, gave him the advantage and habit of fancying himſelf the very character he meant to delineate.

* Theſe faults are ſuch as reſpect the choice of the ſubject, the conduct of the incidents, as well as falſe thoughts, forced expreſſions, clinches, &c.

† The Tempeſt, and Macbeth.

[M] He was an abſolute original.] This has never been conteſted; on the contrary, it has conſtantly been eſteemed no ſlender proof of the force and penetration of ſucceeding wits, to be able to convey an apt and adequate idea of his. Mr Pope has laboured this point; he tells us (26), that 'Homer himſelf drew 'not his art ſo immediately from the fountains of 'nature, it proceeded through Egyptian ſtrainers and 'channels, and came to him, not without ſome 'tincture of the learning, or ſome caſt of the models, 'of thoſe before him. But the poetry of Shake'ſpeare was inſpiration indeed. He was not ſo much 'an imitator as an inſtrument of nature. 'Tis not 'ſo juſt to ſay he ſpeaks from her as that ſhe ſpeaks 'through him.' In another place he obſerves, in diſtinction to Milton's genius, which he ſays, glows continually, and is kept up by the greateſt art, that of Shakeſpeare ſtrikes us unprepared, like an accidental ſtroke from Heaven. That he ſeems to have known the world by intuition, to have looked through human nature at a glance, and to be the only author that gives ground for a very new opinion, that the Philoſopher, and even the man of the world, may be born, as well as the Poet. Mr Upton obſerves (28), that there is no character, that of Socrates only excepted, where refined ridicule, rallery, wit, and humour were ſo mixed and united with what is moſt grave and ſerious in Morals and Philoſophy, as our author's; he obſerves, that this is the magic, with which he works ſuch wonders;

Another unexampled perfection of Shakeſpeare's wit, is taken notice of by Mr Maſon (29), who, ſpeaking of the ordinary advantage of the ancient chorus in dramatic performances, writes thus: 'Whatever theſe modern play-makers may have gained by rejecting the chorus, the true Poet has loſt conſiderably by it, for he has loſt a graceful and natural reſource to the embelliſhments of picturesque deſcription, ſublime allegory, and whatever elſe comes under the denomination of pure poetry. Shakeſpeare, indeed, had the power of introducing this naturally, and, what is more ſtrange, of joining it with pure paſſion.' His ſtriking out of the ordinary road, and rejecting the rules of the drama with ſucceſs, has generally been eſteemed another characteriſtic of his vaſt and original genius. Shakeſpeare, ſays Mr Hurd, firſt broke through the bond of claſſical ſuperſtition, and uninfluenced by the weight of early prepoſſeſſion, he ſtruck at once into the road of nature and common ſenſe (30).

(30) Notes on Horace's Epiſtle ad Piſonem, p. 187. edit. 1753.

[N] A compound of beauties and blemiſhes] It is the obſervation of an elegant French writer, 'that the Engliſh as well as the Spaniards, were poſſeſſed of the theatre at a time when the French had no more than moving itinerant ſtages. Shakeſpeare, who was conſidered as the Corneille of the firſt mentioned nation, was nearly contemporary with Lopez de Vega, and he created, as it were, the Engliſh theatre. Shakeſpeare, beſides a ſtrong, fruitful, genius, was natural and ſublime, but had not ſo much as one ſingle ſpark of good taſte, or any one rule of the drama. I will now hazard a random, but at the ſame time, a true reflection; which is, that the great merit of this dramatic Poet has been the ruin of the Engliſh ſtage. There are ſuch beautiful, ſuch noble, ſuch dreadful ſcenes in this writer's monſtrous verſes, to which the name of tragedy is given, that they have always been exhibited with great ſucceſs. Time, which only gives reputation to writers, at laſt makes their very faults venerable. Moſt of the whimſical gigantic images of this Poet, have, through length of time, acquired a right of paſſing for ſublime. Moſt of the modern dramatic writers have copied him; but the touches and deſcriptions which are applauded in Shakeſpeare are hiſſed at in theſe writers, and you'll eaſily believe, that the veneration, in which this author is held, increaſes in proportion to the contempt which is ſhewn to the Moderns. Dramatic writers don't conſider, that they ſhould not imitate him; and the ill ſucceſs of Shakeſpeare's imitators, produces no other effect, than to make him be conſidered as inimitable. In Othello, a moſt tender piece, a man ſtrangles his wife on the ſtage, and though the poor woman is ſtrangling, ſhe cries out aloud, that ſhe dies very unjuſtly. In Hamlet, the two grave-diggers are drunk, ſinging ballads, and making humourous reflections on the ſkulls which they throw up; but a circumſtance that will ſurprize you is, that this ridiculous incident has been imitated. Otway, in his Venice preſerved, introduces Antonio the ſenator and Naki his courtezan in the midſt of the horrors of the Marquis of Bidmars's conſpiracy. Antonio, the Spaniard ſenator, plays in his maſter's preſence all the apiſh tricks of a lewd impotent debauchee, who is quite frantic and out of his ſenſes, he mimicks a dog, and bites his miſtreſs's legs, who kicks and whips him. However, the players have ſtruck theſe buffoonries (which were calculated merely for the dregs of the people) out of Otway's tragedy, but they have ſtill left in Shakeſpeare's Julius Cæſar, the jokes of the Roman ſhoemakers and coblers, who are introduced in the ſame ſcene with Brutus and Caſſius (31)'. Mr Voltaire has thus given a notable inſtance how far the brighteſt genius may be depreſſed and miſguided by a ſlaviſh attachment to the antique laws, which he calls being in taſte; and will have the various palates of different nations abſolutely ſubjugated to them. A proper anſwer to this impoſition is, that an Engliſhman ſcorns to ſubmit to any laws, to which he has not given his own conſent. 'Tis no wonder to find a critic, who takes his idea of Shakeſpeare from what he finds in Corneille, cenſuring the grave-diggers in Hamlet; Ophelia's dying words in Othello; and the ſuffering coblers to crack jokes in the preſence of Brutus and Caſſius. Theſe are maſterly touches, of a very tickliſh and dangerous nature *; in attempting to judge of which, the blind ſuperſtition of the ſervile critic is equally expoſed, with the impudence of the low creeping imitator. A critic of our own has obſerved, that the authority of Shakeſpeare has been ſo far from ſpoiling the Engliſh ſtage, that, on the contrary, it was ruined, by leaving his noble and manly virtue to follow the effeminate ſoftneſs of the French manners and taſte. In this depraved ſpirit we were debauched, by being too much Frenchified, by reſiding among that people. It was after the Reſtoration that lewdneſs and debauchery were publickly brought on the ſtage by Dryden and Congreve; 'twas then, that Shakeſpeare's plays were altered to the preſent taſte, and his faults endeavoured to be purged out by Sir William Davenant, Dryden, and the Duke of Bucks; the event ſhewed, that as Shakeſpeare came upon the ſtage with all his faults upon his head, ſo theſe could not be taken off without wounding the brain; by which piece of ſurgery, it became ſenſible that they were ſo vitally united to it, that in ſeparating them, the body was brought into the ſtate of a meer lifeleſs carcaſe. Originals are ſui generis; and it would be intirely out of nature to ſet Shakeſpeare for a model to form other wits upon. Some are ſo formed as to ſucceed beſt under the guidance of the Greeks and the common rules. This has been the caſe of Dryden, Otway, and Rowe ‡, whoſe moſt regular compoſitions are reckoned their chef d'oeuvres. Theſe regular beauties gain our eſteem, and ſome degree of love and admiration; but 'tis the charm that unexpectedly ariſes from what was thought to be an irregular contraſt of features and colour, that raiſes enchantment, tranſport, and rapture. Shakeſpeare puts his ſpectators and auditors into a trance, where they both ſee and feel pleaſures unutterable. In this view, Mr Hurd having obſerved, that there was a time when the art of Jonſon was ſet above the divineſt raptures of Shakeſpeare; proceeds to take notice, that the preſent age is well convinced of the miſtake, and finely remarks, that 'if Shakeſpeare's genius is now idolized, happily for the public taſte, it can ſcarcely be too much ſo (32).' Shakeſpeare alone was equal to the taſk of correcting Shakeſpeare's faults. It has been obſerved, that there is no vice of ſtyle or compoſition, but what our Poet has in one place or other ridiculed or cenſured. He has made uſe of this talent in many of his pieces. If in doing this, he lets ſome ſtill keep their places, experience has ſince demonſtrated, that his judgment in this particular was more extraorinary and ſurprizing, as the lofty flowings of his fancy and exactneſs of his judgment appear to be juſtly matched to each other (33).

(33) Warburton's Remarks upon Shakeſpeare.

[O] Queen Elizabeth ſhewed him many marks of her favour.] As no doubt can be made, but that our author felt the firſt fruits of her Majeſty's kindneſs in the article of deer-ſtealing; ſo, in 1581, there was publiſhed under the ſame name, a treatiſe, dedicated to her Majeſty; in which the author particularly mentions that Queen's clemency to him, in theſe terms: 'Although this [the perfection of her Majeſty's government] be of itſelf ſo clear and manifeſt, that it cannot be denied; yet could not I forbear, moſt renowned ſoveraine, being, as it were, inforced by your Majeſtie's

Falſtaff [P], in the two parts of Henry IV. that ſhe commanded the author to continue it for one play more, and to ſhew the Knight in love, which he executed inimitably in The Merry Wives

Majeſtie's late and ſingular clemency, in pardoning certayne my undutifull miſdemeanours; but ſeek to acknowledge your gracious goodneſs and bounty towards me, &c. (34)' By theſe two concurring circumſtances, this piece might fairly challenge our Poet for it's author, did not his claim appear to be fully conteſted, by the date 1581; beſides that the offence for which her Majeſty's pardon had been obtained, muſt have been committed, at leaſt, a year or two before; not to mention, that Shakeſpeare, at the age of fifteen or ſixteen, muſt have been a very wiſe man, not after the common ſort of theſe clerks, which can talk of nothing but of the faculty which they profeſs; as if they be Diuines of Divinity, Lawyers of the Law, and Phiſicians of Phyſic only. This man ſpeaks very naturally of every thing, as a man univerſally ſeen; that had joined good learning with good wit. So that this book, if it could be written by our Poet, would be abſolutely deciſive in the diſpute about his learning, ſince he muſt have been ſo by intuition, for he cites Homer, Plato, Cæſar, Cicero, Pomponius Mela, Vegetius, Collumella, and ſeveral others; and is ſuggeſted expreſsly to have read them all in the original, though he might have had them in the tranſlations. Moreover, the doctor, who preſides in the dialogue, and evidently repreſents the author himſelf, has theſe words: 'I have 'ſeen a cap for 14 pence, as good as I can now get for 'two ſhillings and ſix pence. Now a payre of ſhoes coſt 'twelve pence, that in my time I have boughte a better 'for ſix pence. Now I can get ne're a horſe ſhod 'under ſixteen pence or twelve pence, whereof I have 'alſo ſeen the common price was ſix pence *.' That is in Henry the Eighth's reign, long enough before our Poet was born. Who expreſſed his gratitude to Queen Elizabeth, in his own way; and that (which is a teſtimony of the devotion of his gratitude) not only in ſtrains above all other Poets, but he even ſeems, by a peculiar ſtroke of inſpiration, to be raiſed above himſelf. ——Thou remember'ſt,
Since once I ſat upon a promontory,
And heard a mermaid, on a dolphin's back,
Uttering ſuch dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude ſea grew civil at her ſong,
And certain ſtars ſhot madly from their ſpheres,
To hear the Mermaid's muſic.

Punk. I remember too,
At that very time, I ſaw, but thou could'ſt not,
Flying between the cold moon and the earth,
Cupid alarm'd; a certain aim he took,
At a fair veſtal throned in the weſt,
And loos'd his love-ſhafts ſmartly from his bow,
As it ſhould pierce a Queen of Hearts;
But I might ſee young Cupid's fiery ſhaft,
Quench'd in the moiſt beams of the watry moon,
And the imperial votareſs paſs'd on
In maiden meditation; fancy free.

(35) In his edition of our author's plays.

Dr Warburton (35) has changed allum'd for alarm'd becauſe it raiſes the beauty of the thought greatly; for what an addition is this to the compliment made to this virgin Queen's celibacy, that it alarmed the power of love, as if his empire were in danger, when this imperial votreſs had declared for a ſingle life; ſo powerful would her great example be in the world: Queen Elizabeth could not but be pleaſed with our author's addreſs on this occaſion The ſame critic alſo obſerves, that tho' the compliment paid in theſe laſt lines to Queen Elizabeth, is obvious enough; yet the character of Mary, Queen of Scots, in the former lines, was too allegorically delineated to be underſtood. Nothing is truer than that both a compliment and a ſatire, on that unfortunate lady, were here intended, either of which was a ſufficient reaſon to diſguiſe the matter by an allegory. Firſt, the laying of the ſcene, ſhews it to be near the Britiſh iſland; for the ſpeaker is repreſented as hearing the mermaid, at the very time he ſaw Cupid's attempt upon the veſtal. The mermaid on the dolphin's back, plainly deſigns Queen Mary's marriage with the Dauphin of France. The Poet deſigns her under the image of a mermaid on two accounts, becauſe ſhe was Queen of one part of the iſle, and becauſe of her miſchievous allurements:

Uttering ſuch dulcet and harmonious breath,

This alludes to her great parts of genius and learning, which rendered her the moſt accompliſhed woman of her time. The French writers tell us, that while ſhe was in the Court of France, wife to the Dauphin, ſhe pronounced a Latin oration in the great hall of the Louvre with ſo much grace and eloquence, that the whole aſſembly were in admiration:

That the rude ſea grew civil to her ſong,

By this is meant Scotland, long in arms againſt her; there is the greater juſtneſs and beauty in it, becauſe the common opinion is, that the mermaid ſings in ſtorms:

And certain ſtars ſhot madly from their ſpheres,
To hear the ſea-maid's muſic.

This alludes in general to the many matches propoſed to her; but more particularly to the Duke of Norfolk's famous negotiation with her, which bringing ſuch deſtruction on him, and on the Earls of Northampton and Weſtmoreland, and many other noble families, it was ſaid with the utmoſt propriety,

That certain ſtars ſhot madly from their ſpheres.

[P] The character of Sir John Falſtaff.] This is Shakeſpeare's maſter piece. In it, Shakeſpeare expreſsly figures himſelf by the deer-ſtealer; in which, we ſee the perfection of his genius It will not be foreign to our deſign to examine into the true compoſition of this character. 'Tis evident, the excellency of it lies in a juſt mixture of wit and humour. The ground-work is humour, or the repreſentation and detection of a bragging and vaunting coward in real life However, this alone would only have expoſed the Knight, as a meer Noll Bluff, to the deriſion of the company, and after they had been once gratified with his chaſtiſement, he would have ſunk into infamy and become quite odious. But here the inimitable wit of Sir John comes into his ſupport, and gives a new riſe and luſtre to his character; for the ſake of his wit you forgive his cowardice; or rather, are fond of his cowardice for the occaſion it gives to his wit. In ſhort, the humour furniſhes a ſubject and ſpur to the wit, and the wit again ſupports and embelliſhes the humour. At the firſt entrance of the Knight, your good humour and tendency to mirth are irreſiſtibly excited by his jolly appearance and corpulency. You feel and acknowledge him to be the fitteſt ſubject imaginable for yielding diverſion and merriment. But, when you ſee him immediately ſet up for enterprize and activity, with his evident weight and unweildineſs, your attention is called forth, and you are eager to watch him to the end of his adventures. Your imagination points out, with a full ſcope, his future embaraſſments. All the while as you accompany him forwards he heightens your reliſh for his further diſaſters, by his happy opinion of his own ſufficiency, and the gay vaunts which he makes of his talents and accompliſhments; ſo that at laſt, when he falls into a ſcrape, your expectation is exquiſitely gratified, and you have the full pleaſure of ſeeing all his trumpeted honour laid in the duſt; taken in the midſt of his misfortunes, inſtead of being utterly demoliſhed and ſunk, he riſes again, by the ſuperior force of his wit, and begins a new courſe, with freſh ſpirit and alacrity. This excites you the more to renew the chace, in full view of his ſecond defeat; out of which, he recovers again, and triumphs with new pretenſions and boaſting. After this, he immediately ſtarts upon a third race, and ſo on; continually detected and caught, and conſtantly extricating himſelf by his inimitable wit and invention; thus, yielding a perpetual round of ſport and diverſion. Again, the genteel quality of Sir John is of great uſe in ſupporting his character, it prevents his ſinking too low, after ſeveral of his misfortunes: beſides, you allow him, in conſequence of his rank and ſeniority, the privilege to dictate and take the lead, to rebuke others upon many occaſions. By this, he is ſaved from appearing too nauſeous and independent. The good ſenſe which he poſſeſſes comes alſo to his aid, and ſaves him from being deſpicable, by forcing your eſteem for his real abilities. Again, the privilege you allow him, of rebuking and cheating others, when he aſſumes it with proper firmneſs and ſuperiority helps to ſettle a new and compoſe his character, after an embaraſſment, and reduces, in ſome meaſure, the ſpirit of the company to a proper level, before he ſets out again upon a freſh adventure; without this they would be kept continually ſtrained and wound up to the higheſt pitch, without ſufficient relief and diverſity. It may alſo deſerve to be remarked of Falſtaff, that the figure of his perſon is admirably ſuited to the turn of his mind, ſo that there ariſes before you a perpetual alluſion from one to the other, which forms an inceſſant ſeries of wit, whether they be in contraſt or agreement together; when he pretends to activity, there is wit in the contraſt, between his mind and his perſon; and wit in their agreement, when he triumphs in jollity. To compleat the whole, you have, in this character of Falſtaff, not only a free courſe of humour, ſupported and embelliſhed with admirable wit, but this humour is of a ſpecies the moſt jovial and gay in all nature. Sir John Falſtaff poſſeſſes generoſity, chearfulneſs, alacrity, invention, frolic, and fancy, ſuperior to all other men. The figure of his perſon is the picture of jollity, mirth, and good nature, and baniſhes at once all other ideas from your breaſt. He is happy himſelf and makes you happy. If you examine him further, he has no fierceneſs, reſerve, malice, or peeviſhneſs lurking in his heart; his intentions are all pointed at harmleſs riot and merriment: Nor has the Knight any inveterate deſign, except againſt ſack; and that too he loves. If, beſides this, he deſires to paſs for a man of activity and valour, you can eaſily excuſe ſo harmleſs a foible, which yields you the higheſt pleaſure in it's conſtant detection. If you put all theſe together, it is impoſſible to hate honeſt Jack Falſtaff. If you obſerve them again, it is impoſſible to avoid loving him: He is the gay, the witty, the frolickſome, happy, and fat Jack Falſtaff, the moſt delightful ſwaggerer in all nature. You muſt love him for your own ſake; at the ſame time, you cannot but love him for his own talents, and when you have enjoyed them, you cannot but love him in gratitude. He has nothing to diſguſt you, and every thing to give you joy. His ſenſe and his foibles are equally directed to advance your pleaſure, and it is impoſſible to be tired or unhappy in his company. This jovial and gay humour, without any thing envious, malicious, miſchievous, or deſpicable, and continually adorned with wit, yields that peculiar delight, without any alloy, which we all feel and acknowledge in Falſtaff's company. Ben Jonſon has humour in his characters drawn with the moſt maſterly ſkill and judgment. In accuracy, depth, propriety, and truth, he has no ſuperior, or equal, among the Ancients or Moderns. But the characters he exhibits are of a ſatirical and deceitful, or elſe of a peeviſh or deſpicable, ſpecies; as Volpone, Subtle, Moroſe, and Abel Drugger; in all of which there is ſomething very juſtly to be hated or deſpiſed, and you feel the ſame ſentiments of diſlike for every other character of Jonſon's; ſo that, after you have been gratified with their detection and puniſhment, you are quite tired and diſguſted with their company. Whereas, Shakeſpeare, beſides the peculiar gaiety in the humour of Falſtaff, has guarded him from diſguſting you with his forced advances, by giving him rank and quality; from being deſpicable, by his real good ſenſe and excellent abilities; from being odious, by his harmleſs plots and deſigns; and from being tireſome, by his inimitable wit, and his new and inceſſant ſallies of higheſt fancy and frolic. This diſcovers the ſecret of carrying comedy to the higheſt pitch of delight; which lies in drawing the perſons exhibited with ſuch chearful and amiable oddities and foibles as you would chuſe in your own companions in real life; otherwiſe, though you may be diverted at firſt with the novelty of a character, and with a proper detection and ridicule of it, yet it's peeviſhneſs, meanneſs, or immorality, will begin to diſguſt you after a little reflection, and become upon tireſome and odious; it being certain, that what cannot be endured as an accidental companion in real life, will, for the very ſame reaſons, never be made a favourite comic character on the ſtage. This reſult for generous and worthy characters alone, which we all feel upon the theatre, where no biaſ of envy, malice, or perſonal reſentment, draws us aſide, ſeems to be ſome evidence of our natural and genuine diſpoſition to probity and virtue; though the minds of moſt perſons, being early and deeply tinged with vicious paſſions, it is no wonder that ſtains have been generally miſtaken for original colours. All characters that are well drawn juſtly pleaſe, but not all equally; Jonſon, in his comic ſcenes, has expoſed and ridiculed folly and vice; Shakeſpeare has uſhered in joy, frolic, and happineſs. The Alchymiſt, Volpone, and Silent Woman of Jonſon, are moſt exquiſite ſatires; the comic entertainments of Shakeſpeare are the higheſt compoſitions of rallery, wit, and humour. Jonſon conveys ſome leſſon in every character; Shakeſpeare, ſome new ſpecies of foible and oddity. The one pointed his ſatire with maſterly ſkill; the other was inimitable, in touching the ſtrings of delight. With Jonſon, you are confined and inſtructed; with Shakeſpeare, content and diſſolved in joy. It may be further remarked, that Jonſon, by purſuing the moſt uſeful intention of comedy, is obliged, in juſtice, to hunt down and demoliſh his own characters; upon this plan, he muſt neceſſarily expoſe them to your hatred, and of courſe will never bring out an amiable perſon. But, Shakeſpeare, with happier inſight, always ſupports his characters in your favour; His Juſtice Shallow withdraws before he is tedious; The French doctor and Welſh parſon go off in full vigour and ſpirits. Ancient Piſtol, indeed, is ſcurvily treated; however, he keeps up his ſpirits, and continues to threaten ſo well, that you are ſtill deſirous of his company: And it is impoſſible to be tired or dull with the gay, unfading, ever green Falſtaff. Abel Drugger bids faireſt of any of Jonſon's characters for being a favourite of the theatre; he has no hatred, malice, or immorality, nor any aſſuming arrogance, pertneſs, or peeviſhneſs; and his eager deſire of getting and ſaving money, by methods he thinks lawful, are excuſable in a perſon of his buſineſs. He is, therefore, not odious or deteſtable, but harmleſs and inoffenſive in private life: However, this character, in the whole, is mean and deſpicable, without any of that free, ſpirituous, jocund, humour abounding in Shakeſpeare. It appears, that in imagination, invention, jollity, and gay humour, Jonſon had little power; Shakeſpeare unlimited dominion. The firſt was cautious and ſtrict, not daring to ſally beyond the bounds of regularity; the other bold and impetuous, rejoicing like a giant, to run his courſe, through all the mountains and wilds of nature and fancy. It requires an almoſt painful attention, to mark the propriety and accuracy of Jonſon; and your ſatisfaction ariſes from reflection and compariſon; but the fire and invention of Shakeſpeare are ſhot inſtantaneouſly into your ſoul, and enlighten and chear the moſt indolent mind with their own ſpirit and luſtre (36).

Wives of Windſor [2]. Among his other patrons, the Earl of Southampton is particularly honoured

The reader, who examines into this matter, will obſerve, that the character, here explained, of Sir John Falſtaff, is chiefly taken from the firſt part of Henry the Fourth. For, ſo far as Sir John, upon any occaſion, ſinks into a cheat or a ſcoundrel, he is different from the Falſtaff here deſcribed, which is entirely an amiable character.

[2] The Merry Wives of Windſor.] If this ſtory be true, it is evident, the latter part of Henry the Fourth, muſt have been added afterwards, ſince there we honoured by him, in the dedications of two poems, Venus and Adonis, and Lucrece; in the latter eſpecially he expreſſes himſelf in ſuch terms, as gives countenance to what is related of that patron's diſtinguiſhed generoſity to him [R]. In the beginning of King James the firſt's reign (if not ſooner) he was one of the principal managers of the play-houſe [S], and continued in it ſeveral years afterwards [T]; 'till having acquired ſuch a fortune as ſatisfied his moderate wiſhes and views in life (d), he quitted the ſtage, and all other buſineſs, and paſſed the remainder of his time in an honourable eaſe, among the converſation of his friends, at his native town of Stratford, with the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, to whom his pleaſurable and good nature rendered him very agreeable [U]. He

we have an account of Sir John's impriſonment and death, which might perhaps be done by the author, in compliance with decorum, to avoid the imputation of encouraging idleneſs and riot, by too amiable and happy an example. However that be, 'tis certain, that though Falſtaff is here a fardle of low vices, a liar, coward, and a thief, yet his good humour makes him a pleaſant companion, and what not a little ſhews the genius of our Poet, he has kept up the ſpirit of his humour, after having wrote two plays before, in this third, though it was put upon him by another. For this reaſon, if it be true, what Mr Dryden tells us, ſpeaking of Mercutio's character in Romeo and Juliet, that Shakeſpeare ſaid himſelf, he was forced to kill him in the third act, to prevent being killed by him. It muſt be his diffidence and modeſty that made him ſay this; for it never could be through barrenneſs of invention, ſays Mr Upton, that Mercutio's ſprightly wit was ended in the third act, but becauſe there was no need of him or his wit any longer (37).

(37) Upton's Critical Remarks, as before.

[R] The Earl of Southampton's generoſity.] Mr Rowe tells us, upon the authority of Sir William Davenant, that this nobleman, at one time, gave him a thouſand pounds, to enable him to go through with a purchaſe, which he had heard our Poet had a mind to. The dedication of Lucrece runs thus:

'The love I dedicate to your Lordſhip, is without end; whereof, this imperfect poem, without a beginning, is but a ſpiritleſs ſurety. The warrant I have of your honorable diſpoſition, not the worth of my awkard lines, makes the body of it. Hence, what I have done, is your's; what I have to do, is your's; being part in all I have devoted your's. Were my worth greater, my duty would ſhew greateſt; mean time, as it is, it is bound to your Lordſhip, to whom I wiſh long life, ſtill lengthened with all happineſs.

Your Lordſhip's, in all duty,

W. Shakeſpeare.'

It is worth notice, that how much ſoever he neglected to take due care in printing his plays, yet this poem is printed very elegantly, by the famous Field, in 1694.

[S] A manager of the play-houſe in the beginning of King James's reign.] Soon after his Majeſty's Acceſſion to the Throne, he granted the following licence:

[T] He continued in the houſe ſeveral years afterwards.] The time when Shakeſpeare came upon the ſtage is not more uncertain than that of his quitting it. However, the opinion, that Spenſer's Thalia, in the Tears of the Muſes, where ſhe laments the loſs of her Willy, in the comic ſcene, relates to our author's abandoning the ſtage, is groundleſs, ſince Spenſer, 'tis known, died in the year 1598; and five years after this, we find Shakeſpeare's name among the actors in Ben Jonſon's Sejanus, which made it's firſt appearance in 1603 (39). If it relates to him at all, it muſt hint at ſome occaſional receſs he made for a time, upon a diſguſt taken; but it is moſt likely, that Willy, there mentioned, relates to ſome other favourite Poet of the ſame Chriſtian name. 'Tis evident, that Shakeſpeare did not exhibit his Macbeth 'till after the two kingdoms of England and Scotland were united under one monarch, nor 'till after King James had begun to touch for the King's evil; for he has complimented his royal maſter on both thoſe accounts in that tragedy. It is not probable, that he had quitted the ſtage before 1610; ſince, in his Tempeſt, he makes mention of the Bermuda iſlands, which were unknown to the Engliſh 'till 1609, when Sir John Summers, in his voyage to North America, diſcovered them, and invited afterwards ſome of his countrymen to ſettle a plantation there (40).

[U] Very agreeable] Mr Rowe informs us, that 'there was a ſtory almoſt ſtill remembered among 'them, that he had a particular intimacy with 'Mr Combe, who is ſaid to be an old gentleman, 'noted for his wealth and uſury. It happened once, 'in a pleaſant converſation among their friends, that 'this Mr Combe told Shakeſpeare, in a laughing 'manner, that he fancied he intended to write his 'epitaph, if he happened to outlive him; and ſince 'he could not know what might be ſaid of him when 'he was dead, he deſired it might be done immediately. 'Upon which Shakeſpeare gave him theſe four verſes:

'Ten in the hundred lies here engraved,
'Tis a hundred to ten his ſoul is not ſaved;
If any man aſk who lies in this tomb,
'Oh! Oh! quoth the Devil, 'tis my John a Combe.'

He lived in a very handſome houſe of his own purchaſing, to which he gave the name of New Place; and he had the good fortune to ſave it from the flames, in the dreadful fire that conſumed the greateſt part of the town, in 1614 [W]. It is very probable, he did not much exerciſe his talent in poetry, after his retirement [X]. In the beginning of the year 1616 he made his Will [Y], wherein he teſtified his reſpect to his quondam partners in

The ſharpneſs of the ſatire is ſaid to have ſtung the old gentleman ſo ſeverely, that he never forgave it. One of this name is mentioned by Dryden to have died in 1614, for whom, at the choir of the guild of the Holy Croſs at Stratford, a fair monument is erected, having a ſtatue thereon cut in alabaſter, and in a gown, with this epitaph: 'Here lieth interred the body of 'John Combe, Eſq; who died the 10th of July, '1614; who bequeathed ſeveral annual charities to the 'pariſh of Stratford, and 100 l. to be lent to 15 poor 'tradeſmen, from three years to three years, changing 'the parties every third year, at the rate of fifty ſhil-'lings per annum, the increaſe to be diſtributed to the 'alms-poor there (41).' As this is a very well judged charity, it ſhould ſeem to argue, that Shakeſpeare indulged too great a ſeverity againſt this gentleman, unleſs it be ſuppoſed, that his verſes gave occaſion to the charity; which is not impoſſible. It ſeems to have made no breach in his eſteem or friendſhip for that family, ſince, in his Will, Shakeſpeare bequeaths his ſword to Mr Thomas Combe (42).

(42) See his Will in remark [Y].

[W] He ſaved his houſe in the fire, which happened in 1614.] Mr Theobald (43), upon the information of Mr Biſhop, tells us, that this houſe was firſt built by Sir Hugh Clopton, a younger brother of an ancient family in that neighbourhood, who took their name from the manor of Clopton. Sir Hugh Clopton was Sheriff of London in the reign of Richard the Third, and Lord Mayor in the reign of Henry the Seventh. That the eſtate had now been ſold out of the family for above a century, at the time when Shakeſpeare became the purchaſer; who having repaired and modelled it to his own mind, changed it's former name of Great-Houſe into that of New-Place, which the manſion, ſince erected upon the ſame ſpot, ſtill retains. The houſe and lands which attended it, continued in Shakeſpeare's deſcendants to the time of the Reſtoration, when they were repurchaſed by the Clopton family; and the manſion now belongs to Sir Hugh Clopton, Knt. who informed Mr Theobald, that during the civil wars, King Charles the Firſt's Queen, being driven by the neceſſity of affairs to make a retirement in Warwickſhire, ſhe kept her Court for three weeks in New-Place. Whence we may reaſonably ſuppoſe it to be then the beſt private houſe in the town, and her Majeſty preferred it to the college, which was in the poſſeſſion of the Combe family, who did not ſo ſtrongly favour the King's party.

(43) Ubi ſupra.

[X] Whether he employed his poetical talents after his retirement is uncertain.] The author of an anſwer to Mr Pope's preface to Shakeſpeare (44), tells us, that two large cheſts, filled with Shakeſpeare's looſe papers and manuſcripts, were in the hands of an ignorant Baker of Warwick, who married one of our Poet's deſcendants; and that, to the particular knowledge of the late Sir William Biſhop, they were carelefsly ſcattered and thrown about, as garret-lumber and litter, 'till they were all conſumed in the general fire and deſtruction of that town. But this authority is rejected by Mr Theobald (45); who obſerving, that as Shakeſpeare's wife ſurvived him ſeven years, and his favourite daughter Suſannah ſurvived her twenty-ſix years, it is very improbable, that they ſhould ſuffer ſuch a treaſure to be removed and tranſlated into a remoter branch of the family, without a ſcrutiny firſt made into the value of it. To this it may be added, that this daughter was his executor, and reſiduary legatee, which would ſtill prompt and diſpoſe her the more, in point of intereſt, to ſearch and examine his papers. But, indeed, it muſt be owned, that the ſtrolling player's account is very conſiſtent with ſuch a prior ſearch; for he expreſsly declares, the papers were thrown about as garret-litter, of no value.

[Y] In the beginning of 1616 he made his Will] The following is a copy of it from the regiſter in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury:

Viceſimo quinto die Martii anno regni Domini noſtri Jacobi nunc Regis Angliæ, &c. decimo quarto, & Scotiæ quadrageſimo nono, anno Domini 1616.

In the name of God, Amen. I William Shakeſpeare of Stratford upon Avon in the county of Warwick, Gent. in perfect health and memory, God be praiſed, do make and ordain this my laſt Will and Teſtament in manner and form following; that is to ſay:

Firſt, I commend my ſoul into the hands of God my creator, hoping, and aſſuredly believing, through the only merits of Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlaſting; and my body to the earth whereof that is made.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my daughter Judith one hundred and fifty pounds of lawful Engliſh money, to be paid unto her in manner and form following; that is to ſay, one hundred pounds in diſcharge of her marriage portion within one year after my deceaſe, with conſiderations after the rate of two ſhillings in the pound for ſo long time as the ſame ſhall be unpaid unto her after my deceaſe; and the fifty pounds reſidue thereof, upon her ſurrendring of, or giving of ſuch ſufficient ſecurity as the overſeers of this my Will ſhall like of, to ſurrender or grant all her eſtate and right that ſhall deſcend or come unto her after my deceaſe, or that ſhe now hath of, in, or to, one copyhold tenement, with the appurtenances lying and being in Stratford upon Avon aforeſaid, in the ſaid county of Warwick, being parcel or holden of the manor of Rowington, unto my daughter Suſannah Hall, and her heirs for ever.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my ſaid daughter Judith one hundred and fifty pounds more, if ſhe, or any iſſue of her body, be living at the end of three years next enſuing the day of the date of this my Will, during which time my executors to pay her conſideration from my deceaſe according to the rate aforeſaid: and if ſhe die within the ſaid term without iſſue of her body, then my will is, and I do give and bequeath one hundred pounds thereof to my niece Elizabeth Hall, and the fifty pounds to be ſet forth by my executors during the life of my ſiſter Joan Hart, and the uſe and profit thereof coming, ſhall be paid to my ſaid ſiſter Joan, and after her deceaſe the fifty pounds ſhall remain amongſt the children of my ſaid ſiſter, equally to be divided amongſt them; but if my ſaid daughter Judith be living at the end of the ſaid three years, or any iſſue of her body, then my will is, and ſo I deviſe and bequeath the ſaid hundred and fifty pounds to be ſet out by my executors and overſeers for the beſt benefit of her and her iſſue, and the ſtock not to be paid unto her ſo long as ſhe ſhall be married and covert baron; but my will is, that ſhe ſhall have the conſideration yearly paid unto her during her life, and after her deceaſe the ſaid ſtock and conſideration to be paid to her children, if ſhe have any, and if not, to her executors and aſſigns, ſhe living the ſaid term after my deceaſe; provided that if ſuch huſband as ſhe ſhall at the end of the ſaid three years be married unto, or at and after, do ſufficiently aſſure unto her, and the iſſue of her body, land anſwerable to the portion by this my Will given unto her, and to be adjudged ſo by my executors and overſeers, then my will is, that the ſaid hundred and fifty pounds ſhall be paid to ſuch huſband as ſhall make ſuch aſſurance, to his own uſe.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my ſaid ſiſter Joan twenty pounds, and all my wearing apparel, to be paid and delivered within one year after my deceaſe; and I do will and deviſe unto her the houſe with the appurtenances in Stratford, wherein ſhe dwelleth, for her natural life, under the yearly rent of twelve pence.

Item, I give and bequeath unto her three ſons, William Hart, —— Hart, and Michael Hart, five pounds apiece, to be paid within one year after my deceaſe.

Item, I give and bequeath unto the ſaid Elizabeth Hall all my plate that I now have, except my broad ſilver and gilt boxes, at the date of this my Will.

Item, I give and bequeath unto the poor of Stratford aforeſaid ten pounds, to Mr Thomas Combe my ſword, to Thomas Ruſſell, Eſq; five pounds, and to Francis Collins of the borough of Warwick, in the county of Warwick, Gent. thirteen pounds ſix ſhillings and in the theatre; he appointed his youngeſt daughter, jointly with her huſband, his executors, and bequeathed to them the beſt part of his eſtate, which they came into the poſſeſſion of not long after. He died on the 23d of April following, being the fifty-third year of his age, and was interred among his anceſtors, on the north ſide of the chancel, in the great church of Stratford, where there is a handſome monument erected for him, inſcribed with a ſingle elegiac diſtich in Latin [Z]. In the year 1740, another very noble and moſt beautiful one was raiſed to his memory, at the publick expence, in Weſtminſter-abbey; an ample contribution for this purpoſe being made, upon exhibiting his tragedy of Julius Cæſar, at the theatre-royal in Drury-Lane, April the 28th, 1738 [AA]. Seven and eight pence, to be paid within one year after my deceaſe.

Item, I give and bequeath to Hamlett Sadler twenty-ſix ſhillings, eight pence, to buy him a ring; to William Reynolds, Gent. twenty-ſix ſhillings, eight-pence to buy him a ring; to my godſon William Walker twenty ſhillings in gold; to Anthony Naſh, Gent. twenty-ſix ſhillings, eight pence; and to Mr John Naſh, twenty ſix ſhillings, eight pence; and to my fellows, John Hemynge, Richard Burbage; and Henry Cundell, twenty-ſix ſhillings, eight pence apiece, to buy them rings.

Item, I give, will, bequeath, and deviſe, unto my daughter Suſannah Hall, for the better enabling of her to perform this my Will, and towards the performance thereof, all that capital meſſuage or tenement, with the appurtenances in Stratford aforeſaid, called the New Place, wherein I now dwell, and two meſſuages or tenements, with the appurtenances, ſituate, lying, and being, in Henley-ſtreet within the borough of Stratford aforeſaid; and all my barns, ſtables, orchards, gardens, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whatſoever, ſituate, lying, and being, or to be had, reſerved, preſerved, or taken, within the towns, hamlets, villages, fields, and grounds, of Stratford upon Avon, Old Stratford, Buſhaxton, and Welcombe, or in any of them, in the ſaid county of Warwick; and alſo all that meſſuage or tenement, with the appurtenances, wherein one John Robinſon dwelleth, ſituate, lying, and being, in the Black-Friers in London, near the Wardrobe; and all other my lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatſoever; to have and to hold all and ſingular the ſaid premiſes, with their appurtenances, unto the ſaid Suſanna Hall, for and during the term of her natural life; and after her deceaſe to the firſt ſon of her body lawfully iſſuing, and to the heirs males of the body of the ſaid firſt ſon lawfully iſſuing; and for default of ſuch iſſue, to the ſecond ſon of her body lawfully iſſuing, and to the heirs males of the body of the ſaid ſecond ſon lawfully iſſuing; and for default of ſuch heirs, to the third ſon of the body of the ſaid Suſanna lawfully iſſuing, and of the heirs males of the body of the ſaid third ſon lawfully iſſuing; and for default of ſuch iſſue, the ſame to be and remain to the fourth, fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh ſons of her body, lawfully iſſuing one after another, and to the heirs males of the bodies of the ſaid fourth, fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh ſons lawfully iſſuing, in ſuch manner as it is before limited to be and remain to the firſt, ſecond, and third ſons of her body, and to their heirs males; and for default of ſuch iſſue, the ſaid premiſes to be and remain to my ſaid niece Hall, and the heirs males of her body lawfully iſſuing; and for default of ſuch iſſue, to my daughter Judith, and the heirs males of her body lawfully iſſuing; and for default of ſuch iſſue, to the right heirs of me the ſaid William Shakeſpeare for ever.

Item, I give unto my wife my brown beſt bed, with the furniture.

Item, I give and bequeath to my ſaid daughter Judith, my broad ſilver gilt bole. All the reſt of my goods, chattels, leaſes, plate, jewels, and houſhold-ſtuff, whatſoever, after my debts and legacies paid, and my funeral expences diſcharged, I give, deviſe, and bequeath, to my ſon-in-law John Hall, Gent. and my daughter Suſanna his wife, who I ordain and make executors of this my laſt Will and Teſtament. And I do intreat and appoint the ſaid Thomas Ruſſell, Eſq; and Francis Collins, Gent. to be overſeers hereof. And do revoke all former Wills, and publiſh this to be my laſt Will and Teſtament. In witneſs whereof I have hereunto put my hand, the day and year firſt above written, by me

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

Witneſs to the publiſhing hereof,

Probatum coram Magiſtro William Byrde, Legum Doctore Commiſſario, &c. viceſimo ſecundo die menſis Junii, anno Domini 1616. Juramento Johannis Hall unius ex. et cui, &c. de bene et jurat reſervata poteſtate et Suſannæ Hall alt. ex. &c. cui vendit, &c. petitur.

[Z] His monument and inſcription.] He is repreſented under an arch in a ſitting poſture, a cuſhion ſpread before him, with a pen in his right hand, and his left reſting on a ſcrole of papers; under the cuſhion is this Latin diſtich:

Judicio Pylium, genio Socratem, arte Maronem,
Terra tegit, populus mœret, Olympus habet.

On the grave-ſtone, in the pavement, underneath, are theſe lines:

Good friend, for Jeſus' ſake, forbear
To dig the duſt incloſed here.
Bleſt be the man that ſpares theſe ſtones,
And curſt be he that moves my bones.

[AA] Contributions at the acting of Julius Cæſar.] The truſtees for the public on this occaſion, were the Earl of Burlington, Dr Richard Mead, M. D. Mr Pope, and Charles Fleetwood, Eſq; patentee of the playhouſe; the monument was finiſhed in 1740, and ſtands near the ſouth door of the abbey, in what is called Poets-Corner. Shakeſpeare is repreſented, in the dreſs of his time, in white marble, at full length, leaning a little on his right arm, which is ſupported by a pedeſtal; at the bottom of this there hangs a ſcrole, inſcribed with the following words, from his play called The Tempeſt, to which his left hand appears pointing:

The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The ſolemn temples, the great globe itſelf,
Yea, all which it inhabit ſhall diſſolve,
And, like the baſeleſs fabrick of a viſion,
Leave not a wreck behind.

Above his head behind there is fixt a plate of very curious granate marble, on which is the following inſcription, in raiſed letters of braſs, richly gilt.

Gulielmo Shakeſpeare, anno poſt mortem cxxiv.
amor publicus poſuit.

The inſcription was compoſed by Mr Pope. The whole monument was deſigned by Kent, and executed by Ryſbrack, admirably well. A new prologue and epilogue were ſpoken on the occaſion, which are as follows:

The prologue written by Benjamin Martyn, Eſq;

Whilſt in the venerable dome we view,
The ſculptor's art, Britannia's bards renew;
Behold, their names, on ſpeaking marble, live,
Their forms in animated ſtone revive.

Seven years after his death, his plays were collected and publiſhed in 1623, in folio [B B], by two of his principal friends in the company of comedians, Heninge and Condale; who likewiſe corrected a ſecond edition in folio, in 1632. Though both theſe editions were extremely faulty, yet no other was attempted 'till 1714, when a third edition was publiſhed in 8vo. by Mr Nicholas Rowe [C C], but with few if any corrections; only he prefixed ſome account of our author's life and writings, the materials of the firſt of which were communicated to him by Mr Betterton, the celebrated Comedian, who made a journey to Stratford, purpoſely to learn ſomething further concerning a man, to whom both

Neglected, moulders, like his bones, to duſt.
No ſingle hand durſt claim to rear this ſtone,
And fix in Shakeſpeare's monument his own.
To you 'twas left to dignify the bard,
And grace your Shakeſpeare with his late reward;
Shakeſpeare! the Father of the Britiſh ſtage,
Shakeſpeare, the wonder of each riſing age.
Whoſe glowing fancy and whoſe various art,
With every paſſion governs every heart.
Whoſe genius opens nature to our view,
Whoſe charms, tho' ſtill repeated, ſtill are new.
Tho' Shakeſpeare wants no ſtone to ſpeak his praiſe,
Your gratitude's the monument you raiſe.
Think, when you fix a baſis for his name,
You fix one likewiſe for your country's fame.
Rome, by her ſtatues, rais'd the Roman blood,
And form'd new heroes by the old ſhe ſhew'd.
Let then this chief of our dramatic band,
As firſt in rank, the firſt in honours ſtand.
Let every breaſt, that feels his ſacred fire,
Glow with the virtues which his lines inſpire.
While Brutus bleeds for liberty and Rome,
Let Britons crowd to deck his Poet's tomb.
To future times, recorded, let it ſtand,
This head was laurell'd by the public hand.
To future times, with pride, tranſmit it down,
Such public merit ſhould the public own.

The epilogue written by The Honourable James Noel, Eſq; and ſpoken by Mrs Porter.

Theſe ſmiles beſtow'd, theſe generous honours paid,
To a dead bard, to long loſt Shakeſpeare's ſhade;
To public worth ſuch public favours ſhewn,
Confirm this merit and proclaim your own.
Ev'n here a noble monument you raiſe;
The tomb of glory is a people's praiſe.
Perhaps, ſome will.—Perhaps, no none will ſay,
No dance, no ſong, to decorate the play.
No; Shakeſpeare ſcorns ſuch common arts to uſe,
Senſe gave it birth, let ſenſe preſerve the muſe.
If comic ſcenes divert, or tragic move,
With both delighted, you by both improve;
Fir'd by the muſe, you raiſe each paſſion higher,
And pant to reach the virtues you admire.
When Portia weeps, all gentle breaſts muſt mourn,
When Brutus arms, all generous boſoms burn.
When Rome's firm patriots on the ſtage were ſhewn,
With pride we trace the patriots of our own.
From bondage ſav'd, when that bold ſtate we ſee,
We glow to think, that Britain is as free.
We mount, by bright example, glory's throne,
And make the cauſe of virtue all our own.
Such was the bard, firſt grac'd the Britiſh ſtage,
Firſt charm'd and ſtill ſhall charm thro' every age.
Whoſe verſe is muſic, not at wit's expence,
But joins the charms of harmony with ſenſe.

He wakes the paſſions, governs and inſpires,
Charms while he pleaſes, while he teaches fires.
But here what humble thanks, what praiſe is due
Ow'd to ſuch generous virtue, ow'd to you.
With grief, you ſaw a bard neglected lie,
Whom tow'ring genius living rais'd ſo high;
With grief you ſaw your Shakeſpeare's ſlighted ſtate,
And call'd forth merit from the grave of fate.
Let others boaſt, they ſmile on living worth,
You give a buried bard a brighter birth.

[B B] The firſt edition of his plays] In the preface to this edition it is declared, that Shakeſpeare never blotted out a line in all his writings; and Ben Jonſon tells us, he had often heard the players mention this as an honour to Shakeſpeare's memory; my anſwer, ſays Ben, was, I would he had blotted out a thouſand, which they thought a malevolent ſpeech; I had not told poſterity this but for their ignorance, who choſe that circumſtance to commend their friend by, wherein he moſt failed; and to juſtify mine own candour (for I loved the man and do honour his memory, on this ſide idolatry, as much as any). He was indeed honeſt and of an open and free nature; had an excellent phantaſie, brave notions, and gentle expreſſions; wherein he flowed with that facility, that ſometimes it was neceſſary he ſhould be ſtopped: Sufflaminandus erat, as Auguſtus ſaid of Haterius. His wit was in his own power; would the rule of it had been ſo too. Many times he fell into thoſe things and could not eſcape laughter, as when he ſaid in the perſon of Cæſar, one ſpeaking to him: 'Cæſar thou 'doſt me wrong;' he replied, 'Cæſar did never 'wrong, but with juſt cauſe;' and ſuch like, which were ridiculous. But he redeemed his vices with his virtues. There was ever more to be praiſed than to be pardoned (46). Mr Pope obſerves, that there is indeed in that play ſomething like this expreſſion, but not in theſe words (47). Mr Whalley takes notice alſo, that this paſſage is not to be found in that play, and to excuſe Jonſon, ſays, 'tis probable, that he quoted here by memory a line, which ſome fooliſh player might poſſibly pronounce upon the ſtage, in a manner not unlike what is here repreſented (48). In either caſe, it cannot be denied, that the cenſure has more in it to be pardoned than praiſed. In ſhort, the whole paragraph may juſtly be turned upon the writer (49). It is one inſtance, among numberleſs others, of his promptneſs to find fault, Sufflaminandus erat. The whole remark is grounded in a miſtake. Mr Pope informs us, 'that however it has prevailed, yet in reality, there never was a more groundleſs report, than this of Shakeſpeare's never correcting his firſt writings, or to the contrary of which there are more undeniable evidences. As the comedy of The Merry Wives of Windſor, which he entirely new writ; The Hiſtory of Henry the Sixth, which was firſt publiſhed under the title of The Contention of York and Lancaſter; and that of Henry the Fifth extremely improved; that of Hamlet enlarged to almoſt as much again as at firſt, and many others.' After all, the players, who could not be ignorant of theſe alterations, ſeem to mean, in what they told Jonſon, no more than that Shakeſpeare's firſt writing was without a blot, and ſo given by him to be acted. And how this may juſtly enough be reckoned as a proof of his genius and inſpiration.

[C C] Edition by Mr Rowe] Dr Warburton (50), the preſent Biſhop of Glouceſter, obſerves, that though Mr Rowe was a wit, yet he was ſo utterly unacquainted with the whole buſineſs of criticiſm, that he did not examine or conſult the firſt editions of the work he undertook to publiſh.

he and all the world were ſo much indebted. But the plays being in the ſame mangled condition as at firſt, Mr Pope was prevailed upon to undertake the taſk of clearing away the rubbiſh, and reducing them into a better order; and accordingly he printed a new edition of them in 1721, in 4to. Yet neither did this give ſatisfaction, and the performance only diſcovered the editor to be a better poet, than he was a critic; at leaſt of Shakeſpeare's genius. Hereupon Mr Theobald, after many years ſpent in the ſame taſk, publiſhed a piece, called Shakeſpeare reſtored, in 1726, 8vo. which was followed by another new edition of his plays in 1733, by the ſame author, who therein carried the deſign of his firſt piece much farther. In 1744, Sir Thomas Hanmer, Bart. publiſhed at Oxford a pompous edition, with emendations, in ſix volumes, 4to. To theſe Mr Warburton, now Lord Biſhop of Glouceſter, added ſtill another new edition, with a great number of corrections, in 1747. And Mr Theobald publiſhed his edition a ſecond time, with ſeveral alterations, in 1757 [DD]. There has appeared very lately this year, 1760, an hiſtorical play, intituled, The Raigne of Edward the Third, &c. (e), which is aſcribed to Shakeſpeare, upon theſe three concurring circumſtances, the date, the ſtile, and the plan, which is taken, as ſeveral of Shakeſpeares are, from Holingſhead, and a book of novels, called The Palace of Pleaſure (f). Thus new monuments are continually riſing to honour Shakeſpeare's genius in the learned world; and we muſt not conclude, without adding another teſtimony of the veneration paid to his manes by the publick in general; which is, that a mulberry-tree, planted upon his eſtate by the hands of this revered bard, was cut down not many years ago, and the wood being converted into ſeveral domeſtic uſes, theſe were all eagerly bought at a high price, and each ſingle one treaſured up by it's purchaſer as a precious memorial of Shakeſpeare's memory (g).

(e) Viz. As it hath bin ſundrie times plaied about the Citie of London. London printed for Cuthbert Burby, 1596, 4to. and again in 1599, 4to.

(f) Preluſions, or ſelect pieces of antient poetry, &c. Lond. 1760, 8vo.

(g) A tea-cheſt of this wood, with the mulberries carved upon it, is now in the poſſeſſion of Joſeph Smith, Eſq; Dr of Laws, of Kidlington near Oxford.

[DD] Publiſhed an edition in 1757.] Mr Pope, who firſt entered upon the taſk of criticiſm, declares, that of all our Engliſh Poets, Shakeſpeare muſt be confeſſed to be the faireſt and fitteſt ſubject for criticiſm. The firſt editions being printed from the prompter's books, or the piece-meal parts written out for the players, and very much diſfigured by their blunders and interlineations. Accordingly, after his example, Mr Theobald proceeded in this work, but with ſo little ſucceſs, that Mr Pope declared he could find very few, which ought to be retained. On the other hand, Mr Theobald has ſhewn the greateſt part of Pope's corrections not only to be groundleſs but againſt the mind of the Poet, and therefore juſtly rejected. Dr Warburton has rejected a great number of Mr Theobald's, and Mr Edwards (51) has ſhewn, that a great number of Dr Warburton's deſerve the ſame fate. Sir Thomas Hammer had made very few of his own worth notice, according to Mr Johnſon, who, in 1745, publiſhed Miſcellaneous Obſervations on the Tragedy of Macbeth: with Remarks on Sir T. H.'s edition of Shakeſpeare. To which was affixed, Propoſals for a new Edition of Shakeſpeare's Plays, with a Specimen But this deſign has not yet been executed; ſo that the laſt edition, in ten ſmall volumes, by Mr Theobald, in 1757, is generally eſteemed the beſt we have.

SHARP [JAMES], Archbiſhop of St Andrews, in the laſt century; whoſe tragical death is a ſorrowful inſtance of what a furious and miſguided zeal is capable of doing. He was the ſon of Mr William Sharp, Sheriff Clerk of Banff ſhire [A], and Iſabel Leſley, daughter to the Laird of Kinninvy, a woman of great prudence and piety (a). The time of his birth was in May 1618. From the firſt, he appeared a child of very good parts; and being early ſent to ſchool, out-did all his companions in the rudiments of learning. His maſterly genius, quick apprehenſion, and tenacious memory, were early ſigns of his future greatneſs; and induced his father to deſign him for the Miniſtry. For that purpoſe, he ſent him to the univerſity of Aberdeen, where he arrived to great perfection in the Philoſophy then in vogue. Having paſt his courſes in the college with great applauſe, and being made Maſter of Arts, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity; in which he uſed the advice and direction of Dr Forbes, and Dr Baron. Theſe two learned men, with the other Doctors of Aberdeen, zealouſly appearing againſt the Scotiſh Covenant, made in 1638, became expoſed to many inſults and abuſes; as well as their friends and acquaintance, amongſt whom was Mr Sharp. Whereupon, he retired into England, and contracted an acquaintance with Dr Sanderſon, Dr Hammond, Dr Taylor, and others of our moſt eminent Divines; and was in a likely way of obtaining preferment here. But the civil wars coming on, and he being taken very ill, determined, both by advice and inclination, to return to his native country. By the way, happening into company with Sir James M'Gill of Cranſton, afterwards Viſcount of Oxenford, that generous perſon liking his converſation, carried him to his own houſe in the country. During his ſtay there,

[A] He was the ſon of Mr William Sharp, &c.] Our Prelate's great grandfather was a Gentleman of Perthſhire, who had a large family. One of his ſons, named David, and grandfather to the Archbiſhop, went and ſettled in the town of Aberdeen, where he became a conſiderable merchant, and by his induſtry and frugality acquired a handſome fortune. By his wife Magdalen Haliburton, nearly deſcended from the Laird of Pitcur, an honorable family in the ſhire of Angus, he had his ſon—William, the Archbiſhop's father; who being educated at the ſchools and univerſity of Aberdeen, was, for his extraordinary natural parts and proficiency, taken notice of by the Marquis of Huntley, and other perſons of quality in that country: But eſpecially James Ogilvy, Earl of Finlater, conceived ſuch great opinion of him, that he took him to his houſe, and committed to him the managment of all his affairs. This Earl had married Elizabeth daughter of Andrew Leſley, Earl of Rothes, who took ſuch a particular liking to Mr William Sharp, that ſhe made up a match between him and Iſabel Leſley above-mentioned. Not long after, Mr Sharp was made Sheriff Clerk of Banff ſhire, and lived and dyed in the Caſtle of Banff, in great eſteem and reputation with all that knew him. His wife Iſabel was an extraordinary woman, honoured by all for her wiſdom and piety, and dyed of a great age after King Charles the Second's Reſtoration (1).

there, he became known to ſeveral of the nobility and gentry, particularly to John Leſley, Earl of Rothes; who patronized him, not only out of reſpect to his ingenuity, but alſo at the recommendation of ſome gentlemen of the name of Leſley, of the Earl's family, and Mr Sharp's relations. By that Lord's intereſt, and on account of his own merit, he was choſen one of the Profeſſors of Philoſophy in St Leonard's college in St Andrews, which was his firſt preferment (b). His abilities having raiſed his reputation, and introduced him into the familiarity of many great men, particularly of John Lindſay, Earl of Crawfurd and Lindſay; by that Lord's means, he quitted his Profeſſorſhip, and was appointed Miniſter in the town of Carail. Here, as we are told, he in a ſingular manner exemplified the evangelical precept, as to the wiſdom of the ſerpent, and the innocency of the dove: and here his labours were moſt acceptable, and gained on the hearts of the people by calmneſs, condeſcenſion, and affability; only ſome of the more rigid ſort profeſſed, They did not believe him ſound (c). And indeed he was not ſo, according to their notions; for, he had the courage to correſpond with King Charles II. in his exile, and ſpared no pains to keep life in the fainting ſpirit of Loyalty among many of his brethren (d). In the mean time, great diſputes having ariſen among the Covenanting Preſbyterians in Scotland, which occaſioned their ſplitting into two parties, called Publick Reſolutioners, and Proteſtors or Remonſtrators [B]; Mr Sharp joined the former, thinking them perſons of the greateſt moderation, religion, loyalty, and ſincerity. And all the endeavours of the Privy-Council eſtabliſhed in that country, not being ſufficient to keep them from breaking out into violent flames; in conſequence of which, they both carried their complaints to Oliver Cromwell, then Lord Protector; Mr Sharp was unanimouſly choſen by the Reſolutioners as their agent, whom they knew to be an active man, of a ſtrong head, quick wit, and equal temper. The Remonſtrators, on their ſide, ſent up Mr Guthry, Preacher at Stirling, a furious zealot. The Protector having appointed a time for hearing the two Agents, Mr Guthry ſpoke firſt, and ſo long, that, when he had ended, the Protector told Mr Sharp, he would hear him another time, for his hour for other buſineſs was approaching. But Mr Sharp begged to be heard, promiſing to be ſhort: and being permitted to ſpeak, he in a few words turned Mr Guthry's arguments againſt himſelf, and his cauſe; and gave ſuch a rational repreſentation of his conſtituents and their party, that Oliver was not only ſatisfied they had juſtice on their ſide, but alſo ſo much taken with Mr Sharp's genteel management and addreſs, that he told the by-ſtanders, 'That Gentleman, after the Scotch way, ought to be ſtyled Sharp of that ilk'

[B] Which occaſioned their ſplitting into two parties, called Publick Reſolutioners, and Proteſtors or Remonſtrators.] Biſhop Burnet gives the following account of the heats raiſed in the Kirk by the Publick Reſolutions formed there, and the Proteſtation made againſt them (a). 'A general Aſſembly was in courſe to meet; and ſate at St Andrews. So the commiſſion of the Kirk wrote a circular letter to all the Preſbyteries, ſetting forth all the grounds of their reſolutions, and complaining of thoſe who had proteſted againſt them; upon which they deſired that they would chuſe none of thoſe who adhered to the proteſtation, to repreſent them in the next aſſembly. This was only an advice, and had been frequently practiſed in the former years: But now it was highly complained of, as a limitation on the freedom of elections, which inferred a nullity on all their proceedings: So the Proteſtors renewed their Proteſtation againſt the meeting upon a higher point, diſowning that authority which hitherto they had magnified as the higheſt tribunal in the Church, in which they thought Chriſt was in his throne. Upon this a great debate followed, and many books were written in a courſe of ſeveral years. The Publickmen ſaid, this was the deſtroying of Preſbytery, if the leſſer number did not ſubmit to the greater: It was a ſort of Prelacy, if it was pretended that votes ought rather to be weighed than counted: Parity was the eſſence of their conſtitution: And in this all people ſaw they had clearly the better of the argument. The Proteſtors urged for themſelves, that, ſince all Proteſtants rejected the pretence of infallibility, the major part of the Church might fall into errors, in which caſe the leſſer number could not be bound to ſubmit to them: They complained of the many corrupt Clergymen who were yet among them, who were leavened with the old leaven, and did on all occaſions ſhew what was ſtill at heart notwithſtanding all their outward compliance.'———

'As this debate grew hot, and they were ready to break out into cenſures on both ſides, ſome were ſent down from the Commonwealth of England to ſettle Scotland: Of theſe Sir Henry Vane was one. He adviſed, That, inſtead of Healing the Wound they had given themſelves;' which weakned both parties, and kept them from uniting in an oppoſition againſt the Government; they ſhould leave them to worry one another, and fight their own quarrels: which would keep them in a greater dependence on the temporal authority, when both ſides were forced to make their appeal to it. 'This advice was followed; and the diviſion went on. Both ſides ſtudied, when any Church became vacant to get a man of their own party to be choſen to ſucceed in the election: And upon theſe occaſions many tumults happened: In ſome of them ſtones were thrown, and many were wounded, to the great ſcandal of religion.———At laſt they proceeded to deprive men of both ſides, as they were the majority in the judicatories: But becauſe the poſſeſſion of the Church, and the benefice, was to depend on the orders of the temporal courts, both ſides made their application to the Privy-Council, that Cromwell had ſet up in Scotland: And they were by them referred to Cromwell himſelf. So they ſent deputies up to London. The Proteſtors went in great numbers: They came nearer both to the principles, and to the temper that prevailed in the army: So they were looked on as the better men, on whom, by reaſon of the firſt riſe of the difference, the government might more certainly depend: Whereas the others were conſidered as more in the King's intereſts. The Reſolutioners, upon this occaſion, ſent up Mr Sharp,' as is more particularly related in the Text above.———Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that 'all the methods imaginable were uſed by the Proteſtors to raiſe their credit among the people. They preached often, and very long; and ſeemed to carry their devotions to a greater ſublimity than others did.———They gave the ſacrament with a new and unuſual ſolemnity. On the Wedneſday before, they held a faſt day with prayers and ſermons for about eight or ten hours together: On the Saturday they had two or three preparation ſermons: And on the Lord's day they had ſo very many, that the action continued above twelve hours in ſome places: And all ended with three or four ſermons on Monday for Thankſgiving ———The Reſolutioners tried to imitate them in theſe practices: But they were not thought ſo ſpiritual, nor ſo ready at them: So the others had the chief following.'

'ilk (e).' What induced Cromwell more particularly to favour him, was, his having an acquaintance and intereſt with the Preſbyterian Miniſters at London, whom he [the Protector] was then courting much, by reaſon of their credit in the city (f). And they greatly approved of Mr Sharp's character and conduct, as appears by the letter inſerted below [C]. Having ſucceeded in this important affair, he returned to Scotland to the exerciſe of his function; and always kept a good underſtanding with the chief of the oppoſite party of the Proteſtors, that were the moſt eminent for worth and learning (g). During his reſidence in London, having made himſelf known to all ſorts of people (h); his reputation and general eſteem gave him acceſs to, and acquaintance with, General Monk, who looked upon him as a man of probity and reach, and always after treated him with ſingular familiarity (i). Upon his advancing towards London, the General ſent him a letter, from York, in Jan. 1659-60, wherein he deſired him to undertake a winter journey, and come to him at London with all ſpeed. Mean while, the chief of the Kirk had writ to the General, ſignifying their entire confidence in him as to the affairs of Scotland, and the neceſſity of one from them to be near his perſon, to put him in mind of what was neceſſary, and acquaint them with the ſtate of things; aſking at the ſame time a paſs for Mr James Sharp: which the General immediately ſent, declaring, the ſooner he came to him, the more welcome he ſhould be (k). The inſtructions ſent him, February 6, from the Preſbyterian miniſters at Edinburgh, were, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours, that the Kirk of Scotland might, without interruption or encroachment, enjoy the freedom and privileges of her eſtabliſhed Judicatures, ratified by the laws of the land: and, whereas by the late eſtabliſhed Toleration, a door was opened to many groſs errors and looſe practices in their Church; he ſhould therefore uſe all lawful and prudent means to repreſent the ſinfulneſs and offenſiveneſs thereof, that it might be timouſly remedied (l). By the twenty-firſt of February, he ſeemed to be weary of his ſtation, and deſired to be recalled (m): complaining, he was ſo much engaged in buſineſs, that he was deprived of his reſt. For, people obſerving the great countenance given him by the Lord General, preſſed him ſo, that he was forced to abandon his chamber all the day, and much of the night (n). However he continued at London, and ſeemed then to be more than ordinary zealous for Preſbytery (o): endeavouring, as he ſaid, to guard againſt Sectaries upon the one hand, and Cavaliers upon the other. And expreſſing his fear that the King would come in, and that with him moderate Epiſcopacy at leaſt would take place (p). The 17th of March he deſired to be recalled home; but expreſſed his diſlike at being appointed Miniſter of Edinburgh, a favour intended him (q). In the beginning of April, the Earl of Lauderdale and he had a meeting with ten of the chief Preſbyterian Miniſters in London; who all agreed upon the neceſſity of bringing in the King upon Covenant-terms (r) [D]. In May, at the earneſt deſire of General Monk, and of the leading Preſbyterians in Scotland, Mr Sharp went over to King Charles at Breda, to acquaint him with their behaviour; and to deſire his Majeſty to write a letter to ſome of them [E], to ſhew his reſolution to own them,

[C] As appears by the letter] It was dated at London December 1657, and expreſſed in theſe words: 'Our Reverend Brother Mr Sharp hath with much prudence, courage, and laborioufneſs, unwearedly attended, and managed the Truſt committed to him; yea (as we believe) he hath ſecured your cauſe from ſundry aſperſions, which otherwiſe might probably have reproached it, and he hath gained reſpect in the opinions of ſome in higheſt place by his wiſdom and meekneſs, in vindicating it from miſrepreſentations. [D] In the beginning of April, the Earl of Lauderdale, and he, had a meeting with ten of the chief Preſbyterian Miniſters, &c.] Mr Sharp, immediately after that meeting, namely on the fifth of April, wrote a letter to Mr Robert Douglas, Miniſter in Edinburgh; wherein, after mentioning that meeting, he goes on thus:——'There are endeavours for an accommodation between the moderate Epiſcopalian party and the Preſbyterians. But at our meeting, Lauderdale and I obtained of thoſe Miniſters, that they ſhould not give a meeting to the Epiſcopal men, 'till they firſt met among themſelves, and reſolved on the terms they would ſtick to.——The King is acquainted with all proceedings here, and wants not information of the carriage and affections of Scotland. The Parliament will addreſs him, ſome ſay in hard, others upon honorable terms. I ſee not full ground of hope, that Covenant-terms will be rigidly ſtuck to.'—— In another letter of April 7, he ſays thus:——'The Lord having opened a fair door of hope, we may look for a ſettlement upon the grounds of the Covenant, and thereby a foundation laid for ſecurity againſt the prelatick and fanatick aſſaults. But I am dubious if this ſhould be the reſult of the agitations now on foot.——We intend to publiſh ſome letters from the French Proteſtant Miniſters, vindicating the King from Popery, and giving him a large character. The ſectaries will not be able to do any thing to prevent the King's coming in. Our honeſt Preſbyterian Brethren are cordially for him. I have been dealing with ſome of them to ſend ſome teſtimony of their affection for him, and yeſterday five of them promiſed to ſend a thouſand pieces of gold to him. The Epiſcopal party are making applications to the Preſbyterians for an accommodation, but the Preſbyterians reſolve to ſtick to their principles.'——And in a letter of April 12, he hath this paſſage:—— 'To morrow I have promiſed to meet with Dr Morley who came from the King: The King is at Breda! The Parliament will at its firſt ſitting (as 'tis expected) call him in. Some ſay, the Sectarian party have made application to him to bring him in without terms.'——Alſo, in another letter of his, he thus expreſſes himſelf:—'I fear the intereſt of the Solemn League and Covenant ſhall be neglected; and I ſmell that moderate Epiſcopacy is the faireſt Accommodation which moderate Men who wiſh well to Religion expect (4).' So he began to open his mind upon the point of Epiſcopacy.

[E] And to deſire his Majeſty to write a letter, &c.] This we learn from one of Mr Sharp's to Mr Douglas, dated May 1 P. S. 'General Monk has been theſe ten days preſſing me to go over to the King, to deal that he may write a letter to Mr Calamy, to be communicated to the Preſbyterian Miniſters, ſhewing his them, who called themſelves the godly ſober party. He carried with him a long letter to the King, and another to his Prime Miniſter (s): Biſhop Burnet tells us, that one of thoſe letters was from the Earl of Glencairn to Hyde, recommending Mr Sharp as the only perſon capable to manage the deſign of ſetting up Epiſcopacy in Scotland; upon which he was received into great confidence (t). Inſtructions were alſo ſent him from the Kirk [F], with ſome particulars which he was deſired to propound to the King at fit opportunities (u). General Monk having ordered a frigate to carry him over to Holland, he arrived at Breda May the 8th, and was led to the Court by Alexander Bruce, where the Marquis of Ormond introduced him to the King, to whom he delivered his letters. The next morning he ſtaid an hour and a half with the King alone in his bed-chamber; and in the evening his Majeſty took him to walk in the garden near an hour (w). He returned to London May the 26th, and the ſame day wrote to Mr Douglas, acquainting him, that he 'found 'the ſober Preſbyterian Party had no reſerve but in his Majeſty's Clemency, of which 'they had no cauſe to doubt. That he found the King very affectionate to Scotland, and 'reſolved not to wrong the ſettled Government of their Church. But he apprehended, 'they were miſtaken who went about to ſettle the Preſbyterian government (x).' And he directed his conduct accordingly. For when he, with ſome others of his brethren, 'ſaw nothing remaining (to uſe his own words) but Prayer and waiting on God.'—When he ſaw, that 'no Good would follow from the propoſed Accommodation between the Epiſcopal party and their adverſaries; ſince thoſe who profeſſed the Preſbyterian way reſolved to admit moderate Epiſcopacy.'—When he found, 'from any obſervation he 'could make, that the Preſbyterian cauſe was wholly given up and loſt [G]: and that 'the Preſbyterians were like to be ground betwixt two mill-ſtones, viz. the Papiſts and 'Preſbyterians (y).'—In a word, when he plainly found, that King Charles's Miniſtry were reſolved to cruſh the Covenanters, and to reſtore Epiſcopacy in Scotland, he thought it as well to fiſh in thoſe troubled waters. However, he held out as long as he thought oppoſition would anſwer any purpoſe [H]. But his becoming ſoon after a zealous Member of the Church of England, and accepting of an Archbiſhoprick; made thoſe rigid members of the Kyrk who had maintained him as their Agent, and were reſolved never to conform; imagine, that he had been unfaithful to his Truſt, and all along undermined and betrayed their cauſe [I]. This notion bred in thoſe ſullen and perverſe men ſuch a thorough

[F] Inſtructions were alſo ſent him from the Kirk.] But, notwithſtanding them, he ſignified his intention to one of his conſtituents in the following words:—— 'For my part, I ſhall not be acceſſary to any thing 'prejudicial to the Preſbyterian Government, but 'to appear for it in any other way than is within my 'ſphere, is inconvenient, and may do harm, and not 'good (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 21.

[G] When he found, from any obſervation he could make, that the Preſbyterian cauſe was wholly given up and loſt.] In his letter of June 19, ſpeaking of 'the 'Neglect of the Covenant; I ſee no effectual way '(ſays he) to help this.——I ſee little the Preſby-'terians can, or intend to do for the promoting that 'intereſt (7).'

(7) Woodrow, Introd. p. 39.

[H] However, he held out as long as he thought oppoſition would anſwer any purpoſe.] So we learn from the following extracts of ſome of his letters.——In that of June 5, 1660.——'The Epiſcopalians, ſays 'he, drive ſo furiouſly, that all lovers of Religion 'are awakened to look about them, and to endeavour 'the ſtemming of that feared impetuouſneſs of theſe 'men: All that is hoped, is to bring them to ſome 'Moderation and Cloſure with an Epiſcopacy of a new 'make. You may eaſily judge how little any endea-'vour of mine can ſignify to the preventing of this 'evil; and, therefore, how deſirous I am to be taken 'off, and returned to my charge (8).'——In another of June 10, he ſpeaks thus:——'Some leading 'Preſbyterians tell me, they muſt reſolve to cloſe in 'with what they call moderate Epiſcopacy, or elſe 'open Profanity will upon the one hand over-whelm 'them, or Eraſtianiſm (which may be the deſign 'of ſome Stateſmen) on the other. I am often 'thinking of coming away; for my ſtay here I ſee 'is to little purpoſe. I clearly ſee the General will 'not ſtand by the Preſbyterians (9).'——'For my 'part, ſays he, in one of June 12, whatever con-'ſtructions may be put on my way here, I have a 'teſtimony that my endeavours have not been wanting 'for promoting the Preſbyterian intereſt according 'to the Covenant. I cannot ſay they have been 'ſignificant, &c. (10).'——And again, in another of June 15.——'I have a teſtimony that I have not been 'wanting to improve any opportunity I had during 'theſe tranſactions for the intereſt of our country 'and the Covenant. They will bear me up under the 'conſtructions my imployment at ſuch a juncture lays 'me open to. I truſt when I return to make it 'appear, I have purſued the publick ends of Religion, 'as far as the condition of affairs would bear; and 'I have been byaſſed by no ſelfiſh ends.——I profeſs 'it ſtill to be my opinion, that I know no conſiderable 'number, and no party in England, that will join 'with you for ſettling Preſbyterian Government, and 'purſuing the ends of the Covenant.——The preſent 'poſture of affairs looks like a ſhip foundered with 'the waves from all corners, ſo that 'tis not known 'what courſe will be ſteered. But diſcerning men 'ſee, that the gale is like to blow for the Prelatick 'party, and thoſe who are ſober will yield to a 'Liturgy and moderate Epiſcopacy, which they 'phraſe to be effectual Preſbytery, and by this ſalvo 'they think they guard againſt breach of the Covenant. 'I know this purpoſe is not pleaſing to you, neither 'to me, &c. (11).'——Finally, in another letter of June 23, he gives all up.——'All is wrong here as 'to Church-affairs. Epiſcopacy will be ſettled here 'to the height, their lands will be all reſtored. None 'of the Preſbyterian way here oppoſe this, or do any 'thing but mourn in ſecret. We know not the 'temper of people, to have any thing to do with 'them (12).'

[I] And all along undermined and betrayed their cauſe.] His old friend and acquaintance Robert Douglas, in particular, charged him afterwards ſeverely with Fraud and Prevarication; as appears by the following extract from his Account of the Introduction of Prelacy (13).——'I profeſs I did not 'ſuſpect Mr Sharp in reference to Prelacy more than 'I did myſelf, no more than the Apoſtles did Judas 'before his Treachery was diſcovered: I did not 'ſuſpect him for that, more than I did ſuſpect him 'for taking the Tender, after he came out of the 'Tower ſo long before us. But ſince I find that he 'has been his Truckling; and when he went over 'to Holland he had a letter from a prime Nobleman 'to the King, ſignifying that he was Epiſcopal in 'his judgment. This was revealed to me after he 'was a Biſhop. The firſt thing that gave me a 'diſlike at him was, when he was in Holland he 'wrote thorough Hatred and Prejudice, as nothing but Mr Sharp's blood could ſatisfy and appeaſe. During his abſence from Scotland, he was choſen Profeſſor of Divinity in St Mary's-college in St Andrews (z). And, before he quitted London, King Charles, as a mark of his royal favour, made him his Chaplain for Scotland, with a penſion of 200 pounds ſterling per annum, which he enjoyed as long as he lived (a). About the middle of Auguſt 1660, he returned to Edinburgh, carrying with him a Letter from his Majeſty, directed to Mr Robert Douglas, to be communicated to the Preſbytery of that city [K]. He then delivered up to his conſtituents his commiſſion, with a full anſwer to the ſame: and, after this, never had another commiſſion from them, nor was employed by that party (b) [L]. On the firſt of January 1660 61, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners to viſit the college of Aberdeen (c). The ſame year, an act having paſſed, for reſcinding all the Parliaments held in Scotland ſince 1633; the Earl of Glencairn Chancellor, and the Earl of Rothes Preſident of the Council, were ſent up to London, with a letter dated April 24, to give the King an account of the proceedings and ſtate of affairs of Scotland (d). Mr Sharp attended thoſe Lords; and, in a Council held at Whitehall, was nominated Archbiſhop of St Andrews, with the approbation of all preſent except the Earl of Lauderdale (e) [M]. The laſt day of Auguſt, thoſe two Noblemen and he came back to Scotland, bringing with them a letter from the King to the Privy-Council there, for reſtoring of that Church to its right Government by Biſhops (f). Upon that a reſolution was formed, to fill up all the reſt of the vacant ſees; and the nomination of proper perſons was left to Mr Sharp, who acted with great moderation (g). He, and three others, were conſecrated at London, by virtue of a commiſſion dated December 12, 1661, and directed to Biſhop Sheldon of London, and Biſhop Morley of Worceſter; for the Archbiſhop

I durſt 'not yet believe myſelf in this, having no more ſave 'his commendation of Hyde, but it appeared after-'wards that in Holland he was a great enemy to the 'Preſbyterian intereſt, and when we wrote a favourable 'letter for the Earl of Rothes, and with him a letter 'to the King, he diſſuaded the Earl from delivering 'the letter. When at London, he was enraged that 'we had written to the Miniſters of London. He 'dealt alſo treacherouſly with the Brethren who came 'from Ireland, in diſſuading their Addreſſes to the 'King. When he came to Scotland, he dealt 'earneſtly againſt all Addreſſes made to the Parlia-'ment againſt Prelacy. He dealt treacherouſly with 'the King, making him believe, that there were 'no conſiderable Perſons againſt Prelacy; but would 'have perſuaded the King, that all our lives were 'in his hand, and he might do what he pleaſed; and 'the man never reſted 'till he was brought himſelf 'to a chair.'——Biſhop Burnet, an accuſer of his Brethren, ſpeaks in yet ſeverer terms upon that ſubject (14).

[K] Carrying with him a letter, &c.] That letter was in theſe words:

'CHARLES R.

'Truſty and well-beloved, we greet you well. By 'the letter you ſent to us with the bearer Mr James 'Sharp, and by the account he gave of the ſtate 'of our Church there, We have received full infor-'mation of your ſenſe of our Sufferings, and of your 'conſtant affection and loyalty to our Perſon and 'Authority. And therefore We will detain him 'here no longer (of whoſe good ſervice we are very 'ſenſible) nor will we delay to let you know by him 'our gracious acceptance of your Addreſs, and how 'We are ſatisfied with your carriages, and with the 'generality of the Miniſters of Scotland in this time 'of tryal, whilſt ſome under ſpecious pretences 'ſwerved from that duty and allegiance they owed to 'Us. And becauſe ſuch, who by the countenance 'of Uſurpers have diſturbed the peace of that our 'Church, may alſo labour to create Jealouſies in the 'minds of well meaning people; We have thought 'fit by this to aſſure you, that by the grace of God 'We reſolve to diſcountenance Prophanity, and all 'contemners and oppoſers of the Ordinances of the 'Goſpel We do alſo reſolve to protect and preſerve the 'government of the Church of Scotland, as it is ſettled 'by Law, without violation; and to countenance in the 'due exerciſe of their functions, all ſuch Miniſters who 'ſhall behave themſelves dutifully and peaceably, as 'becomes men of their calling. We will alſo take 'care, that the Authority and Acts of the general 'Aſſembly, at St Andrews and Dundee, the year '1651, be owned and ſtand in force, until we ſhall 'call another general Aſſembly, which we purpoſe 'to do, aſſoon as our affairs will permit. And We 'do intend to ſend for Mr Robert Douglas and ſome 'other Miniſters, that we may ſpeak with them in 'what may further concern the affairs of that Church. 'And as We are very well ſatisfied with your reſo-'lution, not to meddle without your ſphere, ſo we 'do expect that Church-Judicatories in Scotland, and 'Miniſters there, will keep within the compaſs of 'their ſtation, meddling only with matters Eccleſia-'ſtick, and promoting our Authority and Intereſt 'with our ſubjects againſt all oppoſers; and that they 'will take ſpecial notice of all ſuch, who by preach-'ing, and private Conventicles, or any other way, 'trangreſs the limits of their calling, by endeavouring 'to corrupt the people, or ſow ſeeds of diſaffection 'to Us or our government. This you ſhall make 'known to the ſeveral Preſbyteries within that our 'kingdom: And as We do give aſſurance of our 'Favour and Encouragment to you, and to all honeſt 'deſerving Miniſters there, ſo We earneſtly recom-'mend it to you all, that you be earneſt in your 'prayers, publick and private, to Almighty God, 'who is our rock and our deliverer, both for Us and 'for our government, that We may have freſh and 'conſtant ſupplies of his grace, and the right 'improvement of all his mercies and deliverances, to 'the honour of his great name, and the peace, ſafety, 'and benefit of all our kingdoms. And ſo We bid 'you heartily farewell.

For it was not after this that they accuſed him of having betrayed them, but during his negotiations before the King's Reſtoration.

Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Juxon, was unable by reaſon of his great age and infirmities, and Dr Frewen Archbiſhop of York was abſent (b). Before conſecration, Archbiſhop Sharp not having Epiſcopal Orders, was obliged to be re-ordained, though againſt his inclination (i). His firſt act was the obtaining a Proclamation, forbidding Clergymen to meet together in any Preſbytery, or other judicatory, 'till the Biſhops ſhould ſettle a method of proceeding in them. The occaſion of which was, that, upon the conſecration of the Biſhops, the Preſbyteries of Scotland that were ſtill ſitting began to declare openly againſt Epiſcopacy, and to prepare proteſtations, or other acts or inſtruments, againſt them. But this proceeding created the Archbiſhop abundance of enemies; John Maitland Earl of Lauderdale, a ſeeming friend but a private enemy, blowing the coals (k). In April 1662, the Archbiſhop, with the reſt of the new-conſecrated Prelates, were introduced into the Parliament that met at that time: and an act, framed by our Primate, paſſed in that ſeſſion, for reſtoring Epiſcopacy, and ſettling the government of the Church in the hands of the Biſhops (l) [N]. But, rather than comply with the terms of it, and take preſentations to their livings, many Miniſters choſe to be turned out; and above 150 were alſo deprived of their preferments, for not obeying and ſubmitting to the Biſhops ſummons to their Synods. This was tranſacted without Archbiſhop Sharp's knowledge, who did not imagine that ſo raſh a thing could have been done; and was glad he had no ſhare in it, as we are informed by Biſhop Burnet (m). And indeed the writer of his life aſſures us, that 'Archbiſhop Sharp's methods were Chriſtian and prudent, and 'attended with very great ſucceſs. He entertained his Clergy with much brotherly love 'and reſpect, and was a great judge and encourager of learning, wiſdom, and piety (n).' However, it is certain that from this time the frequenters of Conventicles were too ſeverely puniſhed [O]. The deprived brethren and their adherents not patiently bearing their loſſes and ſufferings, broke out at laſt into an open rebellion; which, however, was appeaſed and ſuppreſſed by their defeat at Pentland-hill, 28 November, 1666 (o). To return to ſome facts that happened in the mean time: In 1663, Archbiſhop Sharp came to London, to ſupport the Earl of Middletoun and his intereſt, but finding them both upon the decline, he adhered to the Earl of Lauderdale; who never acted but againſt his inclination for Epiſcopacy. In 1664, the Archbiſhop came again to London, to complain of the Lord Glencairn, and the Privy-Council, for their remiſſneſs in putting the laws againſt the Covenanters in execution. He alſo made ſtrong application to be Chancellor of Scotland (p); but not being able to ſucceed for himſelf, he obtained that high place for the Earl of Rothes (q). And, upon a difference between him and the Earl of Lauderdale, he endeavoured to ſupplant him; that Earl being the bittereſt enemy he could poſſibly have (r) [P]. During the rebellion in the weſtern parts of Scotland, he was in great diſtreſs, being then at the head of the Government in that kingdom; and, after the ſuppreſſion of it, cauſed the priſoners to be ſeverely proceeded againſt (s). He was the King's Commiſſioner in the Convention which met in 1665; but in the beginning of the year 1667, he was ordered to ſtay within his dioceſe, and to come no more to Edinburgh. However, before the end of the ſame year, he was brought again to the Council-board, and behaved for a while with moderation (t). But the rigorous proceedings againſt the Covenanters, of which the blame was chiefly laid upon our Prelate, ſo filled that ſullen, enthuſiaſtic, and ungovernable ſet of people (u), with violent prejudices and a bitter zeal againſt him, that they never reſted 'till they had his life. [N] And an Act, framed by our Primate, paſſed in that ſeſſion for reſtoring Epiſcopacy.] By this act, the whole government and juriſdiction of the Church in the ſeveral dioceſes was declared to be lodged in the Biſhops, which they were to exerciſe with the advice and aſſiſtance of ſuch of their Clergy, as were of known loyalty and prudence: All men that held any benefice in the Church were required to own and ſubmit to the government of the Church, as now by law eſtabliſhed. This, as Biſhop Burnet obſerves, 'was plainly the ſetting Epiſcopacy on another bottom, 'than it had been ever on in Scotland before that 'time (18).——The whole frame of the act, adds he, 'was liable to great cenſures. It was thought an 'inexcuſable piece of madneſs, that, when a govern-'ment was brought in upon a nation ſo averſe to it, 'the firſt ſtep ſhould carry their power ſo high. All the 'Biſhops, except Sharp, diſowned their having any 'ſhare in the penning this act; which indeed was 'paſſed in haſte, without due conſideration Nor 'did any of the Biſhops, no not Sharp himſelf, ever 'carry their authority ſo high, as by the act they 'were warranted to do (19).'——The act being ſo diſagreeable in its own nature to the majority of the Scotiſh Nation, no wonder that the execution of it ſhould bring a great diſlike to thoſe Perſons, who by their office were bound to ſee it obeyed.

For he 'ſaid, he had not credit enough to ſtop him; nor 'would he oppoſe any thing that he propoſed, unleſs 'it were very extravagant (21).'——The Archbiſhop complained to the King of Lauderdale's remiſſneſs; which occaſioned a bitter quarrel between them. And in the end, to compleat the Archbiſhop's diſgrace with the King, Lauderdale got many of his letters, which he had writ to the Preſbyterians, after the time in which the King knew that he was negotiating for Epiſcopacy, in which he had continued to proteſt, with what zeal he was ſoliciting their concerns, not without dreadful imprecations on himſelf, if he was prevaricating with them, and laid theſe before the King (22).

1668, one James Mitchel, a field or conventicle Preacher, ſhot at him, as he was getting into his coach [Q]: for which he was afterwards executed, the eighteenth of January, 1677-8 [R]. But that execution only made way for more deſperate undertakings. Conventicles

[Q] Shot at him, as he was getting into his coach, &c.] Of this wicked and deſperate attempt, we ſhall give the exacteſt account we can, from the moſt authentic relations publiſhed at different times. That given by the author of our Primate's life, is as follows: '——As he came down in the evening from his 'brother's lodgings, which were over againſt the 'Black-frier wynd, and being placed in his coach, 'was diſtributing charity to the poor, and bleſſing 'them, and receiving their returns, he with Dr Honyman, Biſhop of Orkney (who was entering the 'coach) were aſſaulted by a wicked ruffian (Mr James 'Mitchel by name, whoſe ſon and heir is preſent 'preacher (23) at Dunoter) who ſhot at them with 'a piſtol charged with three balls, which broke the 'Biſhop of Orkney's left arm, a little above the 'wreſt. In the confuſion, occaſioned by ſo unexpected an event, the bloody aſſaſine made his eſcape; 'but being afterwards apprehended, he owned the 'fact, and maintained ſuch principles as are deſtructive 'to ſociety, and hateſull to all ſober men; for which 'in or about the year 1676 (24) he ſuffered the 'puniſhment due to ſuch execrable crimes (25).'

(24) It was in January 1677 8. See the next note.

(25) Life, p. 63, 24.

Dr Hickes, in Ravillac redivivus, relates the fact in the following manner —— 'Mr Mitchel joined in 'the rebellion of the Fanaticks, that broke out in 1666. 'He had the fortune to eſcape from the field of 'battle, but was afterwards proclaimed Traytor, with 'many other principal actors in that Rebellion, and 'afterwards excepted by name in his Majeſty's proclamation of Pardon, that he might receive no 'benefit thereby. Then he ſculked about, during 'which time, he took up the reſolution of Aſſaſinating 'the Lord-Primate, and languiſhed away for want 'of an opportunity to put his inhumane deſign in 'execution. At laſt, having obſerved that the Lord 'Arch-Biſhop uſed always to go about the town [of 'Edenburgh] in his coach, he determined to piſtol 'him in it; and accordingly on Saturday the ninth 'of July, 1668, diſcharged a piſtol loaden with three 'bullets at him, which were intercepted by the arm 'of the Lord Biſhop of Orkney, who at the ſame 'inſtant was getting into his Grace's coach: As ſoon 'as he had ſhot, he walked faſt away, and as he 'croſſed the ſtreet, the Primate got a view of his 'face He was not immediately purſued, which 'gave him opportunity to eſcape into the houſe of 'one ——— Ferguſon, an ejected Miniſter; which 'being in an obſcure place of the town, he had 'prepared for a retreat, in caſe he could get ſafe 'thither There having diſguiſed himſelf, by putting 'on a periwig, and changing his cloaths, he immediately went into the ſtreet again, and made as great 'a buſtle as any in the throng to find out the aſſaſine, 'who had ſhot at the Primate, and, as he hoped, 'had killed him in his coach. He was known by 'none in the crowd, but by three of his confederates, 'who had come to town on purpoſe to aſſiſt him in 'his bloody deſign; namely,—— Barſcob, ——— 'Mandroget, and Major Lermonth, who had been 'ringleaders in the rebellion of Pentland-hills. The 'aſſaſine joyned himſelf with theſe three; and after 'a conſultation what they ſhould do for their further 'ſecurity, they unanimouſly reſolved to retire into 'the garden of Sir Archibald Primroſe. The morning 'approaching, they thought it ſafer to quit the town; 'and the other three conducting Mr James Mitchel, 'he made a final eſcape into Holland by their aſſiſtance, 'and was never after ſeen in Scotland, 'till the latter 'end of 1673. In that interval, he rambled through 'Holland, England, and Ireland, from whence 'he returned, with a reſolution (as it ſeems) to 'aſſaſine the Primate again Not long after his 'return he married, and repaired with his wife to 'Edenburgh, preſuming that after more than five 'years abſence, he might live incognito; at leaſt ſo 'long, 'till he could find an opportunity to execute 'his bloody deſign. In order to which, he hired 'a ſhop within a door or two of the Primate's 'lodgings, where his wife pretended to ſell Tobacco 'and ſuch like things (26).'

(26) Ravillac Redivivus, being a Narrative of the Tryal of Mr James Mitchel, &c. 2d edit. Lond. 1682, fol.

Much to the ſame purpoſe is Biſhop Burnet's ſtory. '——A ſtrange accident happened to Sharp in July, '1668, as he was going into his coach in full day-'light, the Biſhop of Orkney being with him. A man 'came up to the coach, and diſcharged a piſtol at 'him with a brace of bullets in it, as the Biſhop of 'Orkney was going up into the coach. He intended 'to ſhoot through his cloak at Sharp, as he was 'mounting up: but the bullet ſtuck in the Biſhop of 'Orkney's arm, and ſhattered it ſo, that, though 'he lived ſome years after that, they were forced to 'open it every year for an exfoliation. Sharp was 'ſo univerſally hated, that, though this was done 'in full day-light, and on the high-ſtreet, yet no 'body offered to ſeize the aſſaſin So he walked 'off, and went home, and ſhifted himſelf of an odd 'wig, which he was not accuſtomed to wear, and 'came out, and walked on the ſtreets immediately. 'But Sharp had viewed him ſo narrowly, that he 'diſcovered him afterwards.——Proclamations were 'iſſued out with great rewards for diſcovering the 'actor; but nothing followed on them. On this 'occaſion it was thought proper, that he ſhould be 'called to Court, and have ſome marks of the King's 'favour put on him. He promiſed to make many 'good motions.——The King, as he had a particular 'talent that way, when he had a mind to it, treated 'him with ſpecial characters of favour and reſpect. But 'he made no propoſition to the King: only in general 'terms he approved of the methods of gentleneſs and 'moderation then in vogue When he came back 'to Scotland, (which was in Auguſt 1675) he moved 'in council, that an Indulgence might be granted to 'ſome Miniſters, of the denomination of Publick 'Reſolutioners, who did not conform, with ſome 'rules and reſtraints (27).' But they were rejected by thoſe Miniſters.

[R] For which he was afterwards executed the eighteenth of January 1677-8.] We have ſeen, in the foregoing note, that Mitchel returned to Edenburgh in 1673, where he married, and hired a ſhop within a door or two of the Archbiſhop's lodgings. But he had not long been there, before he was 'diſcovered 'and apprehended upon ſuſpicion; and when he 'was taken (which was in the ſame place where he 'ſtood to commit the fact) there were two piſtols 'found about him, in ſize and ſhape like that which 'the Primate ſaw him hold in his hand, immediately 'after he had ſhot at his Grace; and upon ſearch, 'they were alſo found to be charged with three 'bullets each. Being apprehended by Sir William 'Sharp, he was immediately brought to his brother 'the Primate's lodgings; and though a great crowd 'had preſſed in after him, yet his Grace knew him 'at firſt ſight from all the reſt (ſuch a deep impreſſion 'the tranſient view he got of him after the ſhot, had 'made upon him) and going up to him, without 'any hæſitation he ſaid unto him, You, Sir, are the man; upon which the wretch trembled and grew 'pale. Not long after, he was convened before the 'Privy-Council, the Duke of Lauderdale, his Majeſty's 'High Commiſſioner, then ſitting in Council; but he 'would confeſs nothing before them, which made 'them depute a Committee for his further examination; before which he freely confeſſed the fact, 'and ſigned his Confeſſion before the King's High-'Commiſſioner ſitting in Council; which the Lord 'Halton, the Treaſurer-Deputy; the Earl of Rothes, 'Lord Chancellor; and ſome other of the Council, 'ſubſcribed as witneſſes. After this examination, 'which was in February 1674, he was put upon his 'tryal. But after his indictment was read, he denyed 'it, and retracted his Confeſſion, which (as our 'author affirms) he had freely made, without any 'promiſe of pardon, before the High-Commiſſioner 'and the Council. Upon which, Sir John Neſbit, 'his Majeſty's Advocate, deſiſted immediately from 'the proſecution, and would never proſecute the 'aſſaſine again: ſo that the Privy Council were forced 'to ſend him priſoner to the Baſs, where he continued 'till the latter end of December 1677. But then 'it being rumoured about, that the Fanaticks deſigned 'to take off our Primate, Archbiſhop Burnet, ſome of

ticles grew at length to a very unſufferable pitch; they having generally with them a troop of armed and deſperate men, that drew up, and ſent parties out to ſecure them (w). From ſome of theſe, the precaution which the Archbiſhop had taken to ſecure his own life, ſerved only to haſten his fatal and moſt tragical death. For, whether it was a premeditated deſign [S], or ſuggeſted by an accidental opportunity (x), nine ruffians [T] attacked him, May the third, 1679, on Magaſk-moor about three miles from St Andrews, and murdered him in a cruel and barbarous manner [U]. His body was interred, May 17, in the ſouth end of

' of the Biſhops, and other eminent perſons, by ' aſſaſination; it was reſolved to bring Mr Mitchel ' to publick juſtice (28).'——Or, as Biſhop Burnet expreſſes it in his invidious way, ' now Sharp would ' have his life.——He pretended, he was in great ' danger of his life, and that the rather becauſe ' the perſon that had made the attempt on him was ' let live ſtill.'——The ſame hiſtorian repreſents this whole affair in very black colours. And tells us, that ' Sharp got a friend of his to go to Mitchel, and ' deal with him to make a full confeſſion: And he ' made ſolemn promiſes, that he would procure his ' pardon. His friend anſwered, he hoped he did ' not intend to make uſe of him to trepan a man ' to his ruin. Upon that, with lifted up hands, ' Sharp promiſed by the living God, that no hurt ' ſhould come to him, if he made a full diſcovery. ' —— And the Duke of Lauderdale, the King's ' Commiſſioner, gave the Council power to promiſe ' him his life.'——But, afterwards, upon Mitchel's refuſing ' to repeat his confeſſion in a court of judi- ' cature; the Council paſt an Act mentioning the ' promiſe and his confeſſion, and adding, that ſince ' he had retracted his confeſſion, they likewiſe recalled ' the promiſe of pardon (29).'——Let us hear what our Archbiſhop ſaid upon that point, at the time of Mitchel's tryal. He then depoſed, ' that imme- ' diately upon the taking of the pannel [i. e. the ' priſoner] he promiſed him, that if he would confeſs, ' and repent himſelf of his fault, without further ' troubling a Court of Judicature, he would intercede ' for his Pardon; which he rejected then, and there- ' fore though he ſtill forgave him, yet he did not ' conceive himſelf bound to endeavour his preſervation ' after more than five years Obſtination (30).'——Biſhop Burnet hath given a large and circumſtantial Account of this whole affair (31), which we cannot inſert, for fear of ſwelling this note too much. But he owns himſelf, that he received his information from one who hated Sharp (32). ' Let therefore the reader coolly judge for himſelf, between the two extremes. Only we cannot but leave this obſervation with him, That Archbiſhop Sharp is by Biſhop Burnet painted in as black colours, as Biſhop Burnet himſelf has been by poſterity: And that he expreſſes through- out as bitter a prejudice againſt our Primate, as even Mitchel himſelf could do. He had alſo forgot, that one of the ancienteſt Laws of the ſupreme Governor of the univerſe, is, Whoſo ſheddeth man's blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed (33). The obvious meaning of which is, that Murder is to be puniſhed with death, which way ſoever it comes to be diſcovered.

[S] Whether it was a premeditated deſign.] The author of the Archbiſhop's Life gives ſtrong reaſons to think that it was a premeditated Deſign. For, ' towards the end of April 1679, a paper was dropt ' in the Burgh of Cowper, full of opprobrious language ' and infinuations of a Deſign upon Archbiſhop Sharp's ' perſon, who was then at Edinburgh, and had re- ' ſolved to go to London, to give a fair repreſenta- ' tion to his Majeſty of the ſtate of affairs, and what ' was to be done for remedying theſe evils. It is ' believed, that if the Archbiſhop had gone ſtraight ' to Court, his enemies had failed in their deſign, and ' alſo, that his wife counſels would have prevented ' much blood and enſuing confuſions (34).'——And, in another letter from one of his Grace's enemies, inſerted in the ſame life (35), and dated third of May 1679, we find this paſſage.——' I hope you ' have heard of the dreadful Death of the old Fox, ' who was clothed with the Sheep's ſkin, and coun- ' tenanced with the King's authority. The ſame ' was intended for others alſo; but it ſeems God hath ' not altogether forſaken them, and given them over ' to themſelves; but it may be ſuppoſed, that they ' are referred to a greater judgment, which God in ' his own appointed time will cauſe to fall upon them.' [U] And murdered him in a cruel and barbarous manner.] Of this inhuman murder the following account is given by the writer of his Life ' Upon ' Friday May the ſecond, he determined to take ' journey to St Andrews, with a deſign to return ' upon Monday to Edinburgh, and thence to begin ' his journey for Court. On Friday evening, he ' reached Kennoway, where he lodged that night. ' ——On Saturday, May 3d, he entred his coach ' with his daughter Iſabel, and went on in his journey. ' —— As he paſſed by the Struthers, he ſent his ' ſervant with an excuſe to the Earl of Crawford, ' that he could not wait upon him at that occaſion. ' And, as he was going on, the coachman perceiving ' ſome armed men making hard after them, who ' looked not like friends, calls to the poſtilion to drive ' on. The Arch-biſhop finding the coach run ſo hard, ' look't out to ſee what the matter was, and perceiving ' armed men purſuing him, he turned to his daughter, ' and ſaid Lord have mercy upon me, my poor child, ' for I am gone. In the mean time, the coach-man ' put faſter on, and out-run the moſt part of theſe ' ruffians, while at laſt one of the beſt mounted of ' them got before the poſtilion, and, by wounding ' him in the face, ſhooting the horſe which he led, ' in the back, and cutting him in the hams, turned ' the coach out of the way, and gave time to the ' reſt to come up, who immediately ſtopt the coach, ' by cutting the harneſſing with their ſwords. One ' wounded him with the ſhot of a piſtol, another with ' a ſmall ſword: thereafter they called to him to ' come out. Upon which he compoſedly opened ' the coach-door, and ſtept forth: And while his ' daughter was crying, and all in tears, he beſought ' them to ſpare his life, and obteſted them not to ' bring innocent blood upon their own heads. But all ' in vain. Then he entreated them through the ' bowels and mercies of Chriſt, that they would at ' leaſt ſuffer him to die patiently, and have ſome time ' to recommend his ſoul unto God. Which being ' denied him, (but would have been granted by the ' moſt barbarous of all Heathens) he fell upon his ' knees, and while he was holding up his eyes and ' hands to Heaven, and, powring out his ſoul before ' God, and after the example of his bleſſed Lord, ' praying for his murderers, he was firſt deeply ' wounded in the wreſts, and backs of theſe up-lifted ' hands, which they did beat down, and then by ' theſe bloody Canibals maſſacred upon the place, ' having received in his head, and other parts of his ' body, twenty two wounds (38).'

(38) Life, p. 73. 74. 75. and 140, &c.

To this, it will not be amiſs to ſubjoin the declara- tion of the Phyſician and Surgeons, who viſited the Archbiſhop's body. ' We under-ſubſcribers, being ' called to viſit the corps of the late Lord Archbiſhop ' of St Andrews, do find, that he had received a ' wound by a ſword over the left eye, extending ' two inches above, and one below, making a great ' ſuffuſion of blood upon the cheek, and upper and ' lower eye-lid. Next, we found many wounds upon ' the poſterior part of his head, inſomuch, that the ' whole occipital bone was ſhattered all in pieces, and ' a part of the brain thereby loſt upon the place, ' which certainly being ſo great, could not but oc- ' caſion his preſent death. There were only two ' wounds to be ſeen upon the body, the firſt, two ' or three inches below the right clavicle, betwixt of the high church of St Andrews; where his ſon erected a magnificent tomb, with an elegant epitaph, to his memory, compoſed by Dr Andrew Bruce, Biſhop of Dunkeld, and afterwards of Orkney (y). By his wife, Helen Moncrief, daughter to William Moncrief, Laird of Randerſton, deſcended from an ancient family, his Grace left one ſon, and two daughters; viz.—Sir William Sharp, who married Mrs Margaret Erſkine, daughter to Sir Charles Erſkine of Cambo, Bart. Lyon King at Arms.—Iſabel, who was in the coach with her father at the time of his barbarous murther, and was afterwards married to John Cunningham of Barns, Gent. in Fife-ſhire.—Margaret, who was married to William Lord Saltoun (z). The Archbiſhop was of a middle ſtature, ſtrong, and well made. He had a comely forehead, but his eyes appeared to be ſomewhat ſunk, yet full of life. His countenance was chearful, with a due mixture of gravity; and he was an abſolute maſter of the art of addreſs. For ſobriety he was next to a miracle. Neither was his Charity leſs in all its branches [W]. He was a man of good learning, and a frequent preacher; and thought reſidence one of the indiſpenſable duties of a Biſhop [X]. He was a kind and affectionate huſband, a tender and indulgent father, a firm friend, a great encourager of learning and learned men, and a ſure patron of ſocieties, particularly of the city and univerſity of St Andrews (a).

the ſecond or third rib, which was given by a ſhot ' not reaching the capacity of the breaſt. The next ' was a ſmall wound upon the region of the kidneys, ' given by a ſmall ſword. Likewiſe we found three ' wounds upon his left hand, which might have proved ' mortal, though he had eſcaped the former. Alſo ' another upon the right hand, as dangerous as the ' former;' as witneſs our hands at St Andrews, the fifth day of May 1679, George Pitillo, M. D. William Borthwick, Chir. Henry Spence, Chir. [W] Neither was his Charity leſs in all its branches.] If at any time he made diſtinction, it was to thoſe of the better rank, upon whom poverty lies heavieſt, becauſe they are aſhamed to diſcover their neceſſities, or to beg ſupplies from others; and that without any reſpect to party. ' I have it (adds the author of his ' life) from a wife, reverend, and aged Preſbyter, ' who had the advantage of knowing him very well, ' that, to his certain knowledge, he hath cauſed ' diſtribute by his truſtees fifty crowns in a morning ' to the orphans and widows of the Preſbyterian ' brethren, without their being acquainted from what ' hand it came. And it is now very well known, ' that a certain Preſbyterian lady (whoſe father was ' the third and moſt eminent, except one, that ſuffered ' after the Reſtoration) was entruſted by him in ' diſpenſing no ſmall ſums of ſecret charity, to the ' moſt needful of that party, which differed ſo much ' from him. And his conduct in his family, and on ' other occaſions to the poor, was ſuitable to diſcretion, and the true laws of charity (40).'

(40) Life, p. 79.

[X] And thought reſidence one of the indiſpenſable duties of a Biſhop.] The author of our Primate's life explains more fully theſe particulars, in the following manner:——' He was no friend to Pluralities in the ' Church, and he thought reſidence one of the indiſ- ' penſable duties of a Biſhop, and was never abſent ' from St Andrews, except when the affairs of the ' Church and the publick called him. Frequently he ' preached every Lord's-day, but at leaſt once in the ' fourteen days: And when he was neceſſarily at ' Edinburgh, he preached on all anniverſary days, ' feſtivals, and ſolemn occaſions. And for that part ' of the Evangelical function he was happily qualified: ' for his ſermons were methodical, grave and per- ' ſuaſive, altogether free from Enthuſiaſtick ſlights ' and bitter invectives; which were then the admirable ' talents of thoſe denominated a Goſpel-gifted Miniſtry. ' That which made all Eccleſiaſtical performances ' eaſy to the Archbiſhop, was, the great progreſs he ' had made, from the days of his youth, in the ſtudy ' of the Greek and Latine Fathers, the ancient ' Liturgies, Councils, and Canons of the Church. ' Neither was he a ſtranger to the learning of the ' ſchool-men (41).'——Biſhop Burnet, indeed, is pleaſed to ſay, that Sharp ' had a very ſmall pro- ' portion of Learning, and was but an indifferent ' Preacher (42).' But we muſt conſider, that this comes from a very inveterate Enemy.

SHARP [JOHN], the late moſt worthy Archbiſhop of York, was born at Bradford in Yorkſhire, February the 16th, 1644, being the ſon of Mr Thomas Sharp, an eminent tradeſman of that place, deſcended from the Sharps of Little Norton, a family of great antiquity in Bradford-Dale (a) [A]. On the 26th of April, 1660, he was admitted of Chriſt's-college in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr Brookſbank [B]. But he attended for ſome time Lectures in Natural Philoſophy, according to the Carteſian method; which were read by Mr Thomas Burnet, then Fellow of Chriſt's-college, afterwards Doctor in Divinity, and Maſter of the Charter-houſe. However, Mr Sharp did not apply himſelf ſo much to the Mathematicks, as he did to Botany and Chemiſtry, which were his favourite ſtudies in his younger years (b). On the 26th of December, 1663, he commenced Bachelor of Arts, having performed his exerciſe and examination with good reputation; though he had laboured under great infirmities both of body and mind moſt part of the time, having been afflicted with a quartan ague, which by its long continuance had brought on a hypochondriac melancholy (c). About the year 1664, he made intereſt for a Fellowſhip of his college; but, his county being full, he was expreſsly excluded by the ſtatutes: Dr Cudworth, the Maſter, offered to bring him in afterwards, in 1669, but he had then better views. The 9th of July, 1667, he commenced Maſter of Arts; and, the 12th of the month following, by virtue of a faculty from Archbiſhop Sheldon, was ordained Deacon and Prieſt both in one day, by Dr Fuller, then Biſhop of Limerick, afterwards of Lincoln. The ſame year, in the month of October, he became domeſtic Chaplain,

Chaplain, and Tutor to four ſons of Sir Heneage Finch [C], then Attorney-General, afterwards Lord Chancellor; by the recommendation of his fellow-collegian, the celebrated Dr Henry More (d). July 13, 1669, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, in company with ſeveral other Gentlemen from Cambridge, who went to Oxford, at the opening of the Sheldonian Theatre (e). Having attended, with univerſal liking, for five years in the family of his excellent patron Sir Heneage Finch, he was by him recommended to King Charles II. for the Archdeaconry of Berkſhire, then void by the promotion of Dr Mew to the Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells; and accordingly he was collated thereto February 20, 1672 (f). Sir Heneage being advanced, the ſame year, to the high office of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; and ſenſible, that the ſeveral duties of his great poſt, would not allow him time and leiſure, to make that enquiry which was neceſſary, to know the characters of ſuch as applied to him for the Crown-preferments in his diſpoſal; he devolved this particular province upon his Chaplain Mr Sharp, of whoſe learning, integrity, and good judgment, he had now ſufficient experience [D]. In 1674, he preached a ſermon, the firſt in the collection of his printed works, which occaſioned a controverſy, of which an account is given in the note [E]. On the 26th of March, 1675-6, he was inſtalled Prebendary of the third ſtall in the cathedral of Norwich; and, on the 22d of April following, inſtituted to the Rectory of St Bartholomew Exchange London. He was married, May 16, 1676, by Dr Tillotſon, at Clerkenwell church, to Elizabeth, youngeſt daughter of William Palmer of Winthorp in the county of Lincoln, Eſq; And, on the third of January, 1676-7, was inſtituted to the Rectory of St Giles in the Fields, London, having ſupplied that place conſtantly from the death of the laſt incumbent (g). He now left the Lord Chancellor Finch, and kept houſe, and his time was taken up, for the ten following years, in cloſe attention to his cure at St Giles's [F]. During that time, he was happy in the intimacy of ſome, and well acquainted with all, the following eminent Divines then in London: Stillingfleet, Cradock, Whitcot, Calamy, Tillotſon [G], Clagett, Williams, Teniſon, Beveridge, Scott, Sherlock, Wake, and [D] Of whoſe learning, integrity, and good judgment he had now ſufficient experience.] This particular we learn from the pious Mr Nelſon (4). whoſe larger account is as follows: 'Among the many very commendable qualities of this great man [Sir Heneage] 'his zeal for the welfare of the Church of England, 'was not the leaſt conſpicuous; which particularly 'ſhewed itſelf, in the care he took in diſpoſing of 'thoſe Eccleſiaſtical Preferments, which were in the 'Gift of the Seal. He judged rightly, in looking 'upon that Privilege as a Truſt for the good of the 'Church of God, of which he was to give a ſtrict 'account; and therefore being ſenſible that the ſeveral 'duties of his great Poſt, as firſt Miniſter of State, 'as Lord-Chancellor, and as Speaker of the Houſe 'of Lords, would not allow his Lordſhip time and 'leiſure to make that enquiry which was neceſſary 'to know the Characters of ſuch as were Candidates 'for Preferment, he devolved this particular province 'upon his Chaplain, whoſe Conſcience he charged 'with an impartial Scrutiny in this matter; adding 'withal, that he would prefer none but thoſe who 'came recommended from him, and that if he led 'him wrong, the blame ſhould fall upon his own 'ſoul. It is true, that this was a great teſtimony 'of my Lord's intire Confidence, in the Uprightneſs 'as well as the Capacity of his Chaplain; but the 'world will quickly be ſatisfied with what caution 'and judgment his Lordſhip took his meaſures, when 'they ſhall know, that his then Chaplain was Dr Sharp, 'the preſent Lord Archbiſhop of York, who fills one 'of the Archiepiſcopal thrones of the Church of 'England, with that univerſal applauſe, which is 'due to his Grace's diſtinguiſhing merit; whoſe 'elevation hath not deprived him of his humility, but 'he exerciſeth the ſame affability and courteſy towards all men, which he practiſed in a lower ſphere. 'And that Learning and Piety, that Integrity and 'Zeal for the Glory of God, which influence his 'Grace in the government of his Dioceſs and of his 'Province, were peculiarly ſerviceable to the Earl 'of Nottingham, in the charge his Lordſhip laid 'upon him with ſo much ſolemnity.'——It was he that procured the learned Mr George Bull, afterwards Biſhop of St David's, a Prebend of Glouceſter, from the Lord-Chancellor, in which he was inſtalled October 9, 1678.

[E] Which occaſioned a Controverſy, of which an account is given in the note.] This Sermon was, ſoon after, anſwered by an anonymous writer, ſuppoſed to be Wadſworth the diſſenter; and that Anſwer was the occaſion of Mr Dodwell's book of Schiſm (5). R Baxter replied to Mr Dodwell, in his 'True and 'only way of Concord.' This drew from Mr Dodwell a ſecond piece on Schiſm (6). At length Dr Sharp, in 1683, wrote, but without taking any immediate notice of the Authors aforeſaid, his firſt Diſcourſe on Conſcience; and in the year following his ſecond Diſcourſe on the ſame ſubject: Both which Diſcourſes made part of the London Caſes, and were abridged by Dr Bennet in the London Caſes. So this Diſpute ended.——But another aroſe from the ſame ſermon. Some Popiſh anonymous writer publiſhed in 1704, a piece intit'led An Eſſay towards a Propoſal for Catholic Communion, with arguments artfully taken from this Sermon. This was anſwered in a piece intituled Concordia diſcors; and again in a pamphlet, recommended publickly by Dr Fowler, Biſhop of Glouceſter, in an advertiſement prefixed: But laſtly and moſt fully by Mr N. Spinckes; all in the ſame year, viz 1705.

[F] And his time was taken up, for the ten following years, in cloſe attention to his cure at St Giles's.] Except that, in the laſt five years, being then Dean of Norwich, he removed in the ſummer months to his charge there.——Richard Baxter lived then in his Pariſh of St Giles's, and kept a large Conventicle there, which he attended on Sundays in the afternoon, but was a conſtant hearer of, and communicant with, Dr Sharp, at his own church in the morning And they lived for many years in good friendſhip with each other (7).

(7) Memoirs, &c. as above.

[G] Tillotſon.] The friendſhip and acquaintance, between them, was of a long ſtanding, and begun by an accidental meeting, upon this occaſion. Mr Joſhua Tillotſon, the doctor's brother, was a wet and dry Salter, or Oilman, in London, of which trade was Dr Sharp's father, at Bradford in Yorkſhire Mr Sharp returning from thence to London, with a bill drawn on Mr Joſhua Tillotſon, happened to meet at his houſe Dr Tillotſon, who finding Mr Sharp to be his countryman, and a young clergyman ſetting out into the world, being above fourteen years younger than himſelf, with his uſual goodneſs and civility took particular notice of him, and after ſome converſation gave Mr Sharp leave to come freely to his houſe, whenever he pleaſed, and to have recourſe to him as often as he thought it might be ſerviceable to him. Mr Sharp judged this a moſt fortunate interview, and and Cave. With Clagett above all others he had a moſt particular friendſhip (b) [H]. March 28, 1679, he accepted of the Lecture at St Lawrence-Jewry, London, upon the earneſt deſire of Dr Benjamin Whichcot, then Vicar of that pariſh, and held it, according to his promiſe, as long as the Doctor lived (which was 'till 1683), and no longer. July 8, 1679, he commenced Doctor in Divinity at Cambridge. In 1681, June 17, he was, by the intereſt of his patron, then Lord High-Chancellor, made Dean of Norwich, into which he was inſtalled June 8 (i). Upon the death of King Charles II. he drew up the Addreſs of the Grand Jury for the city of London. March the 20th, 1684-5, he preached at Whitehall that Sermon which was publiſhed at the requeſt of the Biſhops who then attended at the King's chapel there (k). Having been Chaplain to King Charles II. and attended as one of the Court-Chaplains at the coronation of King James II. (l), he was ſworn Chaplain to this laſt, April 20, 1686, and not in 1688, as Le Neve ſays by miſtake. On the ſecond of May, 1686, he preached in his own church, on 1 Cor. xii. 13. a ſermon againſt Popery (m), which created him ſome trouble. For, at his coming down from the pulpit, a paper was put into his hand, containing an Argument for the Right of the Church of Rome to the ſtyle and title of the only viſible Catholick Church. Not knowing where to direct an Anſwer to that Paper, he anſwered it the next Sunday, May 9, at the end of his ſermon on the ſame text (n). This being miſrepreſented at Court, as a deſign to beget in the minds of the audience an ill opinion of the King and his government, by inſinuating fears and jealouſies to diſpoſe them to diſcontent, and to lead them into diſobedience and rebellion [I], and conſequently as a contempt of his Majeſty's order about Preachers; therefore the King reſented it extremely (o). But Dr Sharp had no notice of the King's diſpleaſure 'till May the 23d, when he was acquainted with it by the Lord-Chancellor Jefferies. The next day, he took his ſhort-hand ſermon to his Lordſhip, and read it to him [K]. Jefferies pretended to be very angry, and reprimanded him, but adviſed him to go down to Norwich, and was afterwards a friend to him (p). On the 17th of June following, Dr Henry Compton, then Biſhop of London, received a letter from the King [L], commanding him immediately to ſuſpend Dr Sharp from further preaching in any pariſh church or chapel in his dioceſe, until he had given his Majeſty ſatisfaction. The Biſhop, thereupon, ſent for the Doctor, and acquainted him with the King's diſpleaſure, and the occaſion of it, by ſhewing him his Majeſty's letter: but he having never been called to anſwer any ſuch matter, or make his defence, and proteſting his innocence, and likewiſe declaring himſelf moſt ready to give his Majeſty full ſatisfaction therein; in order thereto, his Lordſhip adviſed him to forbear preaching, 'till he had applied himſelf to his Majeſty. And, at his requeſt, he ſent by him, June 18, an anſwer to the Earl of Sunderland, Preſident of the Council, then at Hampton-court [M]; but no anſwer could be Himſelf extremely happy in ſo valuable an acquaintance, and ever after ſpoke of this incident with pleaſure. And this was the foundation of a firm and laſting friendſhip between them, improved by an intimate acquaintance for many years, and cemented by repeated acts of mutual good offices (8).

[H] With Clagett above all others he had a moſt particular friendſhip.] He was perfectly charmed with Dr Clagett. And if ſimilitude of temper and manners, equality of age, conformity of inclination and ſtudies, &c. can make true friendſhips, theſe two perſons needed only to be known to each other to become faſt friends. They lived in a manner together. Clagett who was not well furniſhed with Books of his own, made uſe of Dr Sharp's Library, came into it at pleaſure, and proſecuted his enquiries in it as he pleaſed, without the leaſt ceremony uſed, or interruption given on either ſide. Dr W. Clagett dying March 28, 1688, Dr Sharp preached his funeral ſermon, and publiſhed a volume of his ſermons (9). And he took Mrs Clagett, immediately upon her huſband's deceaſe, to his own houſe; but ſhe ſurvived not long (10).

[K] The next day he took his ſhort-hand ſermon to his Lordſhip, and read it to him.] Biſhop Burnet is miſtaken, when he ſays, that 'Sharp went to Court 'to ſhew the notes of his ſermon, which he was ready 'to ſwear were thoſe from which he had read it, by 'which the falſhood of the information would appear. 'But, ſince he was not ſuſpended, he was not admitted (12).' For, from the more authentick account ſent me, it was to Lord Ch. Jefferies the Doctor carried, and read, the notes of his ſermon.

[L] Dr Compton, then Biſhop of London, received a letter from the King.] It was dated June the 14th, 1686, and in theſe words:

'James R.

'Right Reverend Father in God, We greet you 'well. Whereas We have been informed, and are 'fully ſatisfied, that Dr John Sharp, Rector of the 'Pariſh-Church of St Giles in the Fields, in the 'County of Middleſex, and in your dioceſs, notwithſtanding Our late Letter to the moſt Reverend 'Fathers in God the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and 'York, and Our Directions concerning Preachers, 'given at Our Court at Whitehall, the 15th of 'March, 1685, in the ſecond year of our Reign; 'yet he, the ſaid Dr John Sharp, in contempt of the 'ſaid Orders, hath in ſome of the ſermons he hath 'ſince preached, preſumed to make unbecoming 'Reflections, and to utter ſuch Expreſſions as were 'not fit or proper for him; endeavouring thereby 'to beget in the minds of his Hearers an evil Opinion 'of Us and Our Government, by inſinuating Fears 'and Jealouſies to diſpoſe them to Diſcontent, and 'to lead them into Diſobedience and Rebellion. 'Theſe are therefore to require and command you 'immediately upon receipt hereof, forthwith to ſuſpend him from further preaching in any pariſh-church or chappel in your dioceſs, until he has 'given us ſatisfaction, and Our further Pleaſure be 'known herein. And for ſo doing this ſhall be your 'warrant: And ſo we bid you heartily farewel.

'Given at our Court at Windſor, the fourteenth 'day of June, 1686, in the ſecond year of our 'reign.

'By his Majeſties command,

'Sunderland.'

[M] He ſent by him, June 18, an Anſwer to the Earl of Sunderland, &c.] It was as follows:

be obtained to this letter of the Biſhop. Therefore, two days after, Dr Sharp carried a petition to the King [N] at Windſor, which however was not admitted to be read (q). After he had voluntarily ceaſed the exerciſe of his function, by the advice of the Biſhop of London, he removed to Norwich [O]. During this leiſure-time, he amuſed himſelf with collecting old Coins, chiefly Britiſh, Saxon, and Engliſh; of which, as well as of Greek and Roman, he picked up, then and afterwards, as many as furniſhed out a large and choice cabinet. At length, January 9, 1686-7, the Earl of Sunderland wrote to him, that he might return to his function; which he did with great joy. On the 14th and 15th of Auguſt, 1688, he agreed with the other Archdeacons (when ſummoned to appear before the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners for not obeying the King's orders in reſpect of the Declaration), not to appear before that Court; and drew up the reaſons for their refuſal. The 27th of January, 1688-9, he preached before the Prince of Orange, and January the 30th before the Convention. On both occaſions he prayed for King James before Sermon (r) [P]. The Deanery of Canterbury becoming vacant by the removal of Dr Tillotſon to that of St Paul's, Dr Sharp was declared Dean of Canterbury in his room, September 19, 1689, and inſtituted by the Vicar-General on the 21ſt of November (s). About the ſame time, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for reviſing the Liturgy: and, November 21, moved in Convocation, that Dr Tillotſon ſhould be the Prolocutor; but it was carried for Dr Jane, which was thought one principal reaſon why the Commiſſion itſelf failed of ſucceſs (t) Upon the deprivation of ſome Biſhops, for refuſing the oaths to King William and Queen Mary, his Majeſty was pleaſed to mention Dr Sharp, as a proper perſon to ſucceed in ſome of the vacant ſees. Two or three were accordingly propoſed to him: Norwich in particular was preſſed by Dr Tillotſon, as the place which he thought would be moſt acceptable. But Dr Sharp abſolutely declined to accept of any of them; not out of any ſcruple of conſcience, for he could not, under ſuch a ſcruple, have either made 'To the right honourable, the Earl of Sunder-

'land, Lord Preſident, &c.

'My Lord,

'I always have, and ſhall count it my duty to obey 'the King in whatever Commands he lays upon me, 'that I can perform with a ſafe conſcience: But in 'this, I humbly conceive, I am obliged to proceed 'according to law; and therefore it is impoſſible 'for me to comply; becauſe, though his Majeſty 'commands me only to execute his pleaſure, yet in 'the capacity I am, to do it, I muſt act as a Judge; 'and your Lordſhip knows no Judge condemns any 'man before he has knowledge of the cauſe, and has 'cited the party. However, I ſent to Mr Dean, and 'acquainted him with his Majeſties diſpleaſure, whom 'I find ſo ready to give all reaſonable ſatisfaction, 'that I have thought fit to make him the Bearer 'of this Anſwer, from him that will never be un-
'faithful to the King, nor otherwiſe than,

'My Lord,

'Your Lordſhip's moſt humble ſervant,

'H. London.'

[N] Therefore, two days after, Dr Sharp carried a petition to the King.] It was in theſe words:

'To the King's moſt Excellent Majeſty, The humble
'Petition of John Sharp, Clerk,

'Sheweth,

'That nothing is ſo afflictive to Your Petitioner, 'as his unhappineſs to have incurred Your Majeſties 'Diſpleaſure, which he is ſo ſenſible of, that ever 'ſince your Majeſty was pleaſed to give notice of it, 'he hath forborn all Publick Exerciſe of his Function, 'and ſtill continues ſo to do. Your petitioner can 'with great ſincerity affirm, that ever ſince he hath 'been a Preacher, he hath faithfully endeavoured to 'do the beſt ſervice he could in his place and ſtation, 'as well to the late King, your Royal Brother, as 'your Majeſty, both by preaching and otherwiſe. 'And ſo far he hath always been from venting any thing 'in the pulpit tending to Schiſm or Faction, or any 'way to the diſturbance of Your Majeſties Govern-'ment, that he hath upon all occaſions in his Sermons, 'to the utmoſt of his power, ſet himſelf againſt all 'ſorts of Doctrines and Principles that look that 'way: And this he is ſo well aſſured of, that he 'cannot but apprehend that his Sermons have been 'very much miſrepreſented to Your Majeſty. But 'if in any ſermon of his, any words or expreſſions 'have unwarily ſlipt from him, that have been 'capable of ſuch conſtructions, as to give Your Majeſty 'cauſe of offence, as he ſolemnly profeſſes he had no 'ill intention in thoſe words or expreſſions, ſo he is 'very ſorry for them, and reſolves for the future to 'be ſo careful in the diſcharge of his duty, that 'Your Majeſty ſhall have reaſon to believe him to 'be Your moſt faithful ſubject. And therefore he 'earneſtly prayeth, that Your Majeſty out of Your 'royal grace and clemency, would be pleaſed to lay 'aſide the Diſpleaſure You have conceived againſt 'Your humble Petitioner, and reſtore him to that 'Favour which the reſt of the Clergy enjoy under 'Your Majeſties gracious Government.

'So ſhall your Petitioner ever pray, &c. (13).'

(13) Proceedings againſt the Biſhop of London, &c. p. 7, 8, 9.

[O] He removed to Norwich.] After he had been ſome time there, notice was given him, that if he would return and petition the King, he ſhould be reſtored. Mr Henry Guy, Secretary of the Treaſury, directed the manner of the Petition; and the Earl of Rocheſter undertook to befriend him in it (14). Mr Pepys was alſo very helpful to him, as we learn from Biſhop Kennet, whoſe account is thus (15):

'I have heard Archbiſhop Teniſon ſay, That He, 'as Vicar of St Martin's, uſed ſeveral endeavours 'with ſome of the Nobility in vain, to obtain a 'liberty of preaching for his neighbour Dr Sharp; 'till at laſt repreſenting his caſe to Mr Pepys, as 'a good-natured man with wife and children, Mr Pepys went freely to the King, and prevailed with 'his Majeſty to reſtore him to the exerciſe of his 'office; 'till which time, he had a guard or centinel 'to attend his lodgings.'

[P] On both occaſions he prayed for King James before Sermon.] The firſt time it gave no viſible offence, becauſe then neither of the Houſes of Parliament had declared the King's Deſertion of the government and kingdom to be properly an Abdication But on Monday the twenty-eighth the Commons had paſſed their Vote, That the King had abdicated, and the Throne was vacant. And therefore Dr Sharp's praying for the King, gave great offence; as well as ſome paſſages in the ſermon itſelf, leſs agreeable to mens tempers at that juncture than to the ſubject of the 30th of January; ſo that a long debate enſued about giving him thanks as uſual, and the Houſe broke up without doing it. Yet, on the firſt of February they paſſed a Vote of thanks, with a requeſt that he ſhould print the ſermon: but this he declined. This was a pretty remarkable proof, of his ſteadineſs in doing what in his own judgment appeared to him right (16).

made a return to the Congé d'eſlire for the election of Dr Tillotſon to Canterbury, which he did as Dean thereof; nor could he have ſuffered himſelf to have been conſecrated by Dr Tillotſon, as he was ſoon after; but out of a particular friendſhip and eſteem, which he had for the perſons deprived. This however diſpleaſed the King, and Dr Sharp ſeemed no longer to be thought of. While he was in this ſituation, Dr Tillotſon came to his houſe on the 24th of April, 1691, the day after his own nomination to the Archbiſhopric, and told him, that ſince he had ſo obſtinately refuſed taking any of the vacant Biſhoprics, he had thought of a method to bring him off with the King; which was, that he ſhould promiſe to accept the Archbiſhopric of York, in his own country, when it fell, as Dr Tenniſon ſhould take Lincoln. He told him at the ſame time, how all the vacant biſhoprics were deſigned to be diſpoſed of; obſerving, that he had thought of this ſcheme, as he came from Whitehall to his houſe; and directing him to go and acquaint the Earl of Nottingham with it; and if his Lordſhip approved of it, he would himſelf propoſe it to the King on the Monday following. Accordingly on that day he acquainted his Majeſty with what had paſſed between Dr Sharp and himſelf, and fixed the affair: which his Majeſty declared in Council, the middle of the ſame week. And Dr Lamplugh dying on the 5th of May following, Dr Sharp was promoted to the ſee of York [Q], and conſecrated July the 5th, 1691 (u). In that high ſtation he behaved in the moſt laudable and exemplary manner [R]. Upon Queen Anne's acceſſion to the Crown, he was ſworn (March 20, 1701-2) of her Majeſty's Privy-Council. The 23d of April following he preached the Sermon at her coronation, on Iſaiah xlix. 23. And, ſome time in the ſame year, was made Lord Almoner to her Majeſty, which office he held to his death (w). In 1706, he was one of the Commiſſioners for treating of the Union between England and Scotland (x). In 1709, while Dr Sacheverell's affair was depending, our excellent Prelate, imagining that through this imprudent attack both Church and State were in danger; he heartily

[R] In that high ſtation, he behaved in the moſt laudable and exemplary manner.] 'In his Family, 'every thing was managed with ſuch admirable regu'larity, as if all his care and wiſdom had been con'fined to that ſphere only. His retirements were 'divided between ſtudy and devotion. At his table 'there was that decent freedom and alacrity, that 'hoſpitable abundance and plenty, which became 'the dignity of his ſtation and character, and the 'liberality of his diſpoſition. Had Wolſey been to 'dictate ſplendor to him, ſtill his converſation muſt 'have been the beſt part of the entertainment. He 'redoubled the eſteem and veneration of others for 'him, by aiming only at their love; and loſt nothing 'of the Archbiſhop, in the very good neighbour and 'obliging friend. The charity which flowed from 'his table to his gate, was extremely magnified, by 'the manner of beſtowing it: It reached to the 'ſouls, as well as bodies of the poor; and naturally 'led them to a grateful remembrance of their Maker, 'when they ſaw ſo lively an image of him, in one 'of his moſt faithful ſtewards. His delight in private 'charities could not be well concealed; but the 'meaſures of his bounty in that way, are a ſecret 'only known to Him, who ſhall one day reward them 'openly. In his chapel and devotions, he was ſo 'intent, and abſtracted from the world, that the duty 'looked more like pleaſure and enjoyment: And 'ſuch an unaffected humility and holy ardor accom'panied his daily offering of our moſt excellent 'Liturgy, that it ſenſibly diffuſed itſelf through all, 'who had the advantage of praying with him. In 'his Province and Dioceſe, he acted with all that 'wholeſome, but gentle authority, which became 'the ſpiritual father of the clergy and laity. He ſo 'far united thoſe two orders in affection and love 'for each other, which their firſt inſtitution plainly 'tended to promote, that they often joined together, 'to give publick marks of their high eſteem and 'veneration for him; and of the irreſiſtible force 'and influence which his example had upon them, 'to compel them to love and unity. He was conſtant 'in his Reſidence, regular in his Viſitations; and 'by his ſteady and uniform adherence to the rules 'and ordinances of the Church, accompanied with 'a true Chriſtian humility and gentleneſs, he regained 'all that authority and regard for the Epiſcopal 'function, which is one of the diſtinguiſhing marks 'of the primitive purity of Religion. No man had 'a more tender concern for the Reformed Intereſt 'abroad, nor more careful to preſerve the beauty 'and order of the Church of England; that it might 'be a ſtanding pattern for all other Proteſtants. That 'Diſcipline, whoſe decay he often lamented, and 'tried in ſome meaſure to reſtore, appeared truly 'reforming and medicinal under his government; 'and wherever the Canon was invalid, the ends of it 'were anſwered by the force of his Example. In the Senate, his opinion and judgment were of the greateſt 'weight, and his Veracity and Sincerity have never 'been called in queſtion He ſpake with all imagi'nable clearneſs and ſolidity upon the moſt important 'ſubjects; and very ſeldom or never entred into any 'debates, which turned altogether upon private pique 'or intereſt: But he ſaw at once through the merits 'and tendency of every cauſe, which any ways 'affected the conſtitution in Church and State; of 'which he was a conſummate judge, and an unal'terable friend to both.——He had the advantageous 'misfortune of preſiding in the Church, for many 'years of trouble and diſorder; in which time, he 'had frequent opportunities of giving proofs of his 'unſhaken zeal and integrity, whenever any Inno'vations were attempted againſt Religion in general, 'or the Church of England and his own order 'in particular. His conduct before the Revolution, 'ſhewed him to be a ſtrenuous oppoſer of the Idolatry 'and Corruptions of the Church of Rome; and 'his behaviour, both at, and after the Revolution, 'made it apparent, how juſt a ſenſe he had of that 'deliverance, when he promoted every thing, which 'tended to the reſtoration and eſtabliſhment of the 'Conſtitution, that had before been leſſened and 'invaded; and as bravely oppoſed every thing which 'tended to a further change and alteration in our 'Laws and Religion (18).'——To which muſt be added, in his further commendation, 'That he was 'a moſt excellent Governour, brought the Prebendaries 'in his Cathedral of York, and Colleges of Southwell 'and Rippon, to ſtrict reſidence; and that they might 'be the better diſpoſed thereto, he made it his unal'terable practice always to elect them out of ſuch 'as lived in his Dioceſe, and had recommended them'ſelves by doing their duties in their reſpective Parochial 'Cures: By which means no Cathedral in England 'was better attended by Clergy, and the ſervice more 'regularly performed than at York; or the Miniſters 'of ſmall livings, in any dioceſe, more encouraged to 'attend their charge; becauſe this good Biſhop would 'reward their diligence by ſuch compenſations, more 'eſpecially thoſe in York city, on whoſe conduct the 'world had a more eſpecial eye.——He likewiſe very 'much repaired the Collegiate Church at Southwell (19).'

heartily joined thoſe many well-meaning perſons, who zealouſly endeavoured to ſecure both (y): being ſenſible, at the ſame time, how much the great Council of the Nation expoſed themſelves, by taking notice of what was really below their notice. About the year 1712, he began to decline in his health, and going for the recovery of it to the Bath, he dyed there February the 2d, 1713-14, in the 69th year of his age: after having enjoyed the Archbiſhopric of York above two and twenty years, with the utmoſt honour and reputation (z). On the 16th of February he was interred in his own cathedral. His character is given below [S]. [S] His Character, &c.] His general Character is thus given, by the ſame Author from whom we have borrowed the account already given of him in the laſt note.——'Archbiſhop Sharp had all the treaſures of 'antient and modern Learning, which were neceſſary 'to render him a perfect maſter of Divinity, in its 'own main branches, Preaching and Controverſy. 'He thought, and ſpoke, and wrote with inimitable 'clearneſs. In his perſon and behaviour, in the 'Church and the Senate, at his table and in his 'retirements, he gave all the natural and unaffected 'proofs of primitive uprightneſs and integrity: But 'to the honeſt plainneſs and ſimplicity of the Cypria-'nick age, he added all thoſe refined graces and 'improvements of modern Erudition; which others 'aſſume to gain applauſe to themſelves, and which 'He wholly employed in the propagation of truth, 'and the ſervice of Religion. Nothing mean or 'trifling, ſour or ill-natured, ever came from him; 'ſcarce from any body elſe in his preſence. He was 'far from being of a retired Monaſtick temper; but 'had all that well grounded chearfulneſs, that decent 'affability and humanity, which ſtruck a luſtre upon 'all his other Virtues, and made the imitation of 'him infinitely deſirable and pleaſing. As his Grace 'was the delight of all mankind; ſo all Mankind 'were his delight. His charity and bounty were 'large and extenſive; and reached not only to what-'ever objects came in his way, but to all that he 'could find, by an induſtry free from oſtentation. 'He had a publick ſpirit, immenſly large and perfectly 'ſincere; and a greatneſs of ſoul, ſufficient to adorn the 'higheſt birth, and to proclaim the advantageous diffe-'rence between the Roman and Chriſtian honour and 'nobility. His generoſity extended even to the relicts 'and deſcendents of good and worthy men; and became 'the happy inſtrument of Providence, in rewarding 'the poſterity of religious and loyal anceſtors. His 'continual exerciſe of this virtue vaſtly exceeded the 'intentional devotion of a thouſand poſthumous 'charities. He was acceſſible, complaiſant, and 'courteous to a ſurprizing degree; and his good-'nature made no difference in habits, fortunes, ſtations, 'and degrees. Pity and compaſſion ſeemed to be 'a part of his nature, and flowed directly from his 'heart. He might rather be ſaid not to know what 'reſentment was, than to ſtifle and ſuppreſs it. No 'man of a more forgiving temper, leſs acquainted 'with injuries, or better able to bear them. He 'perfectly underſtood the meaning and meaſures of 'Moderation; and left the world without excuſe 'for quarrelling about the word, when they ſaw it 'ſo fully explained in his Grace's life and conver-'ſation. He was juſt, equitable, and impartially 'good. His temperance was ſo great and exemplary, 'that his ſenſes and bodily appetites bore no propor-'tion to thoſe of his mind; to that ſpiritual ſenſation, 'which was perpetually ſearching after the pureſt 'objects. His Underſtanding and Conſcience were 'two great luminaries, moving together by unalterable 'concert; as remarkable for their purity and luſtre, 'as for the order and ſteadineſs of their courſes. He 'loved truth, not with the vain curioſity and un-'certain diſtruſt of one who ſearches after it, but 'with all the delight and complacency of the wiſe 'happy man, who has found, and long enjoyed it. 'His word and promiſe were eſteemed equivalent to 'the firmeſt ſecurities (20).'

We ſhall ſubjoin to this, the character given of our excellent Prelate, in his Epitaph, drawn by the elegant pen of Dr George Smalridge, Biſhop of Briſtol.

'Erat in ſermone apertus, comis, affabilis,
In concionibus profluens, ardens, nervoſus,
In explicandis Theologiæ caſuiſticæ nodis
Dilucidus, argutus, promptus:
In eximendis dubitantium ſcrupulis
Utcunque naturæ bonitate ad leniores partes aliquanto propenſior,
Æqui tamen rectique cuſtos ſemper fidiſſimus:
Primæva morum ſimplicitate,
Inculpabili vitæ tenore,
Propenſa in calamitoſos benignitate,
Diffuſa in univerſos benevolentia,
Studio in amicos perpetuo ac ſingulari,
Inter deterioris ſæculi tenebras emicuit,
Purioris Ævi lumina æquavit.
Tam acri rerum cœleſtium deſiderio flagrabat,
Ut his ſolis inhians, harum unice avarus,
Terrenas omnes neglexerit, ſpreverit, conculcarit.
Eo erat erga Deum pietatis ardore,
Ut illum totus adamaverit, ſpiraverit,
Illum ubique præſentem,
Illum ſemper intuentem,

[T] And publiſhed ſeveral occaſional ſermons; beſides which, Five new Volumes of his ſermons have been printed ſince his deceaſe.] His Sermons are comprized in Seven Volumes. The Iſt Volume is a collection of ſuch Sermons as his Grace had printed upon ſeveral occaſions before the year 1698, being fifteen in number. The IId Volume was publiſhed by his Bookſeller after his death, and takes in the Remainder of his Sermons which were printed in his life-time; and his Two Diſcourſes upon Conſcience, which were formerly publiſhed without a name, and make part of the Collection of the London Caſes. Theſe two Volumes contain all that he himſelf had ſuffered at any time to go abroad into the world.——In 1716, his executors publiſhed two Volumes more, conſiſting of Sermons never before printed. Of theſe, Vol. III. contains ſixteen Caſuiſtical Sermons preached on ſeveral occaſions. And Vol. IV. eighteen ſermons preached on ſeveral occaſions.——In 1734, the Vth Volume was publiſhed, being Eight Diſcourſes on ſeveral Subjects; with Four Sermons on the Imitation of Chriſt. The ſame year, came out the VIth Volume, being Nineteen Sermons on ſeveral Subjects. The VIIth and laſt Volume was printed in 1735, Containing his Grace's Sermons againſt Popery: preached in the reign of King James II. and other Papers wrote in the Popiſh Controverſy.——'So true and lively 'a ſpirit of Religion runs through all thoſe Diſcourſes, 'that they ſeem to be as much the dictates of the 'Author's practice as of his underſtanding. And 'they will be ever admired, as the ſtandard of good 'Preaching, ſo long as the Engliſh Tongue and the 'Proteſtant Religion remain in any degree of purity 'and perfection (21).'

whom he was collated March 14, 1684, to the Prebend of Bromesbury in the church of St Paul (f). July 9, 1685, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity, having taken no degree before (g). He bore his part in the Popish Controversy, during King James the Second's reign [C]. And published twelve Sermons, preached upon several occasions, between the years 1673 and 1692 [D]. Being grown very eminent for his piety, learning, and most improving way of preaching, he was presented by the Crown to the then very considerable living of St Giles's in the Fields (h); and had institution thereto August 7, 1691 (i). We are told, that he also was offered, and refused, first the Bishopric of Chester, because he could not take the oath of homage, and afterwards another Bishopric, as also the Deanry of Worcester, and a Prebend of Windsor (k) [E]. At length, through too close an application to his studies and the duties of his function, falling into a bad state of health, he dyed March the 10th. 1694-5, leaving behind him the character of a good and learned man, an excellent preacher, and one who had done infinite service to the world by his preaching and writings. The 15th of the said month, he was buried in the Rector's vault under part of his church of St Giles's (l). which is essentially and immutably such, and of perpetual obligation. That Moral Good is the main of Religion. Of the causes and folly of Atheism. Of divine Providence, and a Future State Of the necessity of having right Apprehensions of God, &c.——He published, in 1686, Vol. second of this IId Part; 'Wherein that Fundamental Principle of Christian 'Duty, the Doctrine of our Saviour's Mediation, is 'explained and proved.' Wherein he also treats of the Nature of Christ's Kingdom, and of its Ministers; and of Christ's regal acts; and concludes with proving That Jesus Christ is this Mediator, of whom he had been treating.——Some materials he had prepared for a continuation and completion of this most useful work, which Sickness hindered him from accomplishing. But what was found among his papers, upon that subject, came out in the following order.—'The 'Christian Life, Part III. wherein the Great Duties 'of Justice, Mercy, and Mortification are fully ex- 'plained and inforced.' Published in 1697, by J. Gale.——And Part IV, or Vol. V. and last, by Humphrey Zouch, in 1699, 8vo. containing four Discourses; viz. The Worth and Excellency of the Soul: The Divinity nnd Incarnation of our Saviour: The Authority of the Holy Scripture: A Dissuasive from Apostacy."—Mr J. Gale, in his dedication of the IIId Part, informs us, that it was 'the Author's 'design to proceed to a particular explication of the 'several respective Duties which Men are obliged to 'render to God, their Neighbours, and Themselves; 'and for a conclusion of all he proposed a distinct 'Treatise of Ecclesiastical Duties.'——One favorite, and indeed very just, Notion he hath in this work; which is, 'That the main of Heaven consists not so 'much in any outward possession, as in an inward 'state and temper (3).'—So that, 'should not God by 'an immediate Vengeance precipitate wicked Souls 'into hell, yet their own Wickedness, by the mighty 'weight of its own nature, would inevitably press and 'sink them down into that miserable condition. What 'egregious nonsense therefore is it, for wicked men to 'talk of going to heaven? Alas! poor creatures what 'would you do there? There are no wanton Amours 'among those heavenly Lovers; no rivers of Wine 'among their rivers of pleasure to gratifie your un- 'bounded sensuality; no parasites to flatter your lofty 'Pride; no miseries to feed your meagre Envy; no 'mischiefs to tickle your devillish Revenge; nothing 'but chaste and divine, pure and spiritual Enjoyments, 'such as your brutish and devilish Appetites will eter- 'nally loath and nauseate. Wherefore if we mean to 'go to heaven, and to be happy there, we must now 'endeavour to dispose and attemper our minds to it; 'which is no other way to be done, but by leading a 'heavenly Life and Conversation. SHEFFIELD [JOHN], Duke of Buckinghamſhire, a nobleman of diſtinguiſhed abilities both natural and acquired, was born in 1649 (a). After the death of his father, Edmund Earl of Mulgrave, which happened in 1658, the care of educating his ſon, then nine years of age (b), was committed to a governor. In the then diſtracted ſtate of the publick affairs at home, that gentleman travelled into France with his pupil, who was ſo little ſatisfied with his tutor's conduct, as to diſmiſs him in a few years [A]; when the young Earl, finding himſelf deficient in ſeveral branches of learning, took up a noble reſolution to ſupply that defect by his own induſtry [B]. And the ſequel of theſe memoirs will in ſome meaſure ſhew, to what a degree of perfection he finiſhed his deſign. However, intent as he was to compleat that taſk, his ardent thirſt after military glory drew him early into action. In 1666, at the age of ſeventeen (c), he went a volunteer in the firſt Dutch war to ſea [C]. A conduct ſo devoted to the ſervice of his country, procured him the command of one of thoſe independent troops of horſe, which were raiſed the following year, to defend our coaſts from the inſults of that enemy. He remained in his quarters at Dover 'till the concluſion of the peace (d), when thoſe troops were diſbanded. Soon after which, at the next meeting of the Parliament in October, though ſo much under the age prefixed for voting in the Houſe of Peers, he received a writ to ſit there; which being rejected by the Houſe on that account, he acquieſced not unwillingly, the heat of youth then inclining him more to the affairs of love and gallantry, which, by his own confeſſion (e), he engaged in with too much eagerneſs, and even without interruption. However, he did not ſuffer his pleaſures to depreſs or ſink his genius, though he employed his Muſe to heighten their reliſh [D], which in that view was far from being ſtrictly chaſte (f). Theſe merits ſet him in high favour at Court; by which means he was very ſerviceable in procuring the Laureat's place, in 1668, for Mr Dryden [E], whom, as a brother poet, he

[A] His Governor behaved in ſuch a manner as to be diſmiſſed.] We are told, that upon their arrival in France, the Governor, with great earneſtneſs, cautioned his ward againſt kneeling, whenever he met the hoſt in proceſſion, exhorting him to avoid that compliance with the cuſtom of the country, as an act of idolatry; that our young nobleman liſtened with attention to the charge, reſolving to obſerve it. It was not long before they met ſuch a proceſſion, which happening to be in the duſk of the evening at the corner of a ſtreet, to avoid kneeling, he made his utmoſt efforts to ſlip into a ſhop, ſo ſuddenly, as to ſtumble over his governor, who had fallen on his knees, the moment that the Hoſt appeared. It would be idle to look any further for the cauſe of his loſing all his governing authority. However, it is probable the pupil's uncommon ſhare of good ſenſe, would have prevailed ſo far, as to retain him for the advantage of his literary inſtructions, if he had not found him very faultily remiſs in that part of his charge likewiſe (1).

(1) Character of the Duke of Bucks, p. 324. in his Works, Vol. II. edit. 1742, 8vo.

[B] He ſupplied that defect by his own induſtry.] This was a rare inſtance of a manly ſtrength of mind, and noble diſpoſition, at his years, and with the additional lure of an ample fortune. It is ſaid, he kept his tutor only two or three years (2); if ſo, he could not be above twelve years of age, when he took this reſolution. 'Tis true, his rank and fortune gave him the advantage of converſing with the firſt geniuſes of the age, which muſt ſet his own deficiency in literature in full glare before his eyes; and to this his reſolution is aſcribed. He could not but feel himſelf not their inferior in natural wit, and his ſpirit would not ſuffer him to be their inferior in acquired learning. It muſt not ſtill be denied, that he had the further allurement of heightening his pleaſures, by that reſult of his undertaking; and, both from the general diſſolute turn of the wits at that time, and from the uſe our wit made of it afterwards, it is evident that this motive had no ſmall ſhare in determining him to ſhut himſelf up, as we are told he did, for ſeveral hours every day, not only from his acquaintance, but from his pleaſures too.

(2) Id. ibid.

[C] He went a volunteer in the firſt Dutch war to ſea.] He informs us himſelf, that he was particularly incited to take this courſe, by hearing the Earl of Oſſory every where commended for being a volunteer in a hot engagement at ſea (3). Beſides the general ſpur of glory, that Earl was his relation (4), and perhaps the moſt deſerving young nobleman of the age. Fired by this example, he went directly on board that ſhip, which Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle jointly commanded in the fleet againſt the Dutch; and as a ſtorm prevented our volunteer from ſeeing any action, he entertains us with the following ſtory of the Duke of Albemarle's behaviour. After ſetting up the bloody flag, Mr Henry Saville and himſelf being on the quarter-deck, ſpied the old man charging a very little piſtol, and put it into his pocket. It ſeems, he had often ſaid he would anſwer for nothing, but that they ſhould never be carried into Holland. This being remembered, our two volunteers preſently imagined, he had made a reſolution to go down into the powder-room, and blow up the ſhip, in caſe at any time it ſhould be in danger of being taken. In this opinion, they both in a laughing way moſt mutinouſly reſolved to throw him over board, in caſe they ſhould ever catch him going down to the powder-room (5). Our author regretted his own diſappointment in the ſeparation of the fleets, which hindering any engagement, he complains very gallantly, that he loſt ſix weeks time at ſea, at an age when it might be a great deal more pleaſantly ſpent. He calls this the laſt year of the Dutch war (6), becauſe a treaty of peace was agreed upon before the expiration of it, and the two fleets never engaged afterwards, though the Dutch burnt ſome of our beſt ſhips at Chatham, in June 1667, and were driven in July from a ſecond attempt by Sir Edward Sprag (7).

(7) General Hiſtories of England.

[D] He employed his Muſe to heighten the reliſh of his pleaſures.] Several of his poetical pieces were written in this interval, between the firſt and ſecond Dutch wars, as may be gathered from the following quotation from Tully, applied with proper alterations to his Lordſhip by Mr Dryden, in the dedication to his tragedy of Aurengzebe, written in 1676. De iiſdem rebus autem ſæpenumero Brute vereor, ne reprehendar, cum hæc ad te ſcribam, qui tum in Poëſi tum in optimo genere Poëſeos tantum profeceris; nec ut ea cognoſcas quæ tibi notiſſima ſunt ad te mitto, ſed quia te habeo æquiſſimum eorum ſtudiorum quæ mihi tibi communia ſunt, æſtimatorem & judicem.

[E] He was very ſerviceable in procuring the Laureat's place for Mr Dryden.] This Laureat had probably been among thoſe early acquaintance of wits, who had fired the Earl's emulation, beforementioned. We find the former, in 1676, mentioning his friendſhip with the latter, in terms which import it was then of a long ſtanding. 'After which,' continues Dryden, in acknowledging his favour for the Laureat's place, 'I am ſure you will more eaſily permit me to be ſilent 'in the care you have taken of my fortune, which 'you have reſcued, not only from the power of others, 'but from my worſt of enemies, my own modeſty and 'lazineſs (8).' It ought to be remembered, to the Earl's honour, that he kept his friendſhip to the laſt; and the words which the Laureat here puts into the mouth of King Charles, as juſtly ſpoken of the Earl, he had taken into his particular friendſhip. In this interval, too nice a ſenſibility in the point of honour, engaged him in a very ſingular quarrel with Wilmot the witty Earl of Rocheſter [F]. At the breaking out of the ſecond Dutch war, in 1672, he went again to ſea, a volunteer under the Duke of York [G], and behaved ſo gallantly [H], at the famous battle of Solebay, that immediately upon his return to London, the King gave him the command of the Royal Katharine [I], the beſt ſecond rate ſhip then in the Navy, a favour the praiſe of which, he declares, there needed no inſpiration to foreſee how well his Lordſhip would deſerve, may be juſtly put into his Lordſhip's mouth with regard to the Laureat himſelf; for whom he teſtified his entire reſpect, by erecting a handſome monument in Weſtminſter-abbey, at his own expence, in memory of this friend, not long before his own death.

[F] He had a quarrel with Wilmot Earl of Rocheſter.] Being informed that the Earl of Rocheſter had ſaid ſomething maliciouſly of him, he immediately ſent a mettled friend of his, Colonel Aſton, with a challenge. Wilmot denied the words; and though our challenger was ſoon convinced his ſuſpicion was falſe, yet he fooliſhly thought the meer report obliged him to go on with the quarrel. Since it could not be avoided, Wilmot choſe to fight on horſeback, and accordingly met our heroe next morning at the place appointed; but inſtead of one Mr Porter, whom he aſſured Aſton he would make his ſecond, he brought an errant life-guard-man, whom no body knew. Mr Aſton taking exception to this, eſpecially on account of his being ſo much better mounted than they, they all agreed to fight on foot. 'But, continues our 'author, as Lord Rocheſter and I were riding into the 'next field, in order to it, he told me, that he had at 'firſt choſen to fight on horſeback, becauſe he was ſo 'weak with a certain diſtemper, that he found himſelf 'unfit to fight at all, much leſs on foot.' At this, which was deemed a plain confeſſing himſelf a coward, his antagoniſt, whoſe anger was appeaſed by the diſcovery of the falſeneſs of the charge which had kindled it, puſhed him upon the conſideration of the neceſſity there would be, in caſe they ſhould not fight, of clearing his own character, by telling the truth of the matter. Wilmot ſubmitted to the condition, hoping his challenger would not deſire the advantage of having to do with any man in ſo weak a condition. 'I re-'plied, continues our author, that by ſuch an argu-'ment he had ſufficiently tied my hands, upon con-'dition I might call our ſeconds to be witneſs of the 'whole buſineſs; which he conſented to, and ſo we 'parted.' Mr Aſton, on their return to London, wrote down every word and circumſtance of the whole that had paſſed, and diſperſed it abroad; which being never in the leaſt either contradicted or reſented by Lord Rocheſter, entirely ruined his reputation as to courage *. So ſays our author; and the ſeveral challenges which were ſent to that Lord afterwards, together with his behaviour on thoſe occaſions, are a full proof of the truth of the fact in general. However, it cannot eſcape the reader's notice, that the Earl of Mulgrave condemns himſelf, at leaſt equally with his antagoniſt, in this affair in particular (9).

* Our author obſerves, he had a very good reputation for courage before.

(9) Memoirs, p. 8, 9, 10.

[G] A volunteer under the Duke of York.] The Earl never omitted an opportunity of ſhewing his regard to the Duke of York, and takes particular ſatisfaction in mentioning that Duke's kindneſs to him; yet he confeſſes, he went not now with half ſo good a will as before, his heart being engaged violently at this time, ſo that he could never forget the tenderneſs of the parting from his love (10). This laſt expreſſion ſhews it was at this time that he wrote his Letter from Sea †, which concludes thus:

(10) Ibid. p. 12.

† In the firſt volume of his Works.

Remember all thoſe vows between us paſt,
When I from all I value parted laſt;
May you alike with kind impatience burn,
And ſomething miſs 'till I with joy return.
And ſoon may pitying heaven that bleſſing give,
As in the hopes of that alone I live.

After reading theſe lines, we ſhall eaſily believe him, when he tells us, he made all the haſte imaginable to return to London, for reaſons not hard to gueſs (11).

(11) Ibid. p. 17.

[H] He behaved gallantly.] It is entertaining enough to obſerve the ſeveral paſſages in his memoirs, where this behaviour is inſinuated. Firſt, he acquaints us with his accepting Lord Oſſory's invitation to be aboard his ſhip, and afterwards, ſays he, 'I found I 'could not have been any where elſe ſo well, on ſeve-'ral accounts, ſince no man ever did more bravely 'than he on all occaſions (12).' Thus animated by the example of both a kinſman and a friend, he ſuggeſts the effect it had, as follows. After taking notice, that, upon retiring from the fight, the whole French ſquadron failed cloſe by the Lord Oſſory's ſhip, 'I well remember, ſays he, there did not appear ſo 'many ſhot in them all, as in his Lordſhip's ſingle 'ſhip, whoſe condition therefore was judged too bad 'to keep the ſea any longer (13).' Here he is only included among the ſhip's company, but what follows relates to his own particular ſhare of the work. 'I 'found then by experience how much there is of cu-'ſtom in the matter of courage, which makes old 'troops ſo formidable; for in the morning, when the 'enemy's ſhot came on board of us, I thought it 'impoſſible to eſcape, without loſing a limb at leaſt, 'and was accordingly pretty uneaſy; but about the 'afternoon, when the broad-ſides came only one way, 'though without interruption, I began to grow a little 'leſs ſenſible of the danger, which yet I was very glad 'to ſee ended at night. By that time I was very ſuf-'ficiently tired, but had much ado to ſleep, by reaſon 'of the noiſe ſtill ſounding in my ears, which remained 'ſo for ſome hours, juſt as if the ſhooting had ſtill 'continued.' This laſt period is very expreſs, but yet in ſuch terms, as put not the exacteſt modeſty to the bluſh. The image of the noiſe ſtill ſounding in his ears, unavoidably calls to our minds the contraſt to it, in the much admired lines of the eighth book of Milton's Paradiſe Loſt.

We ſhall here take notice of a miſtake in Milton's Life prefixed to his proſe works, where the author tells us, that the Duke of Bucks, in his Eſſay on Poetry, prefers both Taſſo and Spenſer to Milton (14). The lines referred to are in the concluſion of that Eſſay, where, in deſcribing the arduous taſk of writing an heroic poem, he obſerves, the Muſe who makes ſuch an attempt,

Where this laſt is diſtinguiſhly preferred to both the former, contrary to what the abovementioned author remarks.

[I] He had the command of the Royal Katharine.] The Earl we find was not wanting to himſelf in the point of his promotion in the Navy. On the contrary, he tells us, 'That he had made a requeſt to that purpoſe, before the engagement at Solebay, to the Duke of York, and that he thought it a little hard to be denied. His requeſt was, that if in the next engagement, his Highneſs perceived any ſhip to fail of doing it's duty, by reaſon of the Captain's being killed, which was but too uſual, he would then ſend the Earl an order to go on board, and command her immediately; whereby, continues he, inſtead of being an inſignificant Captain-volunteer, I might have an opportunity of doing the fleet ſome ſervice, and gaining ſome honour.' However, he does not forget to turn this denial into a theme of ſounding the Duke of York's praiſes, obſerving, that though the Duke knew the fact, he had mentioned, well, and allowed the reaſon of his requeſt, as the only way of making the volunteers uſeful, yet he counted it too great an alteration of the ſettled orders, which gave the Lieutenant, in ſuch a caſe, that command his Captain before had, though ſeldom found to make a good uſe of it (15). He informs us afterwards, 'That during the engagement of Solebay, the Royal Katharine was once taken by the Dutch, favour which was in the higheſt degree acceptable to him [K]. But, notwithſtanding that, we find him, though at ſea, the enſuing year, yet acting in the poſt, and with the commiſſion, of a Colonel, having himſelf raiſed a regiment of foot to ſerve in the land forces, ſent (with the fleet) under the command of Monſieur de Schomberg, with whom he now lived in a good degree of familiarity and friendſhip (g). Theſe forces being ſet on ſhore in the ſummer, by the command of the Admiral, Prince Rupert [L]; while they lay encamped there, our Colonel, to the great mortification of [Schomberg] his General, was favoured by his Majeſty with the promiſe of a blue ribband, and, upon his arrival at Court, was appointed Colonel of the old Holland regiment, joined to that of his own raiſing. By this means, he continued in commiſſion after the peace, which was concluded before the expiration of the year (h), when all the other new Colonels were diſbanded (i). Soon after his inſtalment into the order of the Garter, May the 29th, 1674, he was made Gentleman of the Bedchamber to his Majeſty; but being ſtill deſirous to exerciſe and improve his military character, notwithſtanding nature had formed him particularly for ſhining in a Court, he went into the French ſervice, having obtained leave of King Charles to make a campaign under the celebrated Marſhal de Turenne (k). About this time, he had ſome expectations of having the firſt regiment of foot-guards; he depended upon the joint intereſt of the two Dukes of York and Monmouth [M], but was Dutch, who had ſent her Captain and moſt of her men on board other ſhips, a few only remaining there, whom they ſtowed under the hatches, with a guard over them: but the boatſwain happening to be among theſe, with his whiſtle encouraged the reſt to knock down all the centinels firſt, and then to fall on the Dutch above deck, by which briſk action they redeemed that conſiderable ſhip. The reader would ſcarce gueſs what ſort of man he really was. His name was Small, whom, continues his Lordſhip, I had an opportunity of knowing well afterwards, when I had the command of the ſhip. He was a nonconformiſt, always ſober, meek, and quiet, even too mild for that buſtling ſort of employment, and very often gave me an image of thoſe enthuſiaſtic people, who did ſuch brave things in our late civil war. For he ſeemed rather a ſhepherd than a ſoldier, and was a kind of heroe in the ſhape of a ſaint (16).'

(16) Ibid. p. 14, 15.

[K] Was very acceptable to him.] The writer of his character tells us he owed this ſtep to the Duke of York (17). The Earl himſelf takes no notice of that favour, (which ſure he would have ſcarce omitted if it were ſo) but attributes it wholly to my Lord Oſſory, whoſe kind and partial letters had arrived at Court before him, when the King making ſome particular compliments, offered him his choice of commanding either the Henry or the Royal Katharine, he choſe the latter, and declares he was extremely pleaſed with the command of a royal ſhip, better in all reſpects than my Lord Oſſory's, and, continues he, of a rate above what I could have expected; for even he who was ſo much more conſiderable on all accounts, had only a third rate ſhip granted him at firſt; whereas the Katharine was then the beſt of all the ſecond rates (18).

[L] By order of Prince Rupert] The whole forces both ſea and land were commanded in chief by that Prince with the title of Generaliſſimo. We have the following account of the quarrel betwixt the land and ſea commanders, which occaſioned this order of the latter, whereby the land forces lay idle at Yarmouth, without doing any thing the whole ſummer. It ſeems Monſieur Schomberg, by the advice of our volunteer, and the conſent of the Captain of the ſhip where he was, had hung up in the ſhrouds one of the colours of our Colonel's regiment, as a ſignal for the land officers to know the ſhip where their General was, chuſing this as more proper for him than any of thoſe which belonged to the ſea. But it had not been ſet up half an hour, when ſitting with the Colonel on the quarter-deck, a bullet was heard whizzing over their heads, which was preſently followed by another. Upon this they began to think cannon bullets that came ſo near a little worth the minding and were ſurprized to perceive they came from the Admiral. All agreeing this was done to expreſs his diſlike of the ſignal, Clement, Captain of the ſhip, was diſpatched to explain the reaſon of it. The prince had ſent his Lieutenant Whitley with his poſitive command to pull down the flag. But he arriving on board the Greyhound juſt after Captain Clement had left it, Whitley was deſired to return with this anſwer, that if his Highneſs continued in the ſame mind, after hearing the occaſion from Clement, the flag ſhould be taken down immediately. The Prince ſeeing Whitley's boat come from the Greyhound, and the flag not taken down, and Captain Clement juſt arrived on board him, in great anger ordered him to be clapt into the bilboes, without ſo much as hearing either him or his meſſage, and commanded the gunner to ſink the Greyhound immediately, if the flag was not taken down. In this extremity, the volunteers of quality * on board the Prince having aſked leave, were connived at by him in going to the Greyhound, where they found it eaſy to perſuade them to pull down their flag, rather than be ſunk; but all together were not able to pacify the General, who interpreted all this proceeding to come from an old pique in Prince Rupert, who he ſaid was otherwiſe too well bred to uſe an old acquaintance and a foreigner in ſuch a brutal manner, as he called it (19).

* Among theſe volunteers was the Earl of Carliſle, a Privy-Counſellor, and a great friend of the Prince's.

(19) Memoirs of Charles II. p. 25 to 28. in the ſecond vol. of our author's Works, edit. 1740.

[M] Joint intereſt of the Dukes of York and Monmouth.] The ſcheme was, to perſuade the King to buy Ruſſel the Colonel out of it, for this purpoſe, having before prevailed with Lord Craven, who commanded the ſecond regiment to let our Earl come over his head. But all was quaſhed by the Earl's unluckily diſcovering, in the interim, ſome amour of the Duke of Monmouth, who by way of revenge privately obtained a promiſe of the King to have that command himſelf, and that his own ſhould be given to the Earl of Oſſory. Accordingly upon the Duke of York's application for the Earl of Mulgrave to his Majeſty, he told his brother he had already promiſed it to the Duke of Monmouth. Our author having his pretenſions thus blown up by the fly management of that Duke, his pretended friend, ſcrupled not to return him the like good office by undermining him with the Duke of York; to whom he repreſented, that as the Duke of Monmouth's own command of the horſe life-guards was better than Colonel Ruſſel's regiment of foot both for honour and profit, he would hardly change it thus without ſome ill deſign, to which twenty-four companies of foot might be more uſeful than a ſingle troop of horſe; that diſappointing of the Earl of Mulgrave was not his only aim, ſince he might have had that ſatisfaction entirely by getting the Earl of Oſſory into that regiment. In fine, when no other method would do to ſatisfy his revenge in keeping the Duke of Monmouth out of this regiment, the Duke of York by his advice perſuaded Colonel Ruſſel not to ſell †.

† As Ruſſel was covetous, this was effected probably by the charm of money.

Our author makes it a great merit in him to have given occaſion to the animoſity between theſe two Princes, and infuſing a jealouſy of his nephew aſpiring to the crown into the Duke of York, which he thinks probable might be the ground of his aiming to get this regiment of guards, which, ſays he, conſiſting of 2400 men was a great part of our little army, and was always kept together and quartered in London, when the other few regiments were ſeparated into all the garriſons of England. This he thinks appeared ſufficiently at the death of King Charles, when it had not been impoſſible for the Duke of Monmouth to ſucceed him, if he had then flouriſhed in court at the head of ſo conſiderable a regiment, which by our author's management he never got poſſeſſion of, being in diſfavour at the time of the Popiſh plot, when Ruſſel renewed his deſire to ſell, the King then giving that command to his other natural ſon the Duke of Grafton (20). How far, and in what manner, the Earl of Mulgrave carried was disappointed by the latter; upon whose disgrace, however, in 1679, the Earl was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of the county of York, and Governor of Hull, in his room (l). The same year, he wrote his piece, intituled, The Character of a Tory [N]. And the next year, he gave a signal proof of his loyalty, in commanding the forces (m) ordered for the relief of Tangier; having voluntarily offered his service for that command, his honour would not suffer him to recede, notwithstanding he apprehended a design against his life [O], by the appointment of a ship to convey him, which the Captain often declared to be in a condition not able to endure the voyage. But he survived the danger [P], and returning carried his resentment to his Majesty on this disappointment, is represented in the dedication of Aurengzebe, where Mr Dryden takes notice of 'his Lordship's great and manly contempt of popular applause, and his retired virtue then shining only to a few, with whom, continues he, you live so easily and freely, that you make it evident you have a soul which is capable of all the tenderness of friendship, and that you only retire from those who are not capable of returning it. —— From this constancy to your friends, I might reasonably assume, that your resentments would be as strong and lasting, if they were not restrained by a nobler principle of good-nature and generosity; for certainly it is the same composition of mind, the same resolution and courage, which makes the greatest friendships and the greatest enmities *.'

* Mr Dryden is generally said to have lent a helping hand in this piece.

It was during this little ill humour that his Essay on Satire was written, in which he has inserted the following remarkable lines.

Nor should the royal mistresses be nam'd,
Too ugly or too easy to be blam'd,
With whom each rhyming fool keeps such a pother,
They are as common that way as the other.
While sauntring Charles betwixt so mean a brace,
Meets with dissembling still in either place,
Affected humour or a painted face.
In loyal libels we have often told him,
How one has justled him, the other sold him.
How that affects to laugh, and this to weep,
But who so long can rail as he can keep?
Was ever Prince by two at once misled,
Foolish and false, ill-natur'd and ill bred.

[N] The character of a Tory.] The whole title is, The character of a Tory, in answer to that of a Trimmer, written at the same time, but never printed. This piece presents us with a full and distinct view of his Lordship's state-principles. We see here how little credit he gave to the Popish-plot, which he expressly calls a pretended one. He appears in defence of a standing-army, and even of the King's dispensing power; yet he is not so absurd as to vindicate an absolute passive obedience, or a slavish non-resistance; but asserts the legality of resisting, when the public welfare risques less in attempting the change, than it suffers from the abuse of the sovereign power. Upon the whole I suppose it will not be denied, that if he had the worst side of the argument, yet he supports it with a much genteeler spirit than his adversary can pretend to, whose affected quaintness and incessantly flashing witty conceits are turned against himself, being first set to a much finer and more delicate edge. We shall give one instance. 'Another fallacy, says he, is endeavoured to 'be put upon us, by shewing the great limitation a 'King lies under, and the extraordinary lessening of 'his authority, when once he engages for one part of 'his people towards the destruction of another, which 'our Trimmer calls sinking from a great monarch into 'the head of a faction, and therefore he is extremely 'troubled for such a diminution of his prince's power. 'Now I confess this appears to me, just as if a highway-'man overtaken by a hue and cry should stand at bay, 'and thus pretend to wheedle the pursuing constable. 'What! will you reverend magistrates (for it is time 'to give good words), who are intrusted by the nation 'with the public peace and tranquillity, and therefore 'are not only strengthened with ample power, but a-'dorned with staves of authority. What? will you 'be thus partial to these witnesses, to these shabby 'fellows who pretend to be robbed, as to follow us 'who never saw your faces before? This is making 'yourself the head of a pursuing rabble, who one day 'perhaps may be indited of a riot for so abusing us. '—— I need not apply the comparison because the 'thing speaks itself.' What follows not only gives us the best idea, and conveyed in the most easy and engaging image, not only of this, but in general of all party disputes whatever, in which 'tis manifest each man means chiefly if not solely himself, and the furthering of his own interest. 'Whereas, con-'tinues he, our Trimmer * blames people for so mono-'polizing a Prince's favour, that a poor Trimmer can 'get none of it, I confess 'tis true, but methinks not 'very strange. I allow his simile to hold good, that 'not only these gentlemen [the ministry] but any o-'ther men in the world, even Trimmers themselves, 'would engross the sunshine with the hazard of being 'burnt, in case there were not enough of it for every 'body. And for my part, though 'tis a great fault 'in mankind, I cannot but charitably forgive it, be-'cause I am one of that race myself, and bad is the 'best of us, Whig, Tory, and Trimmer (21).'

* Savile, afterwards Marquis, then Earl, of Halifax, was the author of The Trimmer, and the greatest tickler against the Exclusion-bill. See some account of him in Sherburne's article, remark [D].

(21) Character of a Tory, p. 65 to 67.

[O] He apprehended a design against his life.] We are told, that some of the Earl's enemies at court took an opportunity to put King Charles out of humour, by malicious stories of him, relating to some ladies in whom his Majesty was not unconcern'd. That by this and other contrivances all the good ships were otherwise employed, and that when his Lordship represented the unsafe condition of the ship appointed for him, both the Admiralty and the King assured him the ship was safe enough, and that no other could be got ready time enough for his expedition; so that the point being reduced to a struggle between his honour and his life, he preferred the former, and resolved, contrary to the advice of his friends, to venture his life; but at the same time advised several volunteers of distinction to wave the voyage, their honour not being equally concerned. That two days after they set sail, the ship leaked in so many places, that notwithstanding the carpenters on board, they owed their safety to the pumps all the remainder of the voyage, which by the advantage of very fine weather they finished in three weeks. That arriving at Tangier, they met Admiral Herbert, afterwards Earl of Torrington, who lifted his hands and eyes in amazement of their having performed such a voyage in a ship which he had sent home as unfit for service (22). While he was at sea, we find he wrote a poem called the The Vision, where though the tender passion is touch'd with his usual delicacy, yet 'tis cast in such a gloomy form as is not common to his Lordship's muse, and therefore may well be thought to be inspired by the sensibility of his present danger, very different from that to the same lady from sea already mentioned. The following lines, with which this piece concludes, are an exact specimen of the temper of the whole, and will both explain and evince the truth of our remark.

[P] He returned with triumph.] The Earl it seems obtained this success cheap enough, for the Moors retired at the first approach of the English army. However, as the enemy had been long very troublesome, and had occasioned great sums to be expended in fortifying the place (24), which was part of Queen Katharine's portion; our general examined the works, attended with proper officers and engineers, who all agreed the place could not be put into a good condition of defence without a vast charge, especially considering how much the Moors had been improved in cannon of late.

returning from the expedition, crowned with ſucceſs, and his Majeſty, not long after, returned likewiſe to his uſual good-nature. This melting away all the Earl's reſentment [Q] and chagrin, immediately revived that hearty reſpect which had continually glowed in the breaſt of this ſubject, who remained ever after in high favour with that Prince (n), 'till by his death the Crown devolved upon the head of his brother. By this change, what had before been the Earl of Mulgrave's dutiful allegiance, became now his ardent affection. He had never known King Charles any other than his ſovereign, a circumſtance that naturally creates ſomewhat of a diſtant awe to the moſt gracious princes; but he had long before lived in a ſtate of familiar friendſhip [R] with the Duke of York, which therefore as naturally grew into the moſt affectionate attachment to King James the Second; upon whoſe acceſſion to the throne, he was immediately ſworn of the Privy-Council, and the 20th of October following, was appointed Lord-Chamberlain of the Houſhold. His ſincere zeal for his maſter carried him even ſo far, as to take a ſeat in the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion [S]. It was this perſonal regard likewiſe, that urged him to oppoſe all ſuch imprudent

[Q] All the Earl's reſentment.] We have a remarkable inſtance to what a height he carried it during the paſſage to Tangier. Among the volunteers who had a deſign of accompanying him, ſome deſiſted by his perſuaſion, but others having ſpoken their intention to go with him, thought their honour concerned in keeping their word. Among theſe was the Earl of Plymouth, a natural ſon of King Charles (26), who 'tis ſaid likewiſe entered heartily into his General's cauſe. They had been a fortnight at ſea, when one of the company obſerving his Majeſty's health had never once been propoſed at the General's table, took the liberty of hinting it to him as an omiſſion occaſioned through forgetfulneſs, eſpecially conſidering a ſon of his Majeſty ſat there every day. The General anſwered he knew it very well, but muſt firſt get out of his rotten ſhip, before he could make that health go merrily round (27).

[R] He had lived in great familiarity with the Duke of York.] Both his memoirs and his account of the Revolution are ſo full of expreſſions of that kind, that one is apt even to think that the pleaſure of that part was the principal motive to the writing of them. But there is one paſſage more conſpicuous than the reſt, which is related by him as follows. In ſpeaking of the ſeveral cauſes which concurred with the Duke of Monmouth's ambition, he ſays, 'There was yet one 'thing more that much contributed to that young 'man's advancement, I mean the great friendſhip 'which the Duke of York had openly profeſſed to his 'wife, a Lady of wit and reputation, who had both 'the ambition of making her huſband conſiderable, 'and the addreſs to ſucceed in it by uſing her intereſt 'in ſo friendly an uncle, whoſe deſign I believe was 'only to convert her. Whether this familiarity of 'theirs was contrived or only connived at by the 'Duke of Monmouth himſelf, is hard to determine. 'But I well remember that after theſe princes had be'come declared enemies, the Duke of York told me 'with ſome emotion, as conceiving it a new mark of 'his nephew's inſolence, that he had forbidden his 'wife to receive any more viſits from him. To which 'I could not forbear frankly replying, That I, who 'was not uſed to excuſe him, yet could not hold from 'doing it in that caſe, wiſhing his Highneſs might 'have no juſter cauſe to complain of him (28).' We have already obſerved, that our author makes himſelf the cauſe of the breach between theſe two Dukes, which he tells us was of the higheſt importance to King James's ſafe ſucceſſion to the crown; this breach taking it's riſe from an intrigue of our Earl with one of the Duke of Monmouth's miſtreſſes (29).

[S] A ſeat in the Eccleſiaſtical commiſſion.] As this was one of the illegal ſteps taken by his maſter, he was in ſome danger of ſmarting for it after the Revolution; in which juncture he had the good fortune to find a friend, where perhaps he leaſt expected it, in Dr Tillotſon, then Dean of Canterbury, who moſt generouſly interceding in his behalf, procured his pardon. In return for ſo noble an act of goodneſs, he thought himſelf obliged to write and print the following letter to that Dean.

'Sir,

'Nothing in this world is or ought to be ſo dear to 'to any man of honour as his reputation, and conſe'quently the defence of it is the greateſt obligation 'that one man can lay upon another. There are alſo 'ſome circumſtances that render this obligation more 'acceptable and valuable, as when it is conferred 'generouſly, without any ſelf-intereſt, or the leaſt deſire 'or invitation from the perſon ſo defended. All this 'happens to be my caſe at this time, and therefore I 'hope you will not be ſurprized to find, I am not the 'moſt ungrateful and inſenſible man living; which 'certainly I ſhould be, if I did not acknowledge all 'your induſtrious concern for me about the buſineſs of 'the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, which now makes ſo 'much noiſe in the world. You have, as I am told, 'ſo cordially pleaded my cauſe, that it is almoſt be'come your own. And therefore unwilling as I am 'to ſpeak of myſelf, eſpecially in a buſineſs which I 'cannot wholly excuſe; yet I think myſelf now a 'little obliged to ſhew, that my part in this matter, 'though imprudent enough, yet is not altogether un'worthy of ſo juſt, and ſo conſiderable an advocate.

'The leſs a man ſays for himſelf the better, and it 'is ſo well known already, with what great care I was 'ſometimes excluded from knowing the moſt impor'tant deſigns of the Court, that I need not juſtify 'myſelf or trouble you as to thoſe matters, only I ap'peal to the unqueſtionable teſtimony of the Spaniſh 'Ambaſſador, if I did not zealouſly and conſtantly 'take all occaſions to oppoſe the French intereſt, be'cauſe I knew it directly oppoſite both to the King's 'and kingdom's good, which are indeed things inſe'parable, and ought to be ſo accounted, as a funda'mental maxim in all councils of princes.

'This, I hope, will prepare the way a little for 'what I have to ſay concerning my being one of the 'Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners, of which error I am 'now as ſenſible as I was at firſt ignorant, being ſo 'unhappily converſant in the midſt of a perpetual 'court flattery, as never to have heard the leaſt word 'of any illegality in that Commiſſion, before I was 'unfortunately engaged in it

'For though my Lord of Canterbury had very pru'dently refuſed to be of it, yet it was told us at court, 'by the King himſelf, that his refuſal proceeded only 'from his unwillingneſs to act at that time, and not 'from any illegality he ſuſpected in the Commiſſion, hav'ing excuſed himſelf from it in the moſt reſpectful way, 'only upon the account of his age, and the infirmities 'he lay under. Being thus ignorant of the laws, and 'in ſuch a ſtation at Court and Council, I need not de'ſire a man of your judgment and candour, to con'ſider the hardneſs of my caſe, when I was com'manded to ſerve in a commiſſion with a Lord Chan'cellor, a Lord Chief Juſtice, and two Biſhops, who 'had all of them acted ſome time already, without 'ſhewing the leaſt diffidence of their power, or any 'heſitation in the execution of it. And perhaps a 'man of more diſcretion than I can pretend to, might 'have been eaſily perſuaded to act in ſuch a conjunc'tion, and to think he might do it ſafely, both in law 'and conſcience; but I need not ſay much to ſhew 'my deſire of avoiding, if poſſible, a troubleſome 'commiſſion, that had not the leaſt temptation of 'honour or profit to recommend it, and in which 'therefore, you know, I continued on no account in the imprudent ſteps, which it was foreſeen muſt unavoidably lead to the ruin of that unfortunate Prince (o) [T]; and the ſame perſonal regard kept him at a great diſtance, from having any ſhare in thoſe counſels, where the meaſures were concerted for bringing about the Revolution [U]. In eſtabliſhing the new ſettlement of the Crown, he yielded to the exigency

(o) See his letter to Dr Tillotſon, in the preceding remark [S]. He was one of the twenty-ſeven Peers, ſelected from the reſt by Chancellor Jefferies, then Lord High-Steward, to try the Lord Delamere for high-treaſon, on January 14, 1685, when that Lord was unanimouſly acquitted. Peerage, Vol. II. p. 518. edit. 1741.

'world, but to ſerve both the King and Clergy 'with the little ability I had, in moderating thoſe 'counſels, which we thought might grow higher, if 'I left my place to be filled by thoſe who greedily 'waited for them, in order to their fooliſh deſigns.

'And ſince I have been forced to mention my good 'will at leaſt, if not my ſervice, to ſuch learned men 'of the Clergy who I thought deſerved it, it may be 'allowed me to give this one inſtance of it, that al'though in preferring men to all other places of the 'houſehold, I ever uſed to aſk permiſſion firſt, (and 'accordingly was often refuſed for the ſake of Roman 'Catholics and others, who were recommended by 'perſons more in favour than myſelf) yet I was ſo 'careful of keeping that conſiderable part of the fa'mily unmixed with mean or unworthy chaplains, '(whom others I feared would have impoſed on his 'Majeſty againſt his intention) that I conſtantly filled 'up thoſe places, without giving him the leaſt notice 'or trouble about it, and ſupplied them with the ableſt 'approved Divines, I could poſſibly find, moſt com'monly recommended to me by thoſe Biſhops who 'were not of the Court. This I conceived to be the 'moſt proper courſe in a matter concerning Clergymen 'with a King of a different perſuaſion from theirs, 'and I intended it for his real ſervice, believing it 'had been better for that unhappy Prince, as well as 'the kingdom, if the greater Eccleſiaſtical dignities 'had been diſpoſed of by others with as much caution.

'And thus, Sir, I have endeavoured to confirm you 'in your favourable opinion of me, which muſt be 'acknowledged by every body to be an approbation 'of ſuch weight, that as I hope it may be an example 'of authority to many, ſo it is ſufficient of itſelf to 'ballance the cenſoriouſneſs of others.

'I am,

'Sir,

'Your obliged humble Servant,

'MULGRAVE (30).'

(30) The Duke's Works, Vol. II. p. 123 to 128.

[T] He oppoſed the meaſures that led to the ruin of that Prince.] He declares that diſlike of the King's meaſures in following the advice of the Roman Catholics, though at the ſame time to ſhew his reluctance to the diſlike, he ſays it ſpread like an infection. 'This, ſays he, reached ſome of his Majeſty's mini'ſters themſelves. The Earls of Mulgrave and Mid'dleton never the leaſt tainted with being either falſe 'or factious. Yet the firſt of them not only in execu'tion of his office [Lord Chamberlain] aſſiſted openly 'all the Proteſtant Clergy, but abſented himſelf from 'all the councils, and both of them in their own juſti'fication took all occaſions of deriding the ill advice of 'the Papiſts (31).'

(31) Account of the Revolution, Vol. II. p. 92.

[U] At a great diſtance from having any ſhare in the Revolution.] Though his Lordſhip was vexed at the diminution of his ſalary, and utterly excluded from all power and favour by a few, and thoſe the fooliſheſt of the Roman party; yet he was far from thinking theſe, or any other reaſons, ſufficient to excuſe a deſertion of his Majeſty, of which he expreſſes the warmeſt abhorrence, and particularly that of his daughters; 'and becauſe, ſays he, this extraordinary deſer'tion of one daughter, as well as the other's ſitting on the father's throne afterwards, muſt needs ſeem wonderful in two ſuch Princeſſes, both of ſtrict devotion, and many great virtues, poſterity will be glad, perhaps, to have ſome further account of ſuch unprecedented proceedings, in perſons of ſo unblameable and of ſo illuſtrious a character. 'Tis very remarkable, that this Prince was ſo thoroughly unfortunate, as to be undone by his own children, and the more by their being bred up moſt carefully and religiouſly, and their being endued with all virtuous inclinations. Theſe being firſt deceived by the indefatigable induſtry of ſome people, drew in a great part of the nation to be deceived, by the goodneſs of their diſpoſition, and the nearneſs of their relation to the perſon accuſed: for who could ſuſpect ſuch daughters of wronging their father. It was infuſed into them ſeverally, by the propereſt inſtruments that could be found, that their father was not only reſolved to perſecute the Proteſtant religion, but would ſtick at nothing in order to it; and therefore at once to prevent his eldeſt daughter's ſucceeding him, and to ſecure the throne after him to one of his own religion, he had contrived a ſuppoſititious ſon, who was to ſucceed, and ſettle that which his ſuppoſed father might not live long enough to fix ſufficiently. And though the juſtice of his mind, and the tenderneſs of his nature were enough to diſperſe all ſuch apprehenſions, yet the zeal of the Popiſh religion was brought in to overballance all other conſiderations. All this was joined with the Prince of Orange's conjugal impoſitions on the moſt complying wife in the world, who was at laſt drawn into the diſmal neceſſity of giving up either her huſband, or a father reſolved and ready (as ſhe thought) to diſinherit her. So that two worthy religious ladies, even becauſe they were ſo, conſented to dethrone a moſt indulgent father, and to ſucceed him boldly in their ſeveral turns, before an innocent brother then a child.

Tantum religio, &c.'

Our author excuſes, after this, King James's general diſtruſt of every body, intimates his own diſſatisfaction, and even endeavoured afterwards to hinder him from going away. 'Juſt as he was ſtepping into bed, continues the Earl, the night before his going away, the Earl of Mulgrave happened to come into the bed-chamber, which being at ſo late an hour, might poſſibly give the King ſome apprehenſions of the world's ſuſpecting his deſign, with which he was reſolved not to truſt him, nor any other Proteſtant whatſoever, he therefore ſtopt ſhort, and turned about to whiſper him in the ear, that his commiſſioners [the Earl of Halifax, &c.] newly ſent him a very hopeful account of ſome good accommodation with the Prince of Orange; to which that Lord only replied with a queſtion, aſking if the Prince's army halted, or approached nearer London. The King owned they ſtill marched on, at which the other ſhook his head and ſaid no more, only made him a low bow with a dejected countenance, humbly to make him underſtand, that he gave no credit to what the King's hard circumſtances at that time obliged him to diſſemble.' After the King's departure from London, when he was inſulted and ſeized by the populace at Feverſham in Kent, and had ſent a poor country fellow with a letter to inform the Council of it, in order to procure his reſcue, which was likely to come too late; the meſſenger having waited long at the council door, without any body's being willing to take notice of him; the Earl of Mulgrave happening to be privately advertiſed of it: The ſad account moved him with great compaſſion, inſomuch that no cautions of offending the prevailing party, were able to reſtrain him from ſhewing a little indignation at ſo mean a proceeding in the Council. Upon this their new Preſident, the Marquis of Halifax, haſtily adjourned it in order to prevent him. But my Lord Mulgrave earneſtly conjured them all to ſit down again preſently, that he might acquaint them with a matter which admitted of no delay, and which he ſaid was of the higheſt importance imaginable. Accordingly the Lords did ſo, when he repreſented to them what barbarity it would be in ſuch an aſſembly to connive at the rabble's tearing in pieces any private gentleman, much more a great Prince, who with all his Popery, he aſſerted, was ſtill their Sovereign. The meſſenger being called in, after giving them a moving account of the King's diſtreſs, delivered the letter (*). Whereupon the Council were prevailed with to ſend

(*) It had no ſuperſcription, and was to this effect. To acquaint the reader of it, that he had been diſcovered in his retreat by ſome fiſhermen of Kent, and ſecured at firſt there by the gentry, who were yet afterward forced to reſign him into the hands of an inſolent rabble.

exigency of the occaſion [W], being fully perſwaded, that the welfare of his country required ſuch a conduct. In this view it was, that in the Convention Parliament, he both ſpoke and voted for the conjunctive ſovereignty [X]. However, by that ſtep he greatly obliged the Prince of Orange [Y], who had it much at heart to obtain this advantage over the Princeſs. The Earl had no employ under the new government for ſome years. May the 10th, 1694, he was created Marquis of Normanby in the county of Lincoln (p). But neither this teſtimony of King William's kindneſs, nor even a perſonal application, with very advantageous offers from his Majeſty [Z], could prevail upon him to deſiſt from exerting his utmoſt vigour, to procure and carry through both the Treaſon-bill, and that for eſtabliſhing triennial Parliaments. He alſo oppoſed, with great zeal, the 200 of the Life-guards, under their Captain, the Earl of Feverſham, firſt to reſcue the King from all danger of the common people, and afterwards to attend him towards the ſea ſide, if he continued his reſolution of retiring, which they thought it more decent to connive at than to detain him here by force. Upon the King's return to London, though he blamed all the Council, and among them the Earl of Mulgrave, for aſſuming what he called an illegal power of acting as they did. Yet he does not forget to mention two things very favourable to the King's private character. When the ſtout Earl of Craven, ſays he, reſolved to be cut in pieces rather than reſign his poſt at Whitehall to the Prince of Orange's guards; the King prevented that unneceſſary bloodſhed with a great deal of care and kindneſs: And amidſt all that juſt apprehenſion of violence to his perſon, at the ſudden entrance into his chamber, of the three Lords, [Halifax, Shrewſbury, and Delamere] who ordered him from the Prince of Orange to retire, which he choſe to do to Rocheſter; he diſguiſed it ſo well as to diſcourſe of the ſetting of the tyde, and other things relating to his removal, as coolly and unconcernedly, as if it had been only a common journey (32).

(32) Ibid. paſſim.

Some years after the Revolution, when King William told him on a particular occaſion, 'That upon 'hearing his Lordſhip was not ſatisfied for ſome time 'before his predeceſſor left England with the meaſures then taken, a perſon, whom he had employed 'to conſult and treat with thoſe Lords who invited 'him to come over, propoſed at one of their meetings to bring over Lord Mulgrave, and to communicate their deſign to him. Upon which the Earl 'of Shrewſbury ſaid, If you do you will ſpoil all, he 'will never join with us. The King aſking him with 'a ſmile, Pray, my Lord, what would you have done, 'if my agent had acquainted you with the whole 'buſineſs? Sir, ſaid my Lord Mulgrave, I ſhould have 'diſcovered it to the Maſter I ſerved. The King re'plied, I cannot blame you? (33).'

(33) Character, p. 333.

[W] He yielded to the exigency of the occaſion.] No doubt but he included himſelf among thoſe few perſons, who, without intending any good to the Prince of Orange, thought it imprudent to ſtem a tide to no other purpoſe except their own ruin, and therefore rather reſerved that intereſt, which by their compliance they obtained both with the Prince and people, to ſecure the public good as much as poſſible, in a ſeaſon when almoſt every body ſeemed to abandon it. After the King's firſt abſconding, when the rabble had pulled down the houſe of the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, the Earl of Mulgrave, though his maſter was gone, and his ſtaff laid aſide, thought the honour of the nation ſo much concerned, that he preſumed to take upon himſelf to order an apartment in Whitehall immediately, and a great table to be kept for him twice a day, with Yeomen of the Guard to attend at his outward room, (which they never do but on the King only) for which ſtrain of authority, he tells us, he had the good fortune to be thanked, both by King James and the Prince of Orange.

After the King's laſt retirement, which our author calls a fatal ſtep that loſt him the crown, and was ſome leſſening to the reputation he had before, when the reading of the King's laſt letter, (wherein he appealed to God and man againſt that flight forced upon him by ſo near a relation) was refuſed by the Council, looking on this as the cleareſt proof of the Lords intentions to exclude their King, he joined with all the reſt, in agreeing that a Convention ſhould be ſummoned, by circular letters in the Prince of Orange's name; and ſecondly, that the Prince ſhould be deſired to manage all public affairs, as well as the public moneys in the mean time. This was the firſt ſtep which he took in favour of the Prince of Orange, and his motive for it, if we believe himſelf, was, that he might, by this compliance, have the greater influence and power in oppoſing the ſottiſh deſigns of ſome of the old Whigs, who having long deſpaired of Court favour, were now, he ſays, tranſported with it, not only out of their old principles, but even out of their very ſenſes alſo. What he remarks afterwards, has been confirmed ſince, 'that ſuch a good opportunity was loſt, of reſettling our old conſtitution, as perhaps England is like never to have again; 'which, continues he, I do not obſerve with any regard to either of the two Princes in competition; but I only mean, that whichſoever Prince that Convention ſhould ſet up, our liberties might have been ſecured, and the government fixed on the beſt and ſteadieſt foundation, the united intereſt of King and people (34).' From this laſt period it appears, that he thought the throne was become vacant by the deſertion of King James, and that the Convention had power to ſet either of the two competitors upon it, as they thought beſt.

(34) Account of the Revolution.

[X] He voted for the conjunctive Sovereignty.] We are told, that ſome of his friends had heard him declare, he had the following motive for this ſtep; that he thought the title of either perſon was equal, and ſince the Parliament was to decide the matter, he judged it would much better pleaſe the Prince, who was now become their Protector, and was alſo in itſelf a thing more becoming ſo good a Princeſs as Queen Mary, to partake with her huſband a crown ſo obtained, than to poſſeſs it intirely as her own (35).

(35) Character, p. 330.

[Y] He obliged the Prince of Orange.] In this ſtep he left the church party, who were inclined to ſet up the Princeſs above her huſband, and not only from his motives as declared to his friends, mentioned in the preceding remark, but what is related in remark [U] concerning the behaviour of the Princeſs of Orange, as only ſuffering the impoſitions of her huſband, one can't help thinking that this vote was owing to his contempt and reſentment of her conduct, and we may know from his own words, how much he paid his court to King William by it, who, he tells us, on this account grew jealous of his moſt intimate confidents among the Engliſh, becauſe they had ſo much regard to his wife. However, the Earl was far from thinking this Prince in earneſt, when he gravely endeavoured to make his friends believe, that he would leave them all in the lurch, by returning with his army into Holland, rather than yield the title to his own wife. He tells us the Princeſs was kept in Holland 'till he had maſtered that diſpute, which vexed him more than any other (36). If ſo, this reaſon of her ſtaying in Holland was luckily favoured by the froſt, and contrary winds after the thaw, which Biſhop Burnet gives for the cauſes of that detention (37).

[Z] A perſonal application from King William.] We have the following account of this application from the penman of his character. King William ſent one day for the Earl, and after ſome little diſcourſe, offered to give him an additional title, with an annual penſion of 3000*l.* and to make him of the Cabinet-Council. The Earl gave him many thanks for his intended favours, and aſked, with humbleſt ſubmiſſion, what his Majeſty expected from him in return; addiog, that he could not deny but that he was engaged in aſſiſting thoſe bills, which his Majeſty did not at preſent approve of; he was ſorry his Majeſty did not, but whether he had the honour or not of ſerving him, he could not give them up, but muſt aſſiſt their ſucceſs to his utmoſt ability (38).

the act which took away Sir John Fenwick's life. Yet ſo high was his reputation at Court, that the King took him into the Cabinet-Council, and gave him a penſion of three thouſand pounds a year (q). He received with pleaſure all theſe marks of eſteem that were paid to his diſtinguiſhed abilities, though he never had any good liking for that Prince [AA]. But, as ſoon as Queen Anne came into the poſſeſſion of the Throne, he entered into her ſervice, with all the warmth of the moſt affectionate duty, which was accepted on her part with the trueſt ſincerity. She gave him the Privy Seal, April 21, 1702, juſt before her coronation, and preſently after it, made him Lord-Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of the north-riding of Yorkſhire. In October following, he was alſo appointed one of the Commiſſioners to treat of an Union between England and Scotland; and, before the expiration of the year, was firſt created Duke of Normanby, March 9th, and then Duke of Buckinghamſhire, the twenty-third of the ſame month (r). He was made too one of the Governors of the Charter-houſe this year. Yet he did not ſit long eaſy in his preſent advantageous ſituation. He grew by degrees jealous of his rival the Duke of Marlborough, and not brooking the ſuperior power of that favourite with his miſtreſs, he threw up the Privy-Seal (s), entirely againſt her mind; ſo that, to remove his diſcontentment, and procure a reconciliation, ſhe made him an offer of the Lord Chancellor's place, which was alſo refuſed by him (t). During this ill-humour, he ſuffered party-prejudice to tranſport him beyond the bounds both of his honour and good ſenſe [BB]. Yet, in 1705, March 21 (u), the Queen readily admitted him to kiſs her hand, [AA] He had no good liking for King William.] In his Feaſt of the Gods, the character of this Prince, bad enough in itſelf, is yet rendered more conſpicuous, by contraſting it with the very amiable one of his predeceſſor, the Earl's favourite, King James, as follows. Another Prince [King James] lately deceaſed in exile, was cenſured alſo, yet with great compaſſion amidſt all their [the Gods] mirth; becauſe though he not only meant to govern well, but had talents capable of it, yet notwithſtanding all that, he loſt three kingdoms, merely for want of being wiſely principled in his youth, and inſtructed that kings ſhould indeed reverence the Gods, and appear decently devout, but never violently zealous for any thing, beſides juſtice and the publick good; which virtue alone, without any other religion, is ſufficient to make them heroes on earth, and advance them afterwards to be Demigods in Heaven. Then follows King William: All the Gods admired that odd mixture of which his ſucceſſor was compoſed, ſo very lazy, heavy, and eaſily impoſed on by Favourites, and yet ſo very ambitious and enterprizing; which they attributed to the very different characters of his anceſtors, who, on his mother's ſide, were only Sovereigns, (Henry the 4th of France excepted), but on his father's ſide ſuch as deſerved to be ſo.

Yet Jupiter himſelf ſhewed great eſteem of him, but was ſuſpected a little of ſome partiality on the account of his own proceedings with old father Saturn. He was obſerved alſo to kiſs Ganymede all the while they were talking of this Prince, which made the Gods whiſper to one another a little maliciouſly (39).

(39) Feaſt of the Gods, p. 191, 192.

[BB] He acted againſt his honour and good ſenſe] He threw up the ſeals in March, and at the meeting of the new Parliament in November following, Lord Haverſham moved the Houſe of Peers, that the Princeſs Sophia might be ſent for into England, as neceſſary to ſecure the ſucceſſion in the Houſe of Hanover. This motion was ſeconded by the Duke of Bucks and the Earls of Rocheſter, Nottingham, and Angleſea (40). A late author makes the following remark upon this extraordinary turn of affairs. 'The Tories, ſays he, very probably looked upon their cauſe as a party to be in a manner deſperate, ſhut out of power both by a Prince and by Miniſters, whom they had always looked upon as of their own principles. Their preſent ſituation was bad, the proſpect was worſe. The very meaſures they had taken to ſecure themſelves in the good graces of the Queen, had given their opponents an opportunity to repreſent them as very cool towards the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, if this opinion prevailed under the great diſappointment of preſent expectations, they had the misfortune of ſeeing their hopes blaſted as far as human foreſight could reach. This it was, continues this author, which, in my poor opinion, determined them to act in the manner related. In which, like all exaſperated parties, they forgot that the perſon againſt whom their rage was pointed, was their Miſtreſs and their Queen: Some of them forgot more; they forgot the returns of gratitude, and the ties of nature. The Duke of Bucks, who made her the firſt compliment after her acceſſion, in replying, when her Majeſty ſaid that the 8th of March, on which King William died, was a dull cloudy day; for all that, Madam, it is the fineſt I ever ſaw in my life, now loſt all decency, and ſaid in her hearing, that the Queen might become childiſh, do nothing of her own head, but be intirely paſſive under thoſe in whoſe hands ſhe was or might be (41).' The writer of the Duke's character inſinuates (42), tho'unwillingly, that he had oppoſed the Duke of Marlborough's ſettlement of 5000*l. per Annum* from the Poſt-Office, and 'tis certain that ſettlement was not carried 'till this very ſeſſion, when the juſt-related motion in the Houſe of Peers was ſeconded by the Duke of Bucks. 'Tis remarkable, that upon the diſappointment he met with in the refuſal of the firſt regiment of the foot-guards from the Queen's uncle Charles II. he paſſed the following cenſure: The King, ſays he, though of more wit than moſt of thoſe who influenced him, had that foible of his family to be eaſily impoſed on (43). He ſeems to have exerciſed his ſatirical genius at this time, as he had done when in a like fit of ill humour in 1675. The production was his laſt mentioned piece, The Feaſt of the Gods, in which he has the following ſevere and unmanly cenſure of Prince George of Denmark, the Queen's huſband: 'They[the Gods]perceived another king hard by, much concerned for the loſs of a brother, whom many years ago he had diſpoſed of extremely well, yet no body ſince ever heard one word of him. Momus laughing, ſaid the good Prince was not quite dead, though forced to breathe hard to prevent being buried, becauſe no body perceived any other ſigns of life in him. Some of the Gods ſmiled, and ſaid it would be well for the quiet of the world, if all Princes were as dull and inſignificant (44).' If what is related in a ſubſequent remark[EE] may paſs for truth, that the Duke once aſpired to marry the Princeſs Anne, it furniſhes an additional incitement for this malevolent ſtroke againſt the Prince of Denmark, who muſt in that caſe be treated as (what is ſcarcely ever felt without rancour) a ſucceſsful rival. Yet, after all, it may be placed to our author's account, by way of ballance to theſe enormous effects of pique and reſentment, that it was at this ſame juncture that he penned his excellent Obſervations on the Statute of Treaſons, where he has given ſuch a proof of his judgment and penetration in a moſt difficult and important point of the Law, as will be a ſtanding monument to juſtify her Majeſty's offer made to him of the Chancellor's place. I can't help thinking but the conſideration, as it ſerved his own honour and reputation, was one motive for this exerciſe, as he calls it, of his thoughts. This conjecture ſeems to be confirmed (if we remember his Lordſhip's artful genius) by the concluding words of thoſe Obſervations. 'I would not have communicated theſe rambling thoughts to any but a friend, nor to yourſelf neither, if among the ſeveral miſrepreſentations upon my reſigning one great employment, and refuſing a greater, you had not ſuſpected me of a little lazineſs, from which I hope this way of employing my leiſure may be ſome vindication, and I wiſh it does not prove a much greater, by ſhewing I needed hand, upon the marriage of his third wife, who was a natural daughter to King James the Second [CC]. During this receſs from publick buſineſs, he finiſhed his houſe in St James's park [DD], having before obtained a grant of the ſite of it from the Crown. The Duke continued out of employ 'till the general change of the miniſtry in 1710; in effecting which he had ſome ſhare (w), and was preſently made Lord Steward of the Houſhold; whence he was advanced the following year to be Lord Preſident of the Council (x). He joined in all the meaſures of that remarkable miniſtry [EE] (of which himſelf was a conſiderable part), excepting in the affair of the Catalans only, whoſe lives and liberties he thought too much expoſed by that part of the plan of the peace of Utrecht; and he laboured heartily, though without ſucceſs, to obtain a better ſecurity for that ill-fortuned people [FF], who had entirely relied on England for protection. Notwithſtanding his diſagreement with the Earl of Oxford in this particular, yet he continued his friendſhip to that miniſter after his diſgrace; and though the Duke, in virtue of his poſt, became, on the death of the Queen, one of the Lords Juſtices for governing the kingdom (y) 'till the arrival of her ſucceſſor in England; yet he never afterwards entered into any of the concerns at Court, and conſtantly oppoſed the ſteps purſued by the adminiſtration, ſpending ſome of his leiſure hours in the moſt elegant manner with his Muſe [GG]. [CC] His third wife was a daughter of King James II.] Her mother was Katharine Sedley, daughter to the ingenious Sir Charles Sedley (46). King James, by a warrant dated December 1688. dignified his daughter by her with the name of Lady Katharine Darnley, gave her the place of a Duke's daughter, and empowered her to bear the royal arms within a border Compone, Ermin and Azure, the Azure charged with Flower-de-lis of France, and for ſupporters, on the Dexter ſide, an Unicorn Ermine, his horn, main, and hoofs, Or, accolled with a Chaplet of Red Roſes, barbed and ſeeded proper, and on the Siniſter, a Goat Ermine, horned and hoofed Azure, with a like Chaplet about his neck as has the dexter. She was left very young a widow by James Earl of Angleſey, from whom ſhe was parted at her own ſuit, though the Earl long oppoſed it, by the unanimous conſent of both Houſes of Parliament, for the Earl's cruelty, and cauſeleſs ill uſage of her. It was thought by ſome that his Lordſhip had a tincture of diſtraction, as was they ſaid plain from his conduct to her. They lived together only one year (47).

His Grace was firſt married to Urſula, daughter of Colonel Stawel, and widow of Earl Conway. His ſecond wife was Lady Catharine, eldeſt daughter to Fulk Greville, Lord Brooke, widow of Baptiſt Noel, Earl of Gainſborough, ſhe died in 1703 4. His Grace had no iſſue by either of theſe ladies, to whom, we are told by ſeveral, he ſhewed but little deference (48), and indeed the natural children he had during theſe marriages, give but too much room to believe the truth of that cenſure. However his Grace makes a kind mention in his will of all his wives, declaring that 'he had had the moſt extraordinary bleſſing of three kind and excellent wives' He alſo deſired to be buried near his ſecond lady in Weſtminſter-Abbey, and intimates, that he would have removed the corps of his firſt wife to the ſame grave, had ſhe not lain near her own mother in the country (49).

[DD] He built his houſe in St James's Park.] In the deſcription of this elegant edifice, he has given his brother Duke incidentally ſome account how he paſſed his time, which he declares was ſpent ſo for the moſt, as to be very conjugally at home, confeſſing himſelf to be changed enough as to his former delights, as to make his wife's company agreeable: ſo far he is explicit, no checks of infamy reſtrained him. He was now at leaſt 59 years old. But in the preceding paſſage, where he ſays, that after dinner he drove again to Marybone for air and exerciſe, obſerving truly enough, that agitation of the body and diverſion of the mind is a compoſition for health, above all the ſkill of Hippocrates, he could not be explicit; the diverſion he choſe for his mind would not bear ſhewing. However it is too well known to be concealed, and ſhall be admitted into theſe memoirs in the view of ſtanding as a ſea-mark to others, againſt that ſcandalous and penurious vice of gaming. It has been ſaid, and never contradicted that I know of, that by this infamous conveyance, a good part of that garden which he ſpeaks of as his chief delight in this letter, came into the hands of a perſon, who inſultingly grazed his ſheep aud oxen cloſe under his Grace's window. And, which is ſtill more infamous, he even did not eſcape the cenſure of being a falſe gameſter.

[EE] He entered into the Queen's ſervice with all warmth of the moſt affectionate duty.] 'Tis ſaid he had made his addreſſes to her in the way of love before her marriage with the Prince of Denmark. This is hinted by Mrs Manley, in the ſtile and manner of her Memoirs of the Engliſh Court (50). Mr Boyer alſo takes notice of it in his hiſtory of this Queen. Some years, ſays he, before the Queen was married to Prince George, the Marquis of Normanby, then Earl of Mulgrave, a nobleman of ſingular accompliſhments both of mind and perſon, and of a plentiful fortune, aſpired ſo high as to [attempt to] marry the Lady Anne. But though his addreſſes to her were checked as ſoon as diſcovered, yet the Princeſs had ever an eſteem for him (51).

'Twas at this time alſo that he wrote his two Tragedies of Julius Cæſar, and the Death of Brutus; for the latter of which the juſt-mentioned Poet compoſed two Choruſſes, which were ſet to Muſic by Signor Bononcini, and performed at Buckingham Houſe. Mr (now Biſhop) Warburton, obſerves, that the two Choruſſes were made at the requeſt of the Duke, to adorn a very poor performance of his, and that they have the uſual effect of all ill-adjuſted ornaments, they make the meanneſs of the piece more conſpicuous (53).

[HH] She brought him a ſon.] She had brought the Duke ſeveral children before this, as firſt a daughter, chriſtned Sophia, who died very young, and two ſons, to the firſt of which Queen Anne, as a Godmother, gave the name of John, who lived but three weeks; and the year after another ſon, called Robert, and ſtiled Marquis of Normanby, born December 11, 1711. On his death his father wrote a tender poem, which ends thus:

But why ſo much digreſſion,
This fatal loſs to ſhew,
Alas there's no expreſſion

After this there was another daughter, chriſtened Sophia Catharina Henrietta, who lived 'till ſhe was four years of age. (54) Account of the Duke's Pedigree, p. 352, 353.

corpſe lay magnificently in ſtate for a conſiderable time at Buckingham-houſe, whence it was conveyed with the greateſt funeral pomp to Weſtminſter-abbey; where being interred according to his own requeſt, a ſumptuous monument was erected afterwards to his memory in Henry the Seventh's chapel; for which purpoſe, he left 500 pounds by his Will, and directed an epitaph written by himſelf to be put upon it. But one expreſſion was omitted by order of Dr Atterbury [II], then Dean of that church, who would not ſuffer it to ſtand there; and indeed the whole, after many declarations of his religious ſentiments, which are found interſperſed up and down in his writings, too plainly ſpeaks him a Theiſt [KK], yet not without ſome mixture of a ſuperſtition caſt in his compoſition

'Tis ſaid that favourite mankind,
Was made the Lord of all below.
But yet the doubtful (a) are concern'd (b) to find
'Tis only one man (c) tells another ſo.
And for this great dominion here,
Which over other beaſts we claim,
Reaſon our beſt credential does appear,
By which indeed we domineer;
But how abſurdly we may ſee with ſhame:
Reaſon that ſolemn trifler light as air,
Driven up and down by cenſure or applauſe,
By partial love away 'tis blown,
Or the leaſt prejudice can weigh it down
Thus our high privilege becomes our ſnare.
In any nice and weighty cauſe,
How weak at beſt is reaſon, yet the grave
Impoſe on that ſmall judgment which we have.

Note (a) The doubtful.] In which number are comprehended all the Sceptics of both ſorts, viz. they who with much conſideration are got to ſlight the Holy Bible, and all religion depending on it, becauſe they have neither the patience nor the parts to examine any thing thoroughly; and others more modeſt, who on ſeveral accounts would accept thoſe doctrines there taught us, if their judgments, informed by a well-meaning and induſtrious inquiry, which is all that God has given us for our guide, did not perceive, in ſome of them at leaſt, a manifeſt abſurdity; apprehending alſo a kind of impiety in believing things inconſiſtent not only with common ſenſe, but with that received notion we ought to have of the Deity. They conceive it to be one of theſe abſurdities, that a poor animal, called a man, ſhould be inveſted by God with a deſpotic dominion over all the reſt of the creation, when all the while we are but too plainly ſenſible of being unable to comprehend the minuteſt part of it. Should we not ſay they undervalue and laugh at any of ourſelves, for giving a large patrimony to a booby ſon, without inſtructing or breeding him up to underſtand or enjoy it. But when no other anſwer is to be well made, the reply to all is, that as odd as it appears, yet God has done it, and therefore we ought to believe it well done, and highly prudent, which moſt certainly is a true conſequence if the premiſes were right, but that will be examined impartially in the following notes.

(b) Concerned.] That is, ſays he, both intereſted in it as they claim the dominion, and ſo are reaſonably inquiſitive about it, and troubled to find their title to it ſo very weak, after ſo much wealth and blood ſpent in the controverſy. 'Tis well too if we are not one day called to account, and made to pay with coſts for ſo contentious a cruelty.

(c) Only one man.] Here now comes properly an examination of the grounds they go upon, who pretend that God has done us this favour, and therefore we ought to believe it well and wiſely done, whatever incongruities may appear in it, which is a conſequence juſt enough, if the premiſes can be as well made out. But alas (ſay our Sceptics) when we come to that, inſtead of a proof there is nothing produced, but one poor text in Geneſis, whether written by Moſes or ſome other man (for that is now diſputed among Divines themſelves) is of no importance, ſince as a man he is ſtill one of our own imperfect, unknowing kind, and if he is to be credited on his ſingle word, againſt all all our ſenſe and reaſon, in a thing alſo which ſeems ſo much to derogate from the infinite wiſdom of Divine Providence, ſure there is need firſt of proving him infallible, whereas all the proof of that is only derived by tradition from other men, who therefore cannot certify for one another. 'Tis ſaid alſo by theſe Sceptics, that 'tis worth our obſerving, how the author of this text of man's dominion over all other creatures, has written another very extraordinary one, viz. That God walked in the garden of Eden in the cool of the evening, which if excuſed on the account of being only a figurative expreſſion, yet much invalidates a narration of ſuch vaſt importance, that tropes and figures ſeem improper in it. Divines are unwilling to ſave it's credit by the difficulty of our underſtanding the Hebrew tongue (though no ill excuſe ſince 'tis allowed to be ſometimes unintelligible) for fear of their adverſaries making the ſame objection to other texts as extraordinary, and perhaps to all the Old Teſtament. Upon the whole matter 'tis probable, the wiſe author of Geneſis, for reaſons which might be given, and many more which we now cannot gueſs at, had found it fit and neceſſary to infuſe this opinion of man's ſovereignty into the Jews; and who knows but it was as needful to encourage them againſt the beaſts of a wilderneſs in which they wandered ſo long, as againſt the kings of Canaan, whom Moſes, like a wiſe leader aſſured them beforehand, the Lord would deliver into their hands (56).

Having thus derided the authority of the Old Teſtament, and conſequently the Jewiſh religion, we find him in the concluſion of his letter concerning his houſe, ſeriouſly denying that of the New, and conſequently of Chriſtianity. Having declared to his brother Peer, that he was often miſſing a pretty gallery in the old houſe he pulled down, more than pleaſed with a ſalon which he had built in it's ſtead, though a thouſand times better in all manner of reſpects, he proceeds thus: Pour faire bonne bouche, with a grave reflection. It were well for us, if this incapacity of being intirely contented was as ſure a proof of our being reſerved for happineſs in another world, as it is of our frailty and imperfection in this. I confeſs the Divines tell us ſo. But though I believe a future ſtate more firmly than a great many of them ſeem to do, by their inordinate deſires of the good things in this, yet I own my faith is founded not on thoſe fallacious arguments of preachers, but on that adorable conjunction of unbounded power and goodneſs, which certainly muſt ſome way recompence hereafter ſo many thouſands of innocent wretches created to be ſo miſerable here (57). 'Tis true his Lordſhip calls the former notes a rambling ſort of rhapſody; and it muſt be owned,

tion [LL]. Mr Pope having declined to write his character [MM], there came out, in 1723, his Works *, pompouſly printed, with his picture prefixed, curiouſly engraved from an original painting by Sir Godfrey Kneller, as alſo a draught of his monument, with the epitaph, and the following inſcription: To the memory of John Sheffild, Duke of Buckingham, theſe his more laſting remains, the monument of his mind and more perfect image of himſelf, are here collected by the direction of Katharine his Ducheſs; deſiring that his aſhes may be honoured, and his fame and merit committed to the teſt of time, truth, and poſterity. The whole impreſſion being ſeized at the preſs by his Majeſty's meſſengers, ſome pieces in it, which gave offence to the Government, were ſuppreſſed (aa) in the publication. However, in 1729, a ſecond edition was publiſhed in 8vo. wherein the caſtrated ſheets were inſerted, and there was alſo prefixed, A Short Character of the Duke of Buckinghamſhire, together with an Account of the Pedigree of the Sheffield Family, and his Grace's laſt Will and Teſtament, written with his own hand, without any aſſiſtance. With regard to his character, it is obſerved, that in his perſon his Grace was tall; and though not perhaps the moſt exactly ſhaped, being thought a little too long waiſted, and rather too narrow in his cheſt and ſhoulders, yet all together he looked more like a man of quality than moſt of his rank who were his contemporaries. He was allowed to be handſome, his face being a regular oval, and all the features of it well proportioned. His countenance had an extraordinary ſweetneſs, joined with a lively and penetrating look, which at firſt ſight ſtruck you with an idea of that great underſtanding of which he gave the world ſuch various proofs. He had one thing very particular, that laughing heartily, which is ſeldom advantageous to any body, was in him uncommonly agreeable. And as it was generally allowed, that no body exceeded him in perſon when young, ſo few if any were ever ſo agreeable when old. As to

* One of his Works (for ſo it may fitly be called, though not mentioned hitherto) was, correcting the preſs for an edition of the Works of G. owned, the cenſure is juſt enough. We ſee him rambling to overturn revelation by the ſuperior ſtrength of reaſon, and yet decrying this reaſon as a narrow, miſleading, uncertain, guide, and ſo unworthy to give us a title of dominion over our fellow-creatures, who are alſo endowed with it *. So then, man is little or nothing better than a brute. But his Lordſhip's drift is more ſoberly delivered elſewhere, in the following diſtich:

[LL]. Though not without ſome mixture of ſuperſtition.] I have ventured to aſſert this from ſeveral paſſages in his works, ſome of the moſt remarkable of which ſhall be laid before the reader for his judgment. In the poem already mentioned, written in his voyage to Tangier, the plan of which is a Viſion, he concludes thus:

> Amaz'd I wak'd in haſte,
> All trembling at my doom;
> Dreams oft repeat adventures paſt,
> And tell the ills to come (59).

(59) Vol. I. p. 38. 4to. edit.

Again, in his memoirs of himſelf, ſpeaking of the death of the Earl of Sandwich, he makes the following remark. He dined in Mr. Digby's ſhip the day before the battle, when no body dreamt of fighting, and ſhewed a gloomy diſcontent, ſo contrary to his uſual chearful humour, that we even then all took notice of it, but much more afterwards (60). The next inſtance is more full to our purpoſe. It is in the ſame memoirs where he relates ſeveral paſſages in his firſt adventure at ſea. Our fleet, ſays he, happening to go near the ſhore to take in freſh water, Prince Rupert dined with a gentleman who lived thereabouts, and returning on board in a little boat, with only Lord Blaney and myſelf, there happened ſo ſudden and violent a ſtorm that we did not like it, and Prince Rupert began to talk of Prince Maurice being caſt away by a like accident. Upon which, continues our author, I could not but reflect on my family alſo, ſince my grandfather and three of his brothers had been drowned. The Lord Blaney hearing all this, made us all laugh in the midſt of our danger, by ſwearing, that though he liked our company, he wiſhed himſelf out of it, and in any other boat whatſoever, ſince he feared the ill fortune of our two families would ſink him (61). The ſtory of his grandfather and three brothers is in the Peerage of England by Mr Collins, who tells us there were in all five brothers, one of whom was drowned in France, three others loſt their lives in the paſſage of Whitgift ferry, over the river Humber, and the youngeſt broke his neck in a new riding houſe, which his father had made out of an old conſecrated chapel, according to Sir William Dugdale. This father was the firſt Earl of Mulgrave in the family, being created by Queen Elizabeth, by whoſe expreſs command he, among other Engliſh Lords, attended the Duke of Anjou to Antwerp. And being in the famous ſea-fight againſt the Spaniards in 1558, who had threatened an invaſion, was knighted by the Lord Admiral for his gallant deportment and memorable ſervice in that engagement. He was afterwards appointed Governour of the Briel, in Zealand, and made a Knight of the Garter. The title of Lord Sheffield of Butterwick was firſt given in the 1ſt of Edward VI. to Edmund Sheffield, our Duke's great-great-grandfather, who was killed in an inſurrection of the common people of Norfolk the next year, he being one of the nobles who accompanied the Marquis of Northampton to ſuppreſs them, when his horſe fell into a ditch near Norwich, whereupon pulling off his helmet to ſhew the rebels who he was, a butcher ſlew him with his club. The manor of Butterwick came into the family by the marriage of Sir Robert Sheffield, knighted by Edward I. with Janet, daughter and coheireſs to Alexander Laird of Butterwick. This Robert's father, who was himſelf alſo Sir Robert Sheffield, lived in the time of Henry III, and was the firſt anceſtor of this family mentioned in hiſtory (62).

[MM] Mr Pope having declined to write his character.] In a letter of that celebrated Poet to Dr Atterbury, dated July 1722, he writes thus. 'The Ducheſs's letter concerns me nearly, I muſt keep clear 'of flattery, I will, and as it is an honeſt reſolution, I 'hope your Lordſhip will aſſiſt me in ſo doing. I 'beg therefore you would repreſent thus much to her 'Grace, that as to the fear ſhe ſeems touched with, 'that the Duke's memory would have no advantage, 'but what he muſt give it himſelf, without being be'holden to any one friend, your Lordſhip may cer'tainly, and agreeably to your character both of rigid 'honour and Chriſtian plainneſs, tell her, that no man 'can have any other advantage, and that all offerings 'of friends in ſuch a caſe paſs for nothing. Be but ſo 'good as to confirm what I have repreſented to her, 'that an inſcription in the ancient way, plain and 'pompous, yet modeſt, will be the moſt uncommon, 'and therefore the moſt diſtinguiſhed manner of doing 'it, and ſo I hope ſhe will be ſatisfied, the Duke's 'honour preſerved, and my integrity alſo, which is 'too ſacred a thing to be forfeited in conſideration of 'any little (though what people of quality may call 'great) honour or diſtinction whatſoever, which thoſe 'of their rank can beſtow on one of mine, and which 'indeed they are apt to over-rate, but never ſo much 'as when they imagine us under any obligation to ſay 'an untrue word in their favour.' It appears by the Biſhop's anſwer, that he had wrote to the Ducheſs juſt as Mr. Pope deſired, but queſtioned whether ſhe would be ſatisfied with it. And that ſhe was not, will be ſeen preſently.

to his manners, he was reported not to be good-natured, and to be very haughty and proud; whereas he was really good-natured, and ſo tender, that upon ſeeing in the ſtreets any real object of compaſſion, he has ſeveral times been touched to a degree of bringing tears into his eyes. He was affected in the ſame manner, upon reading a melancholy ſtory or hearing of any friendly and generous behaviour. He was a little paſſionate, and ſometimes quick upon people that had given him no occaſion; which was the caſe ſometimes of his moſt familiar friends, or gentlemen who came freely to viſit him. But then he was never eaſy 'till he had made them ſome amends. When he was diſobliged by his equals, or even by his King, to his thinking, not well treated, he carried it pretty high, 'till he had got the better of the firſt, and prevailed on the other to change his proceedings more to his ſatisfaction. But except upon ſuch occaſions, no man on earth could carry himſelf with more good breeding and humanity. And in all his converſations with his inferiors, you could not think he judged there was any difference betwixt him and them. He would talk as familiarly to his ſervants as if he was not their maſter, and often ſaid, I was angry with you a little time ago, but I don't mean half the things I ſay in a paſſion. He was by many thought not to have made a very good huſband to his firſt and ſecond wives; yet this ſecond had by a former huſband two daughters, whom he always treated with the greateſt reſpect and kindneſs, as themſelves always acknowledged; and after her death, he contributed to marry one of her daughters to one of the beſt matches in the kingdom. The liberties which he allowed himſelf in relation to the ladies are well known. Yet this ought to be remarked as a proof of his good ſenſe, that none of his miſtreſſes could ever prevail upon him to marry fooliſhly, or ever gained too great an aſcendant over him. And ſome years before his death, a good deal of concern for that kind of libertiniſm, into which an impetuoſity of temper, too much neglected in his education, together with the prevailing faſhion of that Court in which he lived, had too often hurried him. He was by his worſt enemies allowed to have lived always very kindly with his laſt wife. Whenever ſhe was very ill, or in danger (which generally happened when ſhe was with child, or at her lying-inn), he ſhewed all poſſible marks of concern: and when there was more than ordinary danger, his ſervants often found him on his knees at prayers; and on thoſe occaſions he has made vows, in caſe ſhe recovered, to give in charities, ſometimes two hundred, ſometimes three hundred pounds at a time, which he performed punctually. He was thought to be too ſaving in money matters; but that opinion was occaſioned by little trifling accidents, or rather an humour, which indiſcreet people knew not how to manage; for in reality he was not to be called covetous. It is certain his affection to his laſt Ducheſs over-ballanced his diſpoſition that way; for he always paid her pin-money to a day: and notwithſtanding ſome ill accidents in his fortune might have juſtified an omiſſion or delay, when her penſion from the Crown of 1200 l. a year, part of the proviſion made for her by King James the Second (the payment of which, by the ill offices of a favourite at Court had been for ſome time diſcontinued). And when by a juſt repreſentation to Queen Anne, by Lord-Treaſurer Oxford, that penſion began to be repaid, he always brought the money to her, deſiring her to take what part of it ſhe pleaſed for her own uſe; of which ſhe always took one third. But there is a ſtrong indication of his neglecting money matters too much. He loſt a great part of his fortune merely through an indolence and unwillingneſs to take the pains to viſit his eſtates at ſome diſtance from London, in the ſpace of forty years. In a word, he was a good huſband, a juſt and tender father, a conſtant zealous friend, and, one may add, the moſt agreeable of companions. As to religion, Biſhop Burnet tells us (bb), he was looked on as indifferent to all particular profeſſions, and that he was apt to comply in every thing that might be acceptable to King James, going with his Majeſty to maſs, and kneeling at it; ſo that, when that Court thought of making converts to Popery, the prieſts made an attack upon him; he told them, he was willing to receive inſtructions; that he had taken much pains to bring himſelf to believe in God, who made the world and all men in it; but it muſt not be an ordinary force of argument, that could make him believe that man was quits with God, and made God.

His Grace's only ſurviving child, Edmond, was a youth of the greateſt hopes. He was left ſolely to the care of his mother, and being of a weakly conſtitution, was carried by her, who conſtantly attended him, ſoon after his father's death, into foreign parts, on account of his health, which obliged him to reſide a great part of his time out of his native country. He was admitted, on the 26th of July, 1732, of Queen's-college in Oxford, and reſided there about a year and a half, only during the publick Act, in 1733, he retired from the college, his modeſty not permitting him to aſſiſt at that ſolemnity, in which it is uſual for the academical nobles to pronounce exerciſes in publick *. Tender as he was, yet, fired with the example of his anceſtors, many of whom had ſignalized themſelves in the wars, in 1734 he went a volunteer into the French army, then under the command of his uncle the Duke of Berwick [NN], in Germany, whom he ſerved as Aid

* Communicated by the Rev. Mr Allen, Vice-principal of Magdalen Hall, from the information of Dr Browne, now Provoſt of Queen's-college, who was tutor to his Grace.

[NN] He ſerved a campaign with the Duke of Berwick.] This is mentioned by Lord Orrery, now Earl of Cork, a relation and particular acquaintance of this young nobleman, as well as an executor of his father's will, and who after his death publiſhed a poem ſacred to his memory, where he ſpeaks thus of him:

An

Aid de Camp at the ſieges of Fort Kehl and Philipſburgh, 'till the Marſhal loſt his head by a cannon ball from the walls of the latter. This cataſtrophe put an end to the nephew's campaign. The next year, intending to try the air of Naples, he advanced in his way thither as far as Rome, where he found his ſtrength ſo much waſted, that he was not able to purſue the journey any farther. He remained in this city 'till the very laſt ſhock of his diſtemper, which he ſuſtained with admirable fortitude and reſignation, ſaying, he would ride out the ſtorm in the chair where he ſat. He died October 30, 1735, at Rome (cc); but his body was brought into England, and after lying in ſtate at Buckingham houſe, was conveyed to Weſtminſter abbey, with a like funeral ſolemnity to that of his father, by whoſe ſide he was interred. His effigy, curiouſly done in wax, lies over his tomb in Henry the VIIth's chapel. Mr Pope wrote an epitaph for him [OO] By his death, the Sheffield family became extinct, and the whole eſtate came into the hands of the old Duke's natural ſon, Charles Herbert [PP]; who taking the name of Sheffield, in purſuance of his father's Will, entered alſo, after the death of the Ducheſs [QQ] in 1742, into poſſeſſion of the houſe in St James's Park, which he enjoys with a fair character.

(cc) Of a hectic conſumption. Peerage of England Vol. II. p. 148.

An early wit by juſteſt precepts taught,
By art improv'd, by ſolid judgment wrought;
That knew no folly and deteſted ill,
Whoſe thoughts were great, whoſe reaſon was his will.
To higheſt titles, honours, fortune born,
He only look'd on ſordid vice with ſcorn;
Steady in youth, reſolved, yet not auſtere;
Humane to failings, but to crimes ſevere.
Valiant in arms France ſaw his martial fire
Kindling, where Berwick's did in blood expire.

[OO] Mr Pope wrote an epitaph for him.] In theſe words:

'If modeſt youth with clear reflection crown'd,
'And every opening virtue flowing round,
'Could ſave a parent's juſteſt pride from fate,
'Or add one patriot to a ſinking ſtate,
'This weeping marble had not aſk'd thy tear,
'Or ſadly told how many hopes lie here.
'The living virtue now had ſhone approv'd,
'The Senate heard him and his country lov'd.
'Yet ſofter honours and leſs noiſy fame,
'Attend the ſhade of gentle Buckingham,
'In whom a race for courage fam'd and art,
'Ends in the milder merit of the heart;
'And chiefs or ſages long to Britain giv'n,
'Pays the laſt tribute to a Saint in Heaven.'

This laſt thought is finely expreſſed by Lord Orrery, who ends his excellent Poem in an addreſs to the mother thus:

'But thou to whoſe diſtinguiſh'd worth 'twas giv'n,
'To form a ſon an offering fit for heav'n,
'By whoſe unwearied toil and boundleſs care,
'Maternal love and never ceaſing pray'r,
'Life's rugged path he learn'd with eaſe to tread,
'To bear death's mighty ſhock, yet not to dread:
'Whoſe wiſdom urg'd him like the lark to riſe,
'And though with callous wings to reach the ſkies.
'Bid him to Fame's eternal temple climb;
'Daring in action as in ſenſe ſublime:
'Let this conſole thee, tho' but ſhort the race,
'Twas run with ardour and obtain'd with grace.
'And now far hence remov'd from mortal eyes,
'He ſits with ſeraphs and enjoys the prize.'

[PP] His natural ſon] The Duke had taken care of his education, and bred him under a Governour, who was with him at Utrecht and appointed William Bromley, Eſq; a gentleman well known and eſteemed for his great worth and abilities, to be this ſon's guardian to the age of twenty one years. If he, the Duke, happened to die before him, he left him 5000 l. and in caſe he ſhould ſurvive his heir, who ſhould die without iſſue, the whole eſtate, except the houſe in the Park, which likewiſe he was to ſucceed to upon the death of the Ducheſs His Grace alſo left 1000 l. to Mr Herbert's mother, Mrs Lambert. Beſides this ſon, the Duke had alſo two natural daughters, Sophia and Charlotte to whom he left 1000 l each, to be raiſed to 5000 l in caſe Mr Herbert ſhould ſucceed to the eſtate (63): But what is more unaccountable, the daughters were to be put into his own houſe, by the requeſt of his wife, and were carefully educated by her, 'till they were ſent alſo by her direction to a boarding ſchool at Chelſey. One of them was afterwards married to Dr Walker, Dean of Burien, and afterwards to Jeremiah Griffith, Eſq; a Counſellor at Law; and the other to Dr Joſeph Hunt, D. D. and Maſter of Baliol-college in Oxford, and after his death, firſt to Cole an Apothecary at Oxford, and then to Cox, Eſq; of Kent, whoſe widow ſhe now is, and very lately went to Oxford to diſcharge all the debts of her firſt huſband, Dr Hunt, who happened to die inſolvent (64). A rare inſtance of generoſity and conjugal affection.

[QQ] At the death of the Ducheſs.] This Lady did not only procure to be written a character of her huſband, but alſo wrote her own character, which was publiſhed after her death, and is as follows: 'She was 'daughter of King James II. and of the Counteſs 'of Dorcheſter, who inherited the integrity and 'virtue of her father with happier fortune. She was 'married firſt to James Earl of Angleſea, and ſecondly 'to John Sheffield Duke of Bucks and Normanby. 'With the former ſhe exerciſed the virtues of pa'tience and ſuffering as long as there was any hopes 'of doing good by either; with the latter, all other 'conjugal virtues. The man of fineſt ſenſe and ſharpeſt diſcernment ſhe had the happineſs to pleaſe, and 'in that found her only pleaſure. When he died it 'ſeemed as if his ſpirit was only breathed into her; 'to fulfil what he had begun to perform, what he 'had concerted, and to preſerve and watch over what 'he had left his only ſon; in the care of whoſe health, 'the forming of whoſe mind, and the improvement 'of whoſe fortune, ſhe acted with the conduct and 'ſenſe of the father, ſoftened, but not overcome, 'with the tenderneſs of the mother. Her underſtanding was ſuch as muſt have made a figure had it 'been in a man, but the modeſty of her ſex threw a 'veil over it's luſtre, which nevertheleſs ſuppreſſed, 'only the expreſſion, not the exertion of it; for her 'ſenſe was not ſuperior to her reſolution, which when 'once ſhe was in the right, preſerved her from ma'king it only a tranſition to the wrong, the frequent 'weakneſs even of the beſt women. She often fol'lowed wiſe counſel, but ſometimes went before it, 'always with ſucceſs She was poſſeſſed of a ſpirit, 'which aſſiſted her to get the better of thoſe acci'dents which admitted of any redreſs, and enabled 'her to ſupport outwardly with decency and dignity 'thoſe which admitted of none, yet melted inwardly, 'through almoſt her whole life, at a ſucceſſion of me'lancholy and affecting objects, the loſs of all her 'children, the misfortunes of relations and friends 'public and private, and the death of thoſe who were 'deareſt to her. Her heart was as compaſſionate as it 'was great; her affections warm even to ſolicitude; 'her friendſhip not violent or jealous, but rational 'and perſevering. Her gratitude equal and conſtant 'to the living, to the dead, boundleſs and heroical. 'What perſon ſoever ſhe found worthy of her eſteem, 'ſhe would not give up for any power on earth, and

'the greateſt on earth whom ſhe could not eſteem, 'obtained from her no farther tribute than decency. 'Her good will was wholly directed by merit, not by 'accident, not meaſured by the regard they profeſſed 'for her own deſerts but by her idea of theirs; and 'as there was no merit which ſhe was not able to 'imitate, there was none which ſhe could envy. 'Therefore her converſation was as far from detrac- 'tion, as her opinion was from prejudice or prepoſ- 'ſeſſion As her thoughts were her own, ſo were her 'words, and ſhe was as ſincere in uttering her judgment 'as ſhe was impartial in forming it. She was a ſafe 'companion, many were ſerved, none ever ſuffered by 'her acquaintance? inoffenſive when provoked, when 'unprovoked not ſtupid, but the moment her enemy cea- 'ſed to be hurtful, ſhe could ceaſe to act as an enemy, 'and indeed when forced to be ſo, the more a finiſhed 'one for having been long a making, and her proceeding 'with ill people was more in a calm and ſteady courſe like 'juſtice, than in quick and paſſionate onſets, like revenge. 'As for thoſe of whom ſhe only thought ill, ſhe con- 'ſidered them not ſo much as once to wiſh them ill; 'of ſuch her contempt was great enough to put a ſtop 'to all other paſſions that could hurt them. Her love 'and averſion, her gratitude and reſentment, her eſ- 'teem and neglect were equally open and ſtrong, and 'alterable only from the alteration of the perſons who 'created them. Her mind was too noble to be in- 'ſincere, and her heart too honeſt to ſtand in need of 'it. So that ſhe never found cauſe to repent her con- 'duct either to a friend or an enemy.——There re- 'mains only to ſpeak of her perſon, which was moſt 'amiably majeſtic. The niceſt eye could find no fault 'in the outward lineaments of her face, or proportion 'of her body. It was ſuch as pleaſed wherever ſhe had 'a deſire it ſhould, yet ſhe never envied that of any 'other, which might better pleaſe in general. In the 'ſame manner as being content that her merits were 'eſteemed where ſhe deſired they ſhould, ſhe never 'depreciated thoſe of any other that were eſteemed 'or preferred elſewhere. For ſhe aimed not at a ge- 'neral eſteem, or a general love, where ſhe was not 'known, it was enough to be poſſeſſed of both where 'ſhe was. Having lived to the age of ſixty-two 'years, not courting regard, but receiving it from all 'who knew her, not loving buſineſs, but diſcharging 'it wholly whereſoever duty or friendſhip engaged her in 'it; not following greatneſs, but not declining to pay 'reſpect as far as was due from independence and 'diſintereſt. Having honourably abſolved all the 'parts of life, ſhe forſook this world, where ſhe had 'left no act of duty or virtue undone, for that alone 'where ſuch acts are rewarded, on the 13th day of 'March 1742-3.'

To this extraordinary performance there was ſubjoined the following memorandum. The above character was written by Mr Pope ſome years before her Grace's death. This coming out ſoon after Mr Pope's death, gave occaſion to Mr Warburton to publiſh it in his edition of that poet's works, with the following note We find by letter xix. of Pope's letters (65), that the Ducheſs of Bucks would have had Mr Pope draw her huſband's character, but though he refuſed this office, yet having in his Epiſtle on the Characters of Women inſerted theſe lines,

To heirs unknown deſcends the unguarded ſtore,
Or wanders Heaven directed to the poor.

Which are ſuppoſed to mark her out in ſuch a manner as not to be miſtaken for another; and having ſaid of himſelf, that he held a lie in proſe or verſe to be the ſame, all this together gave a handle to his enemies ſince his death, to publiſh the following paper, intitled, The Character of Katharine, Ducheſs of Buckingham and Normanby, as written by him; to which, in vindication of the deceaſed Poet, we have ſubjoined a letter to a friend, that will let the reader fully into the hiſtory of the writing and publiſhing of this extraordinary character. That part of the letter which relates to this affair is as follows:

'To James Moyſer, of Beverly, Eſq;

Bath, July 11, 1743.

'I come now to anſwer your friend's queſtion, the whole of what he has heard of my writing a character of the old Duke of Bucks, is untrue, I don't remember even to have ſeen it in MS. nor ever to have ſeen the pedigree, otherwiſe than after the Ducheſs had printed it with the Will, and ſent one to me, as I ſuppoſe ſhe did to all her acquaintance. I don't wonder it ſhould be reported I writ that character, after a ſtory which I will tell you in your ear, and to yourſelf. There was another character written of her Grace by herſelf (with what help I know not) but ſhe ſhewed it to me in her blots, and preſſed me by all the adjurations of friendſhip to give her my ſincere opinion of it. I acted honourably and did ſo. She ſeemed to take it patiently, and upon many exceptions which I made, engaged me to take the whole, and to ſelect out of it juſt as much as I judged might ſtand, and return her the copy. I did ſo. Immediately ſhe picked a quarrel with me, and we never ſaw each other in five or ſix years. In the mean time ſhe ſhewed this character (as much as was extracted of it in my hand-writing) as a compoſition of my own in her praiſe; and very probably it is now in the hands of Lord Hervey (66).' By this laſt paſſage, compared with what Mr Warburton obſerves, that the character was publiſhed by Mr Pope's enemies, we are led to fix the writing of it upon his Lordſhip, who, it is well known, was one of the chief of Mr Pope's enemies. The Ducheſs was interred by her own particular direction, with at leaſt equal funeral pomp to that of her huſband and ſon; and by the ſame direction, her effigies in wax-work, adorned with jewels, ſtands in Henry VIIth's chapel, in a caſe, which includes that alſo of her daughter, Sophia Katharina Henrietta Sheffield ſtanding by her ſide. In the deſcription of his houſe, the Duke takes notice of the particular care that was taken in contriving it, ſo as to prevent all noiſe over his wife's head during the myſteries of Lucina. It has been ſaid, that he retained an eminent Phyſician, particularly ſkilled in that part of the art, at a large annual ſtipend, and at his death erected a moſt ſumptuous monument (67) to his memory in Weſtminſter-Abbey, with an inſcription written by himſelf. 'Tis of his own conduct to this gentleman he ſpeaks in his Eſſay on Vulgar Errors, where he recommends a ſalary for life as a better method than fees. I almoſt doubt whether the whole profeſſion is generally here accuſed both of want of honeſty and ſkill, only to render the exception more conſpicuous. This, ſays he, is only the caſe in general, for I doubt not but ſome Phyſicians are abler and honeſter than the reſt; and I have myſelf had the experience of one, whoſe ſkill, honeſty, and friendſhip, has recovered the moſt valuable part of my family out of dangers in which we have almoſt deſpaired of ſucceſs, and reſtored her to perfect health. SHELDON [GILBERT] Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the XVIIth century, a moſt generous and munificent prelate, was born July 19. 1598. at Stanton in Staffordſhire. He received the name of Gilbert from his godfather Gilbert Earl of Shrewſbury; to whom his father Roger Sheldon was then a menial ſervant (a), but deſcended from the ancient family of the Sheldons of Staffordſhire (b). In the latter end of the year 1613 he was admitted into Trinity-college in Oxford (c): and November 27. 1617. took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Maſter May 28. 1620 (d). He was elected Fellow of All-ſouls college in 1622. And about the ſame time taking holy orders, he became afterwards domeſtic Chaplain to Thomas Lord Coventry Keeper of the Great Seal, who gave him a Prebend of Glouceſter [A]: and finding him to be a man of parts, recommended

[A] Who gave him a Prebend of Glouceſter.] He was inſtall'd into it February 26. 1632. (1)——The Lord Keeper exceedingly eſteemed him, and uſed his ſervice not only in all matters relating to the Church, but recommended him to King Charles I. as a perſon well vers'd in political affairs (e). On the 2d of May 1633, he was preſented by his Majeſty to the Vicarage of Hackney in Middleſex, void by the promotion of David Dolben to the biſhoprick of Bangor (f). He was alſo Rector of Ickford in Buckinghamſhire; and Archbiſhop Laud gave him the Rectory of Newington in Oxfordſhire (g). Having proceeded Bachelor of Divinity November 11. 1628. he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity June 25, 1634, as a compounder (h). In March 1635, he was elected Warden of All-ſouls-college (i). And being eſteemed a learned man (k), was appointed Chaplain in ordinary to the King; became afterwards Clerk of his Cloſet; and was deſigned by him to be made Maſter of the Savoy-Hoſpital, and Dean of Weſtminſter: but his ſettlement in them was prevented by the civil wars (l). During theſe, he firmly adhered to the King, and was one of the Chaplains whom his Majeſty ſent for, to attend his Commiſſioners, at the Treaty of Uxbridge, in February 1644, for their devotions, and for the other ſervice of the Church, as the management of the treaty requir'd; which could not be foreſeen (m). He argued there ſo earneſtly in favour of the Church of England, as drew upon him the envy and reſentment of the Parliamentarians, which they made him afterwards ſufficiently feel (n). In April 1646, he was attending the King at Oxford, and witneſs to a remarkable vow made by his Majeſty [B], of which an account is given in the note. He alſo attended in 1647, as one of his Majeſty's Chaplains, at Newmarket, and other places (o). The 30th of March, he was ejected from his Wardenſhip of All-ſouls-college, by the Parliamentary viſitors; who forcibly took poſſeſſion of his lodgings, April 13. and impriſon'd him (p), with Dr Hammond, in Oxford, and elſewhere; to the end that their eminency in the univerſity might not hinder the intruders and rebels proceedings, and to keep them from attending on the King at the treaty in the iſle of Wight (q). He remained confin'd above ſix months, and then the Reforming Committee ſet him at liberty, October 24. 1648, upon condition that he ſhould never come within five miles of Oxford; that he ſhould not go to the King in the iſle of Wight; and that he ſhould give ſecurity to appear before them, at fourteen days warning whenever cited (r) Upon his releaſe, he retir'd to Snelſton in Derbyſhire, and among the reſt of his friends in Staffordſhire and Nottinghamſhire; whence, from his own purſe, and from collections made by him amongſt the Royaliſts, he ſent conſtant ſupplies of money to King Charles II. abroad, and follow'd his ſtudies and devotions 'till matters tended to a happy Reſtoration. J. Palmer, the intruder into his Wardenſhip, dying March 4. 1659-60; he became of courſe Warden again, without however taking repoſſeſſion, and continued ſo 'till the January following (s). He became then alſo poſſeſs'd of the Maſterſhip of the Savoy [C], which he kept 'till 1663. On King Charles the Second's return, he met his Majeſty at Canterbury, and was ſoon after made Dean of the Chapel royal; as alſo, upon biſhop Juxon's tranſlation to Canterbury, advanced in his room to the Biſhopric of London, and conſecrated October 28. 1660 (t) [D]. But in effect he governed the whole Province of Canterbury, by reaſon of Archbiſhop Juxon's great age and infirmities (u). He was likewiſe ſworn a privy Counſellor (w). In 1661, the famous Conference between ſome of the Epiſcopal Clergy and Preſbyterian Divines, concerning alterations to be made in the Liturgy, was held at his lodgings in the Savoy [E]. His conduct there and afterwards, is blamed by the Preſbyterians [F]. While he was but in many other buſineſſes of importance, in which that Lord was nearly concerned. The Earl of Clarendon, from whom we have this particular, adds †, that when Dr Sheldon was afterwards Warden of All-Souls college in Oxford, he then was looked upon, as very equal to any preferment the Church could yield, or hath ſince yielded unto him; and Sir Francis Wenman would often ſay, when the Doctor reſorted to the converſation at the Lord Falkland's houſe, as he frequently did, that 'Dr Sheldon was born, and bred 'to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury.'

[B] And witneſs to a remarkable vow made by his Majeſty.] It was firſt made public by Mr Echard (z), who gives this account of the occaſion of making it. ——'In the midſt of theſe uncommon difficulties, 'the pious King, as it were reflecting upon his conceſſions relating to the Churches of Scotland and 'England, and being extremely tender in caſe of ſacrilegious encroachments, wrote and ſigned this extraordinary vow, which was never yet publiſhed. I 'do here promiſe and ſolemnly vow, in the preſence 'and for the ſervice of almighty God, that if it ſhall 'pleaſe the divine Majeſty, of his infinite Goodneſs 'to reſtore me to my juſt kingly rights, and to re'eſtabliſh me in my throne, I will wholly give back 'to his Church all thoſe Impropriations which are 'now held by the Crown; and what lands ſoever I 'do now, or ſhould enjoy, which have been taken 'away either from any Epiſcopal ſee, or any Cathe'dral or Collegiate Church, from any Abby, or other 'religious houſe. I likewiſe promiſe for hereafter to 'hold them from the Church, under ſuch reaſon'able Fines and Rents as ſhall be ſet down by ſome 'conſcientious perſons, whom I propoſe to chuſe with 'all uprightneſs of heart, to direct me in this parti'cular. And I moſt humbly beſeech God to accept 'of this my Vow, and to bleſs me in the deſign I 'have now in hand, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord 'Amen.

'done 'till they had brought in all that they had to ſay 'againſt it in writing, and all the additional Forms and 'Alterations which they deſir'd.' The Miniſters moved for an Amicable Conference, according to the Commiſſion, as thinking it more likely to contribute to diſpatch, and to the anſwering the great end: Whereas, writing would be a tedious endleſs buſineſs, and prevent that familiarity and acquaintance with each others minds, which might facilitate concord. [F] His conduct there, and afterwards, is blamed by the Preſbyterians.] They accuſe him of too much rigidneſs; and tell the following ſtories of him. —— 'In the convocation holden in 1661. Dr Allen of Huntingdonſhire, clerk in that convocation, laboured with Him, to have the Liturgy ſo reformed, as that no ſober man might make exception. But Biſhop Sheldon deſir'd him to forbear; "for, what ſhould be, was concluded on, or reſolv'd." (6) —— Likewiſe, That when the Lord Chamberlain Mancheſter told the King, while the Act of Uniformity was under debate, 'He was afraid the terms of it were ſo rigid, that 'many of the Miniſters would not comply with it;' The Biſhop, then preſent, replied, 'I am afraid, they 'will.'——Moreover, that he ſhould ſay, 'Now we 'know their minds, we'll make them all Knaves if 'they conform (7).'

Upon its being debated in Council, in Auguſt 1662, Whether the Act of Uniformity ſhould be punctually executed on the 24th of that month, or ſuſpended for a while: Our Biſhop preſſed the execution of it. 'England, ſaid he, was accuſtomed to obey laws: 'So while they ſtood on that ground, they were ſafe, 'and needed fear none of the dangers that ſeemed to 'be threatened: He alſo undertook to fill all the va-'cant pulpits, that ſhould be forſaken in London, 'better and more to the ſatisfaction of the people, 'than they had been before: And he ſeemed to appre-'hend, that a very ſmall number would fall under 'the deprivation, and that the groſs of the party 'would conform. On the other hand, thoſe who led 'the party took great pains to have them all ſtick to-'gether (8).' —— Biſhop Parker relates this matter ſomewhat more fully (9). —— 'The Council, ſaith he, 'being held, Biſhop Sheldon came of his own accord '(for he was not yet called to the Privy-Council) and 'pleaded for the Law, with that ſharpneſs of wit, 'that copious eloquence, and that weight of reaſon, 'that he did not ſo much perſuade, as command, the 'aſſent of the King, the Duke, the Council, and all 'that were preſent, and almoſt even the petitioners 'themſelves to his opinion. He told them, that the 'ſuſpenſion of the law came almoſt too late, that by 'the command of that law he had ejected all who 'had not obey'd it in his dioceſe the Sunday before, 'by which he had ſo provok'd their anger and hatred, 'that if they were again reſtor'd, he ſhould not live 'henceforward in a ſociety of Clergy, but in the jaws 'of his enemies; neither could he dare to contradict 'a law that was paſſed with ſo great approbation of 'all good men, ſo general a conſent of Parliament, 'and with ſo much deliberation. And further, that 'if at that time ſo ſacred a Law ſhould be repealed, 'it would expoſe the lawgivers to the ſport and ſcorn 'of the faction. And laſtly, that the State and 'Church would never be free from diſorders and diſ-'turbances, if factious men could extort whatever 'they deſir'd by their impudence and importunity.'

Our Prelate is alſo blamed by the Preſbyterians, for a circular Letter ſent by him to his ſuffragans, in 1670, for promoting the execution of the Conventicle-act (10).

But a perſon highly provok'd, and very much injur'd, as he certainly had been, could not act with that coolneſs about matters which he thought of the utmoſt Importance, as his natural temper would have prompted him to. And, after all, are his ſufferings to be abſolutely forgotten?

[G] In 1663. he was tranſlated to the Archbiſhopric of Canterbury.] The congé d'eſlire was granted July 14. and he was elected Auguſt 11. and confirm'd the 31ſt of that month.

[I] But his moſt ſumptuous and conſiderable work was the magnificent Theatre at Oxford.] The learned and ingenious Dr Lowth, juſtly celebrates his Munificence diſplayed in that noble edifice, in theſe elegant words. —— 'Quid denique hoc ipſum 'Theatrum, Viri graviſſimi atque ſanctiſſimi Gilberti 'Sheldoni Cantuarienſis Archiepiſcopi ſingulari conſtruc-'tum Munificentia? munus dignum auctore, —— quod 'cum intueor et circumſpicio, videor mihi in ipſa 'Roma, vel in mediis Athenis, antiquis illis et cum 'maxime florentibus, verſari; niſi quod, fidenter hoc 'dico, neque Roma neque Athenæ tale tantumque 'Gymnaſium Muſis et Apollini ſuo conſecratum un-'quam habuerunt —— (12).

[K] He is ſaid to have adviſed, among others, the removal of Lord Chancellor Clarendon:] Our author for this particular, is Biſhop Burnet (13); though indeed his words are not very clear, but rather ambiguous. After ſaying, that King Charles II. had reſolved to take the Seals from Lord Clarendon; he goes on thus. —— 'The King ſaid to the Lord Lau-'derdale, that he had talked of the matter with Shel-'don; and that he (14) convinced him, that it was 'neceſſary to remove Lord Clarendon from his poſt. 'And, as ſoon as it was done, the King ſent for 'Sheldon, and told him what he had done. But he 'anſwered nothing. When the King inſiſted to ob-'lige him to declare himſelf, he ſaid, "Sir, I wiſh "you would put away this woman that you keep." 'The King upon that replied ſharply, why had he 'never talked to him of that ſooner, but took this 'occaſion now to ſpeak of it. Lauderdale told me, 'he versity of Oxford (d). The same year, he lost the King's confidence for advising him to put away his mistress Barbara Villiers, and could never recover it again (e). On the 31st of July 1669, he resigned the place of Chancellor of the university of Oxford, and retired from public business; with the inward satisfaction of having served the university with as much affection, and a munificence almost equal to any of his predecessors (f). For the last years of his life, he resided chiefly at his palace of Croydon (g). Having filled the see of Canterbury with great honour and reputation for above fourteen years, he dyed at Lambeth, November 9. 1677, in the eightieth year of his age; and, according to his own direction, was buried in Croydon-church in Surrey (h): where a stately monument was soon after erected to his memory [L], by his nephew and heir Sir Joseph Sheldon, then lately Lord Mayor of London, son of his elder brother Ralph Sheldon of Stanton (i). His works of piety and charity were many [M]. And the rest of his character is given below [N]. He never published any thing but 'A Sermon preached before this distinguishing style, To my old and faithful servant.

[N] And the rest of his character is given below.] It is thus drawn by Dr Samuel Parker, Bishop of Oxford, who had been his Chaplain (17). 'He was a 'man of undoubted Piety; but though he was very 'assiduous at Prayers, yet he did not set so great a 'value upon them as others did, nor regarded so 'much Worship as the use of Worship, placing the 'chief point of religion in the practice of a good 'life. In his daily discourse he cautioned those about 'him, not to deceive themselves with an half religion, 'nor to think that divine Worship was confined within 'the walls of the Church, the principal part of it 'being without doors, and consisting in being con-'versant with mankind. If men led an upright, 'sober, chaste life, then and not 'till then they might 'look upon themselves as Religious; otherwise it 'would signify nothing what form of religion bad 'men followed, or to what Church they belonged. 'Therefore having spoken to this effect, he added 'with a kind of exultation and joy, Do well, and rejoice.——His advice to young Noblemen and Gentlemen, who by their parents commands resorted 'daily to him, was always this; Let it be your principal care to become honest men, and afterwards be as devout and religious as you will. No Piety will be of any advantage to yourselves or any body else, unless you are honest and moral men. He had a great 'aversion to all pretences to extraordinary Piety, which 'covered real dishonesty; but had a sincere affection for 'those, whose religion was attended with integrity of 'manners. His worthy notions of religion meeting 'with an excellent temper in him, gave him that 'even Tranquillity of mind, by which he was still 'himself, and always the same in adversity as well as 'in prosperity; and neither over-rated nor despised 'life, nor feared nor wished for death, but lived 'agreeably to himself and others. From this Tranquillity of Mind naturally arose a courteous behaviour. His Conversation was easy; he never sent 'any man away discontented; among his domestics 'he was both pleasant and grave, and governed his 'family with authority and courtesy.——His Generosity was such, that besides what he did in a private condition, (in which he redeemed the family 'estate, which his elder brother had wasted, for the 'children of the deceased,) after he was advanced to 'the episcopal throne he laid out thirty seven thousand pounds in works of Charity and Piety, and yet 'managed his own affairs with such prudence, that 'he left a considerable estate and a great deal of ready 'money to his heirs, and at the same time bequeathed 'to every one of his servants large pensions for their 'lives.'——Bishop Burnet does not give him so favorable a character (18): It is as follows.——'Sheldon 'was esteemed a learned man before the wars: But he 'was now engaged so deep in politicks, that scarce 'any prints of what he had been remained. He was 'a very dextrous man in business, had a great quickness of apprehension, and a very true judgment. 'He was a generous and charitable man. He had a 'great pleasantness of conversation, perhaps too 'great. He had an art, that was peculiar to him, 'of treating all that came to him in a most obliging 'manner: But few depended much on his professions 'of friendship. He seemed not to have a deep sense 'of religion, if any at all *: And spoke of it most 'commonly as of an engine of government, and a 'matter of policy. By this means the King came to 'look

SHERBURNE [Sir EDWARD] a learned and ingenious Writer in the XVIIth century, was deſcended from an ancient and genteel family of his name at Stonyhurſt in Lancaſhire. But his grandfather Henry Sherburne becoming a retainer to Corpus Chriſti college in Oxford (a) ſettled there, and had iſſue among other children, Edward Sherburne, who being made Clerk of the Ordnance, reſided in Goldſmith's-rents, near Red croſs ſtreet, in the Pariſh of St. Giles Cripplegate, London, where the ſubject of the preſent memoir was born, on the 18th of September, 1618. He received the firſt part of his education from Mr Thomas Farnabie [A] who then taught a grammar-ſchool in Goldſmith's rents: And

[A] Mr Thomas Farnabie.] This gentleman who we are told was the moſt noted ſchoolmaſter of his time, deſerves, on account of the importance of that laborious employment to the public, ſome further notice. His life was alſo chequered with a variety of uncommon incidents. He was the ſon of Thomas Farnabie, Carpenter of London, (2) where he was born about 1575. He became a ſtudent in Merton college in 1590. and being a youth of great hopes was made by one of the Fellows, Mr Thomas French, his poſtmaſter, and conſequently his ſervitor (3); but being very wild he left the college, was ſeduced by the Jeſuits, went into Spain, and was for ſome time educated in one of their ſeminaries there; 'till growing weary of their ſevere diſcipline, he found a way to leave them, and went with Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins in their laſt voyage in 1595, being in ſome eſteem with the former. He afterwards became a ſoldier in the Low-Countries, and was reduced to great poverty, but found means to be ſet on ſhore in the weſt of England; where, after wandering about under the name of Thomas Bainrafe (4), he ſettled at Martock in Somerſetſhire, and taught the grammar-ſchool there for ſome time with good ſucceſs; as appears from hence, that in the year 1646. there was in that town and neighbourhood, many that had been his ſcholars, ingenious men and good grammarians, even in their grey hairs, among whom it was then reported, that when he landed in Cornwall, his diſtreſſes made him ſtoop ſo low as to be an Abcdarian, ſeveral being taught their horn-books by him. After he had gotten ſome feathers at Martock, he took his flight to London, and taught a long time in Goldſmith's-rents, as above mentioned; where he had large gardens and handſome houſes, with great accommodations for young noblemen and gentlemen, who at one time made up the number of 300 or more. The ſchool-houſe was a large brick building, divided into ſeveral partitions or apartments, according to the diſtinctions of the forms and claſſes under the care of the reſpective uſhers allotted to attend them. While he taught here he was made Maſter of Arts at Cambridge, and ſoon after incorporated at Oxford. At length upon ſome diſagreement with his landlords, and frequent ſickneſſes

And upon that eminent master's removal to Sevenoak in Kent in 1636, Mr Sherburne engaged his uther, Mr Charles Aleyn (b), a very ingenious gentleman, who had been bred at Sidney-college in Cambridge (c), to instruct his son in his own house But his preceptor dying in 1640, it was resolved to send his pupil, who was now two and twenty years of age, to compleat his education by travelling into foreign parts. Accordingly he went to France about Christmas the same year, and having visited the most considerable places in that kingdom, was preparing to set out for Italy, when the unhappy news of his father's illness brought him home. The old gentleman did not survive his return many weeks. However upon his death, which happened a few days before Christmas 1641, his son succeeded to the Clerkship of his Majesty's ordnance, the patent being granted to him on the 5th of February following (d). But the condition of the times did not suffer his continuance in this post: Upon the breaking out of the civil war he was found too firmly attached to the King's interest for the designs of the opposite party, and being a papist, was ejected by warrant from the House of Lords, in April or May 1642. He was also committed to the custody of the black rod, and lay there at great expence 'till October, when regaining his liberty, he immediately betook himself to his royal master, who repaired his loss in the best manner he was then able, by making him commissary general of the artillery. In that post he served his Majesty at the Battle of Edge-hill the same month, and attending him afterwards to Oxford, was there created master of arts on the 20th of December This situation was very favourable to Mr Sherburne's taste and turn to letters, and he made use of the opportunity it gave him to prosecute his studies [B] with advantage, nesses in the city, he removed about 1616. to Sevenoak in Kent, having purchased an estate at Otford in that neighbourhood. Here he kept a boarding-school, and taught the sons of several noblemen and gentlemen, was greatly esteemed, grew rich, purchased an estate there also, and another near Hortham in Sussex Upon the dawning of the civil war he was deemed ill affected to the parliament party (e), and being afterwards suspected to have favoured the rising of the country for the King about Tunbridge in 1643, he was imprisoned first in Newgate, and thence put on board a ship, it being then moved in the House of Commons to send him to America; but that motion being at last rejected, he was removed to Ely-house in Holbourn, where he remained for about a year before his death, which happened in 1647. He was buried in the chancel of the church at Sevenoak, with this epitaph over his grave. *P. M. (e) When the Protestation was urged in 1641, he said it was better to have one King than five hundred. The design of this Protestation may be seen in Salmon's Chron. Hist. under 1641.

By his first wife Susan, daughter of John Pierce of Launcells in Cornwall, he had a son named John, who became a Captain in the King's army; to this son he left his estate in Sussex, where he lived in good esteem, dying about 1673. By his second wife Anne, daughter of Dr John Howson, Bishop of Durham he had several children, one of which was named Francis, to whom he left his estate at Kippington, in the parish of Sevenoak, where he was living about 1700, in good repute. To him we are indebted for several particulars in this narrative, as Mr. Wood informs us, who gives Mr Farnabie for the chief Grammarian, Rhetorician, Poet, Latinist, and Grecian of his time, and tells us, that out of his school there issued more churchmen and statesmen than from any other school taught by one man in England. His memory is celebrated by several authors, as John Dunbar (6), Richard Bruch (7), and others. He published several books at London, for the use of schools, among which are Notæ ad Senecæ tragœdias (8), 1613. 8vo Notæ ad Senecæ tragœdias, 1612. 8vo. Notæ ad Martialis Epigrammata, 1615. 8vo. [B] He prosecuted his studies at Oxford.] As several others did, says our Antiquary, who, among the rest, particularly mentions Captain or Sir George Wharton, as having a place as well as Mr Sherburne in the artillery at Oxford: we shall therefore take this opportunity of supplying what may be thought an omission in the article of Lilly the astrologer, by the following account, in which will be found some entertaining incidents. Mr Wood informs us *, that Sir George was descended from an ancient and genteel family in Westmoreland, and born at Kirby Kendal in that county, April 4, 1617, spent some time as a sojourner at Oxford in 1633, and after then retiring to his patrimony, he cultivated his genius for astronomy, being assisted by William Milbourne curate at Brafferton, near Durham, and published almanacks by the name of George Naworth (9); but upon the growing rebellion he turned all his inheritance into money, and raised a gallant troop of horse in his Majesty's service. After several generous hazards of his person in battle, he was at last totally routed in March 1645. near Stow on the Would in Gloucestershire, where the valiant Sir Jacob Astley was taken prisoner, and Sir George received several scars of honour which he carried to his grave. Upon this misfortune he retired to Oxford to his Majesty, who, in recompence of his losses, made him treasurer and paymaster to the artillery under Sir John Heydon. Here at leisure hours he followed his studies, was entered of Queen's college, and might have been created Master of Arts, but neglected it †. After the surrendry of Oxford, he retired to London, and, living privately, wrote several small pieces for a livelihood. But these giving offence to the then prevailing powers (1), he was often seized and imprisoned, as in the Gatehouse, Westminster, Newgate, and at length in Windsor Castle, when, being further threatened, he found a friend in Lilly the astrologer, though his antagonist in that art (a). After the Restoration he became treasurer and paymaster to the office of ordnance, generously

(10) His Almanacks were seasoned with satirical epigrams, reflecting on the times and persons of the rebels, as he called them. Of the same stamp was his Mercurius Elenchus, begun in 1647 and in 1648, he printed a list of those members of the House of Commons, as were officers of the army, contrary to the self denying ordinance, &c.

(a) Our author began the war with an attack upon Booker, in a piece intituled, Mercurio-cælica Mastix: or, an Anticaveat to all such as have heretofore had the misfortune to be cheated and deluded by that great and traiterous impostor, John Booker, in an answer to his frivolous pamphlet, entituled Mercurius Cælicus: or, a Caveat to all the People of England. Oxon. 1644, in 4to. The blow was seconded in his Astrological Judgment upon his Majesty's march from Oxford, 7 of May, 1645, 4to wherein he fell severely both on Booker and Lilly. This piece being sent from Oxford to Sir Samuel Luke (a), Governor of Newport-Pagnel, was presented advantage, as far as the duties of his poſt would permit, in which he continued to ſerve his royal maſter with unintermitting fidelity, during the four years of the civil wars. Upon the ſurrendry of Oxford to the Parliament in June 1646, he went to London, where he was entertained by a near relation, John Povey, Eſq; at his chambers in the Middle Temple. He was now reduced to the ſtate of a perfect philoſopher, and carried all his poſſeſſions about him, his eſtate being ſeized by the antiroyaliſts, his houſe plundered, and all his perſonal effects and houſehold goods carried off, among which was an ample and very valuable collection of books. And he was, even in this privacy, ſtill perſecuted with frequent midnight ſearches, and proclamation baniſhments out of the lines of communication as a malignant. In this diſtreſsful condition he felt the uſe and advantage of his learning; to this dernier reſort he recurred, and had now the happineſs to meet with his kinſman the learned and ingenious Thomas Stanley, Eſq; who was a ſufferer in the ſame cauſe, and had taken up his reſidence in chambers near thoſe of Mr Povey. This was the firſt time they had ſeen one another (e), and the enjoyment became exquiſite, by an unreſerved communication and a lucky affinity of ſtudies. Our author had not long finiſhed a collection of poems and tranſlations, upon which this friend wrote an excellent copy of commendatory verſes [C]; when Sir George Savile, afterwards Marquis of preſented to Lilly, who publiſhed an anſwer to it, together with his Starry Meſſenger, the ſame year (b). In return to which, Sir George, in his Almanack for that year, called Lilly an impudent and ſenſeleſs fellow. Hereupon Lilly, who had been more inclined before to the intereſts of the King, now devoted himſelf entirely to the Parliament, and made repriſals upon Sir George, in his Almanack for the ſame year; wherein, from the King's nativity, he predicted his fatal overthrow at Naſeby, in theſe words: If now [in June] we fight, a victory ſtealeth upon us (c). Sir George concluded the conteſt by a general ſtorm, in a piece intituled, Merlini Anglici Errata: or, The Errors, Miſtakes, &c. of Mr William Lilly's new Ephemeris for 1647, printed in that year.

generouſly repaid Lilly's courteſy, and out of the gains of his place having raiſed money to purchaſe an eſtate, he was created a Baronet, by patent dated December 31, 1677, which title deſcended to his ſon and heir, Sir Polycarp Wharton. He died at his houſe in Enfield, Middleſex, Auguſt 12, 1681, leaving behind him the character of a moſt loyal and generous cavalier, ſays Mr Wood, who further tells us, that Sir George was always eſteemed the beſt aſtrologer that wrote the Ephemerides of his time, and went beyond Lilly and Booker (11), the idols of the vulgar; was a boon companion, a witty droll, and a waggiſh poet. Beſides his aſtrological pieces, he publiſhed ſeveral others: the greateſt part of his pieces were reprinted in 1683, 8vo, by John Gadbury, the almanack-maker, who being born at Wheatly, near Oxford, in 1627, and bound apprentice to a Taylor in that city, left his maſter after the great fire there in 1644, and having a natural genius to almanack-making, improved it at London, under Lilly, and afterwards ſet up that trade, jointly with it's conſort of fortune-telling, for himſelf (12).

One of our author's aſtrological pieces, intituled, The cabal of the twelve houſes, from Morinus (13), has a recommendation annexed to it, ſigned William Oughtred, and dated October 16, 1659, in theſe terms. 'The cabal of the celeſtial houſes, both for the number thereof, and for their ſignification, moſt accurately here firſt deſcribed by the learned author, being the 'greateſt ſcience aſtrological, I do very much applaud 'and admire, as having not thought that ſo much reaſon, and ſuch natural correſpondencies, could have 'been had in divers of theſe ſublime myſteries' We therefore take this firſt opportunity of acknowledging our miſtake in that eminent Mathematician's article (14).

Morinus, or John Baptiſt Morin, who was born in France, in 1583, was undeniably one of the moſt infatuated aſtrologers of his time; he aſcribed all kinds of events to the influence of the ſtars; he even took a diſguſt to Phyſic, to which he was bred, becauſe of the uncertainty he found in it, and applied himſelf to Aſtrology, as abſolutely certain; and it is certain he made a good hand of the trade; for he acquired a fortune of 4000 livres * a year by it, which was a great eſtate at that time, and had a penſion of 2000 livres ſettled upon him by Cardinal Mazarin. It is worth obſerving, that he incurred the like ridicule to that of his brother Aſtrologer Lilly (15). The ſtory is this: Morin having ſucceeded Mr Sinclair in the poſt of Regius Profeſſor of Mathematics in 1630, reſolved to ſucceed him in his bed and money alſo, the widow being left rich. Accordingly he was upon his way to viſit the lady, in that deſign, for the firſt time; when he was ſtruck with great conſternation, on finding the gate hung with black, and learning from the neighbours, that the perſon he was enquiring after would ſoon be interred (16). Surely he had not conſulted the ſtars before he ſet out, or elſe he had not caſt his figure right.

[C] His relation to Mr Stanley, was endeared by an affinity of ſtudies, &c.] The relation between them probably aroſe by Sir Edward's mother, Frances, the ſecond daughter of John Stanley, ſome time of Roydon-Hall in the county of Eſſex, Eſq; deſcended from the Stanleys of Houghton in Cheſhire (17). The affinity of their ſtudies appears from the fruits of them, eſpecially in this interval. Mr Stanley's may be ſeen in his article; and thoſe of our author are, (1.) Medea, a tragedy. Lond. 1648, 8vo, tranſlated from the Latin of Seneca into Engliſh verſe, with annotations. (2.) Seneca's Anſwer to Lucilius his Quære, Why good men ſuffer misfortunes, ſeeing there is a divine Providence? Lond. 1648. The tranſlation is in Engliſh verſe, and was dedicated to King Charles the Firſt, during his captivity in the Iſle of Wight, who moſt graciouſly approved and accepted it *. (3.) Salmacis, Lyrian and Sylvia, Forſaken Lydia, The Rape of Helen, A Comment thereon, with ſeveral other poems. Lond. 1651, 8vo. The firſt three are tranſlations in verſe from the Italian of Preti, the French of St Amand, and the Italian of Morino. The Rape of Helen is from the Greek of Coluthus, and the annotations to it diſcover an ample fund of learning, which is very ingeniouſly applied. The Greek poet was a native of Lycopolis in the Thebaide, and flouriſhed under the empire of Anaſtaſius, between 491 and 518. All we have left of him is this poem, and it is no conſiderable performance (18). However, beſides the Engliſh verſion, it has been ſince tranſlated into French by M. du Molard, and publiſhed in 1742, with annotations; and ſince that, a new edition of the original was printed at Leyden, as I am informed, a few years ago. It was upon theſe tranſlations, that Mr Stanley complimented his friend, in the verſes mentioned above, which begin thus:

The reſt of Mr Sherburne's book is divided into what he calls Ludicra and Ethica, the former of which might have been entitled Love Poems, as well as Mr Stanley's, all the original pieces being ſuch; and in them he has ſhewn himſelf a great maſter of the rythmus: in the variety of his meaſures he even rivals Horace. The reſt are tranſlations from Theocritus, Horace, Martial, Auſonius, Marino, and ſome others. The laſt part is juſtly ſtiled Ethica, as conſiſting of ſerious poems both moral and divine. It will not be amiſs, as the book is ſomewhat ſcarce, to give the reader a ſpecimen, by way of taſte, of Mr Sherburne's poetry, as follows:

On Chloris eyes and breaſts.

Chloris, on thine eyes I gaz'd,
When amaz'd
At their brightneſs;
On thy breaſts I caſt my look,
No leſs took
With their whiteneſs:
Both I juſtly did admire;
Theſe all ſnow, and thoſe all fire.

Whilſt theſe wonders I ſurvey'd,
Thus I ſaid,
In much ſuſpence;
Nature could have done no leſs
To expreſs
Her Providence,
Than that two ſuch fair worlds might
Have two ſuns to give them light.

[D] He was made ſuperintendant of Lord Halifax's, then Sir George Savile's, affairs.] This nobleman, who was as great a Stateſman as any of his time ‖, was deſcended from a family of great antiquity in Yorkſhire, ſome of whom had matched with the heirs of Rochelas, Gother, Tankerſley, Rochdale, Latham, and Ruſhworth, and other worthy families, before the reign of Richard II. About which time Sir John Savile, the legal heir in the ninth generation, married Iſabel, daughter and heir to Thomas Eland, of Eland, in the ſame county, by whom he had diverſe ſons; but the line of the eldeſt failing, the deſcent was continued in Henry his ſecond ſon, who marrying the daughter and heir of Simon Thornhill, of Thornhill, had iſſue by her, Sir Thomas Savile, father of Sir John Savile, Lord of Thornhill, Eland, and Tankerſley. This Sir John, beſides others, had two ſons, the eldeſt of whom was Sir John Savile of Eland, of whom proceeded the Saviles Earls of Suſſex. The ſecond ſon was Thomas Savile of Lupſet, whoſe grandſon Henry was Sheriff of Yorkſhire, and of the council for the North in the time of Queen Elizabeth. This Henry, by the daughter and heir of William Vernon, of Barrowby in Leiceſterſhire, had iſſue Sir George Savile of Thornhill, Knight and Baronet, who by Mary, daughter to George Earl of Shrewſbury, had iſſue a ſecond Sir George, Knight, who dying in his father's life-time, had iſſue Sir George Savile, who ſucceeded to the title and eſtate; but dying without iſſue, was ſucceeded by his brother Sir William Savile This Sir William marrying Anne daughter of Thomas Lord Coventry, Keeper of the Great Seal, became father to Sir George Savile (19), the ſubject of the preſent remark; who was probably born about 1630, as is conjectured from the time of returning from his travels abovementioned. He contributed all he could to bring about the Reſtoration, and ſoon diſtinguiſhing himſelf after that æra by his great abilities, was created a peer, in conſideration of his own and his father's merits to the crown ‡. In 1668, he was appointed of that remarkable Committee, who ſat at Brook-hall for the examination of the accounts of the money, which had been given during the Dutch war (20), of which no member of the Houſe of Commons was admitted. In April 1673, he was called to a ſeat in the Privy-Council and in June following went into Holland with the Duke of Bucks and the Earl of Arlington, as Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary (21), to treat about a peace with France, when he met with great oppoſition from his colleagues. In 1675, he oppoſed with vigour the non-reſiſting teſt bill, and was removed from the council-board the year following, by the intereſt of the Earl of Danby the Treaſurer, whom he had provoked by a ſhaft of his wit. In the examinations before the council, concerning the revenue of Ireland, in which Lord Widdrington having confeſſed that he had made an offer of a conſiderable ſum of money to the Lord Treaſurer, and that his Lordſhip had rejected the offer mildly, in ſuch a manner as not to diſcourage a ſecond attempt; Lord Halifax obſerved upon this, that it would be ſomewhat ſtrange if a man ſhould aſk the uſe of another man's wife, and the other ſhould indeed refuſe it, but with great civility. His removal was very agreeable to the Duke of York, who at that time had a more violent averſion to him, than even to Shafteſbury himſelf, becauſe he had ſpoke with great firmneſs and ſpirit in the Houſe of Lords, againſt the declaration for a Toleration †. However, upon a change of the miniſtry in 1679, his Lordſhip was made a member of the new council (22). And the ſame year in the conſultations about the bill of excluſion, he ſeemed averſe to it, but propoſed ſuch limitations of the Duke's authority, as ſhould diſable him from doing any harm either in church or ſtate; ſuch as the taking out of his hands all power in eccleſiaſtical matters, the diſpoſal of the public money, and the power of making peace or war, and lodging theſe in the two Houſes of Parliament; and that the Parliament in being at the King's death, ſhould continue without a new ſummons, and aſſume the adminiſtration. But his Lordſhip's arguing ſo much againſt the danger of turning the monarchy by the bill of excluſion into an elective government, was thought the more extraordinary, becauſe he had made an hereditary King the ſubject of his mirth, heightened with this witty ſaw, 'Who takes a coachman to drive him, becauſe his father was a good coachman?' Yet he was now jealous of a ſmall ſlip in the ſucceſſion, though at the ſame time he ſtudied to infuſe into ſome perſons a zeal for a commonwealth, pretending to theſe that he preferred limitations to an excluſion, becauſe the one kept up the monarchy ſtill, only paſſing over one perſon, whereas the other really introduced a commonwealth, as ſoon as there was a Popiſh king upon the throne. And it was ſaid by ſome of his friends, that the limitations propoſed were ſo advantageous to public liberty, that a man might be tempted to wiſh for a Popiſh king in order to obtain them. Upon this difference of opinions, a faction was quickly formed in the new council, Halifax, Eſſex, and Sunderland, declaring for limitations, and againſt the excluſion, while Shafteſbury was equally zealous for the latter. When the bill was brought into the Houſe of Lords, Halifax appeared with great reſolution at the head of the debates againſt it: This ſo highly exaſperated the Houſe of Commons, that they addreſſed the King to remove him from his councils and preſence for ever. But he prevailed with his Majeſty ſoon after to diſſolve that parliament, and was created an Earl. However, upon his Majeſty's deferring to call a new parliament according to his promiſe to his Lordſhip, he fell ſick through vexation of mind, and expoſtulated ſeverely with thoſe who were ſent to him upon that affair, refuſing the poſt both of Secretary of State, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. A parliament being called in 1680, he ſtill oppoſed the excluſion bill, and gained great reputation by his management of the debates, though it occaſioned a new addreſs from the Houſe of Commons to ſome time after Mr Sherburne was appointed to attend her nephew Sir John Coventry, as his tutor or governor in his travels abroad. He left England with this charge in the beginning of March 1654, and having viſited all parts of France, proceeded to Italy, ſome part of Hungary, the greater part of Germany, Holland, and the reſt of the Low-Countries, and returned about the end of October, 1659, in the dawn of the Reſtoration. Mr Wood, who ſeems to have had ſome perſonal knowledge of him, tells us, that he made the beſt uſe of this tour in improving himſelf in polite literature, and leads us to infer, that he was a completely genteel ſcholar. When he put in his claim for his place in the ordnance the next year, the Oxford Antiquary, on this occaſion, treats with his uſual rudeneſs (f), Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, afterwards Lord Shafteſbury, who, he informs us, though a relation of Mr Sherburne's late pupil, had put another into his place, after his old ſequeſtrators were dead, ſo that he was obliged to be at the expence of pleading his right before the houſe of peers, before he could get readmittance. The ſame hiſtorian likewiſe informs us, that after ſome time of the King's ſettlement, Mr Sherburne to remove him. However, after rejecting that Bill in the Houſe of Lords, his Lordſhip preſſed them, though without ſucceſs, to proceed to limitations, and begun with moving that the Duke might be obliged to live 500 miles out of England during the King's life ‖. In Auguſt 1682, he was created a marquis; and ſoon after made Privy-Seal; and upon King James's acceſſion, Preſident of the Council: but on refuſing his conſent to the repeal of the teſts, he was told by that monarch, that though he could never forget his paſt ſervices, yet ſince he would not comply in that point, he was reſolved to have all of a piece, and ſo his Lordſhip was diſmiſſed from all public employments. He was afterwards conſulted by Mr Sidney, whether he would adviſe the Prince of Orange's coming over, but the matter being opened to him at a great diſtance, he did not encourage a further freedom; looking on the attempt as impracticable, ſince it depended on ſo many accidents ‡. Upon the arrival of that Prince, he was ſent by the King, with the Earls of Rocheſter and Godolphin, to treat with him, then at Hungerford. In that aſſembly of the Lords, which met after King James's withdrawing himſelf the firſt time from Whitehall, the Marquis was choſen their preſident; and upon the King's return from Feverſham, he was ſent together with the Earl of Shrewſbury and Lord Delamere, from the Prince, ordering his Majeſty to quit his palace at Whitehall, and retire to Hull *. In the Convention-parliament he was choſen Speaker of the Houſe of Lords, and ſtrenuouſly ſupported the motion for the vacancy of the throne, and the conjunctive Sovereignty of the Prince and Princeſs, upon whoſe acceſſion he was again made Privy-Seal §; but in the ſeſſion of 1689, upon the enquiry into the authors of the proſecutions againſt Lord Ruſſel, Algernon Sidney, &c. the Marquis having concurred in theſe councils in 1683, now quitted the court, and became a zealous oppoſer of the meaſures of the government (23) 'till his death, which happened in April 1695, being occaſioned by a gangrene in a rupture that he had long neglected. When he ſaw death inevitably approaching, he ſhewed a philoſophical firmneſs of mind, and profeſſed himſelf a ſincere Chriſtian, lamenting the former part of his life, with ſolemn reſolutions of becoming a new man if God would raiſe him up †. Biſhop Burnet characterizes him as follows. 'He was a man of great and 'ready wit, full of life, and very pleaſant, much 'turned to ſatire; he let his wit turn upon matters of 'religion, ſo that he paſſed for a bold and determined 'atheiſt, though he often proteſted to me, ſays the 'Biſhop, that he was not one, and ſaid he believed 'there was not one in the world. He confeſſed he 'could not ſwallow down every thing that divines im'poſe on the world, he was a Chriſtian in ſubmiſſion, 'he believed as much as he could, and hoped that 'God would not lay it to his charge, if he could not 'digeſt iron as an oſtrich did, nor take into his be'lief things that muſt burſt him. If he had any 'ſcruples they were not ſought for, nor cheriſhed by 'him, for he never read an atheiſtical book. In a fit 'of ſickneſs, continues this prelate, I knew him very 'much affected with a ſenſe of religion: I was then 'often with him, he ſeemed full of good purpoſes; 'but they went off with his ſickneſs; he was conti'nually talking of morality and friendſhip. He was 'punctual in all his payments, and juſt in all private 'dealings: but with relation to the public he went 'backward and forward, and changed ſides ſo often, 'that in the concluſion no ſide truſted him. He 'ſeemed full of commonwealth notions, yet he went 'into the worſt part of King Charles's reign. The 'livelineſs of his imagination was always too hard for 'his judgment. A ſevere jeſt was preferred by him 'to all arguments whatever; and he was endleſs in 'council, for when after much diſcourſe a point was 'ſettled, if he could find a new jeſt, whereby he 'could make that which was digeſted by himſelf ſeem 'ridiculous, he could not hold, but would ſtudy to 'raiſe the credit of his wit, though it made others 'call his judgment in queſtion. When he talked to 'me, as a philoſopher, of his contempt of the world, 'I aſked him what he meant by getting ſo many new 'titles, which I called the hanging himſelf about 'with bells and tinſel; he had no other excuſe for it 'but this, that if the world were ſuch fools as to 'value thoſe matters, a man muſt be a fool for com'pany, he conſidered them but as rattles, yet rattles 'pleaſe children, ſo theſe might be of uſe to his fa'mily. His heart was much ſet on raiſing his family; 'but though he made a vaſt eſtate for them, he buried 'two of his ſons, and almoſt all his grandchildren. 'The ſon that ſurvived him was an honeſt man, but 'far inferior to him (24, and this ſon dying without 'iſſue male Aug. 31, 1700, the dignity became extinct 'in this family, and the title of Earl of Halifax was 'revived in the perſon of Charles Montague the ſame 'year (25).'

The Marquis was twice married, firſt to Dorothy, daughter of Henry Spencer Earl of Sunderland, by whom he had iſſue Henry, William, George, and Anne. Henry married Eſther, daughter and coheir of George de la Tour *, but died in his father's life time, without iſſue (26). Anne was married to John Baron Vaughan. The Marquis's ſecond wife was Gertrude, daughter to William Pierpoint, Eſq; of Thoreſby in Nottinghamſhire, ſecond ſon to the Earl of Kingſton; by whom he had iſſue only a daughter, heir apparent to her mother, married to Philip, eldeſt ſon of Philip Stanhope Earl of Cheſterfield, and father to the preſent Earl.

His ſon William ſucceeded him in the honour and eſtate, and married alſo two wives. 1. Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Samuel Grimſton of Gorambury in Hertfordſhire, Bart. ſiſter and heir to Sir Harbottle Grimſton, by whom he had iſſue George and other children, who died infants in their father's life-time. Alſo a daughter Anne, ſole heir to her mother, and married to Thomas Bruce, ſon and heir apparent to Thomas Earl of Aylesbury. His ſecond wife was Mary, daughter to Daniel Finch Earl of Nottingham (by Eſſex, daughter and coheir to Robert Rich, Earl of Warwick and Holland), by whom he left only two daughters, Dorothy, married to the Earl of Burlington, and Mary, married to the Earl of Thanet (27).

(28) Theſe are more in number than thoſe which had been printed before.

Mr. Sherburne met with a diſcouragement worſe than the former: for by the politic reducers of the charge of his Majeſty's revenue, he was retrenched from the beſt perquiſites of his office to the value of no leſs than 500 l. per annum, and never received any conſideration more than what the King was pleaſed of his own bounty to confer upon him, which was 100 l. per annum, in compenſation of quadruple the loſs he ſuſtained. However, being unmarried, and bookiſhly inclined, he indulged that diſpoſition, and, by degrees, furniſhed himſelf with a large collection of curious books, ſo that his library was eſteemed one of the moſt conſiderable belonging to any gentleman in or near London (g). 'Twas here that he paſſed his happieſt hours, not without ſome emolument to the public. In 1675 he publiſhed at London in folio, The Sphere of Marcus Manilius, made an Engliſh poem, with annotations, and an aſtronomical index. It was intended chiefly for the uſe of the young gentry and nobility, to ſerve as an initiation in the firſt rudiments of ſpherical learning, and was thought worthy of a particular recommendation by the Royal Society [E]. In 1679 he printed likewiſe at London in 8vo, Troades; or the Royal Captives, a Tragedy (b), tranſlated from the Latin of Seneca, with annotations. About this time he ſuffered many indignities on account of the Popiſh plot, and ſeveral attempts were made to remove him from his place in the Ordnance, as a ſuſpected Papiſt. Theſe however proved ineffectual, and on the 6th of January 1682, his Majeſty, in conſideration of his loyalty and ſufferings, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, in his private bedchamber at Whitehall. But being at laſt deprived upon the Revolution, he retired, and paſſed the remainder of his days in a devout and ſtudious courſe of life near London, chearfully ſpending his time altogether in books and prayer. It appears from Mr Wood's account, that he probably ſurvived the cloſe of the laſt century, but how long is ſtill unknown (i).

He had a younger brother, Henry Sherburne, who was alſo created A. M. at the ſame time with himſelf, and was ſoon after made comptroller of the Ordnance in the army of Ralph Lord Hopton. While he reſided at Oxford he drew an exact Ichnography of that city, as it was then a garriſon for his Majeſty, with all the fortifications, &c. It was done for the uſe of Sir Thomas Glemham, then governour, who ſhewing it to the King, [E] His Manilius was recommended by the Royal Society.] Their account is printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, No. 110, in theſe terms. 'The learned 'and intelligent author of this work, rightly conſider-'ing the great importance of the mutual helps which 'the knowledge of antiquity, and the pleaſure of the 'new diſcoveries of the preſent times may afford to 'one another, thought fit to employ part of his inge-'nious talent in rendering Engliſh this antient poem; 'the famous author whereof, deſirous to inculcate 'knowledge with delight, was pleaſed to exhibit to 'the age wherein he lived, the principles of aſtronomy 'in a poetical dreſs, in which ſeveral particulars oc-'cur, touching the nature of the heavens and the ce-'leſtial bodies, that agree with the aſſertions of ſome of 'the moſt eminent modern aſtronomers: as the fluidity 'of the heavens againſt the Ariſtotelian ſolidity of the 'orbs (28), the poſition of the fixed ſtars not in the 'ſame concave ſuperficies equally diſtant from the cen-'ter of the univerſe, but at unequal diſtances in the 'ætherial region (whence the difference of their ap-'parent magnitude and ſplendor) (29), the fiery na-'ture and ſubſtance of the fixed ſtars, and conſequently 'their being endued with native luſtre (30), and the 'galaxy's being an aggregate of numberleſs ſmall 'ſtars (31). The poem begins with a ſuccinct indi-'cation of the original and progreſs of arts and ſci-'ences, more particularly of Aſtronomy; of which 'laſt, beſides what the Engliſher hath noted in his 'not common marginal illuſtrations, he hath added 'for the ſatisfaction of the more curious, a compendious 'hiſtory continued to the time of Manilius, together 'with a moſt inſtructive catalogue of the moſt emi-'nent aſtronomers, from the firſt parent of all arts 'and mankind itſelf to this preſent time. Secondly, 'the poem being carried on with a deſcription of the 'mundane ſyſtem, and the celeſtial ſigns and conſtel-'lations; the former of theſe our interpreter hath 'explained according to the various hypotheſes both 'ancient and modern, the latter he hath deſcribed by 'the number of the ſtars that compoſe them, their 'ſeveral denominations in moſt of the learned lan-'guages, and as they are diſtinguiſhed into ſacred and 'profane figures, according to the different uranography of the ancient heathens, and ſome late 'chriſtian aſtronomers. The third part of the poem 'containing a deſcription of the celeſtial circles, for 'the better underſtanding of theſe, beſides the expla-'nations in the marginal notes, our author hath added 'a coſmographical aſtronomical ſynopſis moſtly from 'Merſennus, to which is annexed the twelve propo-'ſitions of Theodoſius de Habitationibus in Engliſh. 'And Manilius having touched upon the fiery nature 'of the fixed ſtars, this interpreter hath made ſome 'further and more curious inquiries about their ſub-'ſtance, light, colour, ſcintillations, number, figure, 'magnitude, place, and diſtance from the earth, or 'rather the ſun. In the next place, the planets are enu-'merated, and the ſeveral denominations by which 'they were known and diſtinguiſhed by the Ancients. 'The interpreter hath given in his notes, further en-'larging about the nature and ſubſtance of the ſun, 'his maculæ and fæculæ (which are likewiſe repre-'ſented in a particular ſcheme) ſomething alſo being 'ſaid of his vertiginous motion, magnitude, and diſ-'tance, as alſo of the moon and her ſpots, adding 'thereto the ſelenographical ſchemes of Hevelius and 'Grimaldi, with their reſpective nomenclatures; and 'withal exhibiting a brief account of the nature, ſub-'ſtance, ſtructure, figure, magnitude, and diſtance of 'the other planets. And becauſe this poem concludes 'with a corollray of fiery meteors and comets, our au-'thor hath in part explained them alſo in his notes, 'more fully diſcourſing in the appendix, of their 'names, kinds, and ſeveral ſpecies, their matter, 'place, and efficient cauſes, adding in the cloſe a 'chronological hiſtorical table of the moſt remarkable 'comets that have appeared ſince the Flood to this 'preſent. Having in the illuſtration of the whole 'obſerved the method expreſſed by Juſtinian. Ita om-'nia videntur tradi commodiſſime, ſi primo levi ac ſim-'plici via, deinde diligentiori atque exactiori interpre-'tatione ſingula tradantur (32). Nor hath the in-'terpreter omitted to inform his reader touching Ma-'nilius's life, country quality, ſtudies, writings, &c. 'In the doing of which, as well as in compoſing the 'whole work, he hath given ſufficient proof of his 'more than ordinary acquaintance both with ancient 'and modern writings.

'He adorns the whole as with many other very fair 'ſchemes, ſo with thoſe of the two hemiſpheres of 'the ſtars, one for the northern and the other the 'ſouthern conſtellations, wherein the ſtars are ex-'preſſed according to their magnitude, as appears in 'the ſcale thereof, inſerted in the Southern hemi-'ſphere. And the conſtellations are only pricked out, 'wherein with Gallucius, the middle way is taken be-'tween not placing them in any, or repreſenting them 'in too dark ſhadowed figures, as ſome have done.'

(28) This being embraced and demonſtrated by Tycho, Galilæo, Scheinerus, and others, paſſed for a modern diſcovery.

(29) Many had taken this alſo for a novel opinion, as being lately aſſerted and maintained by the famous Kepler, Epit. Aſtron. lib. i. and other modern Aſtronomers.

(30) The proof of this is particularly laboured by Galilæo, who firſt of the Moderns maintains them to be ſo many ſuns, conformably to our ſun.

(31) This was generally thought to have been a diſcovery owing to the teleſcope, from the obſervations made therein by the ſaid Galilæo, Kepler, and others.

But he did not enjoy this favour long, being killed in a mutiny that happened among ſome of the ſoldiers in Oxford, on the 12th of June 1646; whereupon his body was interred the next day, in the church of St Peter in the Eaſt in that city (k).

SHERLOCK [WILLIAM] an eminent Divine, was born in the year 1641 (a), in Gravel-lane, Southwark (b), where his father was a tradeſman of good repute, and having a competent fortune, ſent his ſon, a boy of a promiſing genius, to Eton ſchool, where, being very induſtrious, he became remarkable for the ſtrength and vigour of his parts (c), ſo that at the age of fifteen years he was judged fit for the univerſity, and was accordingly admitted into Peter-houſe college in Cambridge in 1650 (d), where he behaved ſo well as to receive a particular encouragement in a benefaction ariſing from a ſcheme of Matthew Pool's, for maintaining young men of eminent parts at that univerſity in the ſtudy of divinity (e). With this advantage he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in the year of the Reſtoration (f), and entering into holy orders not long after, he exerciſed his faculty as a curate (g) and commenced Maſter of Arts in 1663 (h). He continued in the ſtation of a curate 'till 1669, when he was preferred to the rectory of St George's Botolph-lane, London (i). In this pariſh he diſcharged the duties of his function with a commendable zeal and piety, and was eſteemed one of the ornaments of the London Clergy [A], but being ambitious to make his character and talents more extenſively uſeful to the Church, he reſolved to expoſe in print the abſurdities of the Soliſidian and Antinomial Doctrines, which at that time ſtill prevailed among the ſectaries. To this purpoſe he publiſhed in 1673 (k), a treatiſe entituled, A diſcourſe concerning the knowledge of Chriſt, and our union and communion with him, &c. [B]. [A] He was one of the ornaments of the London Clergy.] Biſhop Burnet, ſpeaking of the different behaviour of the clergy in thoſe times, obſerves, that as there were many of that order, whom the heat of their temper and the hope of preferment drove to extravagancies [againſt the Diſſenters]; ſo there were ſtill many worthy and eminent men among them, whoſe lives and labours did in a great meaſure, reſcue the Church from thoſe reproaches that the follies of others drew upon it. Such, continues he, beſides thoſe whom I have often named, were Teniſon, Sharp, Patrick, Sherlock, Fowler, Scot, Calamy, Claget, Cudworth, the two Mores, Williams (1).

[B] Was exercited with that boldneſs which was natural to our author.] The ſolifidian and antinomial principles, from their firſt appearance in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (2), took ſuch deep rooting, and ſpread ſo wide under Cromwell's uſurpation, that they were eſpouſed by great numbers, when our author undertook this treatiſe, where having ſhewn wherein the knowledge of Chriſt conſiſts, the ſum of which is, that to know Chriſt is to underſtand his goſpel, which contains all the revelations he made of God's will; he proceeds to examine another notion of the knowledge of Chriſt, very diſtinct, he ſays, from the former, and that is an acquaintance with the perſon of Chriſt, particularly as it is ſtated in Dr John Owen's book intituled, Communion with God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, each perſon diſtinctly. He declares, that in the management of it he had carefully avoided all perſonal reflections; while his adverſaries pretended to argue gravely, he had examined their arguments with all poſſible gravity and ſolemnity: But however where they plainly toy and trifle, he had ſo far complied with their humour as to ſmile ſometimes, though as modeſtly as any man could deſire. The drollery of his manner is ſomewhat entertaining, and therefore we ſhall give a ſpecimen of it as follows. In order to give his reader a clear underſtanding of the whole deſign and contrivance of this doctrine concerning an acquaintance with the perſon of Chriſt, he puts every thing into what he calls it's juſt and natural order. God then from the beginning deſigned to glorify his juſtice, and his mercy, and becauſe there had been no occaſion either to puniſh or pardon unleſs man had ſinned, he appointed and ordained ſin for the glory of his vindictive juſtice, and pardoning grace, and accordingly ſince nothing can withſtand the decrees and appointment of God, it pleaſed God that man ſhould ſin; but when he had ſinned, God is extremely diſpleaſed with it, and now his juſtice muſt be ſatisfied; for it is impoſſible for God to forgive the leaſt ſin, without a complete and perfect ſatisfaction. This falls hard upon thoſe miſerable wretches whoſe ill fortune it was, without any fault of theirs, to be left out of the roll of election, and who have no way to ſatisfy the divine juſtice but by their eternal torments. By this it appears how rigorouſly juſt God is, that he will never pardon the leaſt ſin, when he can ſerve his own glory by the miſery and confuſion of ſinners

(2) See Archbiſhop Whitgift's article.

But this is but one part of the glory of God, to be juſt in puniſhing ſin; the other is, to ſhew mercy in ſparing and rewarding the ſinners. Now here was the great difficulty, how God ſhould be juſt and merciful too, when juſtice requires a full ſatisfaction, and mercy excludes all deſert; for the demerit of ſin being infinite, no creature can expiate ſin but by enduring infinite, that is endleſs, torments; and thoſe who muſt be always miſerable, can never be the ſubjects of God's mercy.

To unite theſe two extremes, and reconcile ſuch contradictions, was a work of infinite wiſdom as well as goodneſs, and it was effected thus: God ſends his only begotten ſon, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, into the world, to fulfil all righteouſneſs in his life and to make a full ſatisfaction for ſin by his death; for his blood being of infinite value, (as being the blood of the Son of God) would expiate an infinite guilt, and ſo make a compleat ſatisfaction to juſtice, which is more glorified by the death of Chriſt, than by the eternal miſeries of all the ſinners in the world, becauſe it diſcovers the naturalneſs of juſtice to God, which is the poſition to be maintained, that he would not pardon without full ſatisfaction; that is, that he is ſo juſt that he hath not one dram of goodneſs in him 'till his rage and vengeance be ſatisfied, which, ſays he, is, I confeſs, a glorious kind of juſtice. But now the juſtice and vengeance of God having their actions aſſigned them to the full, that is, (for I can make no better of it) being glutted and ſatiated with the blood of Chriſt, God may pardon as many and great ſins as he pleaſes, without fear of the leaſt imputation of injuſtice; and now a glorious and more comfortable ſcene of mercy begins to appear, now God embraces ſinners as a kind father, and accounts them perfectly innocent in virtue of that ſatisfaction Chriſt hath made for their ſins; but this is not enough, the law of God muſt be fulfilled as well as his juſtice ſatisfied, we muſt be righteous as well as innocent, otherwiſe we may eſcape puniſhment but can expect no reward, though I confeſs I ſhould have thought that Chriſt had ſatisfied for ſins of omiſſion, together with ſins of commiſſion, and as by his ſatisfaction for our doing what we ought not to do, we are reputed by God as having never done any thing amiſs, ſo by his ſatisfaction for our neglecting what we ought to have done, we might by the ſame reaſon be reputed by notions being executed with that boldneſs which was natural to our author's temper, preſently

by God perfectly righteous to have done all that we ought to have done, to have kept the whole law; but it ſeems this was not ſufficient, and therefore the ſatisfaction of Chriſt is imputed to us to make us perfectly righteous, and this makes the grace of God perfectly free, without any ſuſpicion of merit or deſert in us. And now God and ſinners may agree very well and walk comfortably together, for though they have guilt enough, and he juſtice enough to deſtroy a world, yet there is no danger, ſince Chriſt hath ſatisfied juſtice: and though he be infinitely holy and pure perfect light, and ſinners abominably filthy, yet there is no fear he ſhould loath and abhor them, when they are cloathed with the white and ſpotleſs robes of Chriſt's righteouſneſs; and they are ſo well acquainted now with the deſign of God to advance the glory of his free grace in their ſalvation, that they are very ſecure that neither their paſt ſins nor preſent habitual impurities can do them any hurt, but they ſhall be ſaved with a notwithſtanding their ſins (3).

(3) Union and Communion, p. 40, & ſeqq.

This is in his grave way, but his pleaſantry will perhaps be more entertaining to ſome people. Let us take that inſtance of it, where he rallies Dr Owen's manner of explaining the notion, that the perſonal righteouſneſs of Chriſt becomes our perſonal righteouſneſs, where though there be an union of perſons, yet is there no perſonal only a legal union; Chriſt as our Mediator having fulfilled for us all that righteouſneſs which is required of us (4). In ſhewing what this righteouſneſs is, the Doctor [Owen] having firſt excluded the habitual inherent righteouſneſs of Chriſt, or his perfect conformity to the law or will of God, and alſo his actual obedience to any peculiar law of the Mediator which reſpected himſelf merely, declares this righteouſneſs is that which concerns Chriſt in a private capacity as a man ſubject to the law, that is, whatever was required of us by virtue of any law, that he did and fulfilled; which is that actual obedience of Chriſt which he performed for us. In anſwer to this, our author remarks firſt, that it is ſtrange Chriſt ſhould do whatever is required of us by virtue of any law, when he was neither huſband nor wife, nor father, merchant, or tradeſman, ſeaman or ſoldier, captain or lieutenant, much leſs a temporal prince or monarch. However, continues he, ſetting aſide this difficulty of proving that Chriſt did what he never did. Let us conſider how the Doctor proves that what Chriſt did, he did for us and in our ſtead. And here he makes uſe of a little reaſon and a great deal of ſcripture to as little purpoſe (5). And to prepare the way for his reaſoning, I find, ſays he, the Doctor much puzzled, and don't wonder at it, to prove that Chriſt acted as Mediator in thoſe things which did not concern the law of his mediation, and which he did as a private man ſubject to the law. For he tells us, that of this expreſſion 'as Mediator' there is a double ſenſe, it may be taken ſtrictly as relating ſolely to the law of the Mediator, and ſo Chriſt may be ſaid to do as Mediator only, what he did in obedience to that law (that is only what he did as Mediator, which is a pretty obſervation) but in the ſenſe now inſiſted on (that is not ſtrictly as Mediator but as not Mediator). Whatſoever Chriſt did as a man ſubject to the law, he did as a Mediator, becauſe he did it as part of the duty incumbent on him who undertook ſo to be; the meaning of which is, that he who was Mediator, being bound to do ſuch things though not as Mediator, but as a man ſubject to the law, yet he did them as Mediator, becauſe he was a Mediator who did them; which is juſt as good an argument as it would be to prove, that every Embaſſador eats, and drinks, and ſleeps as an Embaſſador, becauſe though this be no part of his Embaſſy, yet he is an Embaſſador who does it; which is ſuch an expoſition of Chriſt's mediatorial office as the ſubtileſt ſchoolmen of them all never yet thought of. This difficulty of Chriſt's doing the things as Mediator, which did not belong to the laws of his Mediation, required great ſkill in logic to get rid of; but however it was wiſely done to make a ſhew of ſaying ſomething to that which cannot be anſwered. For he was ſenſible that what Chriſt did as Mediator, could not be imputed to us as though we had done it, though the fruits of it are; becauſe we were never deſigned to be Mediators, and the righteouſneſs of a Mediator is as improper to be imputed to thoſe who are not Mediators, as it is to impute the righteouſneſs of a prince to a beggar; and therefore that the righteouſneſs of Chriſt might be fit to be imputed to us as our righteouſneſs, he was forced to conſider him not as a Mediator, but as a private perſon ſubject to the law, who did whatever was required of us by virtue of any law; though this too was impoſſible, for he could not at the ſame time act ſo many different and oppoſite parts as there are relations and conditions of men in the world. And yet when he thought on it again, he found, that it was not the righteouſneſs of a private perſon that would avail us, though it were never ſo perfect, (becauſe we have no way to come at it to make it ours) but only the righteouſneſs of a Mediator, who did whatever he did, for us and in our ſtead. And ſo he wheels about again, and tells us, that though what Chriſt did as a man ſubject to the law, did not belong to the law of his mediation, yet he did it as Mediator, becauſe he was a Mediator that did it. And thus he is caught in the net and labyrinth of his own making, and the more he turns and winds himſelf the faſter it holds him. 'A Mediator who acts as a Mediator in a private capacity as a man ſubject to the law.' I ſhall certainly believe, as they ſay ſome country people do, that Logic is conjuring, if it can reconcile ſuch palpable contradictions (6). Our author, while he thus purſues Dr Owen, the then Captain of this new way of ſalvation, through all the ſhifts and ſophiſtries of an evaſive Logic, with all the nerves of reaſon and rhetoric, fails not up and down to throw a ſlight ſmile upon the under-workmen, who riſe not above the character of verbal triflers. Theſe were very numerous, as we have ſeen above. One of theſe explaining the riches of Chriſt in Epheſ. iii. 8. ſports and toys with words and metaphors in the following manner: That he is rich, becauſe he hath a rich dowry, having all the world given to him as his proper inheritance: 'That he keeps open houſe, and maintains all the creation at his own charge, and that he hath done this ſix thouſand years, which would have broken him long time ſince had he not been very rich, and that he does not enrich all the ſaints, but all of the ſaints, their underſtandings with glorious light, their conſciences with quickneſs, pureneſs, &c. And that after all this vaſt expence he is never the poorer, that he is not a penny the poorer for all that he hath laid out for the relief of thoſe that have their dependance on him. And that Jeſus Chriſt is generally rich, rich in houſes and lands, though he had not a place whereon to lay his head; in gold and ſilver, in cattle, in all temporals as well as ſpirituals, and that he hath a great tribute and rent due to him, that is the great Landlord and Owner of all that men poſſeſs above and below (7).' Another of the ſame ſtamp having publiſhed an invitation of young women to Chriſt, exhorts them to chuſe Chriſt for their huſband. 'You muſt be ſick of love, ſays he, of love to Chriſt, and let him be always as a bundle of myrrh between your breaſts. Chriſt is maxime deligibilis, as the ſchoolmen ſpeak. He is the very abſtract and quinteſſence of beauty. He is a whole paradiſe of delights. He is the flower of Charan, enriched with orient colours, and perfumed with the ſweeteſt ſavour; O! carry this flower not in your boſoms but in your hearts, and be always ſmelling to it, and ſhew your love to this lovely Saviour.' Theſe, ſays our author, are very fine things to perſuade young women to accept of Chriſt for their huſband, ſince they can never expect ſo rich and advantageous a match any where elſe. The doctor ſmiles at theſe pretty ſpiritual conceits, as modeſtly, to uſe his own words, as a man can deſire; ſo much at leaſt will be allowed, that theſe precious ſaints made as bold with their Saviour, as our author has done with them, and upon that account he was induced to give way to the natural bent of his genius with leſs reſerve, in a view of ſhaming them, if poſſible, out of that audacious confidence to which the doctrine of an intimate familiar acquaintance with Chriſt's perſon, of coming to and cloſing with him, and leaning, and reſting, and rolling their ſouls upon him, for ſalvation, had carried them. To be a match for ſuch men, required a ſuitable degree of hardineſs, and he did not ſpare to rouze the whole neſt of them, with their captain, Dr Owen, at their head, from whom, who he allows to write with learning and ſubtility, he deſcends to the inferior tribe, as Shephard's Sincere Convert, as alſo his Sound Believer; Watſon's Tracts, viz.

[D] A vindication of his Diſcourſe, &c.] This vindication was levelled chiefly againſt Mr Ferguſon and Dr Owen (9), who, among other expreſſions in that diſcourſe, had produced this as ſtrongly favouring Socinianiſm, viz. That the natural notions which men have of God aſſure them, that he is very good, and that it is not poſſible to underſtand what goodneſs is, without pardoning grace; whence he infers, that God could have pardoned ſin without ſatisfaction, and conſequently that the ſatisfaction of Chriſt was not abſolutely neceſſary in reſpect to God's juſtice. But that method of proceeding was choſen by him for other wiſe reaſons; ſeveral of theſe are mentioned, in which he obſerves he has pitched upon ſuch as are moſt ſuitable to the deſign of a treatiſe againſt the Antinomians: And in anſwer to the charge of his adverſaries, who had argued from this, that the Satisfaction of Chriſt could not be the meritorious cauſe of God's pardoning our ſins, if he was obliged to it by his eſſential goodneſs; our author aſks which of theſe he will reject, whether he will deny that the natural notion of a Deity, includes infinite goodneſs, or that the natural notion of infinite goodneſs includes pardoning grace, when there is a juſt and honourable occaſion for it, or that the merits of Chriſt's ſatisfaction, had purchaſed the grace and mercy of the goſpel. The denial of theſe he declared to be either Atheiſm, or Socinianiſm; and blaming his antagoniſt for charging him with aſſerting that God's eſſential goodneſs obliged him to pardon ſin; whereas, he ſays, that the eſſential goodneſs of God, only proves that he may pardon ſin without a ſacrifice; but not that he either will, or muſt. As to the nature of juſtification, he maintains, that our juſtification and acceptance with God, depends wholly upon the goſpel-covenant, which does not exact from us a perfect and ſinleſs obedience, but promiſes pardon of ſin and eternal life, upon the conditions of faith and repentance, and new obedience; that this goſpel-covenant is wholly owing to the merits of Chriſt, who by the ſacrifice of his death, hath wholly expiated our ſins, and both in his life and death hath given a noble demonſtration of his entire obedience and ſubmiſſion to the divine will: For God being well pleaſed with the obedience of Chriſt's life, and with the ſacrifice and expiation of his death, entered into a new covenant of grace and mercy with mankind; that the only way to partake of the bleſſings of this new covenant, is by believing and obeying the goſpel of Chriſt; that is, in other words, by acknowledging the divine authority of our Saviour, believing his revelations, obeying his laws, truſting to the merits of his ſacrifice, and the power of his interceſſion, and depending on the ſupplies and influences of his grace. So that, continues he, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is not the formal cauſe of our righteouſneſs or juſtification, but the righteouſneſs of his life and death is the meritorious cauſe of that covenant, whereby we are declared righteous, and rewarded as righteous perſons. And as for the meaning of Chriſt's righteouſneſs being imputed to us, he aſſerts that our righteouſneſs is wholly owing to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which in this ſenſe may be imputed to us, becauſe without this covenant of grace, which is founded on the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, the beſt man living could lay no claim to righteouſneſs or future glory; and the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is our righteouſneſs, when we ſpeak of the foundation of the covenant, by which we are accepted: but if we ſpeak of the terms of the covenant; that is, what it is that will intitle us to all the bleſſings of the covenant; then we muſt have a righteouſneſs of our own, for the righteouſneſs of Chriſt will not ſerve the turn. Dr South, ſpeaking of our author's treatiſe of the knowledge of Chriſt, ſays, it is a book fraught with reflections upon God's juſtice, with reference to Chriſt's ſatisfaction; and that it may deſervedly paſs for a blaſphemous libel upon both. However our author, ſpeaking of this controverſy ſome years afterwards, intimates, that he had confuted his antagoniſts, and put them to ſilence; and aſſures Mr Baxter, that if he had a mind to revive that then old controverſy, which his other adverſaries had been pleaſed to forget, he is content to enter the liſts once more (10).

(9) In the concluſion, p. 534, 535. he excuſes himſelf for taking no notice of Mr Polhil and Alſop, as not worth notice.

(10) Preface to his Continuation and Vindication of Dr Stillingfleet, p. 4, 5.

[E] Other pieces the following year.] After his Vindication was finiſhed, Mr Danſon attacked his former book, in a piece, intitled, A friendly debate between Satan and Sherlock, containing a diſcovery of the unſoundneſs of Mr Will. Sherlock's principles, in a book, intituled, A diſcourſe concerning the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, in 1676. Our author replied to it the ſame year, in his Anſwer to a ſcandalous pamphlet, intituled, A friendly debate between Satan and Sherlock. He alſo wrote An account of Mr Ferguſon's common-place-book, in two letters to Mr Glanvil: and Mr Danſon publiſhing, A defence of the late friendly debate, &c. againſt Mr Sherlock's exceptions, 1677, 8vo. our author was defended in a piece, intitled, A vindication of Mr Sherlock, againſt the calumnies of Mr Danſon, &c. 1677, 4to.

[F] He engaged in the diſpute againſt the Non-conformiſts.] Our author in this diſpute, being only Dr Stillingfleet's ſecond; his firſt deſign, if we may believe himſelf, was no more than a ſhort rebuke to ſome ſuch ſkulking pamphleteers as thoſe who don't fight with the Doctor's book, but with his reputation, and have no other way of anſwering arguments, but with picking up ſome by-ſayings, which, with the help of an ingenious comment, may expoſe the author, and then there is no need of anſwering his book. Among others, he takes notice of one whom Dean Stillingfleet had charged with having in the firſt edition of a tract, publiſhed in 1675, pleaded for an univerſal toleration, ſo as to have it granted to Papiſts, as well as other Diſſenters; but printing it again in 1680, he denied them the liberty of that toleration, becauſe they were idolaters, and only allowed them the private exerciſe of their religion. The reaſon of which difference, the Dean ſuppoſes to be, that in 1675, they were willing to conſent to a toleration, tho' Papiſts reaped the advange of it, as well as themſelves; but after the Popiſh plot broke out, they thought it unſeaſonable to make ſuch a propoſal. The paſſage in the edition of 1675, runs thus; The Papiſts in our account, are but one ſort of recuſants, and the conſcientious and peaceable among them, muſt be held in the ſame predicament with thoſe among ourſelves that likewiſe refuſe to come to common-prayer. Again, but as for the common Papiſt, who lives innocently in his way, he is to us as other ſeparatiſts, and ſo comes under the like toleration. Again, He is to us, in regard of what he does in private, in the matter of his God, the ſame as thoſe who likewiſe refuſe to come to common-prayer. Whereas in the edition of 1680, the words are, The Papiſt is one whoſe worſhip is to us idolatry, and we cannot therefore allow them the liberty of publickly aſſembling themſelves as others of the ſeparation. Stillingfleet, in his animadverſions on this alteration, was very ſedate, and indeed cooler than his uſual temper. 'Now, 'ſays he, if there be any difference between the public 'and private exerciſe of religion. Here ſeems to be a 'plain alteration of his opinion; but he ſays, he ex- 'plains himſelf therefore by way of ſupply, ſignifying 'that very troubleſome in defending their ſeparation (n). In anſwer to thoſe principles, our author publiſhed Reaſons for non-conformity examined, in 1679, 4to. which was followed by A defence of Dr Stillingfleet's Unreaſonableneſs of ſeparation in 1681, and A vindication of that defence in 1683, both in 8vo. In the mean time he had taken the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1680 (o), and been married ſome few years before (p). He had alſo been collated to the Prebend of St Pancras in the cathedral of St Paul London, November 3, 1681 (q). After the diſcovery of the Rye-houſe plot in 1683 (r), the Doctor obſerving, that the principles of reſiſtance to a Popiſh Prince were warmly abetted by ſome eminent perſons, and were alſo frequently urged in vindication of rebellious practices againſt the government (s), drew up a ſet of arguments in ſupport of the court doctrine of abſolute non-reſiſtance, which he publiſhed the following year under the title of The caſe of reſiſtance to the ſupreme powers ſtated and reſolved, according to the doctrine of the holy ſcriptures [G], and he continued to preach the ſame doctrine after King James IId's acceſſion

(r) In a ſermon preached at St Botolph's this year on that occaſion, he lays this plot to the charge of the Diſſenters but at the ſame time appears full in the belief of the truth of the Popiſh plot likewiſe.

'that what he ſaid at firſt, ſhould be taken in regard 'as his meaning really was then, and now is, but fuller 'expreſſed (11). We have no way, continues our au'thor, to diſprove what his meaning was, but by his 'words; and if they deſired a public toleration for 'themſelves, they did ſo for the Papiſts, who were to 'come under the like toleration; and I think Mr H—— 'might as well have let it alone, unleſs he could have 'made a better defence.'

(11) Anſwer to Dr Stillingfleet, p. 7.

[G] The caſe of reſiſtance.] Our author in defending this doctrine, did no more than concur with the general voice of his order; Burnet and Tillotſon, both gave into it (12): And as we have ſeen, he was not of a diſpoſition to be ſparing of his pen; he ſtept out boldly and confidently, as his manner was, in the open defence of this principle. It will not be amiſs, for a reaſon we ſhall ſee preſently, to give a ſketch of his way of arguing upon the ſubject. After a ſhort eſſay to prove it by the common arguments then in vogue, he proceeds to anſwer objections. The firſt is, of thoſe who urging, that 'they are bound by no law to ſuffer againſt law, 'ſuppoſe, as a late author (13) does, that a Popiſh Prince 'ſhould perſecute his Proteſtant ſubjects in England, 'for profeſſing the Proteſtant religion, which is eſta'bliſhed by law, by what law muſt he die? not by the 'law of God, for being of that religion which he ap'proves, nor by the laws of our country, where Pro'teſtancy is ſo far from being criminal, that it is death 'to deſert it, and turn Papiſt. By what law then? by 'none that I know of, ſays the author; nor do I, ſays 'the Doctor, know of any, and ſo far we are agreed: 'but then both the laws of God and of our country, 'command us not to reſiſt; and if death, an illegal 'and unjuſt death, follow upon that, I can't help it; 'God and our country muſt anſwer for it.' Agreeable to this is his anſwer to the next objection; that a Prince has no authority againſt law; 'that is true, ſays he, 'but then 'tis as true, that he is accountable only to his 'ſuperior, that is God alone, and not to his inferior; 'that being a principle which is contradictory to the 'very notion of power, and deſtructive of all order 'and government.' In the further proſecution of this argument, he maintains that the authority of the Sovereign is in his perſon, and not in the law: that there muſt be in him a perſonal power and authority antecedent to all civil laws, ſince the law is nothing but the public declaration of the law maker, whether ſovereign Prince, or the people. Hence it neceſſarily follows, that the ſovereign Prince does not receive his authority from the laws, but laws receive their authority from him; and this he will have to be the conſtitution of England, againſt Bracton's rule, that Lex facit Regem, The law makes the King; by which he tells us, that the author means only that he is no King, as King ſignifies a juſt and beneficent power and authority, who governs by arbitrary will, and not by law, as appears from his own words, non eſt enim Rex ubi dominatur voluntas & non Lex; not that he is no ſovereign Prince, but he is a tyrant and not a King. And hence, continues he, it evidently follows, that the being of a ſovereign power, is independent on laws; and the ſame is evident from the allowed maxim, that the perſon of the king is ſacred and inviolable; but what makes his perſon ſo, but his inviolable authority? In a word, ſays he, it does not become a man who can think three conſequences off, to talk of the authority of laws, in derogation to the authority of the ſovereign power. In the further proſecution of this argument, he declares, that of the long ſucceſſion of Princes in this kingdom, there had been no Prince that had caſt off the authority of laws, or uſurpt an abſolute or arbitrary power; whence he ſhews how vain the fears of thoſe are, who pretend this, only to diſturb the public peace. Laſtly, in anſwer to the objection, that granting abſolute non-reſiſtance, the miſchiefs and inconveniencies to mankind may be intolerable: he declares that no miſchiefs, even of the moſt mercileſs tyrant, can be ſo bad as thoſe of confuſion and a civil war. And in reconciling the doctrine of abſolute non-reſiſtance to a limited monarchy, he obſerves very curiouſly, that tho' a Prince may break the laws, yet he cannot make or repeal them, and therefore can never alter the frame and conſtitution of the Government; tho' he may at preſent interrupt the regular adminiſtration of it: and this, ſays he, is both a great ſecurity to poſterity, and a preſent reſtraint upon himſelf; comfort enough (for ſo he intimates by his ſilence) for whatever miſeries the preſent race of his ſubjects may groan under, who muſt ſtill lie faſt bound by the indiſſoluble iron chain of paſſive-obedience. Sam. Johnſon, a writer well matched for hardineſs to the Doctor, in his remarks upon this piece, very ſhrewdly obſerves, that the lawfulneſs of defending ourſelves againſt illegal violence, is a truth ſo obvious, and ſo agreeable to the common ſenſe of mankind, that even thoſe men who ſet themſelves to oppoſe it, do oftentimes aſſert it unawares, and give unanſwerable reaſons for it. He then proceeds to ſet down thoſe conceſſions, which the force of truth has extorted from our author. (1) No man wants authority to defend his life againſt him, who has no authority to take it away, p. 96. But no man whatſoever has any juſt and legal authority to take it away contrary to law, p. 190, 191. (2) He that reſiſts the uſurpations of men, does not reſiſt the ordinance of God, which alone is forbidden to be reſiſted. But acts of arbitrary and illegal violence are the uſurpations of men, p. 128, and 211; and in p. 212, he acknowledges, that the aſſuming of an abſolute and arbitrary power in this kingdom, would be uſurpation; tho' he ſays at the ſame time, that no Prince in this kingdom, ever uſurped ſuch a power, which, ſays Johnſon, is notoriouſly falſe, for Richard the ſecond by name did, not to mention any other. (3) A third argument, which the Doctor furniſhes againſt himſelf, is this, p. 164, 165. The reaſon why we muſt ſubmit to Governors, or ſubordinate Magiſtrates, is, becauſe they are ſent by our Prince, and act by his authority; and we muſt never ſubmit to them in oppoſition to our Prince. Now, ſays Johnſon, nothing is better known in this kingdom, than that thoſe who commit illegal violence, do not act by the Prince's authority; for, as our author ſays, p. 190. he himſelf has no juſt nor legal authority to act againſt law, and therefore we need not ſubmit to them in ſuch acts. Nay, further, according to this author, we muſt never ſubmit to them in this caſe, becauſe they are in oppoſition to our Prince; for they act againſt the peace of our ſovereign Lord the King, his crown and dignity, as the law has evermore interpreted ſuch acts. (4) Our author, p. 126. has theſe words, Every man has the right of ſelf-preſervation, as intire under civil Government, as he had in a ſtate of nature. Under what government I live, I may ſtill kill another man, when I have no other way to preſerve my life from unjuſt violence by private hands. Now the hands of ſubordinate magiſtrates, employed in acts of illegal violence, are private hands, and act with no manner of authority at all; of which this is a moſt convincing proof, that they may be hanged by law for ſuch acts; which no man can or ought to ſuffer for what he does by authority: they are no officers at all in ſuch acts; for illegal violence is no part of their office. This, concludes Mr Johnſon, is ſuffiacceſſion to the throne [H]. However, though he maintained that neither Popery nor tyranny in the Prince could excuſe the ſubject from the duty of paſſive-obedience, yet he entered with the firſt into the controverſy againſt the Papiſts, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a great variety of performances publiſhed on that occaſion [I], and he is allowed by his warmeſt cient to ſhew, that this author holds ſo much truth, as would have led him to his own conviction, if he had but attended to the immediate conſequences of it, inſtead of blending it with a great many falſhoods (14). Theſe remarks, tho' written in 1683, were not publiſhed 'till 1689; and it is obſervable, that if Mr Johnſon had happened to defer the publication a very little longer, he would have ſeen the Doctor actually led to his own conviction.

(14) Remarks on Dr Sherlock's Caſe of Reſiſtance, printed among Johnſon's Works, p. 251, 252. edit. 1710, fol.

We muſt not conclude this remark, without informing the reader, that The Caſe of Reſiſtance had the honour of being tranſlated into French, by Wentworth Dillon, Earl of Roſcommon; whoſe father James Dillon, being reclaimed, when young, from Popery, by Primate Uſher, was ſent by him into England, and committed to the care of Dr George Hakewell, who placed him in Exeter College, Oxford, under the tuition of Lawrence Bodley, B. D. a nephew of Sir Thomas Bodley: here he continued ſome years, became a perſon of ſeveral accompliſhments, and afterwards Earl of Roſcommon in Ireland, his native country. He was ſucceeded in that dignity by his ſon Wentworth Dillon, who was educated in all kinds of polite literature: and about the time of the Duke of York's marriage to the Princeſs of Modena, was made Captain of the band of Penſioners to King Charles the ſecond, and afterwards Maſter of horſe to the ſaid Ducheſs of York. He publiſhed ſeveral pieces of poetry, among which his Eſſay on tranſlated verſe is eſteemed a maſter piece; it has gone thro' many editions; to one of which he added a ſpecimen of blank verſe, being the battle of the Angels in Milton's Paradiſe loſt. He alſo tranſlated Horace's Art of Poetry, into Engliſh blank verſe, printed at London, 1680, 4to. Beſides ſeveral Prologues and Epilogues to plays, printed with the reſpective plays; as alſo divers copies of verſes and tranſlations, printed in the Miſcellanies, by Jacob Tonſon, in 1684; and in the collections of Poems, in 1693, 1694, 8vo. Since which, his works have been printed together, among thoſe of the minor poets, in 1749, and 1750, vol. i. and iii. This ingenious nobleman paid his laſt debt to nature, in his houſe near St. James's palace, Jan. 1684, and was buried in Weſtminſter abbey. To the dignity ſucceeded his uncle, Cary Dillon, Colonel of a regiment, in the war between King James the ſecond, and William the third in Ireland; from whence going into England, he was ſeized with a diſtemper which brought him to his grave at Cheſter, in Nov. 1689 *: And the title has been extinct many years.

* Faſti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 225.

[H] He continued to preach the ſame doctrine after the acceſſion of King James the ſecond.] In a ſermon before the houſe of Commons, May 29, 1685, he has theſe remarkable words upon the duty of loyalty. 'To 'this, ſays he, we owe the preſent ſecurity and pro'tection of the Church of England: For if there were 'nothing elſe to be looked on, yet a jealous Prince 'cannot but look on and reward it's loyalty; and it 'would ſeem very harſh for any Prince, to deſire that 'a religion ſhould be turned out of the Church, which 'ſecures him in a quiet poſſeſſion of his throne; and 'therefore to conclude, I deſire you to obſerve, that 'it is a Church of England loyalty which I perſuade 'you to. This the King relies on as a tried and ex'perienced loyalty, which has ſuffered with it's Prince, 'but never yet rebelled againſt him; a loyalty upon 'firm and ſteady principles, and without reſerve: And 'therefore to keep us true to our Prince, we muſt be 'true to our church and our religion, and it's legal ſecu'rity. It is no act of loyalty to court and compliment 'away our religion and it's ſecurity. For if we change 'our religion, we muſt change the principles of our 'loyalty; and I am ſure the King and the crown will 'gain nothing by it: for there is no ſuch laſting and 'immoveable loyalty as that of the Church of England. 'I deny not, but ſome of our Papiſts, in ſome junc'tures may, and have been very loyal; but I am ſure 'the Popiſh religion is not. The Engliſhman may be 'loyal, but not the Papiſt: And yet there can be no 'ſecurity of thoſe men's loyalty, whoſe religion teaches 'them, in any caſe, to rebel.' Soon after there came out a humorous remonſtrance, by way of addreſs from the Church of England to both houſes of parliament, upon the account of religion, together with ſome remarks upon Dr Sherlock's ſermon, preached May 29. 1685. Wherein the author animadverts upon this laſt charge upon Popery, as groundleſs and uncharitable. In anſwer to which, Dr Sherlock publiſhed, A vindication of a paſſage in a ſermon before the Houſe of Commons, where he aſſerts the doctrine of depoſing Princes, on account of their religion, to be maintained by the Church of Rome in her public inſtruments as a Church.

[I] A great variety of performances on that occaſion.] He publiſhed more treatiſes in the Popiſh controverſy, than perhaps any other of the diſputants, as will appear from the following liſt of them. We are aſſured by the editor of this piece, that it was brought to his hands by the young man himſelf, who wrote it, and to remove all ſuſpicion of fraud, or foul play, he profeſſes upon the word of a Chriſtian, that he has committed it to the preſs, as it was delivered to him by the young man himſelf, in his own hand-writing, without the addition or taking away of one word, or warmeſt adverſary (s) to have wrote well upon this ſubject. After the Revolution he remained for ſome time under the influence of his former principles, and refuſing to take the new oath of allegiance to King William and Queen Mary, was, with other Non-jurors (t) ſuſpended in 1689 from all his preferments: The chief of theſe was the Maſterſhip of the Temple, which had been conferred upon him in 1685. During his ſuſpenſion he publiſhed his celebrated treatiſe intituled, A practical diſcourſe concerning death [K] in 1690. But before the expiration of the year he complied with the new-eſtabliſhed government, and taking the oaths, was reinſtated in all his preferments; of which, though forfeited, yet by the lenity of the adminiſtration he had not been deprived. Great clamours were raiſed againſt this ſtep in his conduct by his old friends whom he had left: Whereupon he thought proper, for the ſatisfaction of the whole party, to publiſh his reaſons for it, and the piece came out the ſame year (u), intituled, The caſe of the allegiance due to Sovereign Powers, ſtated and reſolved according to Scripture and reaſon, and the principles of the Church of England; with a more particular reſpect to the Oath lately enjoined of allegiance to their preſent Majeſties, King William and Queen Mary [L]. altering one ſentence or line; ſo that, continues he, the reader will have it juſt as I had, excepting the falſeneſs of the Engliſh, which is pardonable enough in a poor ſervant, that was very young deprived of his parents, and never had more learning than to read Engliſh. However, upon this, I ordered the bookſeller to ſpeak to his compoſitor at the preſs, to correct the Engliſh as he ſet it.

[K] He wrote his Practical Treatiſe on Death.] It has been obſerved, that our author was as remarkable for his writings in controverſial Divinity in his own time, as he will be eminent for his practical treatiſes in all times; and it may with equal truth be ſaid, that if he had wrote none but this upon Death, it would have been enough for his fame, ſatis pro fama. All his practical pieces were well received by the publick, but they all fall greatly ſhort of this on Death, which has gone through almoſt thirty editions. I fancy the reader will be beforehand with me, in obſerving the ſuitableneſs of the ſubject to the then preſent ſtate of the Doctor's affairs, as well as the melancholy proſpect he had for the future in this world. Such a ſituation would naturally inſpire thoughts of another world; but ſuch thoughts, and cloathed in ſuch expreſſions, are then only produced, when a genius happens to be luckily hit with his ſubject. The whole piece is a compleat inſtance of the true ſublime in writing: And nothing but a genius too could have produced the following, I had almoſt ſaid, equally ſublime deſcription of it:

Thy even thoughts with ſo much plainneſs flow,
Their ſenſe, untutor'd, infancy may know;
Yet to ſuch height is all that plainneſs wrought,
Wit may admire, and letter'd pride be taught.
Eaſy in words, thy ſtile, in ſenſe ſublime,
On it's bleſt ſteps each age and ſex may riſe;
'Tis like the ladder in the Patriarch's dream,
It's foot on earth, it's height beyond the ſkies.
Diffus'd it's virtue, boundleſs is it's power,
'Tis publick health and univerſal care.
Of heavenly manna 'tis a ſecond feaſt,
A nation's food, and all to every taſte (15).

Another genius, ſpeaking of this treatiſe, writes thus: 'Dr Sherlock has repreſented, in very ſtrong and 'lively colours, the ſtate of the ſoul on it's firſt ſeparation from the body, with regard to that inviſible 'world which every where ſurrounds us, though we 'are not able to diſcover it through this groſſer world 'of matter, which is accommodated to our ſenſes in 'this life; and obſerves, that our leaving this world is 'nothing elſe but the putting off this body (16).'

(16) Mr Addiſon in Spectator, No. 513, for October 18, 1713.

[L] The Caſe of Allegiance, &c.] In the preface he declares, 'That he had ſome of the thoughts contained in the book long before, which he drew up in writing, and ſhewed them to ſome of his friends, and diſcourſed with others about them, and told them where he ſtuck. But, continues he, ſtick I did, and could find no help for it; and there I ſhould have ſtuck to this day, had I not been relieved by Biſhop Overal's Convocation book, which not only confirmed my former notions, and ſuggeſted ſome new thoughts to me which removed thoſe difficulties I could not conquer, but alſo, by the venerable authority of a Convocation, gave me greater freedom and liberty of thinking, which the apprehenſion of novelty and ſingularity had cramped before.' As the Doctor aſcribes his conviction to Biſhop Overal's Convocation-book, it will not be amiſs to give the following account of that book from Biſhop Burnet. 'There was a book, ſays this author, drawn up by 'Biſhop Overal, fourſcore years ago, concerning Go-'vernment, in which it's being of a divine inſtitution 'was poſitively aſſerted: It was read in Convocation, 'and paſſed by that body, in order to the publiſhing it, 'in oppoſition to the principles laid down in that famous 'book of Parſons the Jeſuit, publiſhed under the name of 'Doleman*. King James I. did not like a Convocation's 'entering into ſuch a theory of Politics, ſo he wrote a 'long letter to Abbot, who was afterwards Archbiſhop of 'Canterbury, but was then in the lower houſe I had 'the original wrote all in his own hand in my poſſeſſion: 'By it he deſired that no farther progreſs ſhould be made 'in that matter, and that this book might not be offered 'to him for his aſſent; there that matter ſlept. But Sancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, had got Overal's own 'book into his hands; ſo in the beginning of this [K. 'William's] reign, he reſolved to publiſh it, as an authentic declaration that the Church of England had made 'in this matter, and it was publiſhed ‖ as well as licenſed 'by him a very few days before he came under ſuſpenſion for not taking the oaths ‡. But there was a paragraph or two in it that they had not conſidered, 'which was plainly calculated to juſtify the owning the 'United Provinces to be a lawful Government; for it 'was there laid down, that when a change of Govern-'ment was brought to a thorough ſettlement, it was 'then to be owned and ſubmitted to as a work of the 'providence of God, and part of King James's letter 'to Abbot related to this. The Biſhop then goes on 'to tell us, that when this was obſerved by Sherlock, 'he had ſome conferences with the [Jacobite] party, 'in order to convince them by that, which had con-'vinced himſelf (17).' What his Lordſhip here aſſerts we have ſeen confirmed by Dr Sherlock, but he has not informed us of the exact time when he thought ſuch a ſettlement as Biſhop Overal mentions, was made by the Revolution: indeed he tells us, he was always diſpoſed to receive ſatisfaction in his ſcruples, and wiſhed he could have got over them; nay, that he complied with the new government ſo far, as not only to live quietly and peaceably, but even prayed for King William and Queen Mary by name, according to the Apoſtle's direction, to pray for all that are in authority, which they viſibly were in: that he likewiſe always oppoſed a ſeparation, and adviſed not a few, who thought fit to conſult with him, to keep to the communion of the Church, and not to entertain prejudices againſt their Miniſters for taking the oaths; 'for, continues he, I did not refuſe the oaths out of any fondneſs for the government of King James, nor zeal for his return, which the preſent proſpect of affairs gives no man who loves the Church of England, and the liberties of his country, any reaſon to wiſh; nor yet out of any averſion to the government of King William and Queen Mary; But againſt my own inclinations and intereſt, out of pure principles of conſcience to comply with the obligations of my former oaths, and that duty which ſubjects owe to their Prince, which I then apprehended irreconcileable with the new oath.' In all this there is not the leaſt hint that any new advantage lately obtained by the Prince of Orange had any ſhare in his converſion, but rather the contrary; it being inſinu-aſcribed the change of his political opinions chiefly to a paſſage which he had not before obſerved in Biſhop Overal's Convocation-book. There was printed the following year, An ated, that, in ſettling his conſcience, he never looked any further than to King James's firſt leaving the kingdom; and that this was actually the caſe, we have his own expreſs words in the body of the book, where he aſſerts, that Allegiance was no longer due to King James when he had withdrawn his perſon and left his Crown (18). So that what the forementioned Right Reverend hiſtorian tells us, muſt reſt on his ſole authority, concerning our author's declaration, which is, that 'upon King James's going out of Ireland, Dr Sherlock 'thought that this gave the preſent Government a 'thorough ſettlement, and, in that caſe, he thought 'it lawful to take the oaths, and not only took them 'himſelf, but juſtified what he had done.' This hiſtorian had, however, undeniable authority for what he aſſerts afterwards, viz 'that upon this account our author was ſeverely libelled by thoſe from 'whom he withdrew (19).' An anonymous author, remarking the words abovecited, that 'twas not out of fondneſs for King James, nor deſire of his return, &c. that the Doctor ſo long refuſed the oaths, interprets them thus: That is, ſays he, that he [the Doctor] did not ſwear all that while, becauſe he had hopes of King James's return; but how juſtly this pamphleteer may be called a libeller, appears from his idle ſtory of the Doctor's converſion being the meer effect of his wife's ill uſage, in reſpect to his table, 'till he had complied (20). In the ſame licentious ſpirit, another of theſe libellers obſerves, that it was the battle of the Boyne that ſatisfied the Doctor's conſcience (21). However, the Doctor found a vindicator of himſelf from theſe aſperſions, who ſhews that he ſtates allegiance to be due to King William as ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion (22). Finally, our author ſoon after expreſsly, and at large, declares againſt this ill-natured cenſure of Biſhop Burnet in theſe words: (1) The Prince of Orange undertook to ſettle the Government upon the ancient bottom, not diſliked by the Nonjurors at that time. The great body of the nation ſtood ſtill looking on, and wiſhing well to the Prince, without wiſhing ill to the King's perſon, or to the juſt exerciſe of his authority. Very few of the active ones thought of any thing more than to obtain a free Parliament; but the King would not ſtand this trial, diſbands his army, withdraws his perſon, without leaving any authority behind him to adminiſter the Government: Nobody ever thought that this was a perfect free and voluntary act; but however gone he was, and had left nobody behind him to govern by his authority: and then the Government was either diſſolved, or the power muſt reſt in the States of the realm. The States upon this exigency aſſembled, but did not pretend to aſſert the authority of the People over the King, and their power to judge, depoſe, and baniſh him; they only undertook to judge what properly falls under their cognizance in ſuch caſes, viz. Whether the Throne were vacant? and if it were, how it muſt be filled? And when thoſe who were the ſole and proper judges had once determined it, private ſubjects (according to the forementioned rules of all Governments) were bound to acquieſce, whatever their private opinions were; or elſe ſuch ſtate diſputes can never be determined, but we muſt neceſſarily diſſolve into anarchy and confuſion. Where there is no determination of the law of nature, or the law of God againſt it (as there is none about meer legal rights) the reſolution of Governors muſt determine the conſciences of private ſubjects; for the power of judging muſt extend as far as the power of governing goes (23).' By this time we ſee the Doctor convinced of the parliamentary right which was then the Court doctrine: the great difficulty was to ſupport the reputation of his having changed his former principles of indefeaſible hereditary right in the Stuart family, our natural Princes (24); in reſpect to which family, he had carried theſe principles to the greateſt height, and preſſed them, as his manner was, with a contemptuous confidence of all oppoſers. But here he acted ingenuouſly and openly, confeſſing himſelf miſtaken in that point. 'I muſt, 'ſays he, add one thing more, that I have renounced 'no principle that ever I taught excepting one, in 'the caſe of reſiſtance, which is the only material paſ-'ſage I know any reaſon to retract in that book, viz. 'That when St Paul ſays, All power is of God, he 'means only legal powers, but that in an hereditary 'monarchy, where the right heir is living, uſurped 'powers are not of God, nor the ordinance of God, 'as I proved by the example of Joaſh: The reaſon 'and the example you will find ſufficiently anſwered 'in the following diſcourſe, and the doctrine itſelf rejected by the Convocation. Though it has been of 'late years ſo prevailing a miſtake, and impoſed by 'ſuch great authorities, that it is very pardonable, 'eſpecially when it is ſo freely acknowledged (25).' It will perhaps be thought by ſome the moſt ſurpriſing effect of this change, that it ſhould even carry him into an attempt to reconcile it with what he had before taught, viz. the doctrine of abſolute Non-reſiſtance: but this taſk was now for the eaſe of it become irreſiſtible to let it paſs unperformed; for ſince a de facto King was the ordinance of God, he muſt derive his authority from the ſame divine fountain, which conſequently muſt not be reſiſted. Upon this principle he has theſe words in the diſcourſe already cited: 'So that whatever diſpute there may be about other matters, the late Revolution has made no alteration in the principles of Government and obedience; it does not oblige us to own the ſuperior power of the People over the King, which would be a very tottering foundation for monarchy, and could never ſupport it long. Thoſe who believed the doctrine of Non-reſiſtance and paſſive Obedience to be a good doctrine before, may think ſo ſtill, and be never the worſe friends to the preſent Government. And I have often thought it a wonderful Providence of God, that in an age wherein the ſtricteſt loyalty and obedience had been ſo earneſtly preſſed on men, ſo great a Revolution ſhould be brought about, while the generality of the ſubjects were merely paſſive, and ſurprized into a deliverance (26).' Whence it is evident, that, in his opinion, the wonder at laſt of this providence conſiſted in ſecretly inſpiring King James with a reſolution to withdraw his perſon, diſband his army, and leave nobody in authority to adminiſter the affairs of the Crown. Otherwiſe, that the active party ſhould prevail over the other who were merely paſſive, is ſo far from being wonderful, that the contrary would have been the only, and indeed a moſt ſurprizing wonder.

As this revolution, in the Doctor's principles, was ſo wonderfully wrought by Biſhop Overal's book, the reader will naturally be inquiſitive after ſome further account of that Prelate; which curioſity we are able to gratify ſo far as to inform him, that Dr John Overal was bred at Cambridge, where, from being a Fellow of Trinity-college, he became Maſter of Catharine hall, and Regius Profeſſor of Divinity. In 1601-2 he was promoted to the deanery of St Paul's * by Queen Elizabeth, at the recommendation of Sir Fulke Greville, afterwards Lord Brooke, his patron; and in the beginning of King James's reign he was choſen Prolocutor of the lower Houſe of Convocation. In April 1614, he was advanced to the biſhopric of Coventry and Lichfield, from which he was tranſlated in 1618, to that of Norwich, where he died on the 12th of May following, and was interred in that church; where Dr Coſins, Biſhop of Durham, who had been bred under his counſels †, in gratitude erected an elegant monument to his memory, after the Reſtoration ‖. He is ranked amongſt the beſt Divines of his time, and particularly excelled in ſcholaſtic Theology. He held a correſpondence with Gerard Voſſius, and Hugo Grotius, to whom ſeveral of his letters are publiſhed in that uſeful Collection, intituled Præſtantium & eruditorum Virorum epiſtolæ eccleſiaſticæ & theologicæ ‡, in which he declares himſelf in favour of Arminianiſm; however, he thinks St Auſtin's opinion of the irreſiſtibility of Grace may be tolerated, but abſolutely condemns the doctrine of confining Grace to the Elect alone. He laboured heartily to accord the diſputes in Holland upon the points of the quinquarticular controverſy, and expreſſes great concern for the ill treatment which the ſtudies and propoſals of Grotius, for peace, met with. Laſtly, in the ſame ſpirit of peace, he held the expediency of an hypothetical re ordination, in the caſe of admitting foreign Proteſtant Divines to the benefices of the Church of England; wherein his opinion very probably influenced Archbiſhop Tillotſon § ſeveral years afterwards.

[M] Vindication

An anſwer to a late pamphlet, intituled, Obedience and Submiſſion to the preſent government demonſtrated from Biſhop Overal's Convocation-book, with a Poſtſcript in an anſwer to Dr Sherlock's caſe of allegiance (w). To this our author replied, in his Vindication of the caſe of allegiance to Sovereign Power, in reply to an anſwer in a late Pamphlet, &c. with a Poſtſcript, &c. [M] In 1691, he publiſhed his Vindication of the doctrine of the holy and ever-bleſſed Trinity [N]. In this book he ſtarted a new method of explaining that myſtery [O], the danger of which novelty was taken notice of the ſame year. However, (w) This was ſuppoſed to be writ by Biſhop Ken, to whom, according to his uſual warmth, he has once ſaid he would be crucified before he would take theſe oaths. South's Animadverſions, &c.

[M] Vindication of the Caſe of Allegiance.] A copy of King James's letter to Abbot, mentioned by Biſhop Burnet, as above cited, was publiſhed in the New Obſervator of Friday December 5, 1690 (27), where that writer declares, that the original was communicated to him by an eminent perſon in whoſe hands it was. If this be the Biſhop, he differs from his Lordſhip with regard to it's being writ all in the King's own hand, whereas the author ſays this only of the four laſt lines, the reſt, as he conjectures, being writ by the then Secretary of State. The words alluded to by the Biſhop are theſe, 'You have dipped too deep in what all Kings reſerve as the Arcana Imperii, and whatever averſion you may profeſs againſt God's being the author of Sin, you have ſtumbled upon the threſhold of that opinion, in ſaying upon the matter, that even tyranny is God's authority, and ſhould be reverenced as ſuch. If the King of Spain ſhould return to claim his old pontifical right to my kingdoms, you leave me to ſeek for others to fight for them, for you tell me, upon the matter before-hand, his authority is God's authority if he prevail.' In this vindication Dr Sherlock ſuppoſes King William's authority to be unjuſtly gotten, and that the means of bringing about the Revolution were wicked and unjuſtifiable, but he changed this opinion ſoon, as appears from his ſermon abovecited in 1691.

(27) No. 12: in Vol. III. This paper was taken up in contraſt to one publiſhed by Sir Roger L'Eſtrange, under the ſame title, in the preceding reign.

The Doctor's picture, as drawn by S. Johnſon, on this occaſion, is not a little entertaining. The reaſon, ſays that writer, why the Clergy were ſo zealous for tyranny in King Charles IId's time, was, becauſe it was a tyranny on their ſide: That made them ſo very liberal of the Engliſh rights, and to ſacrifice them all at once in a peace-offering to Moloch; and it was a true act of worſhip, for it ſignalized their loyalty. But when Judgment began at the Houſe of God, as Dr Sherlock preached upon the Biſhops being ſent to the Tower, then their note was quite altered. King James had forfeited and ought to be depoſed, with a great deal more to that purpoſe. But afterwards, when they grew jealous of this Revolution, and could not tell what to make of it, having miſſed two hits, both of having King James, and afterwards of having his intended Deputy the Prince of Orange, in their hands, and wanted a third hit; then the words were theſe, Well, will not the Convention fetch the King back again? If they will not we have forty thouſand Men to fetch him back. Dr Sherlock beſt knows where thoſe forty thouſand men now are, but I believe King James would be very glad of half the number. To proceed in my ſtory, the very man that had aſſerted that King James had forfeited, and ought to be depoſed long before he was, or even before the Prince of Orange was expected, began with change of intereſt to have change of thoughts; and then he could not allow King James to be lawfully ſet aſide, nor would ſwear to this preſent Government, and his forfeited place at the Temple was ſupplied by I know who. At laſt, after he had ſtuck as himſelf ſays, a great while, for ſtick he did, he was happily relieved by a lucky coincidence of Biſhop Overal's canons, and the victory of the Boyne; and then he ſettled the Government upon it's own ſettlement, which we that pretend to dull reaſon, do ſay is a circle, and proving a thing by itſelf. It is true he called Providence in aid of this ſettlement; but they have talked of late as meanly of Providence, as ever mankind did of the Swiſs, who are of all ſides, and in French and Dutch ſervice both at once; he then proceeds to harangue in proof of that maxim as he calls it, that Providence thus divided againſt itſelf cannot ſtand. After which, returning to his preaching, he maintains that Judgment began at the Houſe of God, not when the Biſhops were in the Tower, but when Stephen College was murdered, who was a true firſt martyr Stephen.

But for quietneſs ſake, continues Mr Johnſon, it ſhall be his own Houſe of God, the Biſhops; for I grant that that word, and the true Religion, and the like, are doubtful words, and ſignify nothing till we know of what religion the man himſelf is. Theſe are by-matters; but the queſtion is, how a man that had a right notion before, came to loſe it the next year, and has not been able to recover it to this day? For if he had ſtuck to his own occaſional Engliſh principle, (but then was then, and now is now) That King James, being a Tyrant, had forfeited, and, having broke with the nation, ought not to reign, he had not ſtuck at all among Jacobite principles, which however are forty times better than his own hypotheſis of uſurpation: for the Jacobites, though miſtaken, pretend to right, but he proceeds upon avowed, barefaced, open, impudent, outrageous wrong; as uſurpation either is, or there is no ſuch thing in the world: it is all that either the giants or the devils ever attempted againſt heaven. But he had no other way to make a Caſe of Allegiance to King William, to chime in with his unretracted Caſe of Reſiſtance, written heretofore in favour of Tyranny: For though paſſive obedience had no hand in the Revolution, yet perhaps he was informed it might be a grateful preſent to a Settlement. However, I muſt tell him, that paſſive obedience muſt be crooked and bent like a ninepence, and look contrary ways, before he can make a token of it to this Government; for actual reſiſtance of Tyranny gave this Government it's birth and being, and it ſtands, and can ſtand, upon no other bottom (28).

(28) Notes on the Phœnix edition of the [Burnet's] Paſtoral Letter, p. 307, 308. among S. Johnſon's Works, as before.

[N] Vindication of the Trinity.] Biſhop Burnet (29), as it ſhould ſeem for the ſake of an opportunity to indulge his ill-nature in party matters, has antedated the time of our author's publiſhing this treatiſe. That hiſtorian aſſerts, that it was writ while our author was under ſuſpenſion for refuſing the oath of allegiance; that tho' his doctrine was looked on as plain Tritheiſm, yet all the party applauded him and his book; that upon his taking the oath of allegiance ſoon after, and publiſhing an account of his reaſons for it, his former party being highly exaſperated, purſued him with the clamour of Tritheiſm, which, ſays he, was done with much malice by the ſame perſons who had highly magnified the performance while he was of their party. That the Biſhop has antedated this treatiſe is manifeſt, by comparing the Imprimatur of it, January 9, 1690-1, with that of his Caſe of Allegiance, which is dated October 17, 1690, ſo then he muſt have taken the oaths before he publiſhed his Vindication of the Trinity; what then muſt we think of the Biſhop's aſperſion, which is pointed at the end too with this virulent exclamation, So powerful is the biaſs of intereſt and paſſion in the moſt ſpeculative and moſt important doctrines. I own the miſtake in the date is ſmall, but not ſo is the wound given by it; the point of a dagger too is ſmall, but for that very reaſon it pierces more ſurely to the heart.

(29) In the Hiſtory of his own Times, p. 212.

[O] A new Method of explaining that myſtery.] His explanation was thus: He thought there were three eternal Minds, two of theſe iſſuing from the Father, but that theſe three were one by a mutual conſciouſneſs in the three to every of their thoughts. The opinion was generally cenſured, as tending to Tritheiſm. We ſhall give what Dr Wallis ſays, as it is ſpoken with candour in a letter to Mr William Jane, with whom the Doctor had then a controverſy upon this ſubject of the Trinity. 'Now, ſays he, as to what you obſerve, 'concerning the learned author, Dr Sherlock, I ſhall 'begin where you end, and agree with you that the 'treatiſe to which you refer contains many excellent 'things; the ſtrength and weight of his arguments, 'as to thoſe whom he undertakes to anſwer, does not 'depend upon theſe expreſſions to which you object, 'but his arguments are of equal force, though theſe 'expreſſions were ſpared. As to thoſe expreſſions of 'his by you noted, that the three divine perſons are 'three beings, three intelligent beings, three ſubſtantial 'beings, three Holy Spirits really diſtinct as Peter, 'James, and John, and one God only as they are 'mutually conſcious: I was I confeſs diſſatisfied there-ever, upon the promotion of Dr Tillotſon to the ſee of Canterbury, our author ſucceeded him, by his Grace's recommendation and intereſt (x), in the Deanery of St Paul's, and was inſtalled into that dignity on the 15th of July this ſame year [P]. So conſiderable a preferment in the Church, treading as were upon the heels of his compliance to the State, furniſhed an inexhauſtible fund of common-place wit to his adverſaries, and particularly Dr South was too liquoriſh of ſarcaſm (y) not to hitch upon it [Q], as he too frequently, for

(y) He was as ſeverely handled by South, who complied with the new government, as he was either by Hickes or Collier, both Nonjurors. Burnet.

' in (as you are) from the firſt, looking upon them as ' expreſſions too hardy for him to venture upon, (and ' ſo I find are moſt others with whom I have diſcourſed ' about them) and wiſh he had declined them; yet I ' did not think it neceſſary for me to write againſt ' them (though I did not like them) but choſe rather ' to wave them, and expreſs myſelf otherwiſe; nor ' ſhall I aggravate the objections which you have urged ' againſt them, but leave them as they are. That ' learned author may, if he think fit, ſo vindicate or ' explain thoſe expreſſions as he ſhall judge convenient; ' or he may (which I had rather he ſhould) decline ' them, without prejudice to his main cauſe, which ' (in my opinion) he may as well defend without them, ' and thereby leſs expoſe himſelf to the cavils of the ' Anti-Trinitarians, who are catching at every colour-' able pretence of objecting, though not againſt the ' main cauſe concerning the Trinity, if but againſt ſome ' expreſſions of thoſe who maintain it. Now, Sir, if ' you look back upon your own diſcourſe, you will find ' that the whole edge of your arguments is directed ' againſt thoſe expreſſions, three Beings, three Sub-' ſtances, three Spirits: and I do acknowledge, that ' as to theſe, the arguments ſeem to me ſharp enough ' and to do their work: but if, inſtead of theſe, he ' ſay, as I think he ſhould, that the three Perſons are ' one Being, one Subſtance, one Spirit, like as he ſays ' they are one God, the edge will be taken off. That ' which I conceive did impoſe upon him in this point, ' is the forced ſenſe which, in our language, we ſome-' times put upon the word perſon (for want of another ' Engliſh word anſwering to homo) which might indif-' ferently reſpect man, woman, or child, and a like ' forced ſenſe put by the ſchoolmen upon the word per-' ſona, for want of a Latin word which might equally ' relate to men and angels, as ſignifying an intelligent ' Being; whence he was induced to think that three per-' ſons muſt needs be three intelligent Beings: Whereas ' perſona in it's true and ancient ſenſe, before the ' ſchoolmen put this forced ſenſe upon it, did not ſig-' nify a man ſimply, but one under ſuch and ſuch and ' ſuch circumſtances or qualifications; ſo that the ſame ' man, if capable of being qualified thus, and thus, and ' thus, might ſuſtain three perſons, and theſe three ' perſons be the ſame man.'

Now, if (as he ſays himſelf elſewhere in a like caſe) ' he have not been taken to be a fool, yet a wiſe man ' may ſometimes, upon ſecond thoughts, ſee reaſon to ' change his opinion (as in that caſe he did) or rectify ' his expreſſions; and it then be conſidered how much ' eaſier it will be, and leſs obnoxious to exceptions, ' to maintain his hypotheſis thus rectified, he may think ' I have done him no ill office; thus to ſuggeſt (30).'

N B. Dr Wallis is generally cenſured for running into the other extreme of Sabellianiſm, and we need not obſerve that the latter part of the paſſage here cited, is an inſtance of it.

[P] He was made Dean of St Paul's by the intereſt and recommendation of Archbiſhop Tillotſon.] Dr Birch, to whom we owe this particular, has likewiſe given us an inſtance of our author's gratitude. Every body knows in what indifferent circumſtances that excellent Archbiſhop left his family, and the following letter is at once both a proof of it, and of this friend's endeavours to procure a proper relief; The deſign of the letter is ſufficiently explained in the contents, which run thus.

' Dear Hobbs *,

* A Phyſician and intimate friend of Lord Somers.

' That kindneſs which was deſigned to Archbiſhop ' Tillotſon's nephew, for maintaining him at the Uni-' verſity, and was then refuſed, is now become neceſ-' ſary; and your reſpect for the Archbiſhop's memory, ' which was your motive then, I hope continues ' ſtill, eſpecially conſidering the nephew was in no ' fault. Mrs Tillotſon had ſuch a regard for the ho-' nour of my Lord, and ſuch a kindneſs for his rela-' tions for his ſake, that ſhe would gladly maintain him ' if ſhe could, but ſhe is reduced herſelf to thoſe nar-' row circumſtances, by the unexpected death of Mr ' Chadwick †, and that leſs expected condition he has ' left his family in, that ſhe is utterly diſabled She ' came to me before I went to Tunbridge, to deſire ' me to recommend him to ſome family to be tutor to ' ſome young gentleman, where he might ſupport ' himſelf; and upon that occaſion acquainted me with ' her condition: that Mr Chadwick had ſpent all his ' eſtate, but what was ſettled upon his wife in marriage, ' which comes to her eldeſt ſon: that the younger ſon ' and daughter had not one farthing to maintain them, ' but depended wholly upon her; that he had put a ' thouſand pounds of her money into the bank in his ' own name. and had given her no declaration of truſt, ' though ſhe had often deſired it of him, which by this ' means is loſt to her, and muſt pay his debts; that ' his eſtate in the Foreſt *, where ſhe has built her houſe, ' and which I think is copyhold, was purchaſed for ' his life at 300l. which muſt now be paid again; ' that upon his great importunity ſhe built that houſe ' at great expence, which is now much too big for her. ' I was extremely concerned to hear this ſad account, ' and promiſed I would do what I could to maintain her ' nephew in the Univerſity; for to take him ſo young ' from thence would be his ruin; and for this reaſon ' have repreſented the caſe to you, preſuming upon ' your old friendſhip, but have not the confidence to do ' ſo much to ſome great men you know, for it muſt be ' great kindneſs or great virtue that recovers a baulk'd ' charity. But this good Lady's condition is ſo very ' pitiable, that I wiſh you could perſuade my Lord ' Chancellor ‖ to repreſent it to his Majeſty, who, I ' am perſuaded after all his generous behaviour to her, ' would ſtill be inclined to compaſſionate her new miſ-' fortunes.

The Archbiſhop's nephew mentioned in this letter, Mr Robert Tillotſon, ſon of his brother Joſhua, was educated at Clare-hall, in Cambridge, and became afterwards a Fellow there. During the courſe of his education he was honoured with the favour of Lord Somers, out of regard to his uncle's memory, which was acknowledged by him in a Latin letter to his Lordſhip ſtill extant. Upon entering into Orders, he was preſented to the fine-cure of Elme of conſiderable value in the iſle of Ely, by the executors of the Archbiſhop, to whoſe diſpoſal that option was left (32). He lived, being unmarried, in private lodgings at Cambridge, in 1724 (33).

(Q) Dr South hitched upon it] We ſhall give the following inſtance for a ſpecimen of the Doctor's manner in this way. ' The fable, ſays he, tells us of a ' cat once turned into a woman, but the next ſight of ' a mouſe quickly diſſolved the metamorphoſis, caſhier-' ed the woman, and reſtored the brute; and ſome vir-' tuoſi ſkilled in the philoſophy of alterations, have ' thought her much a gainer by the latter change, ' there being ſo many unlucky turns in the world, ' in which it is not half ſo ſafe and advantageous to ' walk upright, as to be able to fall always upon one's ' legs.' The unpleaſing coarſeneſs in the thread of this ſarcaſm, immediately gave my eyes a turn from it to thoſe lines in the Duke of Buckinghamſhire's Eſſay on Satire, where this fable, a little differently couched, is applied with a much more ſtabbing keenneſs, as it is pointed with ſuch a genteel ſpirit and delicacy as cannot but be admired. The ſubject of it is a ſtateſman of diſtinguiſhed abilities for buſineſs, but too fond of mirth and wit, as follows:

When

for his own credit does in his Animadverſions upon Dr Sherlock's book intituled, a Vindication of the doctrine of the holy and ever-bleſſed Trinity, &c. humbly offered to his admirers and to himſelf, (ſo the title concludes) the greateſt part of them. This was publiſhed in 1693, after our author had printed his Apology for writing againſt the Socinians in defence of the doctrines of the holy Trinity and Incarnation, in which he aſſerts his firſt opinion (z), and declares his reſolution to proceed in defence of thoſe important articles (aa). Accordingly in 1694 he publiſhed A defence of Dr Sherlock's notion of a Trinity in Unity, in anſwer to the Animadverſions upon his vindication of the doctrine of the holy and ever bleſſed Trinity, with a Poſtſcript relating to the calm diſcourſe of a Trinity in the Godhead. In this piece he explained his opinion in the generally received terms, ſo as there appeared no material difference from what was called the orthodox faith (bb) [R]: But the affair was not ſo determined. For in anſwer to this laſt-mentioned piece, Dr South publiſhed his Tritheiſm charged upon Dr Sherlock's new notion of the Trinity, and the charge made good, &c. in 1695. and the ſame year the Doctor's notion being aſſerted in a ſermon preached at Oxford, by a Fellow of Univerſity-college, was cenſured by an expreſs decree of that learned body, as falſe, impious, and heretical, and all perſons under their juriſdiction warned not to preach or maintain any ſuch notion [S]. This decree of the Univerſity being publiſhed in the weekly news-papers, with a Poſtſcript, ſignifying, that the doctrine ſo cenſured was that of Dr Sherlock, in his Diſcourſe on the Trinity. Our author, by way of reply, printed in 1696 (cc), A modeſt Examination of the authority and reaſons of the late decree of the Vice-chancellor, and ſome heads of Colleges and Halls, concerning the hereſy of three diſtinct infinite minds in the holy and ever-bleſſed Trinity. This piece producing another, intituled, Remarks upon a book lately publiſhed by Dr William Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, &c. intituled, A modeſt examination of the Oxford decree, &c (dd). And the whole controverſy being managed with unbecoming heat and acrimony on both ſides, his Majeſty, at the motion of the Biſhops (ee), thought fit to interpoſe, by putting out Directions to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, for the preſerving of unity in the Church, and the ſupport of the Chriſtian Faith concerning the holy Trinity, wherein it was ordained, that in the explication of the Trinity, 'all preachers ſhould carefully avoid all new terms, 'and confine themſelves to ſuch ways of explication as have been commonly uſed in the 'church (ff).' So that our author's conduct in this point was finally condemned [T]. Before

(z) Dr South, however, declares, that in this apology he had changed his opinion in ſome things. Preface to Animadverſions.

(aa) It was writ in anſwer to an earneſt and compaſſionate ſuit for forbearance to the learned writers of ſome controverſial papers, by a melancholy ſtander by. Our author obſerves, that Dr Wallis and himſelf were immediately concerned in this ſuit. Apology, p. 2. and in 1694 he publiſhed a defence of this Apology.

(bb) In the beginning he appeals to his friend, that he had not been idle; and it appears, that he publiſhed his Practical Diſcourſe concerning a Future Judgment, in 1692, in 8vo. and A Diſcourſe concerning Providence, in 1694, in 4to.

(cc) So it is in the title-page; apparently from the cuſtom of the London-Printers, in beginning the year at the Michaelmas preceding the eſtabliſhed æra; but it muſt be printed before March 25, 1696, as is plain by the date of the King's directions, Feb. 3, 1695; and the anſwer to it is alſo printed, according to the title page, in 1695, at Oxford, where the Printer follows the eſtabliſhed æra.

(dd) The author was ſuppoſed to be Dr Jonathan Edwards, Principal of Jeſus-college in Oxford, where the book was printed.

(ff) The directions are printed at length in Burnet, and the general hiſtories of England.

When ſerious, few for great affairs more fit,
But ſhew him mirth, and bait that mirth with wit,
That ſhadow of a jeſt ſhall be enjoy'd,
Though he left all mankind to be deſtroy'd.
So Puſs transform'd ſat like a mumping bride,
Penſive and prudent till the mouſe ſhe ſpy'd,
But ſoon the Lady had him in her eye,
And juſt as oddly from the board did fly.

[R] No material difference from the Orthodox faith.] He followed the advice ſuggeſted, as we have ſeen, by Dr Wallis. For, in ſpeaking of the word perſon, he obſerves, 'that it is not in the Trinity taken in the 'common ſenſe of the word, as three perſons who ſub'ſiſt apart, but three ſubſiſtences are three perſons who 'ſubſiſt diſtinctly without ſeparation; for ſubſiſtence 'neceſſarily ſignifies a diſtinct and real, but not ſe'parate ſubſiſtence, and the uſual orthodox way, if I 'miſtake not, is, that the perſon is really diſtinct from 'the modus ſubſiſtendi; and thus the orthodox faith is 'diſtinguiſhed from Sabellianiſm, according to which 'the perſon is nothing elſe but the modus exiſtendi. 'Now, continues he, what I have ſaid of the word 'perſon, is with equal reaſon applicable to the word 'mind.' The animadverter objects againſt the Dean, 'That a mind or ſpirit is an abſolute Being, Nature, 'or Subſtance, and I grant it is ſo in the common 'uſe of the word, as applied to created minds and ſpi'rits, but ſo is perſon alſo as much as mind; and if 'we allow of a theological uſe of the word perſon, why 'not of mind too to ſignify an intelligent ſubſiſtence? 'which is a mind too, but not a ſeparate mind, and 'therefore not ſuch an abſolute Being, Nature, and 'Subſtance as a created mind is.—And when the Dean 'ſpeaks of three diſtinct infinite minds, which are eſſen'tially and independently one, he could mean nothing 'more than three diſtinct, intelligent, but not ſeparate 'ſubſiſtencies; and I need aſk no other pardon for the 'uſe of a term which the ſchools have not conſe'crated (34).

[T] Our Author's doctrine was finally condemned.] Biſhop Burnet in the place cited above, tells us, that theſe directions put a ſtop to the debates upon this ſubject, and that Mr Firmin's death [in 1698] put a ſtop to the printing and ſpreading of Socinian books. This laſt remark muſt not be underſtood abſolutely, and can only mean that Mr Firmin was the chief propagator of Socinianiſm; for that it continued afterwards in a high degree is apparent from this among other inſtances, that notwithſtanding this, our author in 1696 publiſhed a piece, intituled, The Diſtinction between real and nominal Trinitarians ‡ conſidered; and the following year, Vindication of a Sermon concerning corrupting Faith by Philoſophy, to which he added, The preſent State of the Socinian Controverſy in 1698, all in 4to; and in 1701 he preached a Concio ad Clerum before the Convocation (35), where he earneſtly and warmly, as his manner was, exhorts and invites his brethren to oppoſe thoſe heretical, as he calls them, and viperous tracts, which then threatened ſo much danger to the Church. In the ſame view he likewiſe publiſhed Proofs of Chriſt's Divinity, in 1706, 8vo.

‡ The Doctor was called a real Trinitarian.

(35) It was preached on the 30th of December that year.

fore this, in the same year, he preached a remarkable sermon in the Temple-church, on the death of Queen Mary, by which it appears that he did not disapprove of the then intended Comprehension [U] But this did not hinder him from employing his pen to reconcile Dissenters to the Church upon the present state of it's establishment [W]. In 1704. he published the The distinction of high and low Church considered, in 4to. And the same year came out his discourse upon the Immortality of the Soul, in which he attacked Mr. Lock's opinion concerning innate ideas [X]. He was presented to the rectory of Therfield in Hertfordshire some time before his death, which happened on the 19th of June, 1707, in the 67th year of his age (gg). He died at Hampstead, near London, and was interred in the Cathedral of St Paul's. Besides the numerous books already mentioned in the course of this memoir, he printed several sermons, which after his decease were collected and published in two volumes, 8vo. (hh). He was survived by two daughters, and as many sons, to the eldest of which, Thomas, he left a considerable fortune; having in his life-time resigned the Mastership of the Temple in the view of procuring it for him. Accordingly this gentleman succeeded his father in that honourable post, which he discharged to the great satisfaction of those societies a great number of years. He was likewise made Dean of Chichester, and afterwards promoted successively to the sees of Bangor and Salisbury, and, upon the death of Dr Edmund Gibson, in 1748, succeeded him in the Bishopric of London; to which high and arduous province he does honour, and, though upwards at present of fourscore years of age, enjoys the full vigour of his excellent parts. Having lately (ii) published a most excellent charge to his Clergy, wherein that masterly knowledge in the laws of both Church and State, for which he is eminently distinguished, is applied with a paternal affection to their use and service (kk).

(gg) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under the year 1707; and Le Neve's Fasti, p. 185.

(hh) He had also a share in Archdeacon Gregory's pompous edition of the Greek Testament; printed in 1703, at Oxford, in folio. Advertisement prefixed to that book. Mr Wood also mentions some controversial writings between him and one Thomas Vincent a Nonconformist Conventicler at Hogsden, near London. Athen. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 623.

(ii) In July, 1759.

(kk) Since the preceding sheet was printed off, there hath come to our knowledge these two particulars concerning Bishop Overal, viz. That he was first admitted of St John's college in Cambridge; and that he died in the sixtieth year of his age. Carter's History of Cambridge; and the Bishop's epitaph, printed at the end of Bish p Cosins's life, by Dr Smith.

[U] He did not disapprove the intended Comprehension with the Dissenters.] The Doctor, it seems, run with the current of his friends at different times, in respect to this project. In the reign of King Charles the Second, he treated the Dissenters roughly and rudely, with disdain and contempt: speaking of Baxter, the head then of that sect, and, as he declares, the wisest head amongst them, he says, 'As for Mr Baxter, I am 'mightily inclined to pity him, he has disputed him-'self out of all sense and all good manners, and I think 'there is the least reason to answer any of his books, of 'any man's I know; for I believe very few people un-'derstand what he would have himself (36):' Thus it is evident he had at that time no opinion of a Comprehension. But in the succeeding reign, when a scheme was laid for one by Archbishop Sancroft in 1687, he preached a sermon, wherein, to use Dr South's expression, he opened both his arms to embrace the Dissenters. And how much he approved of Archbishop Tillotson's design of introducing it after the Revolution, appears from a passage in the above-mentioned sermon on the death of Queen Mary, where, speaking of her Majesty's piety, and noble designs for the Church of England, he proceeds thus: 'I have reason to say this from those 'frequent intimations I have had from our late admi-'rable Primate [Tillotson] who had great designs him-'self to serve the Christian Religion and the Church 'of England, in it's truest interest; and had interested 'their Majesties, and particularly the Queen, who had 'more leisure for such things, with the same great and 'pious designs. It may be no churchman ever had, I 'am sure none more deservedly had, a greater interest 'in his Prince's favour; and the great use he made of 'it was to do public service to religion; and, whatever 'some men may suspect, to the Church of England, 'though it may be not perfectly in their way (37).'

(37) Sermon on the Death of Queen Mary, preached at the Temple church, p. 6, 7. the 3d edition, 1694, 4to.

[W] The present state of it's establishment.] It was with this view that he published the following pieces. (1) Cases about Church Communion, &c. in 1698, folio, which being attacked by Mr N. Taylor, was defended in a piece intituled, A Vindication of Dr Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, in Answer to Mr Nathaniel Taylor's Treatise, intituled, Dr Sherlock's Case of Church Communion and his Letter to Anonymous, considered, &c. Together with a Reply to his Vindication of the Dissenters from the Charge of Schism, 1702, 4to. (3) New Danger of Presbytery. Lond. 1703, 4to. (4) Of Religious Assemblies, the same year, in 8vo, to which may be added, (5) Distinction of High and Low Church considered, in 1704, 4to.

[X] Innate ideas, against Mr Locke.] It is introduced by way of digression into his third section of the third chapter, where he endeavours to prove the natural Immortality of the Soul, from universal consent, which he thought irreconcileable to the opinion maintained by Mr Locke, that we have no innate ideas; for so he argues, 'if the soul of man has no inbred know-'ledge, it is in vain to talk of the light, and voice, and 'sense of nature; if it has, then the universal consent 'of mankind, can be reasonably attributed to no other 'cause'. He then observes, that 'Mr Locke's hypothesis 'that all our ideas come from without, is the same with 'the old atheistical hypothesis that nihil est in intellectu, quod non fit prius in sensibus,' yet he does not charge Mr Locke with those principles because that writer disowns them, but he asserts that the hypothesis can serve no other end. In order to prove these ideas connate, and that there is some inbred knowledge in the mind, our author argues thus against Mr Locke, upon his own concession that there is a God, and that he made the world. '1. Knowledge is before the things known, and 'is the maker of them; for God knew what he would 'make before he made the world, and therefore the 'ideas of all things were originally in the divine mind, 'before any thing was made. Hence it follows, that 'ideal knowledge is essential to a mind. It is found no 'where originally, but in the eternal mind, and it is es-'sential to the very notion and idea of a mind, for what 'is a mind without the images and ideas of things, which 'is a good argument that created minds, as far as they 'partake of the eternal mind, have the natural ideas of 'things interwoven in their frame and constitution, if I 'may so speak, for a mind is a mind whether created or 'uncreated, and if created minds are made after the 'pattern of the divine mind (and there is no other pattern 'for minds) natural ideas must be as essential to created 'minds, as they are to the uncreated mind, for there is 'no notion of a mind without them.' Every body sees the ridicule our author lies open to, in begging the question that the soul always thinks, which is controverted by Mr Locke; as also, that God must make minds after a pattern, and that too of his own mind. Accordingly Mr Locke made himself very merry with it (38). It must not be denied that our author's reasoning upon this point, is contemptibly weak, and much beneath his character, being built upon a mistake, in confounding truth itself with our perception of it. But how much soever he falls short in the philosophical part, his motives for opposing Mr Locke were pious and not unbecoming the Divine. He was apprehensive, with many others, that the modern Atheists would espouse and magnify Mr Locke's hypothesis, and, whether he would or no, make use of it, or as much of it as they pleased, to confute those principles of religion and virtue which he owned. The objection that mankind were made without any connate ideas of good and evil seemed very formidable to him, for he observes, that the general reason why men are so zealous against these ideas being innate, is to deliver themselves from the necessity of believing any thing of God or Religion.

SHOVEL [Sir CLOUDESLEY], one of thoſe brave Admirals, who, from the loweſt birth and beginning, raiſed himſelf, by the ſole weight of perſonal merit, to the firſt honours of his profeſſion. He was born at a ſmall town near Clay in Norfolk (a), in 1650 (b); and, after ſuch an education as was ſuitable to the circumſtances of his family, was bound apprentice, it is ſaid, to a ſhoemaker, or ſome ſuch mechanic trade (c). However that be, it is certain the youth had always a ſtrong inclination for the ſea; and happening to be ſent upon ſome buſineſs to one of the maritime towns upon the Norfolk-coaſt; the ſight of the ſhipping, &c. fired his fancy to ſuch a degree, that he never ceaſed intreating his parents to let him try his fortune in the Navy, 'till he obtained their conſent (d): one principal motive to which ſeems to have been, the conſideration how little they were able to do for him in any way. 'Tis ſaid, they had directed him to be chriſtened Cloudeſley, in the view of recommending him to the notice of a relation of that name (e); and, perhaps, this kinſman might now be a means of procuring a recommendation to the famous Sir John Narborough, who thereupon preſently made him his cabin-boy (f). Thus were fulfilled the fondeſt wiſhes of his heart. This was a very promiſing way of entering into the Navy; the birth gave him all the opportunities he could deſire of engaging his maſter's regard, and he did not fail to make the beſt uſe of them. Sir John had raiſed himſelf from the ſame ſtation, and was a generous patron of all who diſcovered any extraordinary ſymptoms of maritime worth (g). He ſaw with pleaſure the fidelity and affection which the boy expreſſed towards his perſon upon all occaſions; and after ſome time, having had ſufficient proofs of his talents and aſſiduity, he ordered him to be thoroughly inſtructed in Navigation, and in every other requiſite to make a compleat ſeaman, and then procured him a Lieutenant's commiſſion (b). He was in this rank at the cloſe of the ſecond Dutch war, when our trade to the Levant being diſtreſſed by the corſairs of Tripoli and Algiers, a ſquadron was ordered to ſuppreſs their inſolence, under the command of Sir John Narborough; who, arriving before Tripoli in the ſpring of 1675 (i), found every thing ready to give him a warm reception. The Algerines, upon his firſt appearance, drew up their ſhips of war under the cannon of their mole, and the pirates of Tripoli following the example of their confederates, had brought their ſhips under the walls of their town, and the artillery of a fort that commanded the harbour (k). The appearance of the enemy's ſtrength, joined to the tenor of Sir John's inſtructions, by which he was directed to try negotiation rather than force, determined him to find a perſon in whom he could confide to the Dey of Tripoli, to propoſe an accommodation, upon receiving ſatisfaction for what was paſt, and ſecurity for the future. The Admiral pitched upon our Lieutenant, who attended this expedition, to carry the meſſage. Accordingly he went on ſhore, and delivered it with great ſpirit. But the Dey deſpiſing his youth, treated him with much diſreſpect, and ſent him back with an indefinite anſwer. Mr Shovel, on his return to the Admiral, acquainted him with ſome remarks he had made on ſhore: Sir John ſent him back with another meſſage, and well furniſhed with proper rules for conducting his enquiries and obſervations. The Dey's behaviour was worſe the ſecond time; but Mr Shovel bore it with patience, and made uſe of it as an excuſe for ſtaying ſome time longer on ſhore: And when he returned, he aſſured the Admiral that it was very practicable to burn the ſhips in the harbour, notwithſtanding their lines and forts. Accordingly, in the night on the fourth of March, Lieutenant Shovel, at the head of all the boats (l) in the fleet filled with combuſtible matter, went boldly into the harbour, and deſtroyed the enemy's ſhips, with a degree of ſucceſs ſcarce to be conceived [A]; and Sir John Narborough gave ſo honourable an account of it in all his letters, that the next year our Lieutenant was rewarded with the command of the Sapphire, a fifth rate; from whence he was not long after removed into the James Galley, a fourth rate, in which he continued 'till the death of King Charles the Second; who firſt raiſed and had always a great kindneſs for him (m). Whatever grateful ſenſe he might have of this kindneſs, yet he did not think it ſufficient to juſtify a compliance with the arbitrary and illegal meaſures of the ſucceeding reign. He appeared among thoſe ſea commanders, who, at the riſque of their poſts, bravely rejected every attempt that was made upon them in that deſign; and the event is a remarkable proof of the high eſteem he was then in. When threatenings failed, it was reſolved to try what favours would do; in that view King

[A] A degree of ſucceſs ſcarce to be conceived.] The veſſels burnt, which were all that lay in the harbour, were the White Eagle crowned, of 50 guns, the Looking-glaſs, of 36, the Santta Clara, of 24, and a French veſſel, of 20: After which he returned ſafe to the fleet, without the loſs of ſo much as a ſingle man (1). This extraordinary action ſtruck the Tripolines with amazement, and made them inſtantly ſue for peace. Yet when they came to treat, refuſing to make good the loſſes ſuſtained by the Engliſh, Sir John cannonaded the town; and finding that ineffectual, landed a body of men about 20 leagues from the town, and there burnt a vaſt magazine of timber, provided for building ſhips. When all this failed of reducing theſe people, Sir John ſailed to Malta; and after remaining there for ſome time, returned ſuddenly upon the enemy, and diſtreſs'd them ſo much, that they were glad to conclude a peace on the terms preſcribed. Yet ſoon after the concluſion of the peace, ſome of their corſairs returning into port, not only expreſſed a great diſlike thereto, but actually expelled the Dey for making it, and began to take Engliſh ſhips as before. Sir John being ſtill in the Mediterranean, and having notice of what paſſed, preſently appeared with eight frigates before Tripoli, and began with ſuch violence to batter the place, that the inhabitants were glad once more to renew the peace, and to deliver the authors of the late diſturbances to condign puniſhment (2). Tho' our young hero is not particularly mentioned in theſe ſubſequent actions, yet no doubt he had a good ſhare in them, as he was all the while in the ſquadron with Sir John.

King James preferred him to the command of the Dover, a fourth rate (n). He accepted the commiſſion, without changing his principles; by which means, he was luckily poſſeſſed of this command at the Revolution: When, cloſing heartily with the new government, he was very active in the ſervice, and rendered himſelf ſo conſpicuous, that his riſe in the Navy was as quick as he could wiſh. We find him in the command of the Edgar (o), a third rate, at the battle of Bantry Bay, in 1689; where he gave ſuch ſignal marks of his courage and conduct (p), that, when King William went to Portſmouth, in order to reward the ſeamen for their ſervice in that action, he dined on board the Elizabeth with Admiral Herbert; and having created him Earl of Torrington, he conferred the honour of knighthood upon Captain Shovel (q). During the winter of the year 1690, he was employed in cruizing in the Soundings, and on the coaſt of Ireland, to prevent the enemy from landing any recruits. He had not been long upon this ſtation, when he received advice, that there were ſeveral ſhips of war, French and Iriſh, which at low water lay dry on the ſand in Dublin Bay. Sir Cloudeſly immediately ſtood into the Bay, and ſoon diſcovered, a conſiderable way in, an Engliſh ſhip of good force, a ſmall French man of war of twelve guns, and two or three other ſhips filled with ſoldiers, thought to be a ſufficient guard to ſecure them from any danger. But all theſe precautions were not proof againſt the reſolution of Sir Cloudeſley; he determined to reduce them to aſhes, in the ſight of King James's capital, and in the preſence of a numerous garriſon. To carry this project into execution, he left his flag, and went on board the Monmouth yacht; and at a little more than half flood, the wind being northerly, with that yacht, two hoys belonging to men of war, a ketch, and the pinnaces, he paſſed the bar with a ſurprizing bravery. The ſmall armada of the Iriſh ſeeing this, and perceiving his intention, cut their cables, and ſailing as cloſe to the ſhore as the bank of ſand would permit, fired ſeveral guns at him, and called for aſſiſtance from the garriſon at Dublin, and did all that was poſſible to ſecure themſelves from ſo unexpected an attack. Sir Cloudeſley preſſed forward, in ſpight of all oppoſition, expoſed to the fire of the ſhips, and of the ſmall-ſhot, which flew very thick from King James's militia. As ſoon as he was near enough, he gave a ſignal for a fireſhip, which waited his orders to come in: this being obeyed, the ſoldiers in the largeſt ſhip, which Sir Cloudeſly firſt attempted, deſerted her, and the others ran themſelves aground. Hereupon he ordered the largeſt ſhip to be boarded; which being executed with all imaginable briſkneſs, every thing, that might retard her being conveyed away, was thrown overboard, and the ſailors, with the aſſiſtance of their pinnaces, towed her off; to the inexpreſſible confuſion of the perſons who ſtood on ſhore, ſad ſpectators of this daring action [B]. But Fortune had cut out more work for the courage of Sir Cloudeſley, before ſhe permitted him to return to his ſquadron. In turning out of the Bay, the wind veered from the ſea, and drove one of the hoys aground; ſo that it was impracticable to bring her off, before the water fell away from her. Sir Cloudeſley was unwilling to leave her behind him; he ordered her to be lightned as much as poſſible, and all the veſſels and boats that went in to take her, remained as her guard, 'till the return of the tide ſhould admit the carrying of her away. All this while he continued in the Monmouth yacht. At the loweſt ebb, the hoy was upon dry ground, and many thouſand people crowded upon the ſtrand, where was alſo King James and his guards. The Engliſh lay in their boats armed, and ready for the rencounter. The Iriſh battalions advanced with a pretended bravery, and made a diſcharge or two, but quickly retired, and permitted the Engliſh to do the ſame with their prize, as ſoon as a ſufficient quantity of water gave them leave (r). In June this year, 1690, Sir Cloudeſley was pitched upon to convoy King William and his army into Ireland. With this important charge, he ſet ſail on the 11th from Highlake, attended with five men of war, ſix yachts, and a great number of tranſports. The wind and weather was ſcantly favourable at firſt, but ſoon after a freſh gale ſprung up, and he ſet his Majeſty ſafe a ſhore at Carrickfergus, on the 14th (s). In matters of this nature, Sir Cloudeſley, without queſtion, was one of the ableſt commanders that ever put to ſea; and the King was ſo highly ſatisfied with his diligence and dexterity on this occaſion, that he made him Rear-Admiral of the Blue, with this particular mark of eſteem, that he delivered him the commiſſion with his own hands (t). After performing this ſervice, it was intended he ſhould join the grand fleet [C]; but on the 10th of July, King William receiving information, that the enemy intended to ſend upwards of twenty ſmall frigates, the biggeſt not above thirty-ſix guns, into St George's-Channel, to burn the tranſport-ſhips, he was ordered to cruize off Scilly, or in ſuch a ſtation as he ſhould judge moſt proper to prevent ſuch a deſign; and to ſend frigates to ply eaſtward and and weſtward, to gain intelligence of the body of the French fleet, ſo that he might be the better able to provide for his own ſafety. And they, upon meeting with Vice-Admiral Killigrew in his return from the Streights, were to give him notice of all circumſtances, that ſo he might likewiſe take care not to be intercepted. Sir Cloudeſley cruized up and down in the aforeſaid ſtation, 'till the 21ſt of July, without meeting any thing remarkable; and then the Dover and Experiment joined him from the coaſt of Ireland, with a ketch that came out of Kingſale, on board of which was Colonel Hacket, Captain John Hamilton, Archibald Cockburn, Eſq; Anthony Thompſon, Eſq; Captain Thomas Power, Mr William Sutton, and ſix ſervants, who were following King James to France, in order to accompany him in his intended expedition to England. They gave Sir Cloudeſley an account, that King James took ſhipping at Duncannon, and ſailed to Kingſale; but after ſtaying there a little above two hours, he proceeded to France, with two Spaniſh Frigates, that had lain there for that purpoſe a conſiderable time; and that he carried with him the Lord Powis, Sir Roger Strickland, and Captain Richard Trenavion (u). Hereupon Sir Cloudeſley returned to Plymouth, where he found the Mediterranean ſquadron juſt arrived from Cadiz, under Vice-Admiral Killigrew; who having there received letters from the Lords of the Admiralty, informing him that the French, after an engagement [at Beachy-head], had obliged our fleet to retire, and were with their own about Rye, Dover, and thoſe parts, and that therefore he was to take care of his ſquadron, he called a council of war, at which were preſent the Dutch Admirals, Allemonde and Evertzen, and Sir Cloudeſley Shovel; when it was determined, as the ſafeſt courſe to ſecure them from any attempts of the French, to proceed with the ſhips into Hamoze, within Plymouth Sound (w). But here our Rear-Admiral received orders to proceed, with the ſhips under his command, for Kingſale, to intercept ſome French frigates, that were ſaid to be on that coaſt. Arriving at Waterford-river, he received the agreeable news of General Kirke's having made himſelf maſter of the town of Waterford; but was at the ſame time informed, that Duncannon-caſtle, which by it's ſituation commanded the river, ſtill held out, and that the General, for want of cannon, was not likely to take it. Upon this, conſidering the importance of the place, and that no uſe could be made of the port of Waterford, while this caſtle remained in the hands of the enemy, he ſent the General word, on the 27th of July, that he was ready to aſſiſt him, by ſending ſome frigates up the river, and landing all the men he could ſpare out of his ſquadron, under the protection of their guns: accordingly the next day he ſent in the Experiment and the Greyhound, two ſmall ſhips, to batter the caſtle, and under their fire landed between ſix and ſeven hundred men, all the boats of the fleet being employed in this ſervice. The caſtle all this time thundered upon them, though to little purpoſe; but when once General Bourk, who commanded there, ſaw the men landed, he thought fit to capitulate (x), and marched out of the caſtle, with 250 men, with their arms and baggage; leaving to the Engliſh the fortreſs, which was furniſhed with forty-two pieces of cannon, a noble reward for one day's hard duty (y). After this ſucceſs, the Rear-Admiral ſailed for Limerick, where he was informed the French had a conſiderable number of ſhips; but finding ſoon after that the enemy was retired, and that his own ſquadron began to be in want of proviſions and ſea-ſtores, he came to a reſolution of retiring to Plymouth, where he received a conſiderable reinforcement, with orders to proceed in queſt of the enemy; but theſe orders, which came from the Lords of the Admiralty, were countermanded, on the 18th of September, by a freſh order from the King (z), directing him to detach ten ſhips into the Soundings for the protection of the trade, and to ſail with the reſt for the Downs; which he accordingly did. The remainder of the year 1690 was ſpent by Sir Cloudeſley for the moſt part in cruizing, 'till he was ordered to make part of Sir George Rooke's ſquadron, which eſcorted the King from Holland, and from which ſervice he did not return into the Downs 'till Jan. following. The naval operations of the year 1691, ended very little to the profit, honour, or ſatisfaction, of the nation, which occaſioned attempts in the Houſe of Commons, to faſten upon Ruſſel the miſcarriages, as they were called, at ſea (aa) [D]. But it was Sir Cloudeſley's felicity, that as his ſervices were well intended, ſo, generally ſpeaking, they were well received; and if Sir Cloudeſley Shovel at any time miſſed of ſucceſs, [D] To faſten upon Ruſſel the miſcarriages as they were called at ſea.] Upon the diſmiſſion of the Earl of Torrington, Ruſſel, afterwards Earl of Orford, was appointed Admiral and Commander in Chief: who, in purſuance of his inſtructions, aſſembled a fleet, conſiſting of ninety-one ſhips, of which fifty-ſeven were of the line of battle; and the whole being divided into two ſquadrons, commanded by the Admirals of the red and blue flags, Sir Cloudeſley was conſequently included in it. The grand deſign was to attack the French fleet under Tourville. Accordingly, Ruſſel being joined, tho' late, by the Dutch, bent his courſe to the French coaſt, in purſuit of their fleet; and arriving in that ſtation in July, he ſent Sir Coudeſley Shovel to look into Breſt, where he ſaw about forty ſail coming out of that port; which proved to be a fleet of merchant-ſhips from Bretagne, eſcorted by three men of war. Sir Cloudeſley to decoy theſe ſhips into his hands, made uſe of an excellent ſtratagem: He knew the French had intelligence that a ſmall ſquadron of their fleet had made prize of ſeveral Engliſh merchantmen; laying hold therefore of this piece of falſe news, he ordered part of his ſquadron to put out French colours, and the reſt to take in theirs. By this method he thought to deceive the the French, who might naturally ſuppoſe it to be that ſquadron with their prizes. This ſucceeded in part, tho' the enemy diſcovered the trick before he was near enough to do much miſchief. Admiral Ruſſel being ordered to keep abroad later than he wiſhed, for the ſafety of the fleet, met with a ſtorm, in September, by which ſeveral capital ſhips were greatly damaged. He came to an anchor in the Sound, gave orders for repairing theſe damages, and left Sir Cloudeſley at Plymouth, to ſee it performed (s).

ſucceſs, no body ever pretended to fix imputations upon his conduct; his courage and his ſincerity were alike unqueſtionable; and though this was not the moſt credulous age, yet there was never heard of ſuch an infidel, as one who did not believe Shovel had both. On this account, moſt people were very well ſatisfied, when the King, juſt before he ſet out for Holland (b b), in the ſpring of the year 1692, declared him Rear-Admiral of the Red, and at the ſame time commander of the ſquadron that was to convoy him thither (c c). On his return from thence, he joined Admiral Ruſſel [E] with the grand fleet, and had a great ſhare in the glory of the famous victory at La Hogue. For the French, after an engagement for ſome hours, breaking their line, and Tourville being diſcovered to tow away northward, when the weather cleared up, the Engliſh Admiral gave the ſignal for chacing, and ſent notice to all his ſhips, that the enemy was retiring. At the ſame time, ſeveral broadſides were heard to the weſtward; and though the ſhips that fired could not be ſeen, it was concluded they were the blue ſquadron, that by a ſhift of wind had weathered the French. It proved, however, to be the brave Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, Rear-Admiral of the Red, who had with wonderful pains and diligence weathered their Admiral's own ſquadron, and got between them and their Admiral of the Blue; but after he had fired upon the French for ſome time, Tourville, as well as the Admiral of that ſquadron, came to an anchor, with ſome of the ſhips of their diviſion, but could not diſcover one another by reaſon of the thickneſs of the weather (d d) [F]. In 1693, the heat and animoſity of parties produced an extraordinary change in the command of the fleet; when, inſtead of appointing an Admiral, the King, by way of compromiſe, granted a commiſſion to Henry Killigrew, Eſq; Sir Ralph Delaval, and Sir Cloudeſley, to execute that office. The two former were declared Tories, and Shovel a determined Whig, though without any party ſpirit; yet this proved a bad expedient. They were indeed all good ſeamen, and probably meant their country well; but not agreeing in the manner of ſerving it, the conſequence proved the deſtruction of the Smyrna fleet, which ſo much diſgraces our annals of this year [G]. However, upon the enquiry of the Parliament into that affair, Sir Cloudeſley,

[E] He joined Admiral Ruſſel.] At this time a report was bruited about, that the officers of the navy were bribed by the emiſſaries of France, to betray the fleet into the poſſeſſion of King James; and the forces which now began to draw together, and were to be commanded by him, gave further uneaſineſs to our Court; whereupon the following addreſs was preſented to her Majeſty, ſigned by Sir John Aſhby, Admiral of the Blue, Sir Ralph Delaval, Vice-admiral of the Red, Mr Rooke, Vice admiral of the Blue, Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, Rear-admiral of the Red, and Mr Carter, Rear-admiral of the Blue, beſides ſeveral Captains. Sir Cloudeſley was as forward to promote this addreſs as any gentleman in the navy, tho' he was far from being ſuſpected either by the Queen or Miniſtry. Admiral Carter was the perſon particularly ſtruck at; but without any foundation.

[F] By reaſon of the thickneſs of the weather.] King James bore the loſs of all his hopes, in this defeat, with inconſolable grief, as appears by the following letter which he wrote to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty.

[G] Which ſo much diſgraces our annals.] The Dutch upon this occaſion played off their wit in a picture, wherein the taking of the Smyrna fleet was repreſented at a diſtance, and Sir Cloudeſley Shovel on board his own ſhip, with his hands tied behind him, the two ends of the cord being reſpectively held by his colleagues; to inſinuate that he would have prevented this misfortune, if the Admirals Killigrew and Delaval, had not hindered him.

[H] The

Sir Cloudesley, at the bar of the House, defended his colleagues as well as himself, and gave so clear and plain an account of the matter, that it satisfied all people, who were capable of being satisfied, of the innocence of the commanders; that is, in point of treachery, which, though it had been asserted by a vote of the House of Commons, yet the proposed resolution to censure them passed in the negative (ee). In the year 1694, Admiral Russel was replaced in the chief command of the fleet; and the character of Sir Cloudesley remaining absolutely unimpeached, we find him again at sea this year, acting in the Channel, and on the French coast; where he had the honour to command as Vice-Admiral of the Red, under Lord Berkeley Admiral of the Blue, in the famous expedition to Camaret-Bay, which, unfortunate as it proved *, yet Sir Cloudesley distinguished himself, by his speedy and dextrous embarkation of the land-forces, when they sailed upon it: as he did also, when, on their return to England, it was thought necessary to send the fleet again upon the coast of France, to bombard Diep and other places (ff). On the 27th of August, Lord Berkeley returning to London, the command of the squadron, which consisted now only of frigates and small ships, devolved upon Sir Cloudesley, who received express instructions to undertake the bombardment of Dunkirk at all events. Accordingly he attempted it, though without any good effect, through the fault of the engineer, who probably, for want of sufficient intelligence of the preparations which the French had made against this design, had promised more than either he or any other man could perform [H]. Sir Cloudesley, however, took care to demonstrate from his conduct, that no fault lay in him; for he went with a boat within the enemy's works, and so became an eye-witness of the impossibility of doing what his orders directed to be done; and therefore, on his coming home, he was perfectly well received, and continued to be employed, as a man who would command success where it was possible, and omit nothing in his power where it was not (gg). The remaining part of this war was carried on at sea, chiefly by bombarding the towns and forts on the French coast; in which Sir Cloudesley had his share: and after the peace of Ryswick he was always consulted by his Majesty, whenever maritime affairs were under consideration †. After the declaration of war against France and Spain by Queen Anne, the ministry setting their eyes upon the galleons, a squadron consisting of twenty men of war was fitted out, in order to intercept them, under the command of Sir Cloudesley, then Admiral of the White. And when this design had been luckily anticipated (hh), he was sent to Vigo, after the taking that place by Sir George Rooke, to bring home the spoils of the Spanish and French fleet. This was in the latter end of the year 1702, and he performed all that was expected from him with that zeal and expedition which he had formerly shewn upon all occasions: for, arriving at Vigo on the 16th of October, he got things into such forwardness, that he carried off whatever could possibly be brought home, burnt the rest, and notwithstanding the stormy season of the year, the foulness of his ships, and his being embarrassed with prizes, arrived safely in the Downs on the seventh of November [I]; which the Court considered as so remarkable a service, [H] The engineers promised more than they could perform] This attempt had been resolved on before Lord Berkeley's departure, and Mr Meesters, who is said to be the inventor and manager of the machines, called infernals (9), went to Flanders, in order to procure such pilots as were able to carry the squadron into the harbour of Dunkirk, or at least so far into the road, as might enable them to destroy the enemies ships. Sir Cloudesley sailed to the Downs in the beginning of September, and on the 7th was joined by Mr Meesters, with twenty-six pilots; when Captain Benbow was appointed to command the small ships, and to follow the directions of Mr Meesters, whose pilots did not perform what was expected from them. On the 12th however, Sir Cloudesley Shovel appeared before Dunkirk, with thirteen English, and six Dutch men of war, two bomb-vessels, seventeen machines, and other small craft. In the evening, Capt. Benbow went in and sounded the western channel, between the Brake and the Main, notwithstanding a prodigious fire from the ships and the citadel. The next day all the boats and small vessels were sent in again, with the Charles galley, two bomb-vessels, and some of the machines. In the afternoon, two of the machines were sent in. The first took fire before she was near enough to do execution; whether it was that the cannon of the place set fire to it, as some of the French writers say, or that those on board finding it impossible either to bring it nearer, or to get it off, were obliged to let it burn there. The other, which was the biggest, went in boldly, and advanced very near the mole-head; but the tide set her on one side, so that she drove a cable's length, and then blew up (10). It was found, that the French had, according to custom, early intelligence, and by driving piles before the pier-head, and sinking ships on the back of the westermost pier, had secured themselves against all attempts of this nature. Sir Cloudesley being informed of this, and knowing that the spring tides were over, failed away for Calais, and on the 17th sent the bomb-vessels in, and threw so many shells into the town, that about forty houses were ruined; but the wind blowing hard that night, and a great swell of the sea happening, the Admiral was forced to bear away: And the storm continuing two days, he thought it not convenient to stay any longer, but returned with his whole squadron into the Downs, from whence the bomb-vessels and machines were sent into the river Thames (11).

(9) See an account of these machines in Admiral Benbow's article. But Stephen-Martin Leake, in the Life of Sir John Leake, ascribes this invention to that Admiral's father. See Sir John Leake's article.

[I] He arrived in the Downs on the 7th of November.] Sir Cloudesley, in the space of a week, put the French men of war and other prizes, into the best condition possible; took out all the lading from a galleon, which was made prize by the Mary, and brought along with him the Dartmouth, which had been taken from us in the last war, and was now made prize by captain Wyvill; but as there was another ship of that name in the navy, the prize was called the Vigo. He also took out of the French ships that were run on shore, fifty brass guns, and brought off sixty more from the forts and batteries; after which, on the 24th of October, he set fire to the ships he could not bring away. The next day he left Vigo, but it proving calm, he anchored in the channel between that port and Bayonne, where he sent several prisoners on shore, with a flag of truce, and had ours returned in their stead. On the 27th of October he was again under sail, intending to have passed thro' the north channel; but the wind taking him short, he was obliged to pass thro' that which leads to the south, where the galleon which was the Monmouth's prize struck upon a rock and foundered; but there being several frigates on each side of her, all her men were saved except two. He was this day joined by the Dragon, a fifty gun ship, commanded by Captain Holyman, which had been attacked by a French man service, that it was immediately reſolved to employ him in affairs of the greateſt conſequence for the future (i i). Accordingly he commanded the grand fleet up the Streights in 1703, where he did every thing that was poſſible for an Admiral to do, whoſe inſtructions were very large, and who yet wanted force to accompliſh almoſt any part of thoſe inſtructions [K]; ſo that, notwithſtanding the management of our affairs at ſea was very ſeverely cenſured that year in the Houſe of Commons (k k), yet all parties agreed, that Sir Cloudeſley Shovel had done his duty in every reſpect, and very well deſerved the high truſt and confidence that had been repoſed in him *. In 1704, Sir George Rooke commanded the grand fleet in the Mediterranean; to reinforce which, Sir Cloudeſley Shovel was ſent with a powerful ſquadron, and he took ſuch care, not only to execute his orders, but to diſtinguiſh in what manner they ought to be executed, that by joining the fleet in the middle of June, he was very inſtrumental in the ſucceſs that followed [L]; as by that very action, he effectually diſappointed all the French ſchemes, though that Court had boaſted, they ſhould be able to reſtore their maritime power, and give law to the confederates at ſea this ſummer. He aſſiſted in the reduction of Gibraltar (l l), and had a very conſiderable ſhare in the action off Malaga, in which he behaved with the utmoſt bravery [M]. man of war of much greater force, and the captain and twenty-five men killed; but his lieutenant fought her bravely, and at laſt brought her ſafe into the fleet. In their paſſage they had extreme bad weather; and tho' the Naſſau had the good fortune to make a very rich prize, which was coming from Morlaix, yet it foundered the next morning; and the weather was then ſo bad, that the ſquadron ſeparated, every ſhip ſhifting for itſelf; tho' all had the good luck to get ſafe to England, but in a very ſhattered condition (12).

(12) London Gazette, No. 3683. where it is ſaid, the remainder of the fleet came in under the command of Sir Stafford Fairborne.

[K] He did all that could be done in his circumſtances.] The fleet conſiſted at firſt of twenty-ſeven ſhips of the line, and the Admiral had under him, Rear-admiral Byng, and Sir Stafford Fairborne; and being afterwards reinforced with eight ſhips more, theſe were commanded by Vice admiral Leake. His inſtructions were very large, but all of them might be reduced to theſe three heads, viz. annoying the enemy, aſſiſting our allies, and protecting our trade. He waited 'till the middle of June for the Dutch, and then was joined only by twelve ſhips of the line, carrying three flags; and it is certain, that if the force he had with him had been better adjuſted than it was to the things he had orders to perform; yet the time allowed him, which was only to the end of September, was much too ſhort, ſo that it was really impoſſible for him to execute the ſervices that ſeemed to be expected. He repreſented this (13); but being however ordered to obey, he did ſo, but was not able to get clear of the land 'till the middle of July, having alſo a fleet of upwards of 230 merchant-men under his convoy. On the 24th he arrived off the rock of Liſbon, where he called a council of war, at which the rendezvous was appointed to be held in Altea bay. He purſued his inſtructions as far as he was able; and having ſecured the Turkey fleet, he intended to have ſtaid ſome time upon the coaſt of Italy. But the Dutch Admiral informed him, that both his orders, and his victuals required his thinking of a ſpeedy return; and it was with much ado that Sir Cloudeſley prevailed upon him to go to Leghorn *. In the mean time, the inſtructions he had to ſuccour the Cevennois, then in arms againſt the French King, were found impracticable; and therefore the Admiral contented himſelf with doing all that could be done, which was to ſend the Tartar and the Pembroke upon that coaſt, where they found it impoſſible to do any thing. The Admiral then detached Capt. Swanton to Tunis and Tripoli, and ſent Rear-admiral Byng to Algier, to renew the peace with thoſe ſtates, and on the 22d of September arrived off Altea, from whence he ſoon after ſailed for England. On the 27th, in the Streights mouth, he met with an Algerine man of war becalmed, which he immediately took under his protection, 'till all the Dutch ſhips were paſſed; in which he certainly performed the part of an Engliſh Admiral, preſerved the reputation of our Flag, did great ſervice to our trade, and put it out of the power of the French to practiſe upon thoſe piratical ſtates, as they had done formerly. Having intelligence that a fleet of merchant-ſhips waited for a convoy from Liſbon, he ſent Sir Andrew Leake thither with a ſmall ſquadron, who convoyed them ſafe into the Downs. On the 16th of November, the fleet being off the Iſle of Wight, the Dutch crowded away for their own ports, and left the Admiral to ſteer for the Downs, which he did; but before he he made land, Captain (afterwards Sir John) Norris, in the Orford, a third rate, together with the Warſpright of 70 guns, and the Litchfield of 50, being a-head of the fleet, gave chace to a French ſhip of war, and beginning to engage about eight at night, the diſpute continued 'till two in the morning, when, having loſt her fore-top-maſts, and all her ſails, and her ſtanding and running rigging being much ſhattered, ſhe ſtruck. This ſhip came from Newfoundland, was commanded by Monſieur de la Rue, was named the Hazardous, and had fifty guns mounted, with 370 men; but had more ports, and was larger than any one of our ſixty gun ſhips, ſo that ſhe was regiſtered in the liſt of our royal navy (14).

Sir Cloudeſley had been only a few days in the Downs, when the great ſtorm happened, which began on the 26th of November, this year, 1703, about eleven in the evening, the wind W. S. W. and continued with dreadful flaſhes of lightning 'till about ſeven the next morning. Sir Cloudeſley cut his main maſt by the board, which ſaved the ſhip from running on the Galloper, of the breach of which ſhe was then in view. Sir Stafford Fairborne had his flag as Vice-admiral of the Red flying in the Aſſociation, in which he was driven firſt to Gottenburgh, and then to Copenhagen, from whence he did not get home 'till the next year. The Revenge was forced from her anchors, and with much ado, after driving ſome time on the coaſt of Holland, got into the river Medway; the Ruſſel, Capt. Townſend, was forced over to Holland; and the Dorſet, Captain Edward Whitaker, after ſtriking twice on the Galloper, drove a fortnight at ſea, and then got ſafe to the Nore (15).

[L] He was very inſtrumental in the ſucceſs that followed.] After Sir George Rooke was ſailed, the Court received intelligence, that the French were very buſy in fitting out a great ſquadron at Breſt. Upon this news it was thought proper to equip, with the utmoſt expedition, a good fleet; which was put under the command of Sir Cloudeſley, Admiral of the White, who had under him Sir Stafford Fairborne, Vice-admiral of the Red, and George Byng, Eſq; Rear-admiral of the ſame ſquadron. The Admiral was inſtructed, if he found the Breſt ſquadron ſtill in port, to ſend away the trade, ſtoreſhips, and victuallers, under a proper convoy to Liſbon, and to remain before Breſt himſelf, to endeavour to keep in the enemy; or if that was found impracticable, to burn and deſtroy them if they came out. But in caſe he found the Breſt ſquadron ſailed, then he was to call a council of war, in order to judge what ſtrength might be neceſſary to be ſent to Sir George Rooke, and if it amounted to twenty-two ſhips, then he was to ſail with them himſelf; that our fleet might at all events be ſtronger than that of the enemy. Sir Cloudeſley executed his inſtructions punctually; and finding the Breſt ſquadron were gone, and therefore that a great ſtrength was neceſſary in the Mediterranean to oppoſe the French, he ſailed thither about the latter end of May, and on the 16th of June joined Sir George Rooke, with his ſquadron off Lagos. When a council of war being called to conſider what ſervice ſhould be proceeded on, it was at length, after a long debate, carried, to make a ſudden and vigorous attempt upon Gibralter (16).

[M] He behaved with the utmoſt bravery in the action off Malaga.] In order to a clear underſtanding of Sir Cloudeſley's endeavoured to confer upon him, the glory of beating the French fleet, while Sir George Rooke only looked on, or fought at a diſtance (m m). This was not at all Sir Cloudeſley's nature; he would no more be guilty of an action of that ſort, than he would have been patient in bearing it. He knew very well his own merit, and his Admiral's; and he did juſtice to both in the letter he wrote on that occaſion, a copy of which is inſerted below [N].

(m m) They are the words of Biſhop Burnet, in the Hiſtory of his own Times.

Upon his return home, he was preſented to the Queen by Prince George, Lord High-Admiral of England, and met with a very gracious reception. As Sir Cloudeſley had no concern in the arts made uſe of to leſſen the reputation of Sir George Rooke, in order to pave the way for laying him aſide; ſo, after this was done in 1705, being made Rear-Admiral of England, and Admiral and Commander in Chief of the Fleet, he made no ſcruple in accepting a commiſſion to act jointly with the Earl of Peterborough, as Admiral of the fleet deſtined for the Mediterranean. Accordingly he arrived at Liſbon with this fleet, conſiſting of twenty-nine line of battle ſhips, on the 22d of June. From thence he ſailed to Altea-Bay, and there took in his Catholic Majeſty; who preſſing the Earl of Peterborough to make an immediate attempt on the city of Barcelona, and the province of Catalonia, where he was aſſured the people were well affected to him, it was agreed to, and the fleet ſailed accordingly to Barcelona on the 12th of Auguſt; where after ſome diſputes the ſiege was undertaken, and the city ſurrendered in the end of September [O].

On

Sir Cloudeſley's part in this important action, it will be neceſſary to give a ſhort account of the ſtrength of the two fleets, and the form in which they were drawn up. The French line, which conſiſted of fifty-two ſhips, and twenty four gallies, was very ſtrong in the center, but weaker in the van and rear; to ſupply which, moſt of their gallies were placed in thoſe ſquadrons. In the center was the Count de Toulouſe, High-Admiral of France, with the white ſquadron, having behind him the Marquis du Roy with four gallies. In the van was the white and blue flag, commanded by the Marquis de Vilette, with ſeven French, and five Spaniſh gallies, and the blue ſquadron formed the rear, commanded by the Marquis de Langeron, having behind him eight French gallies, under the command of the Marquis Ferviſle. The line of the confederate fleet conſiſted of fifty-three ſhips, Sir George Rooke, the Rear-Admirals Byng and Dilkes, being in the center, Sir Cloudeſley Shovel and Sir John Leake, leading the van, and the Dutch ſhips forming the rear. A little after ten o'clock, Admiral Shovel, with the van, bore down upon the enemy, and was at ſome diſtance from our center; which the Marquis de Vilette obſerving, thought he might get a-head of that ſquadron with his foremoſt ſhips; and in that view made a ſignal to the head moſt ſhips of the French line, to croud all the ſail they could. Admiral Shovel ſtill bearing down upon the enemy, inſenſibly found himſelf in their line a-head of them; which the French judging to be a favourable opportunity, reſolved to make their advantage of it, by keeping their wind, and crowding all the ſail they were able, in order to cut off our van from the reſt of the fleet; hoping with reaſon, that if it grew calm, which uſually happens in a ſea-fight, their gallies might tow them off, ſo that they might make a double, and weathering Sir Cloudeſley, might put him between two fires. But the Admiral perceiving the deſign, immediately clapt upon a wind; and Sir George Rooke foreſeeing what would be the conſequence, if his van was intercepted, bore down upon the enemy with the reſt of the confederate fleet, and put out the ſignal for the fight, which was immediately begun by Admiral Shovel, and was continued with equal reſolution on both ſides, 'till about two in the afternoon; when Sir Cloudeſley having diſabled ſeveral ſhips of the enemy's van, obliged them to make out of the reach of his cannon. But Sir George Rooke had not the like ſucceſs in the center, where the enemy being very ſtrong, and ſeveral of our ſhips forced to go out of the line for want of ſhot, the battle fell hard upon the Admiral's ſhip the St George, and the Shrewſbury. This being obſerved by Sir Cloudeſley, he immediately tacked a-ſtern, and reinforced the Admiral, by cloſing the line of the center; which excellent piece of ſeamanſhip decided the fate of the day (17). The Count de Tholouſe ſhared the like fate with his van, and about ſeven o'clock was obliged to tow out of danger. The Dutch in the rear, continued indeed firing ſomewhat longer than the reſt, but night coming on put a period to that diſpute alſo.

[N] The letter is inſerted below] This moſt admirably honeſt plain letter, which gives us a true picture of our Admiral, is as follows. 'This brings the news 'of my health, and that we are in our way homeward: 'That which ſends us home ſo ſoon, is a very ſharp 'engagement we have had with the French. Our 'number of ſhips that fought in the line of battle, were 'pretty equal, I think they were forty-nine, and we 'fifty-three; but Sir George Rooke reſerved ſome of 'the fifty gun ſhips, to obſerve if they attempted any 'thing with their gallies, of which they had twenty-'four. Their ſhips did far exceed in bigneſs; I judge 'they had ſeventeen three deck ſhips, and we had but 'ſeven. The battle began on Sunday the 13th inſtant, 'ſoon after ten in the morning; and in the center and 'rear of the fleet, it continued 'till night parted them: 'But in the van of the fleet, where I commanded, we 'having the weather-gage, gave me an opportunity of 'coming as near as I pleaſed, which was within piſtol-'ſhot, before I fired a gun; thro' which means, and 'God's aſſiſtance, the enemy declined us, and were up-'on the run in leſs than four hours; by which time we 'had little wind, and their gallies towed off their lame 'ſhips, and others as they pleaſed: For the Admiral 'of the white and blue, wtih whom we fought, had 'ſeven gallies attending upon him. As ſoon as the 'enemy got out of the reach of our guns, and the bat-'tle continuing pretty hot a-ſtern, and ſome of our ſhips 'in the Admiral's ſquadron towing out of the line, 'which I underſtood afterwards was for want of ſhot; 'I ordered all the ſhips of my diviſion to ſlack all their 'ſails, to cloſe the line in the center. This working 'had that good effect, that ſeveral of the enemies ſhips 'a-ſtern, which had kept their line, having their top-'ſails and foreſails ſet, ſhot up a-breaſt of us, as the 'Rear Admiral of the white and blue, and ſome of his 'diviſion, and the Vice-Admiral of the white and ſome of 'his diviſion; but they were ſo warmly received before 'they got a-broadſide, that with the boats a-head, and 'their ſpritſails ſet, they towed from us, without giving 'us the opportunity of firing at them.

'The ſhips that ſuffered moſt in my diviſion, were 'the Lenox, Warſpright, Tilbury, and Swiftſure, the 'reſt eſcaped pretty well, and I the beſt of all, tho' I 'never took greater pains in my life to be ſoundly 'beaten; for I ſet all my ſails, and rowed with three 'boats a-head, to get along ſide with the Admiral of 'the white and blue, but he out-ſailing me, would not 'fight, and lay along ſide of the little ſhips.

'Notwithſtanding the engagement was very ſharp, 'and I think the like between two fleets never hath 'been in any time, there is hardly a ſhip that muſt 'not ſhift one maſt, and ſome muſt ſhift all: A great 'many have ſuffered much, but none more than Sir 'George Rooke, and Captain Jennings, in the St 'George. God ſend us well home; I believe we have 'not three ſpare top-maſts, nor three ſiſhes in the fleet; 'and I judge there is ten jury-maſts now up. After 'the fight, we lay two days in ſight of the enemy, pre-'paring for a ſecond engagement, but the enemy de-'clined, and ſtood from us in the night (18).'

[O] Barcelona ſurrendered in the end of September, 1705.] The reduction of Barcelona has been always conſidered as one of the moſt extraordinary events of this war, and one may venture to affirm that nothing but the aſſiſtance of the fleet could have reduced it. In ſupport of this aſſertion, we ſhall lay before the reader part of a letter written by Sir Cloudeſley to his Royal Highneſs the Lord High-Admiral, dated October 12, 1705,

On the firſt of October, it was reſolved in a Council of War, that Sir Cloudeſley ſhould proceed for England, with the beſt part of the fleet. In purſuance of which reſolution, he paſſed the Streights, with nineteen ſhips of the line, and part of the Dutch fleet, on the 16th of October, and arrived happily at Spithead on the 26th of November following, after as glorious a ſea-campaign as either ourſelves or our allies could expect (n n). The next year, 1706, Sir Cloudeſley again commanded the fleet which ſailed from St Helens on the 10th of Auguſt, with ten thouſand land-forces, in the deſign of making a deſcent ſomewhere on the French coaſt; but not being joined time enough by the Dutch, this project proved abortive [P], and it was reſolved that the fleet ſhould proceed to Liſbon, with theſe forces on board, and that they ſhould be employed in the ſervice of his Catholic Majeſty. But not ſailing 'till the ſixth of September (o o), and meeting with very bad weather, it did not reach the river of Liſbon 'till the month of November; and even then, the diſputes which aroſe in King Charles's Council, with the delays of the Portugueze, who were far from being hearty in his cauſe, diſappointed all the deſigns of the maritime powers. In this uneaſy ſituation, Sir Cloudeſley did all that could be expected from a wiſe and vigilant commander. He ſent Colonel Worſley to Valencia [Q], in order (n n) This was owing to the great things performed by Sir John Leake, for an account of which we refer to his article.

(o o) Being in the Soundings on the 10th, the Barfleur, a ſecond rate, ſprung a dangerous leak, which obliged the Admiral to ſend her home, and to take the Earl Rivers and his principal officers into his own ſhip the Aſſociation. Burchet.

1705, containing an account of what paſſed in the laſt days of the ſiege (19), in the following terms: 'The '17th, our battery of thirty guns was opened, and 'fourteen of them began to play with very great exe'cution upon that part of the wall where the breach 'was deſigned; the Earl of Peterborough came a-board 'and repreſented to us the great neceſſity he laboured 'under for want of money for ſubſiſting the army, and 'carrying on the ſiege of Barcelona, and the ſervices in 'Catalonia, and, in very preſſing circumſtances, deſired 'the aſſiſtance of the fleet; upon which our flag-officers 'came to the incloſed reſolution, to lend the Earl of 'Peterborough forty thouſand dollars out of the contin'gent and ſhort-allowance money of the fleet. The 19th, 'we came to theſe reſolutions, viz. to remain longer be'fore Barcelona than was agreed on at the firſt, to give 'all the aſſiſtance in our power, and to lay a fire-ſhip 'aſhore, with two hundred barrels of powder; and a 'further demand being made for guns for the batteries, 'we landed fourteen more, which made up in all ſe'venty-two guns, whereof thirty were twenty-four 'pounders that we landed here, with their utenſils 'and ammunition. We continue to bombard the town 'from the ſea as our ſmall ſtore of ſhells, and the wea'ther will permit. The 20th a demand was made for 'more ſhot, and we called together the Engliſh flag'officers, and came to a reſolution to ſupply the bat'teries with all the twenty-four and twenty-eight 'pound ſhot, except a very ſmall quantity, which was 'accordingly done.

'The 22d the Prince of Lichenſtein, and the Earl 'of Peterborough having deſired, at the requeſt of his 'Catholic Majeſty, that the town of Lerida might for 'it's ſecurity be furniſhed with about fifty barrels of 'powder; and a further ſupply of ſhot being demanded 'for the batteries aſhore, it was conſidered at a coun'cil of war, and we came to the incloſed reſolutions, 'viz. To furniſh fifty barrels of powder for Lerida, 'and to ſend ſo many more twenty-four and twenty'eight pound ſhot aſhore, as would reduce the Engliſh 'to thirty rounds; as likewiſe to be further aſſiſtant 'upon timely notice.

'The 23d at night, our breach being made, and all 'things prepared for an attack, the town was again 'ſummoned, and they deſired to capitulate, and hoſ'tages were exchanged; on our ſide Brigadier Stan'hope, and on the enemy's the Marquis de Rivera; 'and all hoſtilities ceaſed (20.)'

It muſt be confeſſed that Don Velaſco, Governor of Barcelona for the Duke of Anjou, and the garriſon, ſubmitted to the arms of Lord Peterborough, but it was to the clemency and good-nature of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, that the ſame gentleman, the Duke of Popoli, the French and Italian ſoldiers who had ſerved againſt the Allies in that ſiege, confided their lives, fortunes, and their honours; from his goodneſs they fought a protection, when even heaven and earth, the miquelets, the remainder of the garriſon, and the burghers of Barcelona had declared againſt them; and 'twas by his juſtice and ſtrict obſervance of the capitulation, they enjoyed a freedom, of which they had criminally deprived ſeveral perſons who expreſſed their zeal a little too warmly for the houſe of Auſtria.

After the town had ſurrendered, a quarrel happened between the townſmen and the Viceroy, which had near proved fatal to the latter. He had uſed the burghers both before and during the ſiege with an unreaſonable ſeverity, eſpecially thoſe that were the leaſt inclined to favour the cauſe of King Charles the Third; he preſerved the ſame auſterity even in the reverſe of his fortune, and to his ſour and moroſe deportment gave a further ſuſpicion to the inhabitants, that he deſigned to carry along with him ſome priſoners of the ſtate which were of their number: His haughty carriage, and theſe ſurmiſes, true or falſe, and the general odium he lay under, incited ſome of the meaner ſort of citizens to draw into a body, who, being aſſiſted in a little time by others of the better ſort, and ſeveral hundred miquelets, violently broke open the priſons, and boldly charged the garriſon, who were then iſſuing out at the breach, and threatened to ſacrifice the Governor to their reſentment; the tumult was at length appeaſed, by the prudence of his Excellency. In the mean time, the chiefeſt of the garriſon, with their ladies, and the Governor himſelf, had taken ſanctuary in a monaſtery, and at their earneſt requeſt, in the cloſe of the evening they were carried on board Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, from whom they received a treatment civil and honourable, attended with all the offices of compaſſion and humanity (21).

[P] The project proved abortive.] The deſign was framed upon the repreſentation of ſome French Hugonots, particularly of the famous Marquis Guiſcard, who was afterwards engaged in a deſign to aſſaſſinate the Queen. The land-forces for this ſervice conſiſted of very near ten thouſand men, which were to be commanded in chief by the Earl Rivers, and under him by the Lieutenant-Generals Earle and de Guiſcard; the Earl of Eſſex and Lord Mordaunt, eldeſt ſon to the Earl of Peterborough, were to ſerve as Major-generals (22.)

[Q] He ſent Col. Worſley to Valencia.] While this gentleman was gone, and before the Admiral had it in his power to take any ſettled reſolution, the King of Portugal died; which threw the affairs of that kingdom into ſome confuſion; and that could not happen without affecting us. We have obſerved already (23), that the Portugueze Miniſtry acted in a manner no ways ſuitable to the ſtrict alliance which then ſubſiſted between our Court and theirs. But now things grew worſe, and whatever ſentiments the new King might be of, his Miniſters ventured to take ſome ſuch ſteps as were not to be borne with patience by an Admiral of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel's temper, of which we ſhall give the following inſtance.

(23) In Sir John Leake's article.

In the beginning of December, the Admiral having appointed ſome cruizing ſhips to proceed to ſea, as they were going out of the mouth of the river, the Portugueze fired firſt at leaſt threeſcore ſhot at them to bring them to an anchor, which he perceiving, ſent orders to our captains to puſh their way through; and accordingly they did ſo without ſo much as returning a ſingle ſhot at the forts. The Court of Portugal, upon his repreſentation of this uſage, pretended, that the officers of the fort had done it without orders, being only directed to fire at and detain a Genoeſe ſhip, whoſe maſter was indebted to the King. But the Admiral being certainly informed, that this very ſhip was at the ſame time lying before the walls of Liſbon, and that the maſter of her was aſhore tranſacting his buſineſs, he let them know, in a manner which became a perſon in his poſt, thus affronted, order to receive from the King himſelf and the General a certain account of their affairs, and a true ſtate of the ſervices they expected from him (p p). The Colonel returned with letters from the King and the Earl of Galway, informing him, that unleſs he could bring the forces, and land them ſo as that they might come to their aſſiſtance, things were likely to fall into as great confuſion as they were in the winter before; whereby all the advantages would be loſt, which had been procured at ſo vaſt an expence both of blood and treaſure by the maritime powers. Theſe advices gave the Admiral ſo much more concern, as he knew the ſhips were ſo much damaged by the rough weather they had met with in their paſſage, that it was impoſſible to fit them ſpeedily for the ſea; and that the land-forces were likewiſe ſo much reduced by ſickneſs, death, and other accidents, that inſtead of ten there were ſcarce ſix thouſand effective men. He reſolved, however, to do the beſt he could to comply with the King's and the General's deſires, the rather, becauſe he ſaw that nothing but ſpirit and diligence could poſſibly recover thoſe advantages, which had been loſt through diviſions and neglect of duty. He gave orders, therefore, for repairing with the utmoſt diligence the miſchief that had been done to his ſhips, ordered the tranſports to be victualled, and made the other neceſſary diſpoſitions for proceeding with the fleet and army for the Spaniſh coaſt, and was on the very point of embarking the troops, when he was reſtrained by an order from England. This order was obtained by the preſſing inſtances of the court of Portugal, repreſenting, that the forces might be more effectually employed in conjunction with their army. Orders were ſent to this purpoſe, and a memorial was drawn up, containing the terms upon which her Britannic Majeſty would conſent to the propoſitions made by the Portugueze miniſter. But notwithſtanding this application, the Portugueze being either unwilling or unable to comply with thoſe demands, it was reſolved, in a Council of War, to reſume the former project, and to land them at Alicant; for which orders arrived ſoon after from England. Accordingly the Confederate fleet, on the ſeventh of January, 1707, ſailed with the land-forces from Liſbon to Alicant, where they arrived on the 28th, and were actually landed (q q). But through the delays the expedition met with, and the reduction of the troops already mentioned, Sir Cloudeſley, finding that his preſence would be of little uſe there, and that the fleet ſtood in need of repairs, left Alicant on the 17th of February, and returned to Liſbon, where he arrived the 7th of March following [R]. There he received orders for the expedition againſt Toulon. In obedience to his inſtructions relating to that important affair, which, if it had ſucceeded, muſt have put an end to the war (r r), our Admiral made ſuch diſpatch, that on the 10th of May he ſailed for Alicant; where having joined Sir George Byng, he proceeded to the coaſt of Italy, and on the fifth of June came to an anchor before Final, with a fleet of forty-three men of war, and fifty-ſeven tranſports. Prince Eugene went thither to confer with the Admiral, and ſoon after the fleet ſailing for Nice, came to an anchor at the latter end of the month, between that city and Antibes; where, on the 29th, he had the honour to entertain the Duke of Savoy, Prince Eugene, and moſt of the general officers, together with the Engliſh and Dutch miniſters, on board his own ſhip the Aſſociation [S]. After dinner they held a Council of War, where it was reſolved to force a paſſage over the Var, in which the Engliſh Admiral promiſed to aſſiſt. Accordingly, two days after, this daring enterprize was undertaken, to the great aſtoniſhment of the French, who believed their works upon that river to be impregnable; and ſo indeed they had proved to any forces in the world except Engliſh ſeamen, as will appear by peruſing the account of that action; which, with the reſt of the proceedings of the fleet in this affair againſt Toulon, may be ſeen below [T]. Upon the Duke of Savoy's raiſing affronted, that if they offered to attempt any ſuch thing again, for they had done it before to Sir John Leake (24), he would not ſtay for orders from his miſtreſs, but take ſatisfaction by the mouth of his cannon. This declaration had a very proper effect, and though it might not mend the principles of the Portugueze Miniſtry, it contributed however greatly towards teaching them better manners (25).

[R] He arrived at Liſbon on the 7th of March, 1706-7.] The great defeat at Almanza happened on the 14th of April following. After which the Earl of Galway retired with the broken remains of his army, which nothing could have ſaved but the timely appearance of our fleet. Sir Cloudeſley, knowing the diſtreſs our army was in through want of almoſt every thing neceſſary, ſent Sir George Byng with a ſtrong ſquadron to the coaſt of Spain for their relief. Sir George ſailed on the 30th of March, and coming off Cape St Vincent on the 15th of April, he received there the news of our defeat; ſoon after which he received a meſſage from Lord Galway acquainting him with the diſtreſs he was in, and deſiring that whatever he brought for the uſe of the army might be carried to Tortoſa in Catalonia, to which his Lordſhip deſigned to retreat, and that, if poſſible, he would ſave the ſick and wounded men at Denia, Gandia, and Valencia, where it was intended the bridges of boats, baggage, and all things that could be got together ſhould be put on board. Accordingly he took care of the ſick and wounded men, and ſent them to Tortoſa, where the Lord Galway propoſed to make a ſtand with the poor remains of the army. This ſervice employed Sir George Byng almoſt the whole month of April, and then he was in daily expectation of being joined by Sir Cloudeſley from Liſbon, either on that part of the coaſt of Spain, or at Barcelona, whither he was deſigned (26). Accordingly we ſee above that Sir Cloudeſley joined him at Alicant.

[S] He entertained the Duke of Savoy, &c. at dinner.] Though Sir Cloudeſley was not one of the politeſt officers we ever had (27), yet he ſhewed a great deal of prudence in the magnificent entertainment he made upon this occaſion. The Duke, when he came on board the Aſſociation, found a guard of halberdiers in new liveries at the great cabbin door. At the upper end of the table was ſet an armed chair with a crimſon velvet canopy. The table conſiſted of ſixty covers; and every thing was ſo well managed, that his Royal Highneſs could not forbear ſaying to the Admiral, at dinner, 'If 'your Excellency had paid me a viſit at Turin, I could 'ſcarce have treated you ſo well (28).'

[T] The proceedings againſt Toulon may be ſeen below.] The enemy's entrenchments on the Var, were extended above four miles into the country, and were defended by eight hundred horſe, and ſix battalions of foot, raiſing the ſiege, and repaſſing the Var, there happened ſome new diſputes, in which Sir Cloudeſley had little or no concern. Her Britannic Majeſty's miniſter laboured to perſwade Prince Eugene to take upon him the command of all the forces in Spain, in which the Duke of Savoy likewiſe concurred; and Sir Cloudeſley offered to tranſport his Royal Highneſs, with a body of troops under his command; but this propoſition being rejected, his Excellency, not a little chagrined at the miſcarriage of an expedition upon which he had ſet his heart, bore away for the Streights (ss), and ſoon after reſolved to return home, which was the laſt act of his life. He left Sir Thomas Dilkes at Gibraltar, with nine ſhips of the line, three fifth-rates, and one of the ſixth, for the ſecurity of the coaſts of Italy, and then proceeded with the remainder of the fleet, conſiſting of ten ſhips of the line, five frigates, four fire-ſhips, a ſloop, and a yacht, for England. On the 22d of October he came into the Soundings, and in the morning had ninety fathom water. About noon he lay by; but at ſix in the evening he made ſail again, and ſtood away under his courſes, believing, as is preſumed, that he ſaw the lights on Scilly. Soon after which he made ſignals of danger, as ſeveral other ſhips did. Sir George Byng, who was then within leſs than half a mile to the windward of him, ſaw the breaches of the ſea, and ſoon after the rocks called the Biſhop and his Clerks, upon which the Admiral ſtruck, and in two minutes there was nothing more of him or his ſhip ſeen [U]. There were near nine hundred perſons with him on board (tt) the Aſſociation, among whom were his ſons-in-law Sir John Narborough and James his brother, Mr Trelawney, eldeſt ſon to the foot, and a reinforcement was daily expected of twelve battalions more, under the command of Lieutenant-general Dillon, but before his arrival, Sir Cloudeſley having obſerved to the Duke, that part of the French lines were ſo near the ſea, that it was in his power to cannonade them, and that he would land a body of ſeamen who ſhould attack the higheſt and ſtrongeſt of their entrenchments, his Royal Highneſs conſented to it. Accordingly on the firſt of July, Sir Cloudeſley ordered four Engliſh and one Dutch man of war to enter the mouth of the river Var, where they began to cannonade the French lines; ſoon after which 600 Engliſh ſeamen landed in open boats, under the command of Capt. (afterwards Admiral) Norris, who was quickly followed by the Admiral, and having begun the attack, the enemy were ſo terrified with ſuch an unexpected ſalutation, that they threw down their arms after a ſhort diſpute, and abandoned their works (29). They had ſcarce quitted their entrenchments, but they met in their retreat Lieutenant-general Dillon, at the head of his twelve battalions, and he was ſo aſtoniſhed, that he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded to abandon the town of St Paul, and continue this retreat (30). On the 2d of July, his Royal Highneſs and Prince Eugene, with the Britiſh Envoy and Sir John Norris, dined again on board the Admiral, and after dinner entering into a conference, the Duke of Savoy reſolved to march directly to Toulon, hoping for a good concluſion of the affair. But the Duke having obſerved that even after Toulon was taken, himſelf and his army might find it impracticable to retreat. The Admiral replied, 'I 'hope better things from your Royal Highneſs's for-'tune; but if there ſhould be any appearance of ſuch 'a thing's happening, your Highneſs may rely upon 'me, I will take care to ſupply a ſufficient number of 'tranſports to embark all your troops.' The Duke thanked him for his generous offer, told him he relied chiefly on the aſſiſtance he expected from him, and that if he would repair to the iſlands of Hieres, he ſhould not long remain there before he ſhould hear of the army's being in the neighbourhood of Toulon, and that then he ſhould expect to ſee the fleet in the road. The Duke marched from the Var on the 3d, but did not arrive before Toulon 'till the 15th (31). The Admiral however ſailed immediately with his fleet for the iſlands of Hieres, leaving ten or twelve frigates to interrupt the enemy's correſpondence with Italy. On the 17th of July, he landed and aſſiſted at a council of war, in which many demands were made on the fleet, and the Admiral promiſed all that was in his power, which he accordingly performed. A hundred cannon were landed from the fleet for the batteries, with two hundred rounds of powder and ſhot, and a conſiderable number of ſeamen to ſerve as gunners; and cordage, nails, and ſpikes, with all other things wanting for the Camp (for indeed they were but poorly furniſhed) were ſupplied from the ſhips: So that affairs had a very good face 'till the 4th of Auguſt, O. S. when, early in the morning, the enemy making a vigorous ſally, drove the confederates from their works, and killed and wounded above 800 men, among whom were the Prince of Saxe-Gotha, and ſome officers of diſtinction. The next day, being the 16th of Auguſt, N. S. the fleet began to cannonade the town, and threw bombs in the night, which was continued 'till the ſiege was raiſed, and which obliged the French to ſink all their capital ſhips, a diſtreſs that more than countervailed the whole expence of this ſervice, great as it was (32). On the 6th his Royal Highneſs deſired the Admiral would immediately embark the ſick and wounded, and withdraw the cannon, in order to his raiſing the ſiege; his Royal Highneſs alſo informed him, that he purpoſed to decamp the 10th in the morning, and deſired that the fleet might accompany the army as far as the Var. Accordingly, the very day the army began to march, the fleet drew as near the place as poſſible, and five bomb-veſſels ſupported by the lighteſt frigates, and all the boats of the men of war, under Rear-admiral Dilkes, advanced into the creek of fort St Lewis, and notwithſtanding a prodigious fire from the place, bombarded the town and harbour from noon 'till five the next morning, and this with all the ſucceſs that could be expected; by this means the land-army had time to quit their camp at La Vilette; which they did in five columns in great ſafety, the enemy having ſomething elſe to do than purſue them: And as to any attempt afterwards, his Royal Highneſs put it pretty much out of their power, by marching in two days as far as in his approach to the place he had marched in ſix (33). Thus ended the famous ſiege of Toulon, from whence the Confederates hoped, and the French feared ſo much. Various reaſons are alledged for the miſcarriage of this enterprize, by the writers of thoſe times, to whom we muſt refer, mentioning this one only, which particularly concerns our Admiral. It was ſaid that Sir Cloudeſley diſguſted the Duke of Savoy, by detaining the payment of his ſubſidies, which were due on his paſſing the Var. But this report is apparently groundleſs, ſince the Admiral ſailed the next day; and conſequently he muſt either have paid the money, or his Royal Highneſs would not have ſtirred a foot further. Biſhop Burnet too ſays *, that the Duke was afraid of getting to Toulon before the fleet; and in that caſe he would have wanted proviſions: all our gazettes contradict this, and ſay, that if he had arrived there ſooner he muſt have taken the place, and all the French magazines.

the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſeveral young gentlemen of quality. There is no ſaying how this unhappy accident fell out, or to whoſe fault it was owing; a report, indeed, prevailed, that a great part of the crew had got drunk for joy that they were in ſight of land (u u). Sir Cloudeſley's body was thrown aſhore the next day upon the iſland of Scilly, when ſome fiſhermen took it up, and having ſtolen a valuable emerald ring from the finger, ſtripped and buried it. This ring being ſhewn about, made a great noiſe all over the iſland, and coming to the ears of Mr Panton, who was purſer of the Arundel, he found out the fellows, declared the ring to be Sir Cloudeſley Shovel's, and obliged them to diſcover where they had buried the body; which being done, he took it and carried it on board his own ſhip, in which it was tranſported to Portſmouth [W], conveyed from thence by land to London, and buried with great ſolemnity from his houſe in Soho-Square in Weſtminſter-abbey (w w), where a fine monument of white marble was afterwards erected by the Queen's appointment, in order to do honour to the memory of ſo great a man and ſo worthy a ſubject (x x). Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, at the time of his death, was Rear-Admiral of England, Admiral of the White, and Commander in Chief of her Majeſty's fleet; one of the Council to Prince George of Denmark as Lord High-Admiral of England, Elder Brother of Trinity-Houſe, and one of the Governors of Greenwich-Hoſpital; in all which ſtations he diſcharged his truſt with the greateſt honour and integrity. And as in his publick character he was an accompliſhed ſea-officer, one who had the glory of his Queen and the good of his country at heart; ſo, in all relations of private life, as huſband, parent, or maſter of his family, he conducted himſelf with ſuch prudence, wiſdom, and tenderneſs [X], that few men lived more beloved, or died more lamented. Her Majeſty expreſſed a very particular concern for the loſs of him, and was pleaſed to tell Sir John Leake, when ſhe made him Rear-Admiral of England, that 'ſhe knew no man ſo fit to repair the loſs of the ableſt ſeaman in her ſervice (y y).'

Sir Cloudeſley married the widow of his friend and patron Sir John Narborough, by whom he left two daughters, coheireſſes; the eldeſt of which married Lord Romney, and the other Sir Narborough d'Aeth, Bart.

(x x) The inſcription is drawn up in a becoming plainneſs and dignity of ſtile; but her Majeſty was very ill uſed as to the reſt, eſpecially in the figure of the Admiral, who, beſides an intolerable nonchalance in the limbs, is repreſented with a full-bottom periwig on his head, and his body in armour, an abſurdity which is handſomely animadverted on by the Spectator, No. 26.

[W] His body was tranſported to Portſmouth.] So Dr Campbell; but the writer of the Secret Memoirs tells us, p. 121. that after being embalmed, it was conveyed to Plymouth in the Saliſbury, where it lay in the citadel in ſtate, 'till by Lady Shovel's orders it was carried for London; when the hearſe was attended by the Mayor and Aldermen in their formalities to the limits of the corporation, the ſoldiers of the garriſon being under arms, the cannon of the place fired minute-guns, and all other honours were done to his memory which his worth and merits could deſerve from a grateful people; and that upon it's arrival in London, it lay in ſtate at his houſe in Soho Square.

[X] In all relations of private life, as huſband, parent, &c. he conducted himſelf with tenderneſs.] The writer of the Secret Memoirs obſerves, that the friendſhip he lived in with his Lady, and the regard he always ſhewed her was almoſt without a precedent, that he uſed her ſons by Sir John Narborough with the ſame tenderneſs as if they had been his own; that as he acquired his fortune by juſt and honourable methods, ſo he behaved himſelf piouſly in the diſpoſal of it; that his mother and ſiſter ſhared his happineſs, and that the former, who long ſurvived her huſband, was alive in her own country, when theſe memoirs were written in 1708, attended with an equipage agreeable to the mother of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel. That his liberality was not confined only to his near relations, the moſt remote branches of his family were ſenſible of the happineſs of being allied to him; his friends, his domeſtics, his dependants, were very often obliged to his bounty; and merit, honour and courage always found in him both encouragement and protection; that the preſents he made were ſo conſiderable, and conferred with that greatneſs of mind, as deſerved the name of magnificences; and that proportioning his gifts to his own generoſity, he often exceeded the expectations of the ſuitors (35).

SLOANE [Sir HANS], Bart. an eminent Phyſician and Naturaliſt, and founder of the Britiſh Muſæum, was of Scotiſh extraction; his father, Alexander Sloane, being at the head of that colony of Scots which King James the Firſt ſettled in the north of Ireland, where our author was born, at Killileagh *, April 16, 1660 (a). He diſcovered a ſtrong inclination for the ſtudy of Natural Hiſtory even in his infancy (b); which being encouraged by a ſuitable education, he applied thoſe hours, which youth is apt to ſquander in trifling amuſements, to the ſtudy of Nature and admiration of her works. At the age of ſixteen he was ſeized with a ſpitting of blood, which interrupted the regular courſe of his ſtudies, and confined him to his chamber for three years. He had already learned enough of Phyſic to know that ſuch a malady was not to be ſuddenly cured; and his prudence directed him to abſtain from wine and other liquors that were likely to increaſe the diſorder. By this ſevere regimen, which he conſtantly obſerved, in ſome meaſure ever after, he was enabled to prolong his life beyond the ordinary bounds preſcribed for the age of Man; being himſelf an example of the truth of his favourite maxim, that ſobriety, temperance, and moderation, are the beſt preſervatives, and the moſt powerful that Nature has vouchſafed to mankind (c). He had hardly recovered this firſt attack, when his deſire of perfecting himſelf in the ſeveral branches of Phyſic, which he had choſen for his profeſſion, led him to London; where he might receive thoſe helps, that he could not hope to obtain in his own country. With this view, preſently after his arrival in that metropolis, he entered himſelf as a pupil to the great Stafforth, an excellent Chymiſt, bred under the illuſtrious Stahl; and by his inſtructions he gained a perfect knowledge of the compoſition and preparation of the different medicines of that kind, which he was to make uſe of in the courſe of his future practice. At the ſame time, he ſtudied Botany at the famous garden at Chelſey (d). He likewiſe aſſiduouſly attended the public lectures of Anatomy and Phyſic in London; and, in ſhort, neglected nothing which had had the leaſt relation to his profeſſion. But his moſt diſtinguiſhed merit was that of a Naturaliſt; and it was this part of his character that introduced him early into the acquaintance of two, the moſt eminent perſons in that way of the age, Mr Boyle and Mr Raye, and he was very careful to improve their friendſhip, by communicating to them every ſtriking object of curioſity or uſe that fell under his obſervation. His intimacy with theſe two great men continued 'till their death; and his obſervations often excited their wonder, and obtained their applauſe (e). After four years ſevere ſtudy at London, Mr Sloane reſolved to viſit foreign countries for further improvement. In that view, he ſet out for France, in company of two other ſtudents [A]. Having croſſed the water to Dieppe, they ſet out for Paris. In the way, they were elegantly entertained by the famous Mr Lemery [B], the father; and, in return, Mr Sloane obliged that eminent Chymiſt

[A] He ſet out with two others.] One of theſe companions was Mr (afterwards Sir) Tancred Robinſon, M. D. and Phyſician in ordinary to King George I. whoſe life for ſome time run on in a parallel courſe to that of our author. While he was at Montpelier, he wrote a letter to Dr Martin Liſter, dated Auguſt 4, 1683, concerning the fabric of the remarkable bridge, called Pont de S. Eſprit, on the Rhine, which was read to the Royal Society, November 7. and afterwards printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, No. 160, for June 1684; after his return, he was propoſed a candidate, Nov. 12, 1684, and elected a member of the Royal Society on the 19th (1). In March 1685, he communicated to the Society, ſeveral Obſervations on ſome boiling Fountains at Perouſa in Languedoc, and others in the kingdom of Naples, which was alſo printed in their Tranſactions (2). He was intimately acquainted with Mr. Raye, with whom he kept a correſpondence by letter (3). On the 25th of March, 1685, was one of the committee appointed to conſider about engraving a new ſet of prints of birds and fiſhes, in the books of Mr Raye, and Willoughby, which were very ill done (4). The ſame year, on St Andrew's day, when the annual election is made of their officers, Dr Tancred Robinſon, was choſen Secretary to the Royal Society, and elected into the Council (5). His continuance in the firſt poſt, happened by reaſon of ſome diſturbances among themſelves to be ſhort (6); but he held his ſeat in the council ſeveral years, and communicated ſeveral uſeful papers to them. He became one of the Fellows of the college of Phyſicians, and practiſed in his profeſſion with great applauſe in London; being at length knighted by King George I. who made him one of his Phyſicians in ordinary, as abovementioned (7).

[B] He gave four phoſphori to Mr Lemeri, &c.] That the reader may form a better judgment of our author's merit, at theſe early years; it will be neceſſary to give ſome account of Mr Lemery, as follows. This celebrated Chymiſt was born Nov. 17, 1645, at Rouen in Normandy, of which parliament his father was a Proctor, and of the reformed religion. His ſon, whoſe name was Nicholas, having received a ſuitable education in the place of his birth, was put apprentice there to an Apothecary, who was a relation. But finding in a ſhort time, that his maſter knew little of Chymiſtry, he left him, in 1666, and went to improve himſelf in that art at Paris, where he applied to Mr Glazer, then Demonſtrator of Chymiſtry in the royal gardens. This however did not anſwer his purpoſe. Mr Glazer was one of thoſe profeſſors who are full of obſcure ideas, and was alſo far from being communicative: Lemery therefore ſtaid with him only two months; and then leaving him, reſolved to travel through France, in queſt of ſome better maſters. In this reſolution he went to Montpelier, where he continued three years with Mr Vernant, an Apothecary, who gave him an opportunity of performing ſeveral chymical operations, and of reading lectures alſo to ſome of his ſcholars. Theſe lectures were very uſeful to him, and he made ſuch advances in Chymiſtry, that in a little time he drew all the profeſſors of phyſic, as well as other curious perſons at Montpelier, to hear him; having always ſome new diſcoveries to inſtruct and entertain the moſt able among them. This raiſed his reputation ſo high, that he practiſed phyſic in that univerſity without a Doctor's degree. In 1672, having made the tour of France, he returned to Paris, where he commenced an acquaintance with Mr Martyn, Apothecary to Monſieur the Prince, and making uſe of the laboratory which this Apothecary had in the Hôtel de Condé, he performed ſeveral courſes of Chymiſtry, which brought him into the knowledge and eſteem of the Prince. At length he provided himſelf with a laboratory of his own; and might have been made a Doctor of phyſic, but he choſe to be an Apothecary, by reaſon of his attachment to Chymiſtry, in which he preſently opened public lectures, and had ſo great an affluence of ſcholars (8) that he had ſcarce room to perform his operations. Chymiſtry had been, 'till this time, a ſcience in which there was little truth, and that ſo buried under a multitude of falſities, as to be utterly undiſcernable. Mr Lemery was the firſt that diſſipated theſe affected obſcurities, reduced the ſcience to clear and ſimple ideas, aboliſhed the ſenſeleſs jargon of barbarous terms, and promiſed nothing which he did not actually perform. At the ſame time he found out ſome chymical ſecrets, which he ſold to good profit (9). But in 1681, his life began to be diſturbed on account of his religion, and he received orders to quit his employ. At this time the Elector of Brandenbourg by Mr Spanheim his Envoy in France, made him a propoſal to go to Berlin, with a promiſe of erecting a Profeſſorſhip in Chymiſtry for him there; but the trouble of tranſporting his family to ſuch a diſtance, added to the hopes of ſome diſtinction that would be obtained in his favour, hindered him from accepting that offer, and he was indulged to read ſome courſes after the time limited by the order was expired. But at length this not being ſuffered, he croſſed the ſea to England in 1683, where he was well received by King Charles II. who gave him great encouragement (10). Yet as the face of the public affairs there appeared not more promiſing of quiet than in France, he reſolved to return thither, tho' without being able to determine what courſe he ſhould then take. In theſe difficulties, imagining that the quality of a Doctor of phyſic might perhaps procure him ſome tranquillity; he took that degree at Caen about the end of the year; and repairing to Paris, had a great deal of buſineſs for a while, but did not find that tranquillity which he deſired; on the contrary, the ſtate of the reformed religion grew daily worſe; and at laſt the edict of Nantz being revoked in 1685, he was forbid to practiſe his profeſſion, as well as other Proteſtants. However, he read two courſes of Chymiſtry afterwards, under ſome powerful protections; one courſe being for the two younger brothers of the Marquis de Ségnelar, Secretary of State, and the other for my Lord Saliſbury. At length he ſunk under the perſecution, and entered into the Romiſh Church, in the beginning of the year 1686. This change procured him a full right to practiſe phyſic, but he was obliged to have the King's letters for holding his courſes of Chymiſtry, and for the ſale of his medicines, as he was not now an Apothecary: However, theſe letters were eaſily obtained, and what with his pupils, his patients, and the ſale of his chemical ſecrets, he made conſiderable gains. Upon the revival of the Royal Academy of Sciences, in 1699, he was made Aſſociate-Chymiſt; and at the end of the year became a Penſionary, by the death of M. Bourdelin. In 1707, he began to feel the infirmities of age, and had ſome attacks of an apoplexy, which were ſucceeded by ſome degree of an hemiplegia, but not ſo ſevere as to hinder him from going abroad, ſo that he attended the academy for a conſiderable time; but at length was obliged to diſcontinue his attendance; and being confined to his houſe, he reſigned his Penſionary's place. He was ſtruck with the laſt ſtroke of the apoplexy in 1715; which after ſeven days put a period to his life, on the 19th of June that year, at the age of ſeventy (11). We have the following books publiſhed by him (1) A Courſe of Chymiſtry. (2) An univerſal Pharmacopœia. (3) An univerſal Treatiſe of Drugs. (4) A Treatiſe of Antimony, containing the chemical analyſis of that mineral.

(8) Among auditors, were Mahault, Bernier, Auzout, Regis, Tournefort, &c. all perſons well known in the learned world. Dict. Portatif, by M. L'Advocat, ſecond edit. Paris, 1735, under Lemery's article.

(9) Among others, he diſcovered a pleaſant cometic, which work'd more ſurely than the ordinary ones in uſe, as alſo a meſenteric opiat, with which he pretended to perform ſurprizing cures. He was alſo the only perſon who knew at this time how to make the blank d'Eſpagne, of which he made a great deal of money. Moreri, and L'Advocat.

(10) No doubt Sir Hans Sloane ſaw him at this time, and perhaps it was then too that he ſhewed him the phoſphori mentioned above. It is certain the writer of the Eloge is far from being correct, eſpecially in dates.

Chymiſt with a ſpecimen of the four different kinds of phoſporus; of which, upon the credit of other writers, Mr Lemery had treated in his book, but had never ſeen any of them before. At Paris, Mr Sloane lived as he had done in London; he attended the hoſpitals, heard the lectures of Meſſieurs Tournefort [C], Du Verney [D], and other eminent maſters; viſited the learned of every faculty, who received him with particular marks

[C] He heard the lectures of Mr Tournefort.] With this celebrated French Botaniſt, Sir Hans had ſome connections, which are greatly to his honour, as will be ſeen by the following narrative. Joſeph Pitton de Tournefort, was deſcended of a noble family (12), born at Aix, in Provence, on the 5th of June, 1656. Like Sir Hans, he diſcovered in his infancy an extraordinary paſſion for the knowledge of plants, and often truanted from the Jeſuits college at Aix, where he was put to learn Latin, in order to go a ſimpling in the fields; ſo that he ſoon knew all the plants about that place. However, his parents deſigning him for the Church, put him to ſtudy divinity, and placed him in a ſeminary. But the deſtination of nature prevailed (13), and by the death of his father, which happened in 1677, becoming his own maſter, he quitted Divinity, and applied himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of Botany, Natural Hiſtory, and Medicine. In this diſpoſition, he run over the mountains of Dauphiné and Savoy, in ſearch of the moſt curious plants; with theſe it was that he laid the foundation of his Herbal in 1678, and the following year he went to Montpelier for further improvement in Botany and Phyſic. Beſides the excellent phyſic garden there, he went all about the country as far as the diſtance of ten leagues, often bringing back ſuch plants as were unknown at Montpelier. From which univerſity, he paſſed, in April 1681, to Barcelona, and ran over the mountains of Catalonia, and the Pyrenees; whither he was followed by the Phyſicians of the country, as well as young ſtudents, to whom he read lectures upon plants. This was a dangerous tour; he was often robbed by the Spaniſh miquelets, and had ſome very lucky eſcapes (14); to which purpoſe he uſed to hide his ryals in his bread, which being very black and hard, was left untouched, through contempt, by the rogues, who ſearched him very narrowly. In theſe wanderings he had once alſo a very narrow eſcape of loſing his life. In a village of Perpignan, the houſe where he lay fell ſo ſuddenly, that he was buried in the ruins, and lay there two hours before he could be got out, and then much hurt. He returned to Montpelier before the end of the year; and making a viſit to his own houſe at Aix, he placed in his Herbal all the plants he had collected in Provence, Languedoc, Dauphiné, the Alps, and the Pyrenees. In 1683, Madame de Venelle, ſubgovernante to the children of France, engaged him to go to Paris, where ſhe introduced him to Mr Fagon, firſt phyſician to the Queen, who procured the place of Profeſſor of Botany in the royal garden of plants, for him. This employ did not hinder him from making new excurſions: He went again to Spain, and paſſed thence to Portugal (15); he alſo went to Holland, and even to England, where he acquired the eſteem and friendſhip of the greateſt Botaniſts at that time. During the courſe of theſe travels, Mr Herman, the celebrated profeſſor of Botany at Leiden, being very aged, offered to reſign that chair to him, with a promiſe of obtaining from the States of Holland a penſion for him of 4000 livres; but Mr Tournefort declined it, and returned to France, where he was enrolled a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1691, by Mr Bignon the inſpector of that Academy, who knew him only by fame (16). In 1694, he publiſhed his Elemens de Botanique, &c. which was printed at the Louvre, in 3 vol. 8vo (17). This piece, containing a new ſyſtem of Botany, was attacked by Mr Ray (18), to whom Mr Tournefort replied in a Latin diſſertation in 1697. The controverſy was carried on with great politeneſs on each ſide; and the French Botaniſt in a piece ſubſequent to the diſpute, made Mr Ray ſome high compliments, even upon his ſyſtem of plants. In 1697, Mr Tournefort was admitted Doctor of Phyſic of the faculty at Paris, and the following year he publiſhed his Hiſtoire des plantes qui croiſſent aux environs de Paris, avec leur uſage dans la medicine (19). In 1700, by the expreſs command of Lewis XIV. he went into Greece and Aſia, where he obſerved a great number of plants; he deſigned to have paſſed into Africa, but the plague being then in Egypt, he returned from Smyrna to France, in 1702. In this voyage he was accompanied by Mr Aubriet, an able Painter, and Mr Gundelſcheime, an excellent German Phyſician (20), who had been ſent by him from Paris, to Sir Hans Sloane, to view what he had brought from the Weſt Indies; and Sir Hans ſent him back with an account of the whole, together with a preſent, containing among other things, ſixty very extraordinary ferns, of which he had duplicates (21). This was the occaſion of Father Plumier's being ſent to the Weſt-Indies, as appears by the following paſſage in Labat. 'An 'Engliſh phyſician having publiſhed a book of the plants 'in America, in which were plates of more than ſixty 'ſpecies of ferns, it was thought for the honour of 'this nation, [France] to ſend ſomebody who ſhould 'make further diſcoveries; accordingly Father Plu'mier was pitched upon for this deſign (22).' The diſcoveries which Mr Tournefort had made in his travels in the Eaſt, furniſhed materials for his Corollarium Inſtitutionum rei herbariæ, which was publiſhed in 1703. After his return to Paris, he reſumed the practice of phyſic, and followed it as much as his other employments would permit; but his buſineſs at the royal garden, together with that of the royal college, where he held the phyſic Profeſſor's chair, added to the neceſſary attendance in the royal academy, took up a great deal of his time. He reſolved alſo to write an account of his laſt grand voyage. So many employments were too much for his health, of which he was not ſufficiently careful. And whilſt he was in this bad way, he received a violent blow upon his breaſt, which he thought would prove fatal to him, as it actually did; and after languiſhing for ſome months, he died on the 28th of December 1708. Beſides his collection of plants, he had got together a prodigious number of other curioſities of art, as well as nature, as figured ſtones, rare marcaſites, extraordinary petrifications and cryſtallizations, metals, habiliments, arms, and inſtruments of war of foreign nations; ſo that the whole made a ſuperb cabinet, which he bequeathed to the King, for the uſe of the learned. His books he left to the Abbé Bignon: The two volumes of his travels were printed at the Louvre in 4to, the firſt before his death, and the ſecond after it, from the manuſcript which was found entirely finiſhed. We have alſo of his writing an anſwer to two letters written upon the ſubject of Botany, by Mr Philip Collet (23), beſides three memoirs inſerted in the Hiſtory of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris (24).

[D] Du Verney.] This famous Anatomiſt, whoſe name was Guichard Joſeph du Verney, was born Aug. 15, 1648, at Feurs en Forés, where his father being a Doctor of Phyſic, followed the buſineſs. Having gone thro' the uſual claſſes of grammar learning and philoſophy, he ſtudied phyſic five years at Avignon, where he ſoon became noted for his ſkill in anatomy, and read lectures in it with great accuracy and perſpicuity. In 1676, he entered into the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris; and applying himſelf to ſtudy the natural hiſtory of animals, he had a good ſhare in the hiſtory publiſhed by Mr Du Hamel in Latin. He was choſen to inſtruct in Anatomy that Dauphin, who was grandfather to the preſent Monarch, Lewis XV. And in 1679, was appointed anatomy profeſſor to the royal garden; when he travelled into Low Brittany, to make diſſections of fiſhes, and the following year he was ſent to the coaſt of Bayonne on the ſame buſineſs. On his return to Paris, he had a prodigious concourſe of pupils to attend his lectures *. When he began to decline thro' age, he petitioned to be a Veteran, and his place was filled by Mr Petit, M. D. He died Sept. 10, 1730, aged 82 years. He never publiſhed any more than one piece, intituled, Traité de l' organe de l' Ouïe; A Treatiſe of the Organ of Hearing; which was enough for his fame: and immediately after it's firſt appearance in French, was tranſlated into Latin, and printed at Nuremberg. He held a correſpondence with ſeveral eminent foreign anatomiſts, by whom he was much eſteemed. By his laſt will, he bequeathed all his anatomical preparations to the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris (25).

marks of eſteem; and employed himſelf wholly in improving his ſtudies. From Paris he went to Montpelier, and having letters of recommendation from Mr Tournefort to Mr Chirac (f), then Chancellor and Profeſſor of that Univerſity; he found an eaſy acceſs, through his means, to all the learned men of the province; particularly to Mr Magnol, whom he always accompanied in his Botanical excurſions about the neighbourhood of that famous city, where he beheld, with pleaſure and admiration, the ſpontaneous productions of nature in that happy climate; and he learned, under the inſtructions of Mr Magnol (g), to claſs them in their proper order. Here, having found an ample field for contemplation entirely ſuited to his taſte, he took leave of his two companions, whom a curioſity of a different kind led into Italy, and ſpent a whole year in collecting plants (b). At the end of which, he travelled through Languedoc, with the ſame view, and paſſing through Tholouſe and Bourdeaux, returned to Paris, where he made a ſhort ſtay, and ſet out for England, in the latter end of the year 1684, with an intent to ſettle and follow his profeſſion. Upon his arrival at London, he made it his firſt buſineſs to viſit his two illuſtrious friends, Mr Raye and Mr Boyle, in order to communicate to them the diſcoveries he had made in his travels. Mr Boyle he found at home, but Mr Raye was retired into Eſſex; to which retirement, however, he tranſmitted a great variety of plants and ſeeds, which Mr Raye has deſcribed, in his Hiſtoria Plantarum, with proper acknowledgments. He continued his correſpondence with Mr Raye, as has been already ſaid, 'till that gentleman's death [E], which happened in 1705-6. About this time our author became acquainted with the celebrated Dr Sydenham, who ſoon contracted ſo warm affection for him, that he took him into his houſe, and recommended him in the moſt earneſt manner to his patients (i). He had not been long in London, before he was propoſed, by Dr Martin Liſter, for a candidate, to be admitted a member of the Royal Society, on the twenty-ſixth of November 1684; and being approved was accordingly elected, January the twenty-firſt following After which, we find him communicating ſeveral curioſities to the Society in 1685 (k) And in July, the ſame year, he was a candidate for the place of their Aſſiſtant-Secretary, but was obliged to give way to the ſuperior intereſt of his competitor, Dr Halley (l). On the twelfth of April, 1687, the Doctor was choſen a Fellow of the College of Phyſicians in London [F]. And the ſame year his friend and fellow-traveller, Dr Tancred Robinſon, having mentioned to the Royal Society the plant called Star of the Earth, as a remedy newly diſcovered for the bite of a mad dog; Dr Sloane acquainted them, that this virtue of the plant was to be found in a book called De Grey's Farriery; and that he knew a man who had cured twenty couple of dogs therewith. This was obſerved by him the thirteenth of July, this year, 1687 (m); and on the twelfth of September he embarked at Portſmouth (n) for Jamaica, with Chriſtopher, Duke of Albemarle, who had been lately appointed Governor of that iſland (o). The Doctor attended his Grace in quality of his Phyſician (p), and they arrived at Jamaica on the nineteenth of December following (q). Here a new field was opened for freſh diſcoveries in natural productions, the proſpect of which probably might be one motive for his undertaking the voyage. The medical world, however, had been deprived of the fruits of it, had not our author, by incredible application, converted, as we may ſay, his minutes into hours (r). The Duke of Albemarle died

[F] He was choſen fellow of the College of Phyſicians.] This election happened upon a very extraordinary occaſion, the hiſtory of which is as follows.

At a meeting of the Society 19° Octobris 1685°.

The Preſident, Sir Thomas Witherley, Knt. and one of the King's Phyſicians, having acquainted them, that of his knowledge a Quo Warranto was to come forth againſt their charter in the beginning of the next term. It was put to the vote, and carried nem con. that the college ſhould themſelves deliver up their charter, &c. into his Majeſty's hands; which ſurrendry was ſubſcribed by all the fellows preſent, and afterwards by others that were then abſent; and an inſtrument was produced and ſealed with the college ſeal, by the Preſident, in the view of all preſent.

29° March 1686°.

The Preſident acquainted the college, that it was the pleaſure of their ſuperiors, that the number of the fellows of the college, ſhould inſtead of forty, be henceforth ſixty, nay eighty.

12° Aprilis 1687°.

The Diploma of King James II. was brought to the college, and ſolemnly accepted by the Preſident and Fellows, and thirty new Fellows were that day admitted; among whom were Dr (afterwards Sir) Hans Sloane, and Dr John Radcliffe (27).

(27) From the college regiſter. N. B. The reader is deſired hence to ſupply an omiſſion in Dr Radcliffe's article, where no mention is made of his being a Fellow of this college.

Sir Hans afterwards took an opportunity of teſtifying his good opinion of Dr Radcliffe's merit. In order to expreſs more emphatically his contempt of ſuch perſons as ſpend the beſt part of their time in niceties of language, and verbal criticiſms, he obſerves, that one of this turn, would once needs perſuade him that Dr Radcliffe could not cure a diſeaſe, becauſe he had ſeen a recipe of his, where the word Pilula was ſpelt with ll ‖.

died almoſt as ſoon as he landed, and the Ducheſs his conſort determined to return to England, as ſoon as anſwers could be received to the letters ſhe had ſent to Court on that melancholy occaſion. Dr Sloane could not entertain a thought of leaving her Grace in her diſtreſs, but whilſt the reſt of her retinue ſpent the time in preparing for their departure, he improved it in making his collections of natural curioſities; inſomuch that, though his whole ſtay at Jamaica was ſcarce fifteen months (s), yet he brought together ſuch a prodigious number of plants, that, at his return to England, Mr Raye was aſtoniſhed, that one man could procure in one iſland, in ſo ſhort a ſpace, ſo vaſt a variety (t) [G]. On his arrival at London, he applied himſelf to the practice of his profeſſion, and ſoon became ſo eminent, that he was choſen Phyſician to Chriſt's Hoſpital, on the 17th of October, 1694 (u), on the firſt vacancy, which he held 'till the year 1730; when, by his great age and infirmities, he found it neceſſary to reſign. What is ſingular, and deſerves the higheſt commendation, is, that though he received the appointments of his office punctually, becauſe he would not ſet a precedent that ſhould hinder thoſe who might ſucceed him, yet he conſtantly applied the money to the relief of thoſe who were the greateſt objects of compaſſion in that hoſpital, that it might never be ſaid he enriched himſelf, by the gains he made of giving health to the poor (w). He had been elected Secretary to the Royal Society, on the 30th of November 1693 (x), and entered upon the buſineſs of that office, by reviving the publication of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, which had been omitted for ſome time. He continued to be editor of them 'till the year 1712 (y), and the volumes which were publiſhed in this period are monuments of his induſtry and ingenuity, many of the pieces contained therein being written by himſelf. In the interim, he publiſhed Catalogus Plantarum, quæ in Inſula Jamaica ſponte proveniunt, &c. ceu, Prodromi Hiſtoriæ Naturalis pars prima [H]; which he dedicated to the Royal Society

[G] Mr Ray was aſtoniſhed at the vaſt variety] 'When I firſt ſaw, ſays that gentleman, the author's ſtock of dried plants collected in Jamaica, and ſome of the Caribbee Iſlands, I was much ſurpriſed, and even aſtoniſhed at the number of the capillary kind, not thinking there had been ſo many to be found in both the Indies.' Not Mr Ray only, but all the world here, was affected with the ſame aſtoniſhment; and ſurely every heart muſt burn with diſdain at the injuries which this aſtoniſhment carried ſome ſelfiſh admirers to commit. 'When I returned, ſays Sir Hans, from Jamaica, I brought with me a collection of dried ſamples of ſome very ſtrange plants, which excited the curioſity of people, who loved things of that nature, to ſee them, and who were welcome; 'till I obſerved ſome ſo very curious as to deſire to carry part of them privately home with them, and injure what they left*. This made me upon my guard with them (28).'

[H] Catalogus Plantarum, &c.] To underſtand the full extent of this catalogue, it will be neceſſary to give the title at length, as follows: Catalogus Plantarum quæ in Inſula Jamaica, ſponte proveniunt, vel vulgo coluntur, cum earundem ſynonimis et locis natalibus: Adjectis aliis quibuſdam quæ in Inſulis Maderæ, Barbadoes, Nevis, & Sancti Chriſtophori naſcuntur; ceu Prodromi Hiſtoriæ naturalis Jamaicæ pars prima. We ſhall be able to form ſome judgment of the true merit of this piece, from the following account, with remarks upon it, communicated to the Royal Society, by Mr. Ray.

The author of this catalogue, ſays that gentleman, doth not preſent the reader with titles of plants collected out of other men's writings, or of which he had only ſeen dried ſpecimens, but of ſuch as himſelf ſaw growing in their native places: Among which, there are a great multitude of new and non-deſcript ſpecies, in one genus alone, viz. thoſe called capillaries no leſs than ſixty; beſides thoſe lately publiſhed by Fa. Plumier, in his firſt volume of the deſcription of American plants, which our author had obſerved and deſcribed long before that book came out ‡: and theſe not ſmall and contemptible ones, ſuch as are hardly diſtinguiſhable from plants of that kind already deſcribed, but of eminent ſtature and beauty; and ſome of them of ſo ſtrange and exotic a form, that if delineated, they could not but invite and greatly entertain the ſpectator's eye. For firſt, he would be entirely delighted to ſee an arboreſcent fern of a ſingle woody ſtem, ſtreight and undivided, bearing leaves only at the top, like a palm tree. Secondly, capillaries of all kinds, creeping on trees, or rocks on the ground, with wires, after the manner of Strawberries; or thirdly, capillaries, the top of whoſe leaves turning downwards, and touching the earth, take root, and put forth a new plant, ſo propagating their kind: or, fourthly, capillaries putting forth from the middle ſtem of their leaves, two ſhoots, each bearing a ſpike of flowers and ſeeds.

‡ This Friar, who long made Botany his chief ſtudy, was ſent by order of the French King, who gave him a penſion, three voyages to the Antilles, and ſet out on a fourth, to examine the tree which bears the quinquina, or Jeſuits bark, but died in his paſſage at Port St Mary near Cadiz, in 1706. Beſides the piece here mentioned, he publiſhed another of the American ferns in 1705, in Latin and French, as alſo a third, intituled, L'Art de Tourner. After his death were found among his papers materials ſufficient for ſix volumes, which were to be printed with his life prefixed. Moreri.

Secondly, the author in this catalogue, hath done great ſervice at leaſt to the inferior rank of Herbariſts, in reducing and cutting ſhort the number of ſpecies, which were unneceſſarily multiplied. For obſerving that thoſe who have publiſhed accounts or deſcriptions of America, for want of ſufficient ſkill in Botanics, and not being verſed in deſcribing plants, have given us ſuch lame, imperfect, and obſcure deſcriptions of ſuch as they took notice of, and of the ſame tree or herb, many times under different names, that the compilers of general hiſtories of plants, meeting with theſe deſcriptions, and having no other knowledge of ſuch plants, than what they derived from them, have repeated one and the ſame ſpecies (found in far diſtant countries, by various obſervers, and differently deſcribed) once, twice, and thrice (nay ſome great authors ſometimes even nine times) over, for different kinds. Now the number of plants being in nature ſo vaſt, 'tis pity to add to it more than there are in nature, making two or three of one, thereby both deterring and confounding the learner. To clear up theſe difficulties, and to reduce all to their proper kinds, no man can be well qualified, but he that hath a comprehenſive knowledge of ſuch plants as grow wild, or are commonly cultivated in gardens, here in Europe, and hath ſeen the non-deſcript Americans, or ſuch as are here alſo known, growing in their natural places; and hath read, conſidered, and compared, what hath been written of them, either by ſuch who have lived ſome time in thoſe countries, and and publiſhed deſcriptions or natural hiſtories of them, or by ſuch as have made voyages thither, and given relations and accounts of their travels, and what they obſerved during their ſhort ſtay there: All which qualifications concur in our author.

Thirdly, this work is of great uſe to thoſe that are delighted in reading the relations and accounts of navigators and travellers to and in theſe parts, to inform them concerning the names of American and Indian plants; they will therein meet with, to what plants they belong, and where they may find exact deſcriptions, or characteriſtic notes of them; the author having with infinite pains and patience, read moſt part of the books of voyages and travels extant, referred to plants he met with therein, named or referred to their proper genera, or places under which they are ranked, and by which they are denominated and characterized by the moſt ſkilful and learned harbariſts of the preſent, or immediately precedent age.

Fourthly; the author in this work hath cleared up and reſolved many doubts and difficulties, and informed us of what plants are ſignified by many names, frequent in the mouths and writings of our own countrymen; of which before we were either ignorant, or in ſome doubt *.

* Of this he gives inſtances in the dumb cane, logwood, the dildoe-tree, the toddy tree, the prickly pear, the four-ſop, bonaviſts, and many others.

Beſides we are aſſured by this work, that there are ſome plants common to England and Jamaica; but the greateſt

Society and College of Phyſicians. About the ſame time, he laid the plan of a Diſpenſatory, where the poor might be furniſhed, at prime coſt, with ſuch medicines as their ſeveral maladies ſhould require; which he afterwards, with the aſſiſtance of the Preſident and other members of the College of Phyſicians, carried into execution (z). Our author's thirſt for natural knowledge ſeems to have been born with him, ſo that his cabinet of rarities may be ſaid to have commenced with his being. He was continually enriching and enlarging it, and the fame, which in a courſe of years it had acquired, brought every thing that was curious in art or nature to be firſt offered to him for purchaſe. But theſe acquiſitions increaſed it but ſlowly, in compariſon of the augmentation it received in 1701, by the death of William Courten, Eſq; a gentleman who had employed all his time, and the greateſt part of his fortune, in collecting rarities, and who bequeathed his whole collection to Dr Sloane, on condition that he ſhould pay certain legacies and debts with which he had charged it (aa). Our author accepted the condition, and performed the Will of the donor punctually; on which account there are ſome who do not ſcruple to ſay, he purchaſed Mr Courten's curioſities at a dear rate (bb). In 1707, the firſt volume of his Natural Hiſtory of Jamaica appeared in folio, though the publication of the ſecond volume was delayed 'till 1725 (cc). By this very uſeful as well as magnificent work, the Materia Medica was enriched with a great number of excellent drugs, not known before [I]. In 1708, the Doctor was elected a foreign member of the Royal Academy at Paris, in the room of Mr Tſchirnaus [K], an honour of ſo much the more eſtimation, as we were then at war with France, and the Queen's expreſs conſent was neceſſary to his acceptance of it. In proportion as his credit roſe among the learned, his practice increaſed with perſons of condition: Queen Anne frequently conſulted him, and in her laſt illneſs was blooded by him (dd). On the advancement of King George I. to the throne, that Prince, on the third of April 1716 (ee), created the doctor a Baronet, an hereditary title of honour, to which no Engliſh Phyſician had ever arrived before *; and at the ſame time made him Phyſician-general to the army, which he enjoyed 'till 1727, when he was appointed King's Phyſician in Ordinary to his preſent Majeſty King George the Second, and preſcribed for the Royal Family 'till his death. He was particularly favoured by Queen Caroline, who placed the greateſt confidence in his preſcriptions (ff). In the interim, he had been choſen unanimouſly one of the Elects of the College of Phyſicians, June 1, 1716 (gg), and he was elected Preſident of the ſame college, September 30, 1719 (hh); in which ſtation he continued ſixteen years (ii). In which time, he not only gave the higheſt proofs of his zeal and affiduity, in the diſcharge of his duty, but alſo, in 1721, made a preſent to that ſociety of a hundred

[I] The college was enriched, &c.] Dr Freind ſpeaking of the particulars of which the hiſtory of phyſic carried down to the laſt century ſhould conſiſt, having directed the hiſtorian, who ſhall undertake that work, to obſerve ſome modern improvements in medicine and ſurgery, proceeds thus: 'On the former head, he ſhould deſcribe the famous compoſition of Fracaſtorius's Diaſcordium, and give a detail of the American drugs, which began to be improved among us in this period, and which have ſo much enriched the materia medica. Monardes, Piſo, and Margrave, will furniſh him with great ſupplies in this kind; but the moſt accurate deſcription of the ſimples themſelves, as well as of the things relating to their virtues in curing diſtempers, we ſhall find in that moſt elaborate work, lately publiſhed, for the honour of our country, by Sir Hans Sloane (29).

[K] In the Academy of Paris, he ſucceeded Mr Tſchirnaus.] This extraordinary perſon being frequently mentioned in the diſpute about the mention of the method of fluxions (30), we ſhall, for the ſake of ſuch as are curious in thoſe matters, give a ſuccinct account of him. Enfroi Walter de Tſchirnaus, for this was his name, was deſcended of a noble and ancient family, and was Lord of Kiſlingſwald and Stolzenberg, in Luſace, where he was born on the 10th of April, 1651. His education was ſuitable to his birth; and after being inſtructed at home, having held a correſpondence with Mr Oldenburg, Secretary to the Royal Society, and the beſt maſters in all the branches of literature, proper for a youth, he was ſent by his father, at the age of ſeventeen, to finiſh his ſtudies at Leyden, in Holland, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his genius for the mathematics, and natural hiſtory; but upon the breaking out of the Dutch war in 1672, he entered a voluntier in that army, and ſerved in that quality for the ſpace of eighteen months; when he was recalled home. Not long afterwards, a reſolution being taken to compleat his education by travelling abroad; in that deſign he made the tour of England, Holland, France, Italy, and went as far as Malta; and was at Paris the third time, in 1682, when he opened the diſcovery of thoſe cauſtics which go by his name, to the Royal Academy of Sciences; whereupon he was admitted a member of that ſociety. He then made another viſit to Holland, and finiſhing his treatiſe de medicina mentis & corporis (31), he left the manuſcript with ſome friends there, and it was printed at Amſterdam in 1687, 4to. After his return to Saxony, he turned his thoughts upon improving optics: to that end, he obtained a grant of the Elector of Saxony King of Poland, to ſet up three glaſs works; which produced ſome extraordinary curioſities in dioptrics and natural philoſophy, an account of which were inſerted in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, for 1699, and 1700. Among others, he made a large burning-glaſs, which was purchaſed by the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, during the minority of Lewis XV (32). He alſo preſented another to the Emperor Leopold, who thereupon offered to create him a free Baron, which honour he declined, and only accepted a preſent of his Imperial Majeſty's picture, together with a chain of gold. In 1701, he went the fourth time to Paris, where he gave his attendance at the Academy, and read to them ſeveral new methods for improving the ſublime geometry, or the geometry of curves, different from that of Mr Leibnitz's infinitefimals. He even produced an example of his new method in the evolution curves, but he never gave any demonſtration of it, and it was univerſally rejected, as having no ſolid foundation. However, before his departure from Paris, he hinted to Mr Homberg his ſecret of making Porcellain ware, which has been ſince brought to ſo great perfection in his own country, and is at this day well known, and in the higheſt eſteem, by the name of Dreſden China. Upon his return home he became very uneaſy in his domeſtic affairs, and continued ſo 'till his death, which happened on the 11th of October, 1708, occaſioned by the gravel and ſtone. His laſt words were triumph, victory, apparently declaring death to be the great conqueror of all human evils (33).

a hundred pounds *, and remitted a very conſiderable debt, which the corporation owed him, ſo far at leaſt as to accept by little, and in ſuch ſmall ſums, as was leaſt inconvenient to the circumſtances of their affairs (kk). Sir Hans was no leſs liberal to other learned bodies; he had no ſooner purchaſed the manor of Chelſey, than he gave the Company of Apothecaries the entire freehold of their botanical garden there, in 1721 †, upon condition only that they ſhould preſent yearly to the Royal Society fifty new plants, 'till the number ſhould amount to two thouſand [L]. He gave beſides ſeveral other conſiderable donations for the improvement of this garden, the ſituation of which, on the banks of the Thames, and in the neighbourhood of the capital, was ſuch as to render it uſeful in a twofold degree; firſt, by producing the moſt rare medicinal plants, and ſecondly, by ſerving as an excellent ſchool for young Botaniſts, an advantage which he himſelf had drawn from it in the early part of his life. The death of Sir Iſaac Newton, in 1727, made way for the advancement of Sir Hans to the Preſidency of the Royal Society (ll). He had been Vice-Preſident, and frequently ſat in the chair for that great man; and, by his long connection with this learned body, he had contracted ſo great an affection for it, that he made a preſent to the Society of a hundred guineas, cauſed a curious buſt of King Charles the Second, it's founder, to be ſet up in the great hall where it met, and, it is ſaid, was very inſtrumental in procuring Sir Godfrey Copley's benefaction of a medal of five guineas value, which is continued to this day, to be annually given, as an honorary mark of diſtinction to him, who ſhall communicate the beſt experiments to the Society (mm); and being now placed at the head of it, he laid aſide the thoughts of all further promotion, and applied himſelf wholly to the faithful diſcharge of the reſpective duties of the places he enjoyed; to anſwer, like an able Phyſician, the high opinion which the publick had conceived of him; to improve his mind with uſeful knowledge, and his cabinet with new curioſities, which he now found much eaſier to do than formerly, ſince he had taught ſeafaring people to regard, as an object of commerce, thoſe marine productions, which before they deſpiſed as uſeleſs and not worth notice. Add to this, the univerſal correſpondence which he held with the learned in every part of the known world, who were fond of tranſmitting to him whatever they thought rare or curious, as they were ſure that ſuch kind of preſents would always find from him a favourable acceptance (nn). In theſe laudable occupations, Sir Hans employed his time from 1727 to 1740; when, at the age of fourſcore, he formed a reſolution of quitting the ſervice of the publick, and living for himſelf. With that view, he reſigned the Preſidency of the Royal Society, much againſt the inclination of that reſpectable body, who choſe Martin Folkes, Eſq; to ſucceed him, and in a publick aſſembly thanked him for the great and eminent ſervice he had done them, and begged his permiſſion, that his name might remain enrolled among the members of their Council as long as he ſhould live (oo). In the month of January, 1741, he began to remove his library, and his cabinet of rarities, from his houſe in Bloomſbury, London, to that at Chelſey; and on the 12th of May following, having ſettled all his affairs, he retired thither himſelf, to enjoy in a peaceful tranquillity the remains of a well-ſpent life. He did not, however, paſs into that kind of ſolitude, which excludes men from ſociety: he received at Chelſey, as he had done at London, the viſits of people of diſtinction; of all learned foreigners; of the Royal Family, who ſometimes did him that honour; and, what was ſtill more to his praiſe, he never refuſed admittance or advice to rich or poor, who came to conſult him concerning their health (pp). Moreover, not content with this contracted manner of doing good, he now, during this retreat, preſented to the publick ſuch uſeful remedies, as the ſucceſs had warranted during the courſe of a long continued practice. Among theſe is an efficacious receipt for diſtempers in the eyes [M], and his remedy for the bite of a mad dog (qq). Hitherto the great temperance of Sir Hans had preſerved him from feeling the infirmities of old age; but in his ninetieth year he began to complain of pains, and to be ſenſible of an univerſal decay. He was often heard to ſay, that the approach of death brought no terrors with it; that he had long expected the

Accordingly the grant was accepted, and the condition has been faithfully performed by the company ever ſince (34). And in 1733 they erected, in the center of the garden, a marble ſtatue of him, ſupported by a pedeſtal, on which is a Latin inſcription, expreſſing his donation, and the deſign and advantages of it *. the ſtroke, and was prepared to receive it, whenever the great author of his being ſhould think fit. The long expected moment at length arrived; after a ſhort illneſs of three days he gave up his laſt breath, January 11, 1752. He was interred on the 18th at Chelſey, in the ſame vault with his lady (rr), the ſolemnity being attended with the greateſt concourſe of people of all ranks and conditions, that had ever been ſeen before on the like occaſion [N]. His funeral ſermon was preached by Dr Zachary Pearce, then Biſhop of Bangor (ss), who forbore to enlarge upon the exalted qualities of the deceaſed, by reaſon of an expreſs prohibition received from his own mouth before his death. Such was his piety, that he thought it a degree of profanation to debaſe, with the praiſes of human excellencies, the pulpit, which ſhould be devoted to diſplay to men the greatneſs of the Supreme Being, and to inſtruct them in his laws (tt). The writer of his Eloge having obſerved, that in his perſon Sir Hans was tall and well proportioned, proceeds to repreſent his character in the following colours; and tells us, that not only 'His manners 'were eaſy, free, and engaging, but that his converſation was ſprightly, familiar, and 'obliging; that nothing could equal his courteſy to ſtrangers; he was always ready upon 'the leaſt notice to ſhew and explain to them his whole cabinet: once a week he kept 'open houſe for gentlemen of all ranks, particularly for his brethren of the Royal Society, 'who thought fit to viſit him. The ſad conſequences of his death were ſeverely felt by 'the poor, to whom he was every way a liberal benefactor. He was a Governor of 'almoſt every hoſpital in and about London. To each he gave a hundred pounds in his 'life-time, and at his death a ſum more conſiderable. That whatever propoſal had for 'it's object the publick good might command his moſt zealous endeavours to promote it, 'he did all that he could to forward the eſtabliſhment of the colony in Georgia of 1732, 'Foundling Hoſpital in 1739, and formed the plan for bringing up the children, which 'experience has ſhewn to be the beſt that could be deviſed. If he found duplicates of any 'book in his ſtudy, his manner was, to ſend one of the copies to the college of Phyſi-'cians, if the book was medical, or to the Bodleian library at Oxford, if it treated on 'other ſubjects. He was the firſt in England who introduced into general practice the 'uſe of the Bark, not only in fevers, but in a variety of other diſtempers, particularly in 'nervous diſorders, in mortifications, and in violent hæmorrhages. He frequently took 'it himſelf for the ſpitting of blood, to which he was always more or leſs ſubject. He 'likewiſe gave a ſanction to the practice of inoculation, by inoculating two daughters of 'the Royal Family, which did more to eſtabliſh that ſalutary diſcovery, than all the 'treatiſes that ever were written on the ſubject.' Whatever cenſure may be paſſed upon ſome particulars, as ſo far drawn of this character, which the reader will bear in mind is the laſt finiſhing of Sir Hans's Eloge, all the world muſt agree to the concluſion of it, wherein that writer obſerves, that he was extremely ſollicitous, leſt his cabinet of rarities, which he had taken ſo much pains to collect, ſhould be again diſſipated at his death; yet was unwilling that ſo large a proportion of his fortune ſhould be loſt to his children, and he was equally grieved that his country ſhould be deprived of the uſe of ſo valuable a treaſure. He therefore bequeathed it to the publick, on condition that twenty thouſand pounds ſhould be made good by Parliament to his family: a ſum, which, though large in appearance, was ſcarce more than the intrinſic value of the gold and ſilver medals, the ores and precious ſtones, that were found in it (uu) [O]. There was, beſides his library, conſiſting of more than fifty thouſand volumes, three hundred and forty ſeven of which were illuſtrated with cuts, finely engraven and coloured from nature, three thouſand five hundred and ſixty-ſix manuſcripts, and an infinite number of rare and curious books. The Parliament accepted the legacy and fulfilled the conditions [P]. It is eaſy to perceive the

the advantage that will reſult to the publick from this immenſe collection. To have acceſs to ſuch a cabinet as this, is, in effect, to men of taſte, like making the tour of the world, and

and additions thereto. In purſuance of this act, the ſum of 300,000l. was raiſed by a lottery, which abundantly enabled the parliament to compleat their whole deſign. According to which, beſides the required ſum of 20,000l. paid for Sir Hans's collection; the Harleian manuſcripts were purchaſed at the rate of 10,000l. and the truſtees of Sir Hans giving their conſent to have his collection removed from his manor houſe at Chelſey, to any proper place within the cities of London or Weſtminſter (36), that magnificent edifice, called Montague-houſe (37), in Ruſſel-ſtreet, Bloomſbury, was alſo purchaſed at the rate of 10,000l. To this houſe, not only the two laſt mentioned collections, but the Cotton library, with all the additions thereto, including that of Arthur Edwards of Hanover-ſquare, London, Eſq; bequeathed by his will in 1738 (38), were removed. By the ſaid act, the following great officers of ſtate and biſhops, for the time being, are appointed truſtees The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord high Chancellor, or Keeper, Preſident of the Council, Privyſeal, Steward, Chamberlain, Lord-Treaſurer, or firſt Commiſſioner of the Treaſury, Lord High Admiral, or Firſt Commiſſioner of the Admiralty, Biſhop of London, the two Secretaries of State, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the two Chief Juſtices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, Maſter of the Rolls, Attorney and Sollicitor General, the Preſidents of the Royal Society and College of Phyſicians, beſides two of the truſtees for the Cotton library (39), the Duke of Portland and the Earl of Oxford; and upon their deceaſe the Counteſs of Oxford and Ducheſs of Portland, and their heirs: On the account of the Harleian manuſcripts, Charles Lord Cadogan, and Hans Stanley, truſtees for Sir Hans Sloane's collection, and their heirs after their deceaſe, and ſome other noblemen and gentlemen who are incorporated by the name of Truſtees for the Britiſh Muſæum; the major part of whom, including the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord High Chancellor, or Keeper, and the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, are a quorum; and theſe three, or any two of them, are empowered to make ſtatutes and to chuſe officers (40), and appoint their reſpective ſalaries; for and towards the payment of which, the ſum of 30,000l. is to be placed out to intereſt in the public funds; as alſo for the neceſſary expences, and repairs, and alterations of the Repoſitory. In purſuance of theſe powers, the ſaid truſtees appointed the following officers, with their reſpective ſalaries, viz. Principal Librarian, ſalary 200l. per ann. three under Librarians, ſalary 100l. each, three Aſſiſtants, ſalary 50l. each, and a keeper of the reading room, ſalary 50l. beſides a porter and a meſſenger, ſalary 40l. each; one man, ſalary 30l. and four women ſervants; and the whole collection being placed in proper order, the Muſæum was opened for public uſe in 1759, when ſeveral ſtatutes and rules relating to the inſpection and uſe of it, were publiſhed by order of the ſaid truſtees; the ſubſtance of which is as follows.

The Muſæum will be kept open every day, (except Saturday, Sunday, Chriſtmas-day, and one week after; one week after Eaſter-day and Whitſunday; Good-Friday, and every public faſt and thankſgiving day) from nine in the morning 'till three in the afternoon; but on Mondays and Fridays in May, June, July, and Auguſt, only from four to eight in the afternoon.

Perſons deſirous to ſee the Muſæum, muſt, in writing, give in their names, condition, and places of abode, as alſo the day and hour they deſire to be admitted, to the porter, before nine in the morning, or between four and eight in the evening, on ſome preceding day, which he will enter in a regiſter, to be laid every night before the principal librarian, or, in his abſence, before the under librarian officiating for him, and, if he ſhall judge them proper, he will direct the porter to deliver tickets to them, on their applying a ſecond time for tickets.

No more than ten tickets will be delivered out for each hour of admittance; which tickets being ſhewn to the porter, he will direct the ſpectators to a room appointed for their reception, 'till their hour of ſeeing the Muſæum be come; at which time they are are to deliver their tickets to the proper officers of the firſt department. Five of the ſpectators will be attended by the under librarian, and the other five by the aſſiſtant, in each department.

The tickets are for the admiſſion of company at nine, ten, eleven, or twelve, in the morning; and at four or five in the afternoon of thoſe days in which the Muſæum is to be open at that time.

If application be made by more than can be accommodated on the day and hour they had named; the perſons laſt applying will have tickets for any other day and hour within ſeven days.

If not more than five produce tickets for any particular hour, they will be deſired to join in one company.

Perſons prevented from making uſe of their tickets are deſired to ſend them back to the porter in time; that others may not be excluded.

That the ſpectators may view the whole Muſæum in a regular order, they will firſt be admitted to ſee the manuſcripts and medals; then the natural and artificial productions; and afterwards the printed books.

One hour only will be allowed to the ſeveral companies, ſo that the whole may be inſpected in three hours. Notice of the expiration of the hour will be given by the ringing of a bell. Each company muſt keep together in that room, in which the officer who attends them ſhall then be.

A catalogue of the printed books, manuſcripts, and other parts of the collection, with proper references, will be depoſited in each department.

If a ſpectator deſires to ſee any book, or other part of the collection, it will be handed to him by the officer, if he ſhall think it conſiſtent with ſafety; and it muſt be reſtored to it's place before the ſpectator leaves the room; but no more than one ſuch book, or other part of the collection, will be delivered at a time to the ſame company. The officer that attends the company, will give them any information they deſire, relating to the part of the collection under his care.

The coins and medals, except ſuch as the ſtanding committee ſhall order, from time to time, to be placed in glaſs caſes, are not to be expoſed to view, but by leave of the truſtees in a general meeting, or of the ſtanding committee, or of the principal librarian; and will be ſhewn between the hours of one and three in the afternoon; but no more than two perſons will be admitted to ſee them at the ſame time, unleſs by particular leave of the principal librarian; who in ſuch caſe is required to attend, together with the officer in ordinary, the whole time: and but one thing will be taken or continue out of the cabinets and drawers at a time, which muſt be done by the officer, who muſt ſee it replaced before any perſon preſent goes out of the room.

If any perſon who hath a ticket, come after the hour marked in his ticket, but before the three hours allotted him be expired, he will, if he deſire it, be permitted to join the company appointed for the ſame hour, on his removing into another department.

Any perſon may apply for a ticket in the manner abovementioned, as often as he pleaſes, provided that no one perſon have tickets at the ſame time for more days than one.

No children will be admitted.

No officer, or ſervant, muſt take any fee, reward, or gratuity.

With regard to Perſons who deſire to make uſe of the Muſæum for ſtudy.

No one will be admitted to make uſe of the Muſæum for ſtudy, but by leave of the truſtees in a general meeting, or of the ſtanding committee; and that for half a year only, without a freſh application. The names of ſuch perſons, with the dates of the orders, and their duration, will be entered in a book.

A particular room is allotted in which they may ſit, and read, or write, without interruption, during the time the Muſæum is kept open; a proper officer conſtantly attending in the room. They muſt give notice, in writing, the day before, what book or manuſcript they ſhall deſire to peruſe the following day; which will be lodged in ſome convenient place in the ſaid room, and will from thence be delivered by the officer of the ſaid room; excepting, however, ſome books and manuſcripts

(36) The Parliament gave the manor-houſe at Chelſey, which by the Will was included in the purchaſe, to Sir Hans's truſtees, to be diſpoſed of as part of his other eſtates. It has been ſince pulled down, and a row of handſome houſes built upon the ſcite.

manuſcripts of great value, or very liable to be damaged, and on that account judged by the truſtees not fit to be removed out of the library to which they belong, without particular leave of the truſtees; a catalogue whereof is kept by the officer of the reading room.

Such perſons will be allowed to take one or more extracts from any printed book or manuſcript; and either of the officers of the department may do it for them, upon ſuch terms as ſhall be agreed on between them. The tranſcriber muſt not lay the paper, on which he writes, upon any part of the book, or manuſcript, he is uſing.

No whole manuſcript, nor the greater part of any, muſt be tranſcribed, without leave from the truſtees.

Every perſon intruſted with the uſe of any book, or manuſcript, muſt return it before he leaves the room.

Any perſon engaged in a work of learning, who ſhall have occaſion to make a drawing of any of the natural or artificial productions, or to examine it more carefully than can be done in the common way of viewing the Muſæum, muſt apply to the truſtees for particular leave for that purpoſe.

On any perſon having occaſion to conſult or inſpect any book, charter, deed, or other manuſcript, for evidence or information, other than for ſtudying, muſt apply for leave to the truſtees. But if the caſe ſhould require ſuch diſpatch as that time cannot be allowed for ſuch application, the principal librarian, or the under librarian officiating for him, may grant ſuch leave.

No part of the collections belonging to the Muſæum muſt at any time be carried out of the general repoſitory; except books, charters, deeds, or other manuſcripts, to be made uſe of in evidence: And theſe muſt be carried by the under librarian or aſſiſtant of the department to which they belong, or by ſuch other of the under librarians or aſſiſtants, as the truſtees ſhall appoint; and he muſt attend the whole time, and bring it back with him; for which extraordinary trouble and attendance it is expected that a proper ſatisfaction be made him.

If any perſon ſhall behave in an improper manner, and contrary to the rules preſcribed by the truſtees, and ſhall continue ſuch miſbehaviour, after having been admoniſhed by one of the officers, ſuch perſon will be obliged forthwith to withdraw from the Muſæum; and his name is to be entered in a book kept by the porter; who is ordered not to deliver a ticket to him for his admiſſion for the future, without a ſpecial direction from the truſtees in a general meeting. SMALRIDGE [GEORGE], a polite Scholar, a learned Divine, and a pious and devout Prelate, was born in the year 1663, at Litchfield in Staffordſhire (a), where his father, Thomas Smalridge, followed the buſineſs of a Dyer with diſtinguiſhed reputation (b); but his fortune not being ſufficient to give his ſon that education, which his promiſing parts deſerved, theſe found a patron in Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; his fellow-citizen, by whoſe direction the young genius was ſent to Weſtminſter-ſchool [A]; where being choſen into the college, he preſently became the delight and admiration of his ſchool-fellows, by the ſweetneſs of his temper, and the delicate turn of his exerciſes. At the age of ſeventeen, he repaid the kindneſs of his benefactor, in two elegant elegies upon the death of his friend William Lilly, the famous Aſtrologer [B]. On the 17th of May the following

[A] By whoſe direction he was ſent to Weſtminſter-ſchool.] For this we have the ſame authority as for the foregoing particular, and it is countenanced, or we might ſay confirmed, by Mr Aſhmole's Diary of his own life, where nothing is ſet down but ſuch things as he had ſome eſpecial concern in. There we find p. 66, the following independent article, 'May 17, [1682] 'George Smalridge was elected out of Weſtminſter-'School to go to Chriſt-Church in Oxford.' And if ſuch a circumſtance could ſtand in need of any further proof, the reader will find it in the motive for Mr Smalridge's writing verſes upon the death of William Lilly the Aſtrologer, for whom it is well known Mr Aſhmole had a particular friendſhip (1).

[B] He wrote two elegies upon the death of Lilly.] As theſe are the firſt fruits of our author's poetical talents in print, we ſhould not do juſtice to his memoir if they were omitted.

following year, 1682, he was elected from the ſchool to a ſtudent's place at Chriſt-Church-college in Oxford (c); where having taken his degree of Bachelor of Arts at the regular time (d), he became a tutor (e), and was the next year pitched upon, though ſo young, as very capable of taking a part, together with his fellow-collegians, Dr Aldrich and Mr Atterbury, in the Popiſh controverſy againſt Obadiah Walker, Maſter of Univerſity-college [C]. In this engagement, he publiſhed, in 1687, Animadverſions on the eight

' Fatorum interpres fata inopina ſubit.
' Verſari æthereo dum vixit in orbe ſolebat;
' Nunc humilem jactat terra ſuperba virum.
' Sed cœlum metitur adhuc reſupinus in urna,
' Vertitur in ſolitos palpebra clauſa polos.
' Huic buſto invigilent ſolenni lampade muſæ.
' Perpetuo nubes imbre ſepulchra rigant.
' Ille oculis movit diſtantia ſidera noſtris,
' Illum amotum oculis traxit ad aſtra Deus.'

To this he likewiſe added the following elegy in Engliſh, on the ſame occaſion.

Our Prophet's gone, no longer may our ears
Be charm'd with muſic of th' harmonious ſpheres:
Let ſun and moon withdraw, leave gloomy night,
To ſhew their Nuncio's fate, who gave more light
To th' erring world than all the feeble rays
Of ſun or moon; taught us to know thoſe days
Bright Titan makes; follow'd the haſty ſun
Through all his circuits; knew th' inconſtant moon,
And more inconſtant ebbings of the flood,
And what is moſt unconſtant, th' factious brood,
Flowing in civil broils. By th' heav'ns could date
The flux and reflux of our dubious ſtate.
He ſaw th' eclipſe of ſun, and change o'th' moon,
He ſaw, but ſeeing, could not ſhun his own.
Eclips'd he was that he might ſhine more bright,
And only chang'd to give a fuller light.
He having view'd the ſky and glorious train
Of gilded ſtars, ſcorn'd longer to remain
In earthly priſons: Could he a village love,
Whom the twelve houſes waited for above?
The grateful ſtars a heavenly manſion gave
This heav'nly ſoul. Nor could he live a ſlave
To mortal paſſions, whoſe immortal mind,
Whilſt here on earth, was not to earth confin'd;
He muſt be gone, the ſtars had ſo decreed,
As he of them, ſo they of him had need.
This meſſage 'twas the blazing comet brought,
I ſaw the paleſac'd ſtar, and ſeeing thought
(For we could gueſs, but only Lilly knew)
It did ſome glorious hero's fate foreſhew;
A hero's fallen whoſe death, more than a war
Or fire, deſerv'd a comet; th' obſequious ſtar
Could do no leſs, than his ſad fate unfold,
Who had their riſings or their ſettings told.
Some thought a plague, and ſome a famine near,
Some wars from France, ſome fires at home were fear'd.
Nor did they fear too much, ſcarce kinder fate,
But plague of plagues befel th' unhappy ſtate,
When Lilly died. Now ſwords may ſafely come
From France or Rome, Fanatics plot at home.
Now an unſeen and unſuſpected hand,
By guidance of ill ſtars may hurt our land,
Unſafe becauſe ſecure. There's none to ſhew
How England may avert the fatal blow.
He's dead, whoſe death the weeping clouds deplore,
I wiſh we did not owe to him that ſhower
Which long expected was, and might have ſtill
Expected been, had not our nation's ill
Drawn from the heavens a ſympathetic tear.
England has cauſe a ſecond drought to fear.
We have no ſecond Lilly who may die,
And by his death may make the heavens cry.
Then let your annals, Coley, want this day,
Think ev'ry year Leap-year, or if't muſt ſtay, Cloath it in black, let a ſad note ſtand by,
And ſtigmatize it to poſterity (2).

[C] He took a ſhare in the Popiſh controverſy.] Mr Wood, ſpeaking of the publication of Church Government, P. V. obſerves, that the zealous men of the Church of England, then in the Univerſity, perceiving that Mr Walker would cut their own throats at home (as they ſaid) were reſolved to anſwer whatever he publiſhed (3). In purſuance of this reſolution, extraordinary diligence was uſed by Dr Aldrich (4) and Mr afterwards Dr Atterbury, in executing that deſign, and in the ſame ſpirit Church Government, Part V. coming out, in May 1687, Mr Smalridge publiſhed his Animadverſions upon it, in June following; in the introduction to which, having mentioned the Anſwer of Dr Aldrich, he gives the following reaſons for his own undertaking this taſk. ' I ſhould not, ſays he, have thought myſelf obliged to anſwer the extravagant ſingularities of a private fancy, ſuch eſpecially as are not likely to do any miſchief to the public, and ſuch I eſteem the notions of this pamphlet, which is too perplexed for a common reader's underſtanding, and too ſophiſtical to impoſe upon the more intelligent. But conſidering the falſe and ſcandalous reports that are of late ſo induſtriouſly ſpread about the nation, as if Oxford converts came in by whole ſhoals, and all the Univerſity were juſt ready to declare [in favour of Popery]. I have juſt reaſon to believe that this pamphlet was deſignedly printed at Oxford to countenance thoſe reports, for no doubt the Popiſh preſſes were at the editor's ſervice. The ſecret is, theſe papers are to paſs, with unwary people, for a ſpecimen of the Univerſity's government; much ſuch a one indeed as the tile was, which Hierocles's ſcholars brought to market, for a ſample of the houſe he had to ſell. Now there are divers aggravations of this foul play, which make it yet more inſupportable; as where 'tis ſaid, Why is this queſtion now revived, which the members of our Church have of late ſo carefully declined, out of pure reſpect to thoſe ears, which, if it be poſſible, they are not willing to offend. Or why are we of the Univerſity attacked in our own quarters, and ſo defied to own a truth, that we can neither in honour nor honeſty decline an anſwer, tho' we are well aware with what deſign the ſcene of the Controverſy is laid in Oxford. Or how can we brook this uſage from our companions, our own familiar friends, with whom we have taken ſweet counſel together, and walked in the Houſe of God as friends (5).' This piece was publiſhed, as has been ſaid, in May (6), and how exactly our author, whoſe tract followed it in June, has kept to the ſame lore, appears from his epiſtle addreſſed to the Univerſity reader, where he obſerves, ' that the hopes of our enemies abroad have been entertained, and the ſollicitude of our friends awakened, by the news of our Oxford converts daily flocking into the boſom of the Romiſh Church. But we hope all men are by this time convinced, that they deſerve as little conſideration for their number, as they do regard for their accompliſhments. No one needs to be alarmed at the deſertion of ſix or ſeven members, who ſhall conſider their dependance on one, who, by the magazines which he had ſtored up againſt us, ſhews that he has not now firſt changed his complexion, but only dropped the vizor.' This is ſufficient for a ſample, for to trace him through every inſtance of the contraſt, would be to tranſcribe both. Mr Atterbury's piece followed eight Theſes laid down, and the Inferences deduced from them, in a Diſcourſe intituled, Church-Government, Part V. lately printed at Oxford [D]. Thus early did he diſtinguiſh himſelf in a point of ſo much ſerious ſtudy, as was the defence of his Prince's ſupremacy againſt the papal uſurpations, when urged to it by his regard for the honour of the univerſity. Neither did he fail of giving the higheſt entertainment to that elegant ſeat of the Muſes, by his admirable poetical talents, when a ſuitable occaſion invited him. The Muſæ Anglicanæ cannot boaſt a more exquiſite performance, than the Auctio Daviſiana of Mr Smalridge, publiſhed firſt in 1689, 4to. The ſame year, July 4th, he proceeded Maſter of Arts (f); not long after which, he entered into Holy Orders, and about the year 1692 was appointed Miniſter of Tothil-Fields-chapel, Weſtminſter (g). In 1693, he was collated to a Prebend in the church of Litchfield (b). In 1700, he took his Doctor's degree in Divinity (i), and frequently ſupplied the place of Dr Jane, then Regius-Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford, with great applauſe [E], 'till the Profeſſor's death in February followed in the beginning of Auguſt (7), in the preface to which the ſame particulars are touched upon, but in ſuch a taſte and manner as makes them his own. By this laſt piece there ſeems to have been a fourth perſon engag'd in the common deſign, whoſe part was the defence of the Reformation, as appears from theſe words of the author. 'In the defence of our Reformation to come, 'it will be found, that the Conſiderer is no good hiſto-'rian; the Reaſoner has proved him no good Catho-'lic; the Animadverter no good ſubject; and all toge-'ther no good Diſputant; ſo that I have no new ſide 'of him left to entertain the reader with.'

(7) It was intituled, A Vindication of the Spirit of Martin Luther, &c.

[D] Church Government, Part V.] The whole title runs thus: Church Government, Part V. A Relation of the Engliſh Reformation, and the Lawfulneſs thereof examined by the Theſes delivered in the four former Parts. But it ſeems theſe four had not been publiſhed. This was a very extraordinary myſtery, which lay fully open however to ridicule and raillery, and did not eſcape our Animadverter's notice. 'Nor is it, ſays he, any wonder, if that arguer does not convince, who uſes, for 'principles, concluſions drawn from premiſes which the 'world never ſaw, and then aſſumes ſuch things as every 'one acquainted with hiſtory is able to contradict. Certainly his Univerſity readers will not be very fond of 'the concluſion of that ſyllogiſm whoſe major propoſition is a petitio principii, and minor, a downright 'falſehood in matter of fact; they no doubt are ſurprized to find conſequents come before their antece-'dents, and Church Government, Part V. to have 'ſlipped into the world ſomewhat immaturely, me-'thinks, before the other four (8).' Mr Wood, who informs us (9), that this piece was wrote by Abraham Woodhead, and was the firſt that was printed at the preſs which Obadiah Walker had ſet up in the back part of his lodgings, as Maſter of Univerſity college, obſerves that it had the print of King Alfred cut in a wooden border prefixed to the title. So minute a particular appears to be trifling and contemptible at firſt ſight, but upon looking into the book will be found very pertinent. The Antiquary therein apparently had his eye upon that part of our young animadverter's piece, where he urges the editor with the authority of Mr Spelman's book de Vita Ælfridi, written as he obſerves by the author in Engliſh, but publiſhed in Latin by the Maſter of Univerſity college in Oxford, in the name of the Alumni of that ſociety. This author, ſpeaking of the laws made by King Ælfred in cauſes eccleſiaſtical, makes the following inference from them. Theſe laws do therefore deſerve our particular obſervation, becauſe from them it is evident that the Saxon Kings, Ælfred and Edward, were of opinion that they had a ſupremacy as well over eccleſiaſtical perſons as laymen, and that the Church which was within their dominions, was not out of their juriſdiction, or ſubject to a foreign power, and exempted from the laws of their country, as Becket, Anſelm, and others afterwards, fiercely contended (10). Again, from King Alfred's laws it is evident, either that the Roman ſupremacy was not yet riſen to that height as in after-ages, ſo as to leſſen the juriſdiction of Chriſtian Princes, or if it was, yet King Alfred did not ſubject himſelf ſo far to it (11). Nay, ſo far was King Alfred from paying any ſuch ſubjection, that we are told he found out a way to ruin and deſtroy that univerſal empire which the Romaniſts in thoſe dark ages had newly founded, and were haſtening to finiſh, which is ſpoken in reference to his reſtoring the ſecond commandment expunged out of the decalogue according to the canons of the ſecond Nicene council (12). From which one inſtance it is plain, that, contrary to the pretenſions of our author, King Edward the Sixth was not the firſt that took upon him to reform liturgies. Mr Smalridge concludes thus, 'Theſe paſſages cited I take to be ſome 'of the perperam ſcripta which the publiſher of that life 'mentions in the preface (13). And accordingly we 'find that whatever is advanced againſt the papal au-'thority in the text, is qualified in the comment; and 'it is plain that King Alfred was a greater adverſary 'to the power of the Pope, than his Alumnus, the Anotator. So that it is matter of great ſurprize to 'find him appear in the frontiſpiece of this treatiſe of 'Church Government, who was ſo great an enemy to 'the anti-regal deſigns of it.'

May 6, 1706, he preſented the famous Dr Grabe, with this elegant ſpeech.

He had now long been diſtinguiſhed by his diſcourſes from the pulpit; and in conſequence thereof, on the twenty-ninth of January 1707-8, he was choſen Lecturer of St Dunſtan's in the Weſt (k), London. He had entered very early into an intimacy with Dr Francis Atterbury at ſchool; and this, by a concurrence of ſentiments and ſtudies, afterwards grew into the moſt ſincere and hearty friendſhip; of which he gave an illuſtrious proof in 1710, when being a Member of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation, he ſteadily promoted his friend's advancement to the Prolocutor's chair, and preſented him to the Houſe on that occaſion in a remarkable elegantly turned panegyric (l) [G]. [F] He yielded to the tide of party, &c.] We have already ſhewn (14), that the carrying of this matter againſt our author, was made a point by the Duke of of Marlborough and his Ducheſs alſo, at the head of the Whigs *. The Ducheſs expreſsly tells us, that Dr Smalridge was put up by the Tories, a blot it ſeems that entirely obliterated all his pretenſions to a right of expectation ſuperior to his competitor, by having ſupplied the place many years with great applauſe, as Deputy to Dr Jane, which in reality was ſo far from being now of any ſervice to him, that it even help'd to aggravate his crime, the memory of Dr Jane being particularly odious to the Whigs at this time on many accounts, as will appear from the following ſketch of his life. This Gentleman was ſon of Joſeph Jane of Leſkard in Cornwall, Eſq; Member for that borough in the long Parliament under Charles the Firſt, but upon their violent proceedings againſt his Majeſty, he retired to Oxford, ſat in the Parliament there in 1643, and was one of the Commiſſioners in Cornwall for the King the following year (15). Upon the decline of his Majeſty's affairs, he was a great ſufferer, compounded, as is thought, for his eſtate, and went abroad, where he wrote ΕΙΚΩΝ ΑΚΛΑΣΤΟΣ, or, the Image unbroken, A Perſpective of the impudence, falſehood, vanity, and prophaneneſs, publiſhed in a Libel, intituled ΕΙΚΟΝΑΚΛΑΣΤΗΣ againſt ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ; printed in 1651, in a ſmall character 4to. His ſon Dr William Jane was born at Leſkard about the year 1644, and, being bred at Weſtminſter-ſchool, was thence elected ſtudent of Chriſt Church College, Oxford, in 1660; proceeding regularly to take his degrees in arts, he entered into holy orders, became Lecturer of Carfax church in Oxford, Chaplain to Dr Compton, Biſhop of London (16), Prebendary of St Paul's, Bachelor of Divinity in 1674, and inſtalled Canon of Chriſt Church in 1678. The following year he proceeded Doctor of Divinity as a Compounder, and on the 19th of May, 1680 was admitted Regius Profeſſor of Divinity. In 1685, he was nominated, by King James the Second, Dean of Glouceſter (17), with which he held the Precentorſhip of Exeter (18). Upon the arrival of the Prince of Orange at Hungerford, in his march to London, he was one of the four Delegates ſent by the Univerſity of Oxford, to offer his Highneſs their plate, which, though refuſed by the Prince, yet the Doctor took that opportunity of aſking for the biſhopric of Exeter, void by the tranſlation of Dr Lamplugh to the ſee of York, but was prevented by a promiſe before made of Exeter to Dr Trelawney, Biſhop of Briſtol (19). However, Mr Wood tells (20), us he was made Chaplain to King William, and it is certain was one of the Commiſſioners appointed on the 13th of September 1689, by his Majeſty, to review the Liturgy in order to a Comprehenſion, tho' he never ſat in it; and November 21 following, he was elected Prolocutor of the lower Houſe of Convocation againſt Dr (afterwards Archbiſhop) Tillotſon, then Dean of St Paul's (21). It was ſaid that he was much diſguſted at the ill ſucceſs of his application for a biſhopric, and ranged among the malecontents of King William's reign (22). However that be, it is certain that he lived ſome years after Queen Anne's acceſſion to the throne without being advanced higher in the Church, dying on the 5th of February, 1706 7 (23). Mr Wood gives us the titles of two ſermons of his, beſides thoſe already mentioned in print, all in 4to As alſo another piece intituled, The preſent Separation ſelf-condemned and proved to be Schiſm, &c. London 1678, 4to. He is the ſuppoſed author of A Letter to a Friend, containing ſome Queries about the new Commiſſion for making Alterations in the Liturgy, Canons, &c. of the Church of England, publiſhed in October 1689, in a ſingle ſheet 4to. He is likewiſe ſaid to have viewed before it went to the preſs, and made ſome corrections in a piece of Abraham Woodhead, intituled, An hiſtorical Narration of the Life and Death of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, &c. Oxon, 1685, 4to. publiſhed by Obadiah Walker, who ſtruck out Dr Jane's corrections when it was in the preſs (24). Dr Jane is charged moreover with having a chief hand in penning the Judgment and Decree of the Univerſity of Oxford, paſſed in that Convocation in July 1683, then preſented to and approved by King Charles II, but burnt by the hangman in purſuance of an order of the Houſe of Lords, in 1710 (25).

[G] In an elegant panegyric.] Having repreſented his friend as a perſon fit for the poſt in every reſpect, he begins with his character as a ſcholar; in which reſpect he recommends him to their choice as one that was a ſtranger in no branch of literature; had been long and ſucceſsfully exerciſed in moſt arts and ſciences, and was moſt accompliſhed and perfect in the moſt perfect kinds of learning: Vir in nullo literarum genere hoſpes in pleriſque artibus & ſtudiis diu et feliciter exercitatus, in maxime perfectis literarum diſciplinis perfectiſſimus. He then proceeds to his conduct in controverſy, a delicate point, and it is touched with a delicate hand, duely balanced between his friend's honour, and his own integrity. He allows him to have been too ſevere in treating his antagoniſt; but alledges, that this was not to be imputed to any principle of ill-nature, envy, or pride, but to a temper of itſelf too warm, or perhaps to a degree of paſſion, eaſily pardonable in a ſoldier, who fought for every thing that was dear to him, in a ſon endeavouring to reſcue his mother from injury and violence. But, adds he, if there be a greater number of excellencies in his writings; if he has treated of ſubjects alſo firm in the ſame connexions the following years, but without ſuffering himſelf to be drawn into the violence and rage of party diſputes, either upon State or Church ſubjects [H]. In this amiable diſpoſition of purſuing mild and perſuaſive methods, he entertained a friendly correſpondence with Dr Samuel Clarke and Mr Whiſton [I]; and was very ſerviceable in moderating the heat of the proceedings in Convocation againſt them [K]. In the ſame ſpirit he propoſed a conference with the former upon the ſubject of the Trinity, which was accordingly held at the ſeat of Thomas Cartwright, Eſq; of Aynho, in Northamptonſhire, about the year 1712 [L]. But, however commendable ſo peaceful a conduct jects in themſelves arduous, uſeful, and agreeable; if he has confirmed them with the ſtrongeſt arguments; if he has preſſed them upon the minds of his readers, by a pure and perſpicuous ſtile: it is reaſonable that he ſhould receive the applauſe due to learning, from men of letters; from the eloquent, the honour due to eloquence; *Si quid forte aſperius, ſi quid ardentius, ſi quid liberius effuderit, Lector paulo humanior, id non odio, non livori, nec arrogantiæ, tribuet; ſed aut ingenio ſuapte natura aliquantulum prefervido, aut fortaſſe iracundiæ, in milite pro aris focisque acriter dimicante, in filio ab injuria et vi matrem ſuam eripiente, facile ignoſcendæ. [H] Without the rage of party diſputes] For this we have the authority of the famous Sir Richard Steele, who cannot be ſuſpected of partiality to him. We find that juſtly admired writer, thus deſcribing Dr Smalridge in the Tatler (26), under the feigned name of Favonius. He introduces it according to the affecting turn and manner of thoſe papers, by an account of a viſit he made to a friend of his, a Lady of great worth, who lay then on her death-bed. 'At the door I met 'Favonius, not without a ſecret ſatisfaction to find, 'that he had been there. I had formerly converſed 'with him at this houſe; and as he abounds with that 'ſort of virtue and knowledge, which makes religion 'beautiful, and never turns the diſcourſe into the vio- 'lence and rage of party diſputes, I liſtned to him with 'great pleaſure. The diſcourſe chanced to be upon 'the ſubject of death, which he treated with ſuch a 'ſtrength of reaſon, and greatneſs of ſoul, that inſtead 'of being terrible, it appeared to a mind rightly cultivated altogether to be contemned, or rather to be 'deſired. As I met him at the door, ſo I ſaw in his 'face, a certain glowing of grief and humanity, heightned with an air of fortitude and reſolution; which, as 'I afterwards found, had had ſuch an irreſiſtible force, 'as to ſuſpend the pains of the dying perſon, and the 'lamentations of the neareſt friends, who attended 'her.'

(26) No. 110. In the preface to the 4th volume, he expreſsly tells us, that Favonius is intended for Dr Smalridge.

[I] He held a fair correſpondence with Dr Samuel Clarke and Mr Whiſton.] The latter of theſe, in his Hiſtorical Memoirs of the former, tells us (27), that his acquaintance with Dr Smalridge commenced about the ſame time as it did with Dr Clarke, that is, about the year 1697. How ſoon our author became acquainted with Dr Clarke, is not certain, but it muſt have been ſome time before the year 1709; when Mr Whiſton having tranſlated the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions into Engliſh, deſired Dr Clarke to reviſe it; who having done ſo, and corrected the whole, finding about ten or twelve places, which he heſitated about, recommended it to the tranſlator, to go to their great and common friend Dr Smalridge, (they are Mr Whiſton's words) for the laſt correction of the more difficult places; who accordingly examined and corrected the verſion in every one of thoſe places. Mr Whiſton further informs us here, that in the advertiſement to the firſt volume of his Primitive Chriſtianity revived, where this fact is mentioned without naming the two perſons, Dr Smalridge is underſtood by a very learned and judicious perſon. He alſo intimates afterwards (28), that all the four volumes of the laſt-mentioned book, were communicated to our author before they were printed, and expreſsly declares, that upon committing his fourth volume to him, he was pleaſed to peruſe it with great care, 'and confeſſed, ſays Mr Whiſton, that I had 'therein acted very uprightly, and that my quotations 'were fair and juſt; and that whereas a friend of his had 'ſuggeſted to him, that he thought ſome paſſages were 'omitted in antiquity, that ſeemed to make againſt 'me; he upon comparing, found that I had not omitted them, but that they were all in my papers.'

[K] He was ſerviceable in moderating the heat of the proceedings in Convocation againſt them] We ſhall begin according to the order of time, with Mr Whiſton, who informs us, that about the ſame time that Dr Smalridge had his manuſcript papers [of Primitive Chriſtianity revived] he once went down to him [at Weſtminſter] and deſired him to go with him to the Archbiſhop of York, Dr Sharp, in order to try whether they could not find out ſome way for a fair examination of his papers before they were printed; 'which, ſays Mr Whiſton, I earneſtly endeavoured.' He replied, 'that there was nothing to be ſaid againſt 'examination, nothing to be ſaid againſt it; and, 'accordingly, he went along with me to the Arch-'biſhop's houſe in Petty-France, Weſtminſter, im-'mediatly. But the Archbiſhop not happening to 'be at home, there were no further ſteps taken at 'that time (29).' After Mr Whiſton's affair came before the Convocation, Dr Smalridge, being appointed one of the committee for that purpoſe, was not wanting to give intimations of his good intentions towards his deliverance, by declaring openly, upon the reading of his letter to the Convocation, in that committee, that it would be harder to come at him now than before; and, by declaring openly, in Convocation, againſt the current of the Houſe (30), that it was his private opinion, that he ſhould be heard before he was cenſured. With regard to Dr Clarke, the ſame hand informs us, that Dr Smalridge, then a Biſhop, and in the Upper-Houſe, dropped ſome words before-hand, that as to other of Dr Clarke's metaphyſical notions about the Trinity, he did not think it neceſſary to proceed to their condemnation; provided he would but truly declare he believed the real eternity of the Son of God. That as the Biſhop's opinion was chiefly regarded by that Houſe, ſo Mr Whiſton thought it had great weight with Dr Clarke, in inducing him to draw up that declaration of his opinion, which he had laid before the Biſhops, on the ſecond of July, 1714. The firſt article of which runs thus: 'My opinion is, that the Son of God 'was eternally begotten by the eternal, incompre- 'henſible, power and will of the Father; and that 'the Holy Spirit was likewiſe eternally derived from 'the Father, by or through the Son, according to the 'eternal, incomprehenſible, power and will of the 'Father.' Which produced a reſolution in that Houſe to proceed no farther upon the extract laid before them by the Lower-Houſe; ſo that, concludes Mr Whiſton, as Dr Smalridge in ſome meaſure aſſiſted my eſcape from that Convocation. ſo was Biſhop Smalridge the principal occaſion of Dr Clarke's eſcape from the other (31).

(30) Ibid. p. 56.

(31) Ibid. from p. 56 to 65.

[L] A diſpute about the Trinity with Dr Clarke, &c.] Mr Whiſton, who is ſtill our informer, tells us, that the conference was propoſed by our author in order to the conviction of Dr Clarke; and, continues he, if any perſon was able to convince upon that head, it muſt have been Dr Smalridge, who had fully conſidered my fourth volume, and was a thorough maſter of thoſe original books of Chriſtianity whence the arguments were to be taken, and who wanted no ſagacity or good will to enforce them. However adds he, the Doctor failed of ſucceſs; and, on the contrary, the company were generally ſatisfied, the evidence on Dr Clarke's ſide was greatly ſuperior to the other (32). Now granting this to be a fair repreſentation of the iſſue of this diſpute; our author's reputation is in no danger of being hurt by it, when it is conſidered who made up the generality of this company, probably Mr Waſs, then Rector of the pariſh, and Mr Cartwright's chaplain, and Mrs Cartwright, who we are aſſured was never abſent nor unconcerned at ſuch conferences, both of them prejudiced

(32) Ibid. p. 51.

a conduct might be in the eyes of all the ſober part Chriſtians, yet there were not wanting thoſe who took great offence at it, and ſome of theſe even carried their reſentments ſo far as to charge him with leaning towards Arianiſm [M], inſomuch, that a little before his death he was brought under a neceſſity of vindicating himſelf from that calumny [N]. In judiced greatly in favour of Dr Clarke's notions; and as to the Doctor himſelf 'tis well known how utterly inconvincible he was, maintaining his doctrine to the laſt, againſt all conviction.

[M] He was charged of leaning towards Arianiſm.] Mr Whiſton was apparently a great means of bringing him under this character, ſince he every where repreſents him, throughout his memoirs of Dr Clarke, in this light; upon too fond a deſire to have one, whom he looked on as the moſt excellent man in the nation, of his ſide. The ſtrongeſt proof he offers for his conjecture, is ſeen at the concluſion of his account of the juſt mentioned conference at Aynho; which, after declaring the allowed ſuperiority of Dr Clarke's evidence, runs thus: 'And whether 'Dr Smalridge did not himſelf ſomething feel it, 'I cannot certainly tell. So far I think will appear 'hereafter, that excepting his condemnation of the 'groſs Arians, whom neither Dr Clarke nor I ever 'ſupported, he after this choſe rather to refer to 'others, who had managed the Athanaſian cauſe, 'than ever to enter directly into it's vindication. 'Nor did he eſcape the ſuſpicion of being himſelf 'inclinable to what has been of late called Arianiſm, (33) Ibid. p. 52. 'eſpecially at Oxford, as will hereafter appear (33).' By theſe laſt words, Mr Whiſton refers to a poſtſcript at the end of theſe Memoirs; where he tells us, that when in his ſecond appendix to the Hiſtorical Preface, p. 33, 34, 35, he ſaid, that propoſition from the Upper-Houſe of Convocation, which condemns, as hereſy, his affirming, that the one God of the Chriſtians was not the three Perſons taken together, but God the Father only, was owned not to be heretical by more than one of the Lower-Houſe, he meant by Dr Smalridge and Dr Cannon; and agreable to this, we are afterwards told, that when his firſt volume of Primitive Chriſtianity revived had been peruſed by Dr Smalridge, he confeſſed to Mr Whiſton, that he had proved, that ſo far as our preſent records go, the Holy Ghoſt was not called God, nor invocated in the three firſt centuries; though he thought Baſil had given good reaſons, why we might venture farther. Our author's ſentiments of this performance of Mr Whiſton's, he frankly declared, in the following moſt friendly letter to himſelf.

'Sir,

'I did not ſend for the books ſooner, becauſe 'I had rather have them bound than in ſheets. 'I pray God the publication of them may not do that 'diſſervice to our holy religion, which I am perſuaded 'you are far from intending. It ſeems to me much 'more likely, that unbelievers ſhould thereby be 'ſtrengthened in their infidelity, than that thoſe 'whom you ſuppoſe miſtaken, ſhould be induced to 'reform the opinions which you take to be erroneous. 'There is one ſuffrage in our Liturgy in which you 'will heartily join with us, That it may pleaſe God 'to bring into the way of truth all ſuch as have erred 'and are deceived. This is the prayer of

'Your faithful friend,

Nov. 22, 1711. 'and ſervant,

'George Smalridge (*).

* Ibid. p. 138.

Again, ſays Mr Whiſton, 'ſome time after the 'publication of the then Biſhop of Bangor's famous 'ſermon, and about the time of the publication of 'my Scripture Politicks, I waited upon Biſhop 'Smalridge; and, among other things, deſired, that 'his Lordſhip, of whom both parties had ſo good an 'opinion, would do ſomething to bring us out of 'that diſorder in which we then were; and particularly, that he would pleaſe to write a little book, to 'recommend a fair and impartial review of Chriſtian 'Antiquity to the world, in order to the correction 'of ſuch errors and practices as might have crept 'into the Church, ſince the firſt ſettlement of Chriſtianity, which recommendation would, I believed, 'have a very good effect. His Lordſhip's anſwer, 'as near as I can remember the words, and that with 'great emotion of mind, was this: Mr Whiſton, 'I dare not examine; I dare not examine; for if 'we ſhould examine and find that you are in the 'right, the Church has then been in an error ſo 'many hundred years; yet, as Mr Whiſton concludes, 'when I aſked him how he could ſay ſo and ſtill 'be a Proteſtant; he replied, Yes, he could (34).' (34) Ibid. p. 140, 141, 142. Thus we ſee how ill the parts of this ſtory hang together; and ſuch traſh would not have found a place here, but as it gives an opportunity of ſatisfying ſuch as perhaps may be unacquainted with that odious part of Mr Whiſton's conduct, in retailing and miſrepreſenting private converſation in favour of his own principles; a moſt miſchievous kind of falſeneſs and treachery, of which no man was univerſally eſteemed leſs capable than he, at the time when theſe tales, concerning Dr Smalridge, have their date; and, conſequently, no man more capable of doing miſchief by them. For which reaſon, it will not appear incredible, that he was a great means of bringing the ſuſpicion of Arianiſm upon the Biſhop; which, however, in the iſſue turned to his advantage, as will be ſeen in the following remark.

[N] Under a neceſſity of vindicating himſelf from that calumny.] To ſet this part of our author's life in a full light, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that in 1719, there was a deſign among the Anti-Athanaſians, as they called themſelves, to petition the Parliament for a legal Toleration. Dr Clarke was conſulted, and approved the deſign, and Mr Whiſton was the chief promoter of it. Upon this occaſion, a paper was drawn up and printed in order to be diſtributed to the Members of Parliament, to the following purport:

'Whereas, in an Act of Parliament, 1. Gul. & 'Mary, for the exempting Proteſtant Diſſenters, &c. 'from diverſe penalties, &c. there are ſeveral re'ſtrictions and limitations, by which many of his 'Majeſty's peaceable Proteſtant ſubjects are ſtill left 'incapable of receiving the benefit of ſuch exemption, '&c. Therefore, for the quieting the minds of all 'ſuch his Majeſty's good Proteſtant ſubjects; be it 'enacted, &c. That every Proteſtant Diſſenter from 'the Church of England by law eſtabliſhed, who 'ſhall make and ſubſcribe the declaration againſt 'Popery, and take the oaths in the ſaid Act men'tioned; and who ſhall, inſtead of any other decla- (35) N. B. No preachers or teachers, except Quakers, are at preſent tolerated by Law in England, without ſubſcribing the Ift, IId, Vth, VIIIth, IXth, XIIth, and XVIIth, of the XXXIX Articles of Religion. 'rations and ſubſcriptions therein required, declare 'and ſubſcribe his unfeigned aſſent to, and his belief 'of, the Holy Chriſtian religion, as contained in the 'ſcriptures of the Old and New Teſtament, and in 'the Creed, commonly called the Apoſtle's Creed, 'ſhall have the full benefit of the ſaid exemptions, 'as if he had made all the declarations and ſubſcrip'tions therein hitherto required; any thing in the 'aforeſaid Act, or in any other Act, to the contrary 'in any wiſe notwithſtanding (35).'

This attempt, though abortive, yet made a very great noiſe, and being particularly diſguſtful to the generality of the Clergy, who were moſt zealous for preſerving the preſent eſtabliſhment unaltered, in this reſpect, ſome of theſe judging, that ſuch a bold attempt could not be thought of without ſome particular encouragement, were prompted to look whence it might poſſibly come, and in that humour preſently caſt their eyes upon Biſhop Smalridge, who, it was well known, had often expreſſed a good opinion of Dr Clarke and Mr Whiſton, eſpecially as to the piety and uprightneſs of their intentions for the ſervice of religion, and frequently declared his diſlike of all violent meaſures againſt them. Theſe murmurings reaching the ears of Sir Jonathan Trelawny, then Biſhop of Wincheſter, who had a great reſpect for his brother of Briſtol, his Lordſhip took the liberty of acquainting him with them: in anſwer to whom, Biſhop Smalridge wrote the following remarkable vindication of himſelf, in a letter to that friend, dated from Chriſt-Church in Oxford, September 23, 1719.

'My

In 1711, he preached his farewel ſermon at St Dunſtan's (m), upon the reſignation of that Lecture-ſhip [O], being made Canon of Chriſt-church in Oxford, into which he was inſtalled the fourth of September that year. Dr Atterbury was made Dean of that church the ſame day; and reſigning the Deanery of Carliſle, Dr Smalridge ſucceeded him in that dignity, into which he was admitted on the third of November, and inſtalled by proxy on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month. Upon the promotion of this friend to the Deanery of Weſtminſter and Biſhopric of Rocheſter, he ſucceeded him alſo as Dean of Chriſt-church, into which he was admitted on the eleventh of July 1713. To this Deanery, upon the tranſlation of Dr John Robinſon to the See of London, was added that of Briſtol, of which Dr Smalridge was conſecrated Biſhop, the fourth of April 1714; and her Majeſty appointed him her Lord-Almoner ſoon after (n). In this poſt he likewiſe ſerved her ſucceſſor, King George the Firſt, the firſt Chriſtmas after his Acceſſion to the Throne (o). But ſtill preſerving that benevolent principle which conſtantly directed his conduct in all public affairs, never to join in the exaſperating meaſures of any party, he became diſagreeable to the Miniſtry, by refuſing to ſign the Declaration, which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſome other Biſhops, then in and about London, had drawn up on occaſion of the rebellion in 1715 [P]; and ſoon after was (o) See his letter to Biſhop Trelawney, in remark [N].

'My very good Lord,

'Among the many proofs your Lordſhip has given 'me of your favour and friendſhip to me, none could 'be greater or more obliging than the generous con- 'cern you have ſhewn for my injured reputation; 'and I am very much ſurprized to hear that I ſhould 'be ſuſpected of Arianiſm, having never given, as 'I know of, the leaſt ground for ſuch ſuſpicion. 'I have, from the chair (while I ſupplied Dr Jane's 'place) from the pulpit; when I have preached at 'the New Chapel [in Tothil-fields, Weſtminſter]; 'and here at Oxford, on Chriſtmas day was twelve 'month; and on the ſame day at Court, when I was 'Almoner, the firſt Chriſtmas after the King's 'acceſſion; and in Convocation, when a cenſure 'paſt on Mr Whiſton's doctrines, (whilſt I was 'preſbyter and a member of the Lower-Houſe); and 'upon all other proper occaſions expreſſed my ſenti- 'ments about the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour, 'in oppoſition both to the Socinians and Arians. 'I did on Sunday laſt ordain ſome clergymen, and 'I examined them particularly as to the points con- 'troverted betwixt the Catholic Church and the 'Arians, and ſaid what to me ſeemed proper to con- 'firm them in the Catholic faith, and to arm them 'againſt the objections uſually brought by the Arians. 'I have read over more than once, and, as well as 'I was able, have conſidered Dr Waterland's late book, 'and have in converſation ſignified my approbation of 'it, and recommended it to my friends as a ſubſtantial 'vindication of the received doctrines and confutation 'of Arianiſm.

'Trelawney, Nov. 16, 1719.

'This is a true copy of part of the Biſhop of 'Briſtol's letter to me; and without going deeper 'into it, is a ſufficient vindication of him from the 'damnable but thriving hereſy of Arianiſm.

'Witneſs my hand,

'Jonathan Trelawney.'

(36) Memoirs of Dr Clarke, p. 138, 139.

Mr Whiſton, from whom we tranſcribe this (36), makes the following extraordinary remark upon it: N. B Whether Biſhop Smalridge meant by Arianiſm the Euſebian doctrine, of late revived, is not here expreſsly ſaid. He muſt mean not explicitly or in totidem verbis, for ſurely, the Biſhop's approbation and recommendation of Dr Waterland's book, as a confutation of Arianiſm, is clearly expreſſive of that meaning; but Mr Whiſton was reſolved not to ſee that meaning. A prejudice ſo obſtinately blind is enough to make us read with caution, what he tells us afterwards he had from the Earl of Nottingham; viz. that in the other part of this letter, ſuppreſſed by the Biſhop of Wincheſter, his friend, Biſhop Smalridge, declared, the regard he had for ſome perſons not of the Athanaſian opinion; and his little approbation of at leaſt the damnatory clauſes in the Athanaſian Creed; as alſo, this other N. B. That our Biſhop ſeemed always to him [Mr Whiſton] ready enough to give up the Athanaſian creed; only he loved to put it upon another foot, ſays Whiſton, than I ſhould have done; I mean, that it ſhould be given up to the clamours of the Diſſenters, who ſtill made it's damnatory ſentences an argument againſt Conformity to the Church of England. This, however, is much leſs incredible than what follows: 'I was alſo informed, continues this bigotted Anti-Athanaſian, by an eye-witneſs, Sir Robert Clarke, that when he was once at Briſtol cathedral on an Athanaſian-Creed day; and not believing that Creed himſelf, had nothing elſe to do but to watch Biſhop Smalridge's behaviour; he took notice, that he did not repeat that creed any more than himſelf (37).' This carries an inſinuation ſo injurious to the Biſhop, and ſo utterly inconſiſtent with his conſtant behaviour at divine ſervice at Oxford, where he made it his particular care to join with a full and audible voice in every part of the ſervice requiring it, and often complained of a bad cuſtom that had crept into the univerſity, of not joining in the pſalmody, (there being only a ſermon beſides) under a pretence of being more moved by liſtning to the ſweet performance of the choriſters in that part of the duty (38); that no excuſe can be made for it.

(37) Ibid. p. 140.

(38) From my own knowledge.

[O] His farewel ſermon at St Dunſtan's, &c.] This ſermon was printed together with eleven more, by himſelf, in 1717, 8vo. and the volume is not ſcarce; yet there is one paſſage in it which it would be a kind of injury to the pariſh as well as to his memory, if this opportunity of doing juſtice to both was neglected. In the concluſion of his diſcourſe, he addreſſes himſelf to the inhabitants thus: 'And now, my dearly 'beloved brethren, I moſt earneſtly beſeech you to 'call to remembrance all the diſſauſives from impiety 'and ſin, all the exhortations to holineſs and virtue, 'which I have, through the courſe of my miniſtry, 'with much weakneſs and infirmity, but with an 'honeſt mind and a hearty concern for your eternal 'welfare, made unto you. That having by your 'own free choice ſet me to be your watchman, you 'would hearken to this laſt voice of the trumpet, this 'plain, this repeated, this final, declaration of one, 'who ſincerely loves and regards you, and who has 'all the teſtimonies he could wiſh, more than he 'could expect, of affection and eſteem from you, have 'it's due weight.'

[P] He refuſed to ſign the Declaration, &c. 1715.] The paſſage in that Declaration which he excepted to was this, 'We are the more concerned that both the 'Clergy and People of our communion ſhould ſhew 'themſelves hearty friends to the Government, on this 'occaſion, to vindicate the honour of the Church of 'England, becauſe the chief hopes of our enemies 'ſeem to ariſe from diſcontents, artificially raiſed 'amongſt us; and becauſe ſome who have val ed 'themſelves, and been too much valued by others for 'a pretended zeal, have joined with Papiſts in theſe 'wicked attempts, which as they muſt ruin the Church 'if they ſucceed, ſo they cannot well end without 'great reproach to it, if the reſt do not clearly and 'heartily declare our deteſtation of ſuch practices.' This, he thought, was an unjuſt and invidious party-reflection upon ſome, whoſe loyalty was unqueſtionable. It has been ſaid, that he was perſuaded to take this ſtep by Biſhop Atterbury; but it is manifeſtly agreeable to his own principles and judgment. Though very probably they might act in concert upon this intereſting affair, was removed from the Almoner's place (p). However, it was not long before his true merit was particularly marked by her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, with whom he continued from that time in high favour 'till his death, which was occaſioned by an apoplexy, on the twenty-ſeventh of September 1719, to the affair, as they always lived in the cloſeſt communication of counſels and friendſhip in points which nearly concerned either of them. The following letter is a conſpicuous inſtance of this intimacy, in regard to Dr Atterbury's diſpute with Hoadley, and is no leſs remarkable in it's contents.

To the Reverend Dr Smalridge.

'Dear George,

'I happened about a fortnight ago to dine with 'Mrs Aſtel. She ſpoke to me of my ſermon (39), 'and deſired me to print it; and after I had given 'her the proper anſwers, hinted to me, that ſhe 'would be glad of peruſing it. I complied with her, 'and ſent her the ſermon next day. Yeſternight ſhe 'returned it, with this ſheet of remarks, which I can 'not forbear communicating to you, becauſe I take 'them to be of an extraordinary nature, conſidering 'they come from the pen of a woman. Indeed, one 'would not imagine a woman had written them. 'There is not an expreſſion that carries the leaſt air 'of her ſex from the beginning to the end of it. She 'attacks me very home, you ſee, and artfully enough, 'under a pretence of taking my part againſt other 'Divines, who are in Hoadley's meaſures. Had ſhe 'as much good breeding as good ſenſe, ſhe would be 'perfect. But ſhe has not the moſt decent manner 'of inſinuating what ſhe means, but is now and then 'a little offenſive and ſhocking in her expreſſions; 'which I wonder at, becauſe a civil turn of words '(even where the matter is not pleaſing) is what her 'ſex is always miſtreſs of: ſhe, I think, is wanting in 'it: but her ſenſible and rational way of writing 'makes amends for that defect, if indeed any thing 'can make amends for it. I dread to engage her, 'and leave the reſt to an oral conference. Her way 'of ſolving the difficulty about ſwearing to the Queen 'is ſomewhat ſingular. You'll bring this with you 'to Henry Bridges's to-morrow. Perhaps I may call 'upon you between twelve and one, in order to our 'going thither together; if I were ſure of your being 'at home, I would. But if I do, and find you are 'abroad, there is no inconvenience in it. I can 'follow you alone.

Friday noon. 'Your's, adieu.'

(39) Apparently that ſermon preached before the Sons of the Clergy, againſt Hoadley's meaſures of Submiſſion.

By the way, the Biſhop's cenſure of Mrs Aſtel's rude way of expreſſing herſelf has happened to give much offence to the writer of her life (40), who has ranked her among the chief heroines of the three kingdoms; and, therefore, according to the general rule of ſuch undertakers, who think it their buſineſs to aſſume the character of a Champion Knight, to defend their heroine's ſpotleſs worth againſt all oppoſers, will by no means allow her to be capable of ſuch a defect; and even ſcruples not to retort the reflection upon the Biſhop. So redoubted a champion, who enters the liſts in defence of his miſtreſs, profeſſedly without knowing any thing of the particulars upon which the juſtice of her cauſe depends, needs not fear having any opponent. However, as Mrs Aſtel was undoubtedly an ornament to her ſex, and has been mentioned as ſuch before in the courſe of this work (41), the reader will naturally have a curioſity to know ſomething more of her, which he may take as follows: She was born about the year 1668, at Newcaſtle in Northumberland, where her father, being a merchant, took care to give her a genteel education. Among other accompliſhments, ſhe was taught the French language, but having an uncommon bent and genius for literature, ſhe afterwards learned Latin without a maſter. This being obſerved by an uncle, who was a clergyman, he undertook to be her preceptor, and by the help of his inſtructions ſhe made a conſiderable progreſs in Philoſophy and Mathematics as well as the language. With this foundation, at the age of twenty, ſhe left Newcaſtle, and went to London; where, and at Chelſey, ſhe ſpent the remaining part of her life; proſecuting her ſtudies very aſſiduouſly; ſo that, in a little time, ſhe made great acquiſitions in the forementioned ſciences; and turned over the beſt heathen moraliſts, and made herſelf miſtreſs particularly of Xenophon, Plato, Hierocles, Tully, Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Antoninus. Being now ſenſible of her own talents for learning, and feeling the advantage of it, in regard to the world's eſteem, ſhe ambitioned to raiſe the whole ſex above their ordinary level, and endeavoured to inflame their minds with an ardor for knowledge as well as religion. In this view, ſhe firſt publiſhed A ſerious propoſal to the Ladies for the advancement of their true and greateſt intereſt; to which ſhe added, ſome time after, A ſerious propoſal, &c. the ſecond part; wherein a method is offered for the improvement of their minds. Theſe books wrought ſo far upon a certain great lady, that ſhe had a deſign to give ten thouſand pounds towards erecting a ſort of college for the education and improvement of the female ſex. But the matter coming unluckily to the ears of Dr Burnet, he immediately went to the lady, and ſo powerfully remonſtrated againſt it, telling her, it would look like preparing a way for the Popiſh religious orders, and would be reputed a nunnery, &c. that he intirely fruſtrated that noble deſign (42). We have already mentioned, under Mr Norris's article, her letters to him concerning the love of God, wrote in 1695, which were firſt occaſioned by her meeting with his peculiar notions upon that ſubject in his Practical Diſcourſes upon various Subjects. In 1696, ſhe publiſhed An Eſſay in defence of the female ſex, in a letter to a Lady, written by a Lady. This is a witty piece, and was reprinted ſoon after. In 1700, ſhe publiſhed Reflections upon Marriage; in which ſhe is thought to carry the birth-right and privileges of her ſex a little too far. But in her excuſe, this piece is ſaid to derive it's birth from a diſappointment which ſhe met with in a marriage, not long before ſhe undertook it; and as it did not pleaſe ſome nice palates, ſhe printed a ſecond edition, with this title, Reflexions upon Marriage: To which is added, A preface, in anſwer to ſome objections, Lond. 1705, 8vo. As ſhe was a great enemy to the ſectaries, ſhe took up the cudgels againſt Davenant's Moderation a Virtue, &c. And his Eſſays on Peace and War; in anſwer to which ſhe wrote Moderation truly ſtated; in a review of a late pamphlet entituled, Moderation a Virtue: or, The occaſional Conformiſt juſtified from the imputation of Hypocriſy; wherein this juſtification is further conſidered; and, as far as is capable, juſtified. As alſo, A fair way with the Diſſenters and their patrons; not written by L----y or any other furious Jacobite, whether Clergyman or Layman, but by a very moderate Perſon and dutiful Subject to the Queen*; both in 1704, 4to. (43). She alſo wrote An impartial enquiry into the cauſes of the Rebellion and Civil War in this Kingdom; in an examination of Dr Kennet's Sermon, January 30, 1703-4; and vindication of the Royal Martyr, Lond. 1704, in 4to. But her chef d'œuvre or maſter-piece is, The Chriſtian Religion as profeſſed by a Daughter of the Church of England, Lond. 1705, 8vo. (44). For ſeveral years before her death ſhe conſtantly walked from Chelſey to St Martin's church in the Fields every Sunday, to hear a celebrated preacher† She led a holy, pious, and evangelical life, and enjoyed a perfect ſtate of health 'till a few years before her death, when having one of her breaſts taken off for a cancer (45), this impaired her conſtitution, and ſhe did not long ſurvive it. After ſhe was confined to her bed, ſhe ordered her coffin and ſhrowd to be made and brought to the bedſide, and earneſtly deſired, that no company might be admitted to her, refuſing even to ſee Lady Katharine Jones, her deareſt friend. She died about the 11th of May, and was buried at Chelſey on the 14th, 1731. Her fortune was never large, and in the latter part of her life was ſo much reduced, that ſhe was obliged to her friends for a great part of her ſupport. Among others, Lady Elizabeth Haſting, eſpecially was very kind and generous to her, and once gave her a purſe of no leſs than fourſcore guineas (46).

(43) While this was in the preſs, Davenant came out with a new edition of his Moderation ſtill a Virtue; whereupon ſhe returned immediately a very ſmart anſwer, afterwards added by way of preface to this book, which is very ſcarce.

(44) In this piece, ſhe has taken to taſk Locke's notion of thinking matter, and ſhewn the miſchievous tendency of his Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, and the Lady's Religion. She has alſo made ſome remarks on Dr Tillotſon's ſermons upon the Eternity of Hell torments, which is mentioned by Dr Waterland, in his Advice to a Young Student.

He died at Chriſt-church, and his corps was interred in the iſle, on the north ſide of the choir of that cathedral, where ſome years afterwards a handſome monument of white marble was fixed to a column, with an inſcription in elegant Latin, as may be ſeen below [Q]. He was united to Mr Nelſon (whoſe epitaph he wrote) in a kind of congenial worth, eſpecially in works of charity; wherein he ſo much abounded, that his widow and two children, a ſon and daughter, had been deſtitute of a ſupport if the forementioned generous patroneſs, the Princeſs of Wales, had not provided for them, by giving the firſt a penſion of three hundred pounds a year, and conferring a good benefice in the Church for the ſon, Mr Henry Smalridge, who having been bred at Weſtminſter-ſchool, was then a ſtudent of Chriſt-church and Maſter of Arts, and took Orders to qualify himſelf for receiving his worthy patroneſs's bounty (q). In 1724, the widow took an opportunity of expreſſing her grateful ſenſe of theſe favours in a dedication to her Royal Highneſs [R], prefixed to a collection of ſixty of the Biſhop's ſermons then publiſhed in folio; the ſecond edition of which came out in 1727.

SMITH [Sir THOMAS], Secretary of State to King Edward VI, and afterwards to Queen Elizabeth, was born March 28, in the year 1514 [A], at Saffron-Walden in Eſſex. His father was John Smith of that place, Gent. [B] and his mother Agnes Charnock, of an ancient family in Lancaſhire. He received his ſchool-education, in all probability in his native town of Walden [C]; and in 1526, at the age of twelve or [A] Was born March 28, in the Year 1514.] That he was born March 28; we learn from the inſcription under his picture, at the beginning of his Life by Mr John Strype. And that it was in the year 1513 or 1514, we learn from himſelf. For he ſays (1), that 'the eight and twenty of March 1565, he 'was in the one and fiftieth yeere of his age.' From whence Mr Strype wrongfully infers, 'that he muſt 'have come into the world in the year 1512 (2).' J. Fox is alſo miſtaken, in aſſigning his age to have been three and thirty in 1551, according to which he muſt have been born in 1518 (3). Mr Camden is neareſt the truth, when he ſays, that he dyed in 1577, in his grand climacteric (4). And therefore the inſcription on his monument is wrong, which ſays, he had completed the 65th year of his age.

[B] His father was John Smith of that place, Gent.] He was a perſon of good rank and quality, being High-Sheriff of the Counties of Eſſex and Hertford, in the year 1538. And he was alſo a man of conſiderable wealth, for the time he lived in; for, in one year, a° 1549, he purchaſed a Chantry in the Church of Long Aſhton in Somerſetſhire, with other lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the counties of Somerſet and Glouceſter, which coſt him 293 l. 16 s. 8 d. And alſo the Guild or Fraternity in Great Walden lately diſſolved, with divers other lands and tenements in Eſſex and London; for which he, with another joint-purchaſer, paid 531 l. 14 s. 11 d.——In 1545, his coat of Arms was granted him by the principal King of Arms; or rather confirmed: For the patent ſpecifies, That he was deſcended of honeſt lineage, and his anceſtors had long continued in nobility and bearing of arms; and that it was Mr Smith's deſire, that the King of arms would ratify unto him his former coat, and regiſter it in the records of his office.—He was an old favourer of the Reformed Religion, in which he brought up his ſon Thomas from his youth. He lies buried in Walden church. By his wife, Agnes Charnock, he had four daughters, Agnes, Mary, Alice, and Jane, which two laſt married; and three ſons, Thomas the ſubject of this article; John and George. John was the chief inſtrument and procurer of the new erection of the Corporation of the town of Walden, a° 1549, and of the foundation of King Edward's Almſhouſe there. George was a merchant in London; and his poſterity inherit the ſeat of Hill Hall, and other eſtates acquired by Sir Thomas (5).

[C] He received his ſchool education, in all probability in his native town of Walden.] There was an old School there; which, after his advancement at Court, he got erected into a royal foundation by K. Edward VI. and endowed with two Mills, and an annuity of twelve pounds per ann. payable out of the manor of Willingale Spain's in Eſſex (6).

or thirteen, was ſent to Queen's-college in Cambridge: where he became ſo eminent for learning, that King Henry VIII. choſe him one of his ſcholars; and, for his encouragement and better maintenance, allowed him a yearly penſion, as was then cuſtomary (a). In 1531, he was choſen Fellow of his college; about which time, being incited by a laudable emulation, on account of the great honor and reſpect paid to Dr John Redman, newly returned from foreign univerſities with a thorough knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages, he cloſely applied himſelf to the reading of the beſt authors, ſuch as Plato, Demoſthenes, Ariſtotle, and Cicero. By his great diligence he acquired, in about two years time, a perfect ſkill in Greek, and was appointed, in 1535, to read the publick Greek Lecture in the univerſity. Upon which occaſion, obſerving the vitious Pronunciation of that elegant and harmonious language, he and John Cheke (b) conſulted about reforming that error; and brought up a new way of pronouncing Greek, which at length came to be univerſally received (c) [D]. Beſides his public Lecture, he alſo read privately in his college upon Homer's Odyſſey. In 1536, he was made Univerſity-Orator, which place he filled with great applauſe. But, not ſatisfied with what improvements he could make at home, he ſet out upon his travels in 1539; in order not only to learn the foreign languages, but alſo to ſtudy in the univerſities of France and Italy, which then abounded with very learned Profeſſors. At [D] And brought up a new way of pronouncing Greek, which at length came to be univerſally received.] Cuſtom had eſtabliſhed a very improper and falſe manner of ſounding ſome of the Greek vowels and diphthongs: For, ι, η, υ, ει, οι, υι, were all then pronounced as ιωτα. This diſparaged extremely the pronunciation of that fine language: 'When the reader 'had almoſt nothing elſe to ſpeak, but mournful 'ſounds, and that ſniveling ι (7).' He therefore and Mr Cheke conferred ſeriouſly about this matter. They perceived, that the vulgar method of pronouncing Greek was evidently falſe; it being abſurd, that ſo many different letters and diphthongs ſhould have but one and the ſame ſound. And they found it difficult to teach that language well, by reaſon of this great confuſion. They proceeded to ſearch Authors (not having ſeen yet Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus), in order to arrive at a certainty. But the modern writers little availed them: For they had not yet peruſed Eraſmus's Book, De rectâ Latini Græcique Sermonis pronunciatione. Tho' they both obſerved theſe palpable errors, they could not agree among themſelves; eſpecially concerning the pronunciation of the letters γ before α and υ ψιλον. They dreaded the Effects of an unuſual Sound, which, by reaſon of its Novelty, would be both difficult and diſagreeable. Soon after, having got Eraſmus's Book, and Terentianus de Literis, Syllabis, Pedibus, et Metris, they began to reform privately the Pronunciation of the Greek, but did not venture to communicate it to any but their moſt intimate and familiar friends. When they had ſufficiently accuſtomed themſelves to this new method of Pronunciation, which they liked more and more by reaſon of its fulneſs and ſweetneſs, they determined to make trial of it publickly. It was agreed that Mr Smith ſhould begin. He read at that time Ariſtotle de Republicâ, in Greek, as he had done ſome years before. And that the Novelty of the pronunciation might give the leſs offence, he uſed this artifice; viz. Of letting, in his reading, now and then a word fall, uttered in the new correct ſound: To the end, that if his Auditors utterly diſliked it, he might defer his project for a while; or if they approved of it, he might briſkly go on. At firſt no notice was taken of it; but when he repeated it oftner, they began to liſten more attentively. Eſpecially his pronouncing η and οι, as ε and οι, being frequently obſerved, they could not think it a ſlip of the tongue, but deſign; and laughed at the unuſual ſounds. He again, as though his tongue had ſlipped, would ſometimes correct himſelf, and ſay the word again after the old manner. But when he did this daily, ſome of his friends came to him, and told him what they had obſerved in his Lectures. He owned to them, he had been thinking of ſomething privately, but that it was not yet ſufficiently digeſted, and prepared for the publick. Upon the rumour of this, many others came to him; whom he deſired to have patience, 'till their ears were accuſtomed to the new ſounds, and the prejudice of novelty worn off. And ſo by degrees he explained to them the whole reaſon of his new pronunciation. In his private readings upon Homer's Odyſſey, he more plainly and openly ſhewed and determined the difference of the ſounds. Many came, that they might learn from him how to frame their mouths to utter thoſe new and true ſounds. And it is not to be expreſſed, with what greedineſs and affection this was received among the young ſcholars. The following winter, there was acted in St John's college the Greek play of Ariſtophanes called Plutus, in this new pronunciation, and one or two more of his comedies; when it was obſerved, that none of thoſe who underſtood Greek thoroughly, or were accounted learned, ſhewed any diſlike or oppoſition. This method of pronouncing was followed by John Ponet, Mr Smith's pupil, and ſucceſſor in his lecture, afterwards biſhop of Winchester; and alſo by Mr Roger Aſcham, another of his ſucceſſors, tho' he diſliked it for a while; and even by Dr John Redman, public Profeſſor of Divinity, a man of great learning and reputation (8). Thus by Mr Smith's unwearied pains and endeavours, was the Greek language reſtored to itſelf, as it was ſpoken when Greece was in its moſt flouriſhing condition. And by undeniable Authorities from Plato, Dionyſius, Thucydides, and Demoſthenes, he made out that he was in the right (9). Cheke, when he was appointed Profeſſor of the Greek tongue, proceeded in the ſame method. But Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Winchester, and Chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, dreading all Innovations, and obſerving that theſe endeavours of bringing in a new pronunciation of the Greek, came chiefly from perſons ſuſpected to be no friends to Popery; he made a ſolemn Decree againſt that way (10). Some time after, Mr Smith waiting upon the Biſhop, entered into diſcourſe upon that ſubject; and finding him immoveable, told him, in a mild and ingenious way, that for his part he could read both ways, the new and the old, that he might offend none for a matter of ſo ſmall importance. Adding, that 'even 'Stammering deſerved praiſe, if he that did ſo, would 'ſpeak plainly, when there was occaſion (11) according to that of the Apoſtle, I am debtor both to fools 'and wiſe.' Thus pleaſantly did Mr Smith comply with the Biſhop, and yet tacitly gave him a ſevere reproof for his obſtinacy.—During the courſe of his Travels abroad, he recommended to all the Learned, with whom he converſed, his new way of Pronunciation, and endeavoured to eſtabliſh it to the utmoſt of his power.——And, after his return home, in 1542, he wrote a long and eloquent Latin letter to Gardiner, wherein he argued with much freedom the points in diſpute between them. In this letter, he ſhewed 1ſt what was to be called true and right in the whole method of Sounds and Pronunciation; retrieving it from the vulgar and current uſe, and propoſing the Antients as the beſt and only pattern to be imitated in this caſe. 2. He compared the old and the new pronunciation with that pattern; that a judgment might be formed, of what was to be corrected, and what followed. 3. He explained and vindicated his paſt conduct in the whole affair of the reading of Greek.—During his embaſſy in France, in 1568, he cauſed this letter to be printed at Paris by Robert Stephens, under this title, De rectâ & emendatâ Linguæ Græcæ Pronuntiatione, 4to, together with his other Tract concerning the correct writing and pronouncing the Engliſh Tongue: Of which an account is given in the next note (12).

[E] So

At Padua he ſtudied the Civil Law, and went out Doctor in that faculty. During the courſe of his travels he grew more and more confirmed in the truth and propriety of that Pronunciation of the Greek, which he had revived, and recommended it to ſeveral learned men (d). Coming home, a very accompliſhed perſon, he retired to his college: and in 1542, having taken the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law in Cambridge, he was made the King's Profeſſor in that faculty. In which, as well as in other branches of literature, continuing to improve himſelf, he came to be reckoned the beſt ſcholar in the univerſity, not only for Rhetoric and the learned Languages, but for Mathematicks, Arithmetick, Law, Natural and Moral Philoſophy, &c. And in order to communicate his knowledge, he took pupils; among whom were, Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford, and John Ponet, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter. About this time, Thomas Goodric, Biſhop of Ely, made him Chancellor of his dioceſe. As he had undertaken to reform the pronunciation of the Greek, ſo did he alſo make it his buſineſs to refine and poliſh the Engliſh, tongue; and wrote a treatiſe concerning the correct writing of it, and the true ſounding of the letters and words (e) [E]. Moreover he endeavoured to promote true Religion in the univerſity, having been trained in the Proteſtant doctrine from his youth; and ſecured to the utmoſt of his power ſuch as were expoſed to perſecution, in the latter end of King Henry the Eighth's reign (f). He was at leaſt in Deacon's Orders, and had the Rectory of Leverington in Cambridgeſhire of conſiderable value (g); and ſoon after the Deanry of Carliſle (b). A man of ſo good a diſpoſition, and of ſuch bright parts as Dr Smith was, could not but be welcome and neceſſary, to any Court; accordingly, upon the Acceſſion of King Edward VI. he was taken into the Lord Protector Seymour's family, and made one of his Maſters of Requeſts: And likewiſe Provoſt of Eaton-college; and Steward of the Stannaries, he being an excellent Metalliſt and Chemiſt. Growing rich from the profits of thoſe many gainful employments, he purchaſed about that time ſeveral eſtates [F]. In 1548, he was advanced to the important office of Secretary of State; and knighted. The ſame year, in the month of July, he went Embaſſador with Mr Thomas Chamberlayne to Bruſſels (i), to the Emperor's council there [G]: and returned to England, in September, leaving Chamberlayne reſident at [E] So did he alſo make it his buſineſs to refine and poliſh the Engliſh tongue, and wrote a Treatiſe concerning the correct writing of it, &c.] He maintained, that the manner of Writing many of our Engliſh words, was both abſurd and improper. As for inſtance; in theſe words, Pleaſe, Sonne, Moone, To, Toe, Meane, he ſaid, thoſe ſounds are not comprehended, which we would expreſs; and, in ſome of them, the ſyllables are ſtuffed with needleſs letters: Which letters by themſelves have their certain natures, as he obſerved, and being joined after that manner, have not that force which they ought to have. And again, in other words, he took notice we had no Letters that expreſſed what we ſpoke, and therefore he thought it neceſſary to have more Letters (13). So he framed twenty-nine Letters; whereof Nineteen were Roman, Four Greek, and Six Engliſh or Saxon. The Five Vowels he augmented to Ten, by diſtinguiſhing them into Long and Short, and making certain accents over, or on the ſide of, thoſe that were to be pronounced long. He allowed no Diphthongs, nor double Conſonants, nor any E's at the end of words not being ſounded. He was for throwing out entirely, and baniſhing from the Alphabet, the Letter Q as uſeleſs; Ku expreſſing the full power of Qu., for, without the vowel U, the letter Q is never written. And the ſame uſeleſſneſs he found to be in the letter C. for it is always expreſſed either by K. or S. but he retained it in his Alphabet to ſerve inſtead of Ch. (14). Mr Strype cauſed this Alphabet to be engraved on a copper-plate, and placed it in the Appendix to Sir Thomas's Life (15). But, in all ſuch pretended Reformations of our Language, the beſt, and indeed only certain, Method, is, To trace back the ſeveral Words wherewith it is compoſed, to their Primitives, in the Anglo-Saxon, and other tongues; and to ſpell, or write them, as near as may be, according as they are in their reſpective Originals. But as for the writing of them as they are pronounced, it may perhaps ſuit the vulgar, and the pretty fellows of the age, but is really unworthy of perſons that pretend to any literature, and underſtand more languages than one.

He alſo bought a houſe in Channonrow, Weſtminſter; and one in Philpot-lane, London (16): And a houſe in Fleet-lane, with ſeveral other tenements. [G] He went Embaſſador with Mr Chamberlayne to Bruſſels, to the Emperor's Council there.] The deſign of that embaſſy, was, to provide againſt the Dangers apprehended from the French; who had poſſeſſed themſelves of Scotland, and were a formidable enemy, and the more for being ſo near. Our Court therefore endeavoured to deprive them of the conveniency of the Ports of the Low Countries, which were moſt commodious for Scotland. Sir Thomas obtained a promiſe from the Emperor's council, that they would not permit them to make uſe of thoſe ports. But the promiſe was not duly obſerv'd; for in the latter end of the ſame year, both French and Scots came from Scotland, and landed at Dunkirk. This was one of the buſineſſes of that embaſſy; but the chief end of it, was for raiſing ſoldiers in thoſe parts, which they did to the number of 2000, and obtained the Emperor's leave to bring them over. There is in the Cottonian library (18), a letter of Sir Thomas to the Lord Protector Somerſet, written during this embaſſy, which gives ſome account of it, and of the ſtate of affairs in other parts, and may be acceptable to the reader. 'Tis as follows. 'Pleaſeth it Your Grace to be advertiſed, That We received Your Grace's Letters the 'xiith of July, with the good news of the ſtate of our 'Things in Scotland; for the which We moſt highly 'thank Almighty God, and your Grace. And as we 'do not a little rejoice at them ourſelves, ſo we ſhall 'not fail to communicate them, as occaſion ſhall 'occur, where it ſhall be convenient. And ſurely, 'they here have eſpials in Scotland, as well as we, 'and be not ignorant of our affairs there. Nevertheleſs, as they pretend at the leaſt, they be very 'glad to hear them of us. The rumour runneth here 'ſtill, that Mr Chamberlain, and an Ambaſſador, came 'hither to take up men: And hereupon hath ſome 'offer been made unto us; but ſuch as we could not 'like. Yeſterday came to us a certain Almain, who 'brought to Yarmouth, I ſuppoſe, an enſign of foot-'men in the King's days that dead is: He liked ſo 'well his pay then, as he ſaith, he would gladly ſerve 'the King before any other Prince. at Bruſſels (k). About that time, he was concerned in the Reformation of Religion; and in redreſſing the Coin, which had been embaſed by the late prodigal tyrant King Henry the Eighth. In 1549, he was employed in an eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, for the examination of Anabaptiſts and Arians; and in other commiſſions: and alſo appointed one of the Viſitors of the univerſity of Cambridge. Towards the end of that year, he ſeems to have been involved in his maſter the Duke of Somerſet's troubles. He faithfully adhered to him as long as he could; and, to all appearance, loſt his place of Secretary of State: for it is ſaid in the King's Journal (l), that Mr Wotton was made Secretary: however, Sir Thomas was ſoon after reſtored again to that place. For, on the 30th of April 1551, under the name of Secretary, he was one of the perſons appointed to go in the great and ſplendid embaſſy to Henry the Second of France, to treat of a marriage between that king's eldeſt daughter and King Edward VI (m). Thus he paſſed the too ſhort reign of this amiable Prince in great reputation and proſperity. But upon Queen Mary's coming to the Crown, he was deprived of all his offices and preferments, and charged not to depart the kingdom. However, he behaved with ſo much addreſs and prudence, that he had 100*l.* a year allowed him for his ſubſiſtence, and was ſhelter'd under the Pope's Indulgence [H]; being favoured by Biſhop Gardiner of Wincheſter, and not moleſted by Boner Biſhop of London. At Queen Elizabeth's happy Acceſſion to the Throne, Sir Thomas was invited again to Court, and employed in ſettling the public affairs both in Church and State; particularly in reviſing and amending the book of Common-Prayer (n) [I]. He was likewiſe reinſtated in his Deanery of Carliſle (o): but not in his late office of Secretary of State. In 1559, he was ſent into France, with other Commiſſioners, when a peace was concluded between that Crown and England. And in 1562, he was ſent embaſſador into that kingdom, jointly with Sir Nicolas Throckmorton, where he demanded the reſtitution of Calais; but at length, without obtaining it, concluded a peace with France, in the beginning of the year 1564 (p). After the concluſion of that peace, he ſtill reſided in France, where he reviewed and corrected, and cauſed to be printed, Dr Haddon's Anſwer to Hierom Oſorio's letter to Queen Elizabeth, admoniſhing her to return to Popery (q). He alſo finiſhed there, or perhaps entirely compoſed, his treatiſe of 'The Commonwealth of England [K].' And, in the beginning

And the Bull ran for Indulgence to Smythwick, and his five friends and their children, as was petitioned, a quibuſvis excommunicationis, ſuſpenſionis, & Interdicti, aliiſque eccleſiaſticis Sententiis, Cenſuris & Poenis, a jure vel ab homine quavis occaſione vel cauſis latis, &c i. e. Many other Indulgences were granted by virtue of this Bull 'as to have a portatile altar, to receive the ſacrament privately; in Lent, and in other faſting-times of the year, to eat eggs, butter, cheeſe, and other milk-meats, and fleſh without ſcruple of conſcience' Smythwick choſe Sir Thomas Smith for one of his five friends ſpecified in the Bull, to be partaker of theſe privileges. And ſo it is expreſſed in an inſtrument, drawn and atteſted by Thomas Willet, publick notary; ſtill remaining at Hillhall. This, unqueſtionably, was a good protection to Sir Thomas, in thoſe evil days *.

[I] Particularly in reviſing and amending the book of Common-Prayer.] Mr Strype thinks, that Sir Thomas was author of the Device for the Alteration, or Reformation, of Religion, drawn up in December 1558 (19): And which is printed in the Collection of Records, at the end of Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, Part ii (20).

ning of the year 1566, returned to his native country (r). In March 1566-7, he went again embaſſador extraordinary to France, to make a formal demand of Calais from the French (s). Returning to England in the beginning of May 1568, he made intereſt for the place of Chancellor of the Dutchy vacant by the death of Sir Ambroſe Cave; but he did not ſucceed, it being given to Sir Ralph Sadleir. Vexed, it may be ſuppoſed, at this diſappointment, and expreſſing too plainly his uneaſineſs, Sir Thomas was not employed the three years following: But retired to his country-ſeat, where he buſied himſelf in rural diverſions, and in acting as a Juſtice of Peace, particularly in puniſhing of witches; which was not much to his honour. In the beginning of the year 1571, he returned again to Court, and was admitted into the Privy-Council (t). The 24th of June following he was appointed Aſſiſtant to William Lord Burghley, in his office of Secretary of State (u). About this time, he was engaged in a project for tranſmuting iron into copper [L], which proved very expenſive to him, and at laſt unſucceſsfull (w). In December 1571, he was commiſſioned to go Embaſſador into France, to make a firm Alliance offenſive and defenſive between that Crown and England; and alſo to treat privately about the match, between Queen Elizabeth and Francis Duke of Alenſon. He went over to France about February 1571-2, and having ſucceſsfully concluded his negotiation, returned to his native country in June 1572 (x). His Inſtructions are printed in the Compleat Ambaſſador (y). In April 1572, whilſt he was abroad, the Queen conferred upon him the place of Chancellor of the Order of the Garter; and, the 24th of June following, he was conſtituted Secretary of State, in the room of William Lord Burghley, made Lord High-Treaſurer. Having obtained, the year before, a grant of a rich parcel of land called the Ardes in Ireland, he ſent a colony thither in 1572, and endeavoured to ſettle it, at the expence of ſeveral thouſand pounds [M]. 'was nor ſhall be, vaine imaginations, fantaſies of 'Philoſophers, to occupy the time, and to exerciſe 'their wits: but as England ſtandeth, and is gouerned 'at this day the eight and twenty of March, Anno '1565, in the ſeventh yeere of the Raigne and Adminiſtration thereof by the moſt religious, vertuous, 'and noble Queene Elizabeth, daughter to King 'Henrie the eighth, and in the one and fiftieth yeere 'of mine age, when I was Embaſſadour for her Ma'jeſty in the Court of France, the ſcepter whereof at 'that time the noble Prince of great hope Charles 'Maximilian did hold, hauing then raigned foure 'yeeres.' This work is divided into three books. The 1ſt treats of the diverſities of Commonwealths, or Governments; of the King, and the ſeveral ranks and orders of men. The 2d of the Laws of this realm in general; and of the Parliament, and Courts of Juſtice, &c. And the 3d of Appeals, Courts of Starre-Chamber, Wards and Liveries, Dutchy-Court, Court of Requeſts; of wives and children; Eccleſiaſtical Court, &c. It was firſt publiſhed in 1584. 4to, and again in 1621, 4to. in the old black Gothick character: and again in 1624, and 1635, 12mo. He wrote it in Latin, as well as Engliſh; and it is compriſed in one of the Volumes of the Reſpublicæ.

[L] About this time, he was engaged in a project for tranſmuting iron into copper.] Being of a working brain, and a philoſophical head, he engaged into a project of Alchimy, hoping to tranſmute iron into copper. Into this chargeable, but, as was hoped gainful buſineſs, he brought Secretary Cecil, who had alſo a philoſophical genius, the Earl of Leiceſter, Sir Humfrey Gilbert, and others. The firſt occaſion of this buſineſs was from one Medley, who had by vitriol changed iron into true copper at Sir Thomas Smith's houſe at London, and after at his houſe in Eſſex. But this was too coſtly, as Sir Thomas ſaw, to reap any benefit from it. Therefore he propoſed to find out here in England the primum Ens Vitrioli, and therewith to do the ſame work at a cheaper rate. Upon which, Sir Thomas, Sir Humfrey Gilbert, and our Medley entered into a company under articles to find this out: namely, That Medley ſhould be employed in this buſineſs, at the charge of the two others, 'till by the profit he ſhould reap from the thing found out he might bear his proportion. The place where this was to be attempted, was in the iſle of Wight, or at Pool, or elſewhere. But at Winchelſey he had made the firſt tryal, becauſe of the plenty of wood. He received of Sir Thomas, and Sir Humfrey 101 l. a piece, for the buying of veſſels and neceſſaries. They removed to Pool, thinking this Ens of vitriol to be there, and took a leaſe of land belonging to the Lady Montjoy of, of 300 l. per annum. For the payment of which, Sir Thomas with the other two entred into a bond of 1000 l. While theſe things were in this ſtate, Sir Thomas went embaſſador to France in 1572, and a quarrel then happening between Medley and Sir Humfrey (and Medley, gone to Ireland, being reported to be run away) the buſineſs lay aſleep for ſome time. But Sir Thomas revived it at his return; tho' he found arrears of rent, and wages due to workmen, &c. to the amount of 200 l. and no copper nor any crocus of copper made. About December 1574, he perſuaded the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, and the Earl of Leiceſter, to enter into the Society; which they did, after due examination, and depoſited each 100 l. towards carrying on the buſineſs. Medley was now removed to Angleſey, where was proper fuel, earth, and water, ſufficient to do it for ever, or at leaſt for a very long time. The things he undertook to do, were theſe: To make of raw iron good copper, and of the ſame weight and proportion, abating one part in ſix; as 600 tun of iron ſhould by boyling make 500 tun of perfect copper. The liquor wherein the iron was boyled, to make copperas and allom ready for the merchant: which, keeping the price they then bore, ſhould, of the liquor of 500 tun of copper, be worth 10000 l. that is, for every tun 2000 l. There appearing a great probability of ſucceſs in the undertaking, Sir Thomas got a patent ſigned, in January 1574, for the Society, which was therein ſtyled, 'The Society of the new 'Art.' But, after many delays and diſappointments, all the hopes and proſpects of great Gains vaniſhed into ſmoke. Sir Thomas ſmarted in his purſe for his chymical covetouſneſs; Gilbert ſeems to have been impoveriſhed by it; and Medley was beggered: the common end of moſt alchymiſts, and projectors (22).

[M] Having obtained——a grant of a rich parcel of land called the Ardes in Ireland, he ſent a colony thither, &c.] This is a rich and pleaſant country, or peninſula, on the eaſtern coaſt of Ulſter, and of conſiderable extent, lying well for trade by ſea. It was formerly the eſtate of the Savages, an Engliſh family; one of which is famous for that ſtout and witty ſaying, 'That he would not rely upon a caſtle of ſtones, but 'a caſtle of bones,' meaning his own body. Afterwards the O-Neals took it out of their hands; but they being attainted of treaſon, Sir Thomas got a grant of that diſtrict from Queen Elizabeth (23): whereby he was to be Lieutenant-general there for war, and for the diſtribution of lands, orders, and laws in the matters pertaining thereunto. In a word, to obtain and govern the country to be won, following inſtructions and orders to him to be directed from the Queen and her council; and this for the firſt ſeven years. Afterwards the government of the country to return to ſuch officers as the cuſtoms and laws of England did appoint, except the Queen ſhould think him worthy to be appointed Governor thereof, as being a frontier-country. The right to remain only in him, as to the inheritance; the authority to muſter and call together memorable action of his, was in 1575, when he procured an Act of Parliament for the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the two colleges of Eaton and Wincheſter; importing, that, in all college-leaſes, a third part at leaſt of the old rent ſhould be reſerved and paid in corn [N]; that is to ſay, in good wheat at the rate of ſix ſhillings and eight pence the quarter, or under, and good malt at the rate of five ſhillings the quarter, or under. About the year 1576, he began to be afflicted with a violent defluxion upon the glands of his mouth and throat; which having kept him in a decaying, conſumptive, and waſting condition all that year, and part of the next, put an end to his life on the 12th of Auguſt 1577, in the 63d year of his age. During his lingring illneſs, he diverted part of his melancholy hours in looking over his papers and manuſcripts [O], of ſome of which an account is given below. He was buried in the chancel of the church of Theydon-Mount, in which pariſh Hill-hall ſtands: and a handſome monument was erected to his memory [P]. By his will he gave all his Latin and Greek books to Queen's college in Cambridge, the place of his education; with a great globe of his own making: and a rent-charge of 12 l. 7 s. 4 d. [Q]. Notice is taken below, of the ſeveral pieces of his own compoſition [R]. Sir Thomas Smith was of a fair ſanguine complexion; and had a calm together his ſoldiers throughout the ſame country, and to diſpoſe of them upon the frontiers, as he ſhould ſee cauſe for the better defence of the country. His natural, and only, ſon Thomas Smith was joyned with him in the patent; and, under his conduct, he ſent a colony thither, which did good ſervice againſt one Sarleboy, and other Iriſh rebels. But Mr Smith being intercepted, in the beginning of the year 1573, by a wild Iriſhman, was thrown alive to the dogs, and deſtroyed (24). The ſettling of this colony coſt Sir Thomas above 10000 l. without his reaping any benefit from it. After his death the Ardes were loſt to his heirs, being begged of King James I. by ſome of his Scottiſh favourites, particularly one Hamilton. And in vain did Sir Thomas and Sir Edward Smith petition the crown, after the Reſtoration, and the Revolution, for the recovery of ſo valuable an eſtate (25).

[N] He procured an Act of Parliament for the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the two colleges of Eaton and Wincheſter; importing, that in all college-leaſes, a third part at leaſt of the old rent ſhould be reſerved and paid in corn.] This is further explained in the act, thus.—— 'To be delivered yearly upon days prefixed 'at the ſaid colleges, &c. And for default thereof to 'pay the ſaid Colleges in ready money at the election 'of the ſaid Leaſees, after the rate as the beſt wheat 'and malt in the market of Cambridge, and in the 'market of Oxford, and of Wincheſter and Windſor, 'for the rents that were to be paid to the uſe of the 'Houſes there, were, or ſhould be, fold the next mar-'ket-day before the ſaid rent ſhould be due, without 'fraud or deceit.'—T. Fuller ſaith (26), that 'Sir Thomas Smith was the chief procurer of the paſſing of this act, and is ſaid by ſome to have ſurprized the Houſe [of Commons] therein, where many could not conceive how this would be at all profitable to the Colledge, but ſtill the ſame on the point, whether they had it in money, or wares. But the politick Knight took the advantage of the preſent cheap year, knowing thereafter grain would grow dearer, mankinde daily multiplying, and licence being lately legally given for tranſportation At this day, much emolument redowndeth to the antient Colledges in each Univerſity by the paſſing of this Act, ſo that though their Rents ſtand ſtill, their Revenues doe increaſe.'

[O] He diverted part of his melancholy hours in looking over his papers, and manuſcripts.] Particularly, his book Of the Value of the Roman Coins according to the Engliſh ſtandard. This he had compoſed, when he was Secretary to King Edward VI; upon a queſtion put to him by his fellow-ſecretary Sir William Cecil, viz. 'What was the ordinary Wages of a Soldier at Rome.' But he had loſt it, as well as ſeveral others written by him in his youth. He remembred, he had ſent one copy of it to Sir Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leiceſter, and another to Sir William Cecil. Upon ſearching the Earl's ſtudy, the copy ſent to him could not be found. Wherefore Sir Thomas 'requeſted the 'Lord Treaſurer Cecil, to look for his copy: eſpe-'cially he deſired the Tables, which were exactly and 'plainly drawn up. For, ſearching among his old 'Papers, he could find the firſt draught of that Book, 'and the Adverſaria; whereby he was able to fill up 'all the Chapters in a manner as they were at firſt: 'But the Tables, or any Draughts of them, he could 'not find. Therefore he prayed the Lord Treaſurer, 'in his letter dated April 22d, 1576, to look out the 'Book, eſpecially the Tables.' His Lordſhip having found the book and Tables among his papers, ſent them to Sir Thomas. Mr Camden, in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth, calls this Treatiſe an exact commentary, worth publiſhing (27). The induſtrious Mr Strype made great enquiry after the compleat Book, but without ſucceſs: at length he met with Sir Thomas's rude draught of it, in ſeveral Tables of his own hand-writing; of which he hath publiſhed a true extract, at the end of his Life of Sir Thomas Smith (28).

Mr Strype informs us, that he was one of the beſt ſcholars of his age; a great admirer of the Platonick Philoſophy; a good Phyſician and Chymiſt; an excellent Mathematician, Aſtronomer, and Arithmetician; a cunning Politician; maſter of the Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Engliſh languages; a great Hiſtorian, eſpecially in the Roman Hiſtory; a compleat Orator; well ſkilled in architecture, gardening, &c. And, as to his Virtuous accompliſhments; he was a ſincere Proteſtant; exemplary, for Truth and Integrity, for an inviolable love to Juſtice and Uprightneſs, a moſt unchangeable Faithfulneſs and Zeal to the concerns of his Queen and country. His life and manners were unreprovable; he was of a grave and yet obliging behaviour; a perfect ſtranger to the too common practices of Courts, Fraud and Falſehood, Flattery and Treachery, Vice and Debauchery. He was likewiſe of a reſolute and active mind; and of univerſal Charity and Benevolence towards all mankind (a). He had two wives; the firſt was, Elizabeth daughter of William Karkek, or Carkyke, of London, Gent. and the ſecond, Philippa, widow of Sir John Hamden: but leaving no iſſue by either of them, and his natural ſon being killed in Ireland as is above related, his eſtates deſcended to his brother George's ſon, Sir William Smith, who dyed in 1626, and whoſe poſterity have enjoyed them ever ſince (b).

SMITH [THOMAS], a learned Engliſh Divine, and author of ſeveral books, in the beginning of this century, and part of the laſt, was the ſon of Mr John Smith of All-hallows Barking, London (a), and born in that pariſh June 3, 1638 [A]. In the year 1657, he was admitted Battler of Queen's college in Oxford, and ſoon after Clerk of the ſame. Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts March 15, 1660 [B], and that of Maſter October 13. 1663 (b), he was choſen, in 1663, Maſter of the free-ſchool adjoining to Magdalen-college: and, in 1666, he was made perpetual Fellow of that college. He was then remarkable for his great ſkill in the oriental languages [C]. In Auguſt 1668, he went as Chaplain to Sir Daniel Harvey, Embaſſador to Conſtantinople [D], and returned thence in 1671. Five years after he travelled into France; and, after a ſhort ſtay there, became Chaplain to Sir Joſeph Williamſon, one of the Principal Secretaries of State, with whom he continued many years, and was very ſerviceable to him, but at length was diſmiſſed without any preferment, or reward (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, October 29, 1671 (d). In 1677, he was ſollicited by Biſhop Pearſon, Biſhop Fell, and Dr Lloyd then Dean of Bangor and afterwards ſucceſſively Biſhop of St Aſaph and Worceſter, and others; to return into the Eaſt by the way of Venice, in order to collect antient Manuſcripts, eſpecially of the Greek Fathers [E]; but the Whereupon the Chancellor deſired that he might be diſpenſed with, for the want of two terms, which was accordingly done (3).

(8) Appendix ad Johannis Confratris Glaſtonienſis Chronica, Vol. II. p. 470, &c.

The ſubſtance of this relation is. That it was propoſed, he ſhould viſit mount Athos, accompanied with a Greek Prieſt; and thence proceed into Aſia-Minor, to Smyrna, Nicæa, Nicomedia, Ancyra, and into Egypt; in order to find out the two entire Epiſtles of Clemens Romanus, the Collection of St Ignatius's Epiſtles made by Polycarp, Polycarp's Epiſtle to the Philippians, Hegeſippus's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, the Greek original of Irenæus againſt Hereſies, ſeveral pieces of Origen, eſpecially his treatiſe concerning Principles, &c. But the difficulties and dangers of the voyage, among barbarous nations, who had no phyſicians if he ſhould have fallen ill; the diſcouragements and perſuaſions of his friends and relations; and the juſt expectation he had of good preferment from his patron Sir Joſeph Williamſon, prevailed upon him not to accept of this advantageous offer: tho' he was well diſpoſed to ſerve in that reſpect the Chriſtian world. —— What he did not think fit to undertake, was afterwards effected by the late learned Archbiſhop Wake; who kept a Grecian Gentleman in pay, to ſearch for Manuſcripts in the Eaſt. By that means, his Grace procured ſeveral valuable ones, particularly a curious old Lectionary on vellum, containing the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Epiſtles: and many others.

[F] Having already given the world ſome monuments of his extenſive learning.] He publiſhed, I. Diatriba de Chaldaicis Paraphraſtis, eorumque verſionibus, ex utraque Talmude & ſcriptis Rabbinorum concinnata. Oxon. 1662, 8vo. i. e. [G] Remarks upon the Manners, Religion, and Government of the Turks, &c.] This book he wrote firſt in Latin, and publiſhed it in two Letters; with this title, V. Epiſtolæ duæ, quarum altera de Moribus & Inſtitutis Turcarum agit, altera Septem Aſiæ Eccleſiarum notitiam continet. Oxon. 1672, 8vo. Afterwards he added two Letters more, and made the title thus, Epiſtolæ quatuor, quarum duæ de Moribus ac Inſtitutis Turcarum agunt; & duæ Septem Aſiæ Eccleſiarum & Conſtantinopoleos notitiam continent. Oxon. 1674, 8vo. And underſtanding that a perſon was about tranſlating them into Engliſh, he was neceſſitated to do it himſelf, with ſome few enlargements (9). The title of his book thus tranſlated, is, 'Remarks upon the Manners, Religion and Go-'vernment of the Turks. Together with a Survey of 'the Seven Churches of Aſia, as they now lye in their 'ruines: And a brief Deſcription of Conſtantinople.' Lond. 1678, 8vo. It is very entertaining, and he has inſerted ſeveral Greek Inſcriptions in his Survey of the Seven Churches of Aſia.

[H] And in 1680, An Account of the Greek Church.] This alſo was written at firſt by him in Latin, and publiſhed under this title, VI. De Græcæ Eccleſiæ hodierno Statu. Oxon. 1676, 8vo. Reprinted, with additions and corrections, at London 1678, 8vo. There was inſerted, at the end, An Account of the State of the Greek Church, under Cyrillus Lucaris Patriarch of Conſtantinople, with a Relation of his ſufferings and death: and Hymnus Matutinus, taken from the Alexandrian MS. Gr. and Lat. He tranſlated it afterwards himſelf into Engliſh, and intitled it, 'An Account of the Greek Church, as to its Doctrine 'and Rites of Worſhip: with ſeveral Hiſtorical Re-'marks interſperſed, relating thereunto. To which 'is added, an account of the State of the Greek 'Church, under Cyrillus Lucaris Patriarch of Conſtan-'tinople, with a Relation of his Sufferings and Death.' Lond. 1680, 8vo. In the Preface he obſerves, 'that 'you will here clearly ſee, with what great difficulties after [I]. In 1679, it was designed that he should be employed, in transcribing and publishing the Alexandrian Manuscript of the Greek Bible, in the Royal Library (f), and to have for his reward, as King Charles II. had promised, a Prebend of Westminster, or Canonry of Windsor; but that good design came to nothing (g). He proceeded Doctor in Divinity June the 22d, 1683 (h); and, on the 20th of December 1684, was presented by the President and Fellows of his college to the Rectory of Stanlake in Oxfordshire; which not liking, he resigned within a month (i). In 1687, when King James II. was endeavouring to compel Magdalen-college, in an arbitrary manner, to admit Antony Farmer for their President: our author and Captain Bagshaw, two of the Fellows, presented, April the 10th, a petition to the Earl of Sunderland President of the Council, wherein the college did humbly beseech his Majesty, either to leave them to a free election, or to recommend a qualified person. To which the only answer was, That his Majesty having sent his letter to the college, expected to be obeyed. Whereupon Dr Thomas Smith, with Dr Fairfax and Dr Pudsey, were for presenting a second address to his Majesty, before they proceeded to the election. And on the 16th of November, Dr Smith, and Mr Chernock, were the only two Fellows, that submitted to the authority of the royal Commissioners and Visitors of the college, and acknowledged the justice of their proceedings. With whose behaviour therefore King James II. was so well satisfied, that they remained unmolested, when the rest of the Fellows were deprived (k). In January 1687-8, Dr Smith was presented to the Prebend, or Church, of Heytesbury in Wiltshire, by Dr Thomas Pierce Dean of Sarum. Notwithstanding his compliance hitherto with the Court, he would not sacrifice his Religion to them; for, in August 1688, he was deprived of his Fellowship by Bonaventure Gifford, the Popish President of Magdalen-college, because he refused to live there with the new set of Popish Fellows, being then senior Bursar. He was restored to his Fellowship, in the October following. But he lost it again July 25, 1692, as well as his preferment at Heytesbury, because he would not take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary (l). From that time, he lived chiefly in Sir John Cotton's family (m), in a studious and retired manner, and employed himself in publishing several books [K]. He

'the poor Eastern Christians struggle; against what 'mighty opposition they still maintain the profession of 'Christianity; and how the cross of Christ triumphs, 'notwithstanding the cruel mockings and insultings of 'the profest enemies of it; though it must be most 'sadly confessed, that several corruptions and errours 'in point of doctrine and superstitious rites and prac-'tices in worship have crept in among them, to the 'great disadvantage, scandal, and dishonour of our 'holy Religion, which is hereby continually exposed 'to the censure and contempt of the Mahometans, 'who, dull and stupid as they are, do not pretend to 'examine the grounds and reasons of the Christian be-'lief, but judge of the whole by such odd phantastick 'misrepresentations, and fortify their old prejudices 'every day more and more with fresh matter of dislike. '——— Though it is manifest to all, who understand 'antiquity, how much the present Greeks have in se-'veral Points of Doctrine varied from the belief of 'their ancestours, and have corrupted the simplicity 'and purity of Religion by a mixture of odd Opinions 'and Fancies, they pretend notwithstanding, that 'their Tenents are agreeable to the Fathers, and that 'they follow the Traditions of the ancient Church. 'But without looking back much beyond this last 'century, whoever will compare the answers of the 'Patriarch Jeremias to the letters of the Divines of 'Wittenberg in the year 1576, with their Confession 'of Faith published in the year 1662, and with the 'Bethleemitick Synod held in the year 1671, will find 'such a vast difference between the modesty of that 'Patriarch, and their bold determinations, as will en-'cline any sober and considering man to believe, that 'they have of late more than ever been wrought upon 'by the sly artifices and insinuations and under-hand 'dealing of the subtile emissaries of Rome, who watch 'continually over the poor Greeks, and take advan-'tage of their Poverty and Distress to bring them to a 'further compliance, and in time, to a downright 'subjection. [viz. to the Church of Rome.]——— 'This design of the Romanists, which has been carry-'ing on for so many years, was soon discovered by 'Cyrillus Lucaris Patriarch of Constantinople, a man 'of great parts, and of an extraordinary courage, who 'was resolved to give a check and put a stop to it, as 'much as in him lay, and by degrees to reform those 'abuses and errours, that had prevailed among the 'Greeks, and introduce a stricter alliance and union 'of the Eastern Church with the Reformed Churches 'of Christendome. This drew upon him the indigna-'tion of Urban the eighth, then Pope, and the Con-'gregation of Cardinals de propagandâ Fide, as they 'speak at Rome, who knew no good could be done, 'while he sate upon the Patriarchall throne. And 'therefore finding, after several attempts to bring him 'over by fair means to relinquish his pretensions, that 'he was too stout and too honest to submit to their 'overtures and proposals, they made use of several 'evil arts to dethrone him; and in order thereunto 'blackened and defamed him with a thousand calum-'nies, and pursued him with unwearied diligence 'and malice, and never desisted 'till they had got him 'strangled.'

'SIR,

'I write this to acknowledge the receipt of your 'Letter of the 25. March. The Inſcription in it I do 'not beleive to bee genuine (15): but of this I am 'not able to write more, by reaſon of the utter ex- 'ſtinction of my right eye, and the weakneſs of my 'left: which forbids me to make uſe of it either in 'reading or writing for above four or five minutes at a 'time: which together with an inflammation in my 'other uſeleſſe eye gives mee extreme great paine, and 'that continued: ſo that I am forced, to obtaine ſome 'kind of eaſe, to lye upon my bed a great part of the 'day. God grant mee patience under, and ſubmiſſion 'to his heavenly will. So that now at laſt there is 'like to bee a fatall interruption put to our correſpon- 'dence, on my part at leaſt: and therefore I would 'not have you give yourſelfe the trouble of writing to 'mee, til you heare from me firſt, either by a ſhort 'letter of my owne, or by the hand of a friend In 'the midſt of all my paine and anguiſh, I thanke 'God, I am not ſick, and find no ſymptomes of ap- 'proaching death upon mee: yet conſidering my great 'age, having now almoſt run out the threeſcore and 'twelvth yeare of my life (for I was borne 3 June '1638) I conclude I have not long to live, and that 'there may bee ſome unforeſeen ſuddain change, 'which may carry mee off. My Br told mee this 'weeke, that Mr Fiſher acquainted him, that his 'kinſman, Dr Hudſon, would bee in London very 'ſpeedily. If ſo, deſire him to come and viſit mee: 'for I heartily deſire to ſee him and diſcourſe with 'him. I cannot hold out any longer. I conclude 'this, I feare my laſt, letter to you with my prayers 'to our gracious and mercifull God to bleſſe you 'with long life, vigorous healthe, and a perpetual 'uſe of your eyes. Diſce meo exemplo.

'I am,

'SIR,

London, 1 April, 1710. 'Your affectionate Friend,

'and humble Servant,

'Tho. Smith.'

SMITH [Dr JOHN], an orthodox Divine of diſtinguiſhed learning, in the latter end of the laſt and beginning of the preſent century, was deſcended of an ancient family [A] of his name, originally ſeated at Durham (a), and was the eldeſt ſon of William Smith, Clerk, Rector of Lowther in Weſtmoreland (b), by Elizabeth his wife, the fifth and poſthumous daughter of Giles Wetherell, of Stockton near Durham [B]. Our author was born at Lowther in 1659, on the tenth of November, and baptized the next day. As ſoon as he was fit to receive the rudiments of learning, his father took the pains himſelf of inſtructing him, and he had ſo happy a genius, that, in the fifth year of his age, he learned his Latin Grammar, and his Greek in the ninth. After which, by the unlucky advice of ſome friends, he was ſent to Bradford in Yorkſhire, to Mr Chriſtopher Neſſe, a leading man among the Preſbyterians; where he miſ-ſpent two years, having forgot almoſt

(b) His father, our author's grandfather, Matthew Smith, was a Counſellor at Law, and eminent both for his ſkill in the Law, and for his genius in Poetry, as appears by what he publiſhed that way. He ſuffered much in his eſtate, in defence of the royal cauſe. Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. I. p. 223.

[A] Deſcended of an ancient family.] The firſt perſon we meet with of this family, which is recorded in the Herald's office, is Thomas Smith, who lived in the reign of Henry VI. he behaved with great valour in that King's expedition to Scotland, and in one of his engagements with the Scots broke his ſword, which gave occaſion to him and ſome of his poſterity to aſſume for their creſt the broken falchion (1).

[B] Daughter of Giles Wetherell of Stockton.] She was alſo niece to Sir George Marwood, Bart. (2), and to Barbara Marwood, who married the grandſon of Toby Matthews, Archbiſhop of York; families not only of good antiquity, but of conſiderable repute for their learning (3). N. B. Robert Wetherell, ſon of Henry and grandſon of the abovementioned Giles, ſettled in Ireland, and was ſome time Mayor of Dublin, and poſſeſſed of a good eſtate there, his ſon Captain Wetherell was killed at the battle of Falkirk, January 17, 1745 (4).

almoſt all his Grammar rules. This loſs, however, though not without ſome difficulty, was repaired by the care of Mr William Lancaſter, ſome time Provoſt of Queen's-college Oxford (c); but he going, by the recommendation of Mr Smith's father, with Sir John Lowther's ſon, afterwards Lord Viſcount Lonſdale, to Oxford, as his Preceptor, adviſed that this his young ſcholar ſhould be committed to the inſtruction of Mr Thomas Lawſon, by ſect a Quaker, but an excellent ſchoolmaſter, who grounded him well in the three learned languages (d). An early foundation of claſſical learning being thus laid, his father had ſome thoughts now of ſending him to the univerſity, but which he could not for ſome time determine. The nearneſs of the place, and the company of a young ſtudent who was going thither, recommended Glaſgow in Scotland, and the day was fixed for the journey; but it proved ſo rainy and tempeſtuous a ſeaſon, that his father would not then venture him from home. Thus the deſign of a Scotch education being laid aſide *, Queen's-college in Oxford (where generally the youth of the two northern counties are admitted) ſeemed to bid fair for him. He was therefore ſent for a ſhort time to Appleby-ſchool, and Dr Thomas Smith, then Biſhop of Carliſle, as well as Archdeacon Muſgrave, who had been both Fellows of this college, promoted his going thither. But neither did this ſcheme take effect; for a neighbour telling his father, that he was ſending up two of his ſons to St John's-college Cambridge, he was at laſt prevailed on to yield to the great deſire of his own ſon to go with them [C]. Accordingly our author was admitted in St John's-college, June 11, 1674 (e). From his firſt entrance, he was much eſteemed for his learning, his ſtrict and exemplary life, and cloſe application to his ſtudies; by which means, he made ſo good a proficiency in the Sciences, that he more than equalled moſt of his contemporaries. He took his degree in Arts at the regular times, and, being always deſtined for the Church, was ordained both Deacon and Prieſt by Dr Richard Stern, Archbiſhop of York, probably as ſoon as his age would permit. In the latter end of 1681, he was called to Durham by the Dean, Dr Denys Granville, who had a great regard for his family, and eſteemed him highly for his excellent endowments. He was firſt admitted a Minor Canon of that church, on the 20th of July, 1682, and on the 29th collated to the curacy of Croxdale; and to the living of Witton-Gilbert, July 1, 1684. He went in 1686 to Madrid, by the recommendation of Dr Granville, Chaplain to his nephew Charles Lord Lanſdowne, afterwards Earl of Bath, on his Lordſhip's being made Ambaſſador to the Court of Spain. He returned home ſoon after the Revolution: when he had the misfortune to loſe a curious collection of books, he had bought while abroad, which were caſt away in their paſſage by ſea, together with ſome ſermons he had taken no little pains to compoſe, by which he was obliged to go to work again. In 1694, Dr Crew [afterwards Lord Crew], Biſhop of Durham, who was a very good judge of men, and a great encourager of learning, conſtituted him his domeſtic chaplain, and ever after had a high ſenſe of his diſcretion and prudence, inſomuch, that he generally conſulted him in all eccleſiaſtical affairs of moment. His Lordſhip alſo collated him to the Rectory and Hoſpital of Gateſhead, on the 12th of June, 1695, and to a Prebend of Durham, September the 25th following, into which he was inſtituted the next day. Upon this promotion, he was created Doctor in Divinity at Cambridge in 1696, and was Treaſurer of the church of Durham in 1699. His munificent patron (f) gave him alſo, July 28, 1704, the Rectory of his own pariſh, Biſhop's-Wearmouth; where he not only repaired the chancel in a handſome and ſubſtantial manner, but built a very ſpacious and elegant parſonage-houſe, entirely at his own expence, beſides what he laid out upon his prebendal houſe, (c) See a further account of this gentleman, in the article of Dr Joſeph Smith.

(d) This was an extraordinary Quaker, and did not hold human learning in ſuch contempt as that ſect generally do by principle.

* The family looked on this as a providential eſcape from the Scotiſh religion, to which his intended companion was proſelyted, and became a Paſtor to proſelyte others.

(e) Carter's Hiſt. of Cambridge, under that college.

(f) Dr Smith wrote ſome memoirs of his Lordſhip, which are ſtill extant in the family.

[C] His father went with him as far as York.] Here he took leave of his father, not expecting to ſee him in this world any more as he was then under a regimen for a dropſy and jaundice, occaſioned by too hard ſtudy. He died ſoon after on St Andrew's day 1675 aged forty-five years, and was buried in the chancel of the old church * the 5th of December. He was a perſon of probity and piety as well as learning. The foundation of which he laid at Clare-Hall in Cambridge, where he was admitted July 15, 1649, under Mr David Clarkſon, and ſo became a fellow-pupil with Archbiſhop Tillotſon, who had a great regard and friendſhip for him. He was an excellent Grecian, and wrote, among other things, learned and uſeful notes upon Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey. He was ordained Prieſt (being a Deacon before) April 17, 1654, at Southill-Hall in Yorkſhire by Dr Henry Tilſon, then Biſhop of Elphin in Ireland (5), who being a native of Yorkſhire, had retired thither upon the breaking out of the rebellion. In 1655 he was preſented to the Living of Lowther, by Sir John Lowther, at the requeſt of his kinſman and quondam pupil Sir Henry Marwood, Bart. of Buſly-Hall, in the county of York, who was then to have married a daughter of the ſaid Sir John Lowther, to which family Sir Henry Marwood was nearly allied by Dorothy his ſecond wife (6) daughter of Sir Henry Bellingham, Bart. and by the iſſue of Sir Henry's only ſon George Marwood, who married Conſtance ſecond daughter and coheir to Sir Thomas Spencer, Bart. of Yarnton in Oxfordſhire, he had only one daughter and heireſs Jane Marwood, the wife of Cholmley Turner of Kirkleatham, Eſq; who became heir general to the conſiderable eſtate of the Marwoods. But the title was not extinct 'till the death of her kinſman Sir William Marwood, who died February 22, 1740, and was buried in the chancel of the church at Paddington in Middleſex, with two of the children of Joſeph Smith, Eſq; LL D. of Kidlington in the county of Oxford. A handſome marble monument is erected for them, and to the memory of the ſaid Sir William. To return to Mr Smith. He was ejected from his living of Lowther among other loyaliſts, under the uſurpation of Cromwell; but in conſequence of the Bartholomew Act was inſtituted on the 10th of October 1662. After his death his widow removed with the family to Guiſborough in Yorkſhire, where ſhe entered into a ſecond marriage with Mr John Bell, a worthy Clergyman, who had been bred at St John's college in Cambridge, and was now Rector of Stainton, and afterwards of Horkſtow in Lincolnſhire. But unfortunately ſhe did not ſurvive this marriage above nine months, for being on a viſit at her couſin Turner's, at Kirkleatham in Yorkſhire (7); ſhe died in Auguſt 1680, at the age of forty-three years, in childbed (8) of a daughter Elizabeth Bell, who afterwards married Mr Couſon, a gentleman of a good eſtate at Eaſt-Halton in Lincolnſhire.

houſe, and other inſtances which might be mentioned of a truly liberal and noble ſpirit. But his chief delight was in his books and in his ſtudy, by a too aſſiduous and indefatigable application to which, he greatly impaired his health; ſo that he began to decline about two years before his death, which happened July 30, 1715, in the 56th year of his age, after a fortnight's illneſs, occaſioned by a weakneſs of ſtomach, grown unable to do it's office. He died at Cambridge, where he had been for ſome time, in order to finiſh an edition of the Hiſtorical Works of Venerable Bede; and his remains were depoſited in the chapel of St John's college in that univerſity; where a handſome marble monument is erected for him, with an elegant Latin inſcription (g), wrote by his learned friend and Antiquarian Mr Thomas Baker, then Fellow of that college (b). But his character appears at length to advantage, in the following terms, by a friend; who obſerves, that he was very modeſt in ſtirring for his ſecular intereſt; ſtudying to deſerve favours rather than ſollicit for them; that he took great delight in reading the Sacred Code, and took much pleaſure in weighing and penetrating into the full force and true meaning of them; in which he paid always a religious regard and veneration for Primitive Antiquity. He was alſo a good Hiſtorian, and would talk of the moſt remarkable paſſages with great acuteneſs. He was well verſed in the ſeptentrional literature, and was likewiſe a good maſter of the French and Spaniſh tongues. The moſt conſiderable Antiquaries, both in England and Scotland, courted his correſpondence upon the ſubject of Antiquities. In ſhort, he was acknowledged a general ſcholar, having a fertility of genius, joined to an uncommon penetration and ſolidity of judgment, with a ſurprizing memory; ſo that he ſeemed to be born for promoting literature. He could ſay as pleaſant things as any perſon when diſpoſed to be facetious, and his mirth was always ſeaſoned with gravity, and innocence. He delighted to converſe with ſcholars, and was likewiſe of a communicative temper, the peculiar excellency of a learned man. He was a great encourager of young divines; ſo obliging to them, ſo ready to aſſiſt them, and ſo diſpoſed to reſolve their doubts and ſcruples, that none went from him but with pleaſure and ſatisfaction. In argument and diſputation, no one leſs paſſionate or dogmatical; no one more happy in delivering himſelf in a way that both convinced and entertained. He was in all reſpects an ornament to the Church, and a bleſſing to the neighbourhood, eſpecially to his brethren the Clergy, his whole converſation being ſincere, honeſt, diſcreet, and profitable, and his whole life one entire piece and continued teſtimony of his piety and devotion towards God, and his friendſhip and charity to men, and of his humility and ſobriety towards himſelf. His labours in preaching, catechizing, and other duties of his function, were extraordinary, and beyond moſt examples; and ſuch a God-like diſpoſition appeared in every thing he ſaid or did, that he commanded reſpect and veneration from every one. He was never wanting in any of the duties or good offices of charity, being of a kind and ſympathizing diſpoſition to all under any calamity or neceſſity; and he was a very rare example of temperance, abſtaining from all ſorts of ſtrong liquors, and a ſtrict obſerver of the days of faſting and abſtinence appointed by the Church. He imagined this great abſtemiouſneſs made his head clearer and better prepared for ſtudy, and which he thought too his conſtitution required: but in this he was miſtaken; for by that, and too intenſe ſtudy, he broke the vigour of it. He left by Will ſeveral generous legacies; beſides a kind remembrance to his ſurviving brothers [D], which, to uſe his own words, he bequeaths to them as

(g) It is inſerted in Stanton, and Le Neve, as alſo in Blome's Cantabrigia.

(b) He was ejected ſoon after.

[D] A kind remembrance to his ſurviving brothers.] He was at the head of ten brothers, ſix of whom beſides himſelf lived to the age of maturity.

The ſecond, William, was bred to Phyſic, which he ſtudied at Edinburgh, and afterwards ſettling at Leeds in Yorkſhire, practiſed there with great reputation and ſucceſs. He died April 7, 1729, and was buried in St Peter's church at Leeds *.

* He married the daughter of John Harriſon, Alderman of Leeds, and left iſſue one ſurviving ſon, William, now of Richmond in Surrey.

The third, Mathew Smith, of Newcaſtle Underline, was a Blackwell-Hall Factor. He died February 21, 1721, and was buried at Bettley in Staffordſhire.

The fourth, George Smith, B. D. who was much admired for his knowledge in polite literature, as alſo for his integrity and chriſtian conduct of his life; was bred at St John's college in Cambridge, of which he was ſome time Fellow, and while Chaplain to Brigadier Meredyth's regiment in Flanders, he became acquainted with General [afterwards Earl] Cadogan, he ſtaid a conſiderable time with his Lordſhip, who upon his being appointed Envoy and Plenipotentiary to the States-General in 1706, made him his Chaplain. He alſo attended his Lordſhip in the ſame character when he was ſent Ambaſſador thither in 1716, and his Lordſhip being conſtituted General of all His Majeſty's forces the year following, in the room of the Duke of Marlborough, appointed Mr Smith to ſucceed Dr Hare, afterwards Biſhop of Chicheſter, as Chaplain-General to the army (9). While he reſided at Ghent in Flanders, he married Anne, daughter to Colonel John Reddiſh of Skains, by Edenbridge in Kent, by whom he had iſſue Richard Smith, who was bred at Jeſus college in Cambridge, and is now Rector of Burmarſh and Alkham in Kent, and George Smith, a merchant, who died at Bengal in 1735. Their father died at Kenſington, April 17, 1725, and was buried at his living of Higham in Kent, in the church-yard adjoining to the Eaſt window, according to his deſire where a handſome tomb is erected for him.

(9) Supplement to Pointer's Chronological Hiſtory, p. 1058.

Fifth, Joſeph Smith, the fifth ſurviving brother, went to Queen's-college in Oxford, where he became Provoſt, of whom hereafter.

Sixth, Benjamin Smith, a Student in the Inner-Temple, died in the twenty-ſeventh year of his age, December 6, 1699, by too aſſiduous application to the Law, and was buried in St Andrews Church, Holborn, London.

Seventh, Poſthumus Smith, L.L.B. his youngeſt brother, became ſo eminent a Civilian, that he was early appointed Auditor to Lord Crew, and principal Regiſter to the Dean and Chapter of Durham, as alſo Surrogate to Dr Brookbank Chancellor (10), and Commiſſary, and Official-General of that Archdeaconry. He died October 5, 1725, and was buried in the Cathedral of Durham behind the altar. He left iſſue one ſon John Smith of Durham, Eſq; † and three daughters, Grace, Mary, and Elizabeth, by Mary, his wife, daughter to Sir George Wheeler, of whom a further account is given in remark [H]. Grace, the eldeſt, married her couſin-german, Francis Middleton, Eſq; ſon of Ralph Middleton of Offerton, in the county of Durham, by Frances, his wife, daughter to Sir George Wheeler; Mary married Breams Wheeler of Durham, Eſq; nephew to Sir George Wheeler; and Elizabeth, married John Bedford, M. D. of Durham.

† He died unmarried, December 13, 1744; whereby his ſiſters became his heirs, and he was buried with his father.

as a token of the brotherly love he had for them from their cradle, and which he leaves with them at his grave. He married Mary, eldeſt daughter of William Cooper, of Scarborough, Eſq; by his wife Philadelphia, fifth daughter of Henry Smith (i), of Weſt Herrington and Moreton-houſe; which Henry was half-brother to Sir George Baker, of Crook near Durham [E], by their mother Mary, daughter to Lionel Heron, of Chipchaſe-caſtle, Eſq; who was married firſt to Oſwald Baker, Eſq; and after his death to William Smith of Durham and Weſt-Herrington, Counſellor at Law; whence the ſaid Mary Cooper was allied in blood to George Baker, Eſq; the founder of ſix exhibitions in St John's-college Cambridge. By his marriage to this lady, who died in Auguſt 1728, Dr Smith had a very conſiderable fortune, and a fair iſſue to enjoy it: as 1. George Smith of Burnhall, Eſq; of whom hereafter. 2. John, a Blackwell hall Factor, who died at Durham November 22, 1731. 3. Joſeph Smith, Fellow of Trinity-college Cambridge, who died July 13, 1734, and was buried in All-Saints church at Cambridge. 4. William, who died very young a ſudden death, being choaked with the core of an apple. 5. Another William, who was bred to the Common-Law, and ſettled at Newcaſtle; he died November 2, 1730, and was buried with his mother and brother John, in the church-yard of Durham cathedral, where a handſome tomb is erected to their memories. Beſides his compleat and accompliſhed edition of Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which will be mentioned in the next article, our author publiſhed ſeveral Sermons, the titles of which are inſerted below [F]; and ſeveral manuſcript ſermons of his were in poſſeſſion of his ſon Joſeph, which ſince his death have not been found. He had alſo made ſome progreſs in writing the Antiquities of Durham, for which undertaking Biſhop Nicholſon obſerves (k), he was the moſt proper perſon. He likewiſe furniſhed Dr Gibſon with the additions to the Biſhoprick of Durham, which are inſerted in the laſt edition of Camden's Britannia by that prelate. He alſo ſupplied Mr Anderſon with materials in the publication of his Hiſtorical Eſſay; wherein he ſhews, that the crown and kingdom of Scotland is imperial and independent [G]. Laſtly, he communicated to Dr Thomas Smith (l) two manuſcripts

[E] Sir George Baker of Crooke.] This gentleman, after having done and ſuffered much for his King and country, eſpecially for gallantly defending Newcaſtle againſt the rebellious Scots, at laſt ſubmitted to an unequal fate, unworthy of his great deſerts on the fourth of Auguſt 1662, and was buried in the chancel of the great church at Kingſton upon Hull in Yorkſhire, where a monument (11) was erected for him in 1710, by his nephew Thomas Baker before mentioned.

This learned, ingenious, and induſtrious Antiquarian, was born September 14, 1636, at Lanchester in the county palatine of Durham (12), and being ſent to St John's-college in Cambridge, was choſen Scholar and afterwards Fellow upon Dr Aſhton's foundation (13), which he held 'till the acceſſion of King George I. ſoon after which he was ejected for refuſing to take the oaths to the government (14). However he kept his chamber in the college, and reſided there as a Commoner-Maſter 'till his death, which happened on the ſecond of July 1740 (15). He was buried in the ante-chappel of the college, and his various works printed and manuſcripts ſupply the place of a monument. Theſe are, 1. Reflections upon Learning, &c. which has gone through ſeveral editions, and is generally much eſteemed, notwithſtanding the cenſure paſſed upon it by a late ingenious writer. 'Baker, ſays he, in 'his Reflections upon Learning defended Eraſmus, and attacked Le Clerc with a virulence, which one would 'not have expected from a man, who, as I remember 'was accounted, and who deſired to be accounted a 'candid, genteel, and polite perſon. But party zeal 'guided his pen: Tantum religio potuit! Le Clerc 'gave him a ſhort anſwer in the Index to the fourth 'edition of the Ars critica under the word Eraſmus. '— Baker hath one chapter upon Metaphyſics, in 'which he hath made no mention of Locke; juſt as if 'a man ſhould write the lives of the Greek and Latin 'poets, and only omit Homer and Virgil! He obſerved cap. 16, that there was little or nothing left 'for the ſagacity and induſtry of modern critics; and 'thereby he ſhewed that he was no critic himſelf, and 'not at all acquainted with the true ſtate of claſſical 'books, and particularly of Greek authors (16).' There are ſeveral other ſhafts occaſionally lanced at Mr Baker's book in the Life of Eraſmus, which is confeſſedly formed upon the plan of Le Clerc, the writer's guide and maſter. Will not then his own words be retorted upon him? but party zeal guided his pen: Tantum religio potuit. 2. Mr Baker reprinted Biſhop Fiſher's funeral Sermon of Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, with a preface containing ſome account of the hiſtory of learned men of his own college, which is obſerved to be excellent in it's kind, and makes us wiſh the remainder of it had come forth, as he ſeemed to give us hopes of in page 55, finiſhed by the ſame maſterly hand. He did however, carry on it's hiſtory through a ſucceſſion of it's maſters, from the foundation to the end of Biſhop Gunning's maſterſhip, which together with many other volumes (17) of thoſe valuable collections he made towards a hiſtory of the Univerſity in general, he preſented to his great friend and patron the late Lord Oxford (18), in whoſe Lady's cuſtody they remained with many others of extraordinary value, to the no ſmall regret of the learned, inacceſſible, 'till they were lately purchaſed with the Harleian manuſcripts, by the Parliament in 1753, and make now a very conſiderable part of the Britiſh Muſæum The reſidue of his collections (19) Mr Baker bequeathed to the univerſity, in hopes that a more favourable opportunity might offer, and more ſuitable encouragement be given to ſome other, for ſetting about ſo great a work (20).

[F] His Sermons in print.] Theſe are, 1. A Sermon preached before the univerſity of Cambridge, on Proverbs iv. 13. Lond. 1700, 8vo. 2. An Apology to Chriſtians for the goſpel and it's miniſters, &c. on 1 Cor. xv. 1, 2. Lond. 1709, 4to. 3. A Sermon preached before the Sons of the Clergy upon their firſt ſolemn meeting at St Nicholas church in Newcaſtle, Sept. 10, 1711, on Exod. xx. 12. Lond. 1711, 4to. and reprinted the ſame year. N B. He was the chief inſtrument in ſetting on foot this branch of charity. 4. A Sermon preached at the conſecration of the chapel of Stockton, &c. on Math. xxi. 9. ibid 1712, 8vo. and reprinted the ſame year.

[G] Anderſon's Hiſtorical Eſſay, &c.] Our author ſupplied him with the chief part of the large appendix to this book, containing copies of charters, and other writings relating to Scotland, in which, as he obſerves, that nation is much obliged to Dr Smith for letting them know where ſo many of their valuable deeds and writings are, which by their being carefully lodged at Durham, have eſcaped the repeated miſerable fate that moſt of their ancient charters and records have undergone, firſt, by the general havock and deſigned extirpation of their memory by Edward I. who carried off or deſtroyed all the marks of their antiquity and independency, as well as the rights of their lands that came into his clutches, with the famous library kept at Ruſhnet (21); next, by the burning of the city of Edinburgh by the Engliſh, under the command of the Duke of Lancaſter; and afterwards by the deſtruction or tranſportation ſcripts of Biſhop Coſins [H], one intituled, A Vindication of the Orders of the Church of England, againſt the exceptions and cavils of a certain Romiſh Prieſt of our nation; and the other, containing an Anſwer to A Letter inſcribed to a Noble Engliſh Lady, in Defence of adminiſtring the Euchariſt to the Laity in one Kind only, together with a learned Epiſtle concerning the Sabbath, of Dr Coſins, then Maſter of Peter-Houſe college in Cambridge, to Dr Samuel Collins, Provoſt of King's-college there in 1635, when there was a warm controverſy in England upon that ſubject. All which, ſays Dr Smith, will deſerve to be inſerted in a new edition of Biſhop Coſins's Engliſh Works, whenever ſuch a one ſhall be publiſhed (m). In return for theſe favours, Dr Thomas Smith gave our author a manuſcript, in his own hand-writing, of the proceedings againſt Magdalen-college, in King James the Second's time, and his oppoſition in that affair drawn up by himſelf: and it contains a more particular and authentick relation than has hitherto been publiſhed (n) [I].

portation of moſt of what was left by the Popiſh clergy at the Reformation; and laſtly by the carrying of their records to London, in the late civil wars, and the diſaſter that befel them in their return.

[H] He gave Dr Thomas Smith two manuſcripts of Biſhop Coſins] This favour was procured from our author, by the interceſſion of Sir George Wheeler, his relation, and much eſteemed and reſpected by him. This reverend and pious Knight was ſon to Colonel Charles Wheeler of Charing in Kent (22), whoſe father Thomas Wheeler, married the daughter of Sir Nicholas Gibbons of Charing. Sir George was born in 1650, at Breda in Holland *, and educated in Lincoln-college, under the learned Dr George Hickes, the deprived Dean of Worceſter, but before he had a degree conferred on him he went to travel, and in the company of Dr James Spon of Lyons took a voyage from Venice to Conſtantinople through the leſſer Aſia, and from Zant to ſeveral parts of Greece to Athens and thence to Attica, Corinth, Bootha, &c. Some time after his return he made a preſent to the univerſity of Oxford of ſeveral pieces of antiquity, which he had collected in his travels, whereupon the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him being then a Knight. Soon after he took holy orders, and about December 12, 1684, was inſtalled into a prebend of Durham (23), on the promotion of Dr Denys Granville to the Deanry of that place. He was made Vicar of Baſingſtoke, and was afterwards preſented to the rich rectory of Houghton le Spring by Biſhop Crew his patron. He was created, D. D. by Diploma, May 18, 1702 (24). He publiſhed an account of his journey into Greece, in ſix books, in 1682, folio. He alſo publiſhed, An account of the churches and places of aſſembly of the primitive Chriſtians from the churches of Tyre, Jeruſalem, and Conſtantinople, deſcribed by Euſebius, and accular obſervations of ſeveral very edifices of churches, yet remaining in thoſe parts, with a ſeaſonable application. Lond. 1689, and we have a third piece of his, intituled, The Proteſtant Monaſtery, or Chriſtian Oeconomicks, containing directions for the religious conduct of a family. It appears by this treatiſe, that he was remarkably pious and devout. It contains his thoughts on that ſubject of near twenty years before, being penned ſoon after his entrance (they are his own words) into the conjugal ſtate, and he ſuppoſes ſeven years before his entrance into holy orders; though now much abbreviated and ſomewhat altered. He married Grace Higgons, daughter of Sir Thomas Higgons of Odiham in Hampſhire, Ambaſſador to Venice, Leghorn †, &c. She died 1703, and was interred at Charing. Sir George died February 18, 1723-4, aged ſeventy-four (25), and being a true admirer of Venerable Bede, had ſeveral of his children buried hard by him, and ordered his own corps to be interred as near Bede's tomb as it conveniently could, without violating the ſacred aſhes. A marble monument with a long inſcription in Latin is erected for him, by his ſon Granville Wheeler, in the body of the church, contiguous to the wall, behind which the body lies buried. Sir George built the chapel in Wheeler's ſtreet, Spittlefields, London, commonly called Wheeler's chapel, which is for the uſe of Mr Wheeler's tenants and inhabitants thereabouts. He died poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate and fortune, and had a numerous iſſue of which four ſons Thomas, George, Granville, and Charles, lived to maturity, beſides ſeven daughters who all married. Thomas the eldeſt ſon married the daughter of Sir George Curtis, Lord of the manor of Otterden-place and Monkton in Kent, and dying in the life-time of his father without iſſue, as did alſo George the ſecond ſon, who was a Counſellor at Law, Granville the third ſon, ſome time of Chriſt-college in Cambridge, and now D. D. became heir to his father. He has diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a learned member of the Royal Society (26), and is no leſs eſteemed for his abilities as a Divine, than for his great piety, which was the motive of his going into Orders. He is now Rector of Lake in Nottinghamſhire. He married firſt, Katharine Maria, daughter to Theophilus, Earl of Huntington, and to his ſecond wife Mary daughter of John Dove, Eſq; by Elizabeth his wife, daughter and coheir of John Bridgeman, younger brother to Lord-Keeper Bridgman, but has iſſue only by his firſt marriage

[I] A manuſcript, containing a particular account of the proceedings againſt Magdalen-college, &c] A copy of this MS. being communicated to me, I ſhall gratify the reader with ſome extracts from it, wherein Dr Thomas Smith, the author, vindicates himſelf from ſeveral miſrepreſentations in the printed account of this affair. He begins his account thus:

'Hearing from Dr Ironſide, then Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and others, that they had met with a report, that I had endeavoured to get the King's mandate for the Preſidentſhip of the college, then vacant by the death of Dr Clerke; I replied, that I had as good a pretenſion (it may be without the leaſt guilt of immodeſty) as any other, and that I knew ſo well how the Preſidentſhip had been diſpoſed of by the Kings and Queens of England, that I ſaw no ill or indecency in ſuch an application.'

He then proceeds to give a detail of the affair; that his friend and colleague, Dr Younger, came to his lodgings at Charing Croſs, London, on Eaſter-Eve, March 26, 1687, and told him, he had received a meſſage from Lady Shuttleworth in Lancaſhire, that her father Dr Clerke died at her houſe a few days before, and that this was a ſecret, and to be made uſe of accordingly; that Dr Smith told him, that the lady intended him, by this quick meſſage, a particular kindneſs, and that he ſhould by all means procure, by the intereſt of the Princeſs Anne, whoſe domeſtic chaplain he was, and is ſtill, the King's recommendatory letters to the college, which would put the matter out of all doubt and queſtion; but this being declined by Dr Younger, who adviſed him to uſe his intereſt in Court to procure it, and to take time by the foretop, he thereupon went to Thiſtleworth on Monday morning, March 28, to Dr Parker, Biſhop of Oxford, with whom he had then, and ſeveral years before, an intimate acquaintance, to beg his intereſt with his Majeſty. That the Biſhop wrote a letter, which he gave him incloſed in another directed to his landlord, where he had lately lodged, dwelling in the Haymarket, telling him, that he muſt not know or enquire to whom it was directed. This, ſays he, if any thing, will be effectual. Nor, continues Dr Smith, would he ever tell me afterwards who the perſon was to whom he wrote, tho' I learned it not long after by a meer accident. After three or four days I went to Thiſtleworth a ſecond time, to know what anſwer he had to his letter; for I was not to ſtir, or ſay any thing of the buſineſs, 'till I heard from him. He then told me, that he was not my competitor, notwithſtanding the noiſe of the town, that the King would make him Preſident. That the King expected the perſon recommended ſhould be favourable to his religion, and then aſked me what I would do, or could do therein? I replied, My Lord, I pray acquaint the King that if his Majeſty ſhall pleaſe to recommend me to the College, I will make it my buſineſs to advance piety and learning, to make men dutiful and obedient to his perſon, and to promote true Catholic Chriſtianity, and I hope, ſaid I, the King will will require no more of me, for this is all I can do. He answered me, this I assure you will not do. I said to him, then let who will take the Presidentship for me. I will look no more after it. After this I made no address in the least to any person, either in the Court or out of it, about this matter, as having been fully convinced by the discourse which I had with Bishop Parker, that all future attempts, as things then stood, would be vain and to no purpose.

April 5, I went over to wait upon my Lord Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth. After dinner his Grace came to me standing by the window, and spake to me in these words. Doctor, will the Presidentship of your college fall into your hands? I answered, no my Lord, I don't expect it. I shall never agree to the conditions. He replied, what conditions? I said again in general terms only (without mentioning the discourse I had a few days before with Bishop Parker) I know very well what I say to your Grace; then said he, without asking any further question, well Doctor, I know you are an honest man, may you have your reward: if not in this world, yet God is a good paymaster.

Dr Smith then proceeds to give what he calls An Impartial Relation of the election of a President of St Mary Magdalen-college, Oxon. in April 1687, and the following visitation. In which he continues to vindicate his conduct from some misrepresentations in the printed account of that affair. In order thereto he observes, that when the college sent Mr Bagshaw to him at London, with their request to deliver their petition against the King's mandate, to admit Mr Farmer to the Presidentship. He was directed to deliver it to the Earl of Sunderland, which he complied with, though against his own opinion, being desirous to have delivered it to the King immediately *. That afterwards, upon the college citation of the Fellows to proceed to an election on the 15th of April, he went to Oxford, where at a meeting of the Fellows on the 15th in order to proceed to an election immediately, he declared his opinion for petitioning the King again as most prudent and dutiful, before they proceeded to an election, the King having interposed his royal pleasure and authority, which if it had not been done he readily acknowledged, that they not only might but ought to proceed to the election that very instant, according to the express letter of the statute in every particular. That the Vice-president as well as Dr Fairfax and Dr Pudsey, concurred with him in this opinion, but the majority appearing on the other side against such second petition, the election was made, and Dr Hough chosen President, and confirmed afterwards by the Bishop of Wincheſter their local visitor, though he, Dr Smith, did not give his vote for him. That it was thought necessary, in order to maintain this election, and to keep off the King's displeasure, to address the Duke of Ormond, whose chaplain Mr Hough, had the honour to be, that he would use his interest with the King, and intercede for the college. That a letter was accordingly drawn up, dated April 19, 1687, and sent to him in the country, of which, continues Dr Smith, I was wholly ignorant, much less did I subscribe it, though it appears by the very letter which the Duke of Ormond sent up to Court, that they very knavishly and basely foisted my name into the subscriptions of the Fellows, which forgery I did not discover 'till I read the letter with the subscriptions, printed by Dr Johnston in his vindication of the King's visitatorial power (27) about a year ago, which was matter of amazement to me. Besides they all knew if I had been spoken to, I should never have consented, several things contained in it being contrary to my express declaration and judgment. I did not vote for Mr Hough at all, either in the first nomination or after-scrutiny: but first named two others, and when the majority elected Mr Maynard and Mr Hough to be returned to the thirteen Seniors to chose one of them, I voted for Mr Maynard.

That about the 23d of April a letter written two days before the twenty-first, came from my Lord Sunderland, directed to the Fellows of the college, requiring us to give an account of what had passed at the election the week before, and whether the King's letter mandatory had not been delivered before the election of Mr Hough; to this an answer was framed, to which I told them I could not subscribe, nor approve of the case drawn up in several particulars alledged in it, and therefore I desired to be wholly unconcerned in it for the future as I really was in this troublesome business, which might have been prevented by our petitioning the King a second time; and upon the reading both of the letter and case, I bid Mr Almont, our Steward and public Notary, take notice, that I disliked several things both in the one and the other; and before him, and in the presence of the Fellows in the Chequer publicly interposed my dissent. After this I refused to be present at other meetings which were had about petitioning the King, and the President accompanied by three or four of the Fellows went up on Wednesday the 27th of April to deliver it. Upon the 6th of June I desired leave of absence for some time and went to London.

Hearing of the intended visitation by the King's Commissioners, he returned to the college on the 14th of October. On Tuesday the 25th the Commissioners having received the King's letters mandatory for the admission of Dr Parker Bishop of Oxford into the Presidentship; they first asked Dr Pudsey whether he would install the Bishop by his proxy, and upon his refusal the question was put to Dr Smith, who read his answer as follows:

My Lords Commissioners, I answer with all humble and dutiful submission to the King's Majesty's authority and your Lordship's visitatorial power, that it is not in my power to do this. Your Lordships, who have deprived Dr Hough, and declared the Bishop of Oxford President, may install him. This method being altogether new and extraordinary, I cannot be satisfied how I can or ought to be the executioner of your Lordship's sentence. Besides, I beg leave to propose a short case to your Lordships, whether, and how I can install or give possession, without being impowered and authorized by a rule out of the High Court of Chancery or King's-bench for my security, if there were nothing of conscience in the case. The Chief Justice answered, that they, acting by authority under the Broad-Seal, had the power of those Courts. I humbly begged their pardon and demurred. Then the Commissioners installed the Bishop, after which, returning to the common room, they proposed this question to every Fellow, will you submit to the Bishop of Oxford now installed President, by virtue of the King's mandate, to which Dr Smith's answer was: I own from my heart, and acknowledge the King's supremacy; I do now, and always will pay all dutiful and humble obedience to his Majesty's authority, and this out of a principle of conscience and loyalty, as becomes a Priest of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of England established by Law. I have made no exception to the legality of your Lordship's commission, nor to the exercise of it in this present visitation. I am ready and willing to obey in licitis et honestis, the President, whom the King has been pleased to constitute President, whenever he shall come and reside in the college (28).

Friday October 28. The Commissioners telling the Fellows that they had received an express that morning from London, wherein the King required, that the Fellows should acknowledge their disobedience, in contesting his authority, ordered that they should make this acknowledgment in a writing under their hands. In this affair, says Dr Smith, I was wholly unconcerned, as to any kind of obligation lying upon me, to join in such an address, who had been absent from the college, with statutable leave, during the heat of the contest (the Fellows refusing my advice for deferring the election, 'till the King had been petitioned a second time: which method, if it had been followed, had prevented all the troubles which fell upon the college). The Commissioners, upon my saying thus much, acknowledged that I was not obliged, nor was a subscription required of me (as is subtilly, but most falsely suggested, in the printed relation) (29); who was so far from being press'd, as is there said, that I was not so much as spoken to. But, however, after some little demurr, I went up to the hall, where the Fellows were retired to discourse with several of them, and interpose my advice. I told them, they might make their acknowledgment in such a form, as might neither displease the Commissioners, nor prejudice themselves; as that we are heartily sorry to have incurred your Majesty's displeasure; and that if, in the management of this cause, we have done any thing amiss tending that way, we humbly beg your Majesty's pardon; or to this purpose. I told them, moreover, that I would not accuse them, but that I was to defend myself; that in the management of the best cause, there might be misbehaviour and miscarriage, and therefore therefore I begged them, for God's ſake, very earneſtly, that they would conſider what they had to do. But I not prevailing, they drew up a paper, which being ſubſcribed, they went down with it to the common room, to preſent it to the Commiſſioners. As ſoon as it was read, the Commiſſioners ſaid, it was not a paper to be offered: that they had offered more in a former addreſs, which was read: and that it was not agreeable, but directly repugnant, to the ſubmiſſion made on Tueſday. The Biſhop of Cheſter adding, that it was proteſtatio contra factum, Dr Bailey deſired to explain himſelf as to the paper, that by the word ſubmit, they only meant, that they would not oppoſe; and that as to owning the Biſhop of Oxford Preſident, they had no ſuch deſign or meaning. This appeared to me, ſays Dr Smith, matter of aſtoniſhment, for that the ſubmiſſion was made after the Commiſſioners had inſtalled him.

Reflecting upon this interpretation, I have ſaid, continues he, ſeveral times to them, If we may faſten an interpretation upon words, contrary to their plain, obvious, and common ſenſe and meaning, let us henceforward ceaſe to condemn and preach againſt the jeſuitical wicked doctrine of equivocation and mental reſervation: and that if we now thought ourſelves bound to obſerve the founder's ſtatutes ad literam in every particular, and that we could not be diſpenſed with from them, as we have been diſpenſed with formerly in diverſe inſtances, and eſpecially about elections, we ought to take ſhame to ourſelves, by a publick acknowledgment, that we have lain ſo long under thoſe fatal errors, and do penance for our manifeſt and wilful perjuries.

After the general ſubmiſſion made by all the Fellows except, Dr Fairfax, and all the college beſides, except the under-porter, both of whom were expelled, I obſerved, that there was great diſſatisfaction taken by ſeveral at this their compliance, blaming them for leaving Dr Fairfax in the lurch; and beſides, they were piqued by Mr Obadiah Walker and his party's upbraiding them, that they durſt not ſtand it out: and it being commonly ſaid in the town by the ordinary people, Here is your Magdalen-college conſcience, beſides other motives, they thought fit to evacuate their ſubmiſſion, by this equivocal interpretation.

Tueſday November 15. The ſame Commiſſioners came to town, being brought in by three troops of horſe, and were lodged in the college.

That night I was ſent for to the Preſident's lodgings by the Biſhop of Oxford, not knowing in the leaſt that the Commiſſioners were with him, forbearing to viſit him above once or twice at moſt, upon his taking poſſeſſion of the lodgings, notwithſtanding our intimate friendſhip many years before, which I then chiefly waved, to avoid all poſſible umbrage of me. I was ſurprized at the ſight of them, where we had but little diſcourſe, and that of indifferent things; only, before I took my leave, Baron Jenner took me aſide, and aſked me very ſeriouſly, Doctor, I pray tell me, when you delivered the petition of the college to my Lord Preſident? I told him, upon the faith of an honeſt man and a Chriſtian, that it was on Sunday the 10th of April. Afterward, the Biſhop of Cheſter invited me to his chamber, and aſked me the ſame queſtion, which I anſwered word for word as before I did to Baron Jenner. He further aſked, when I had my anſwer? I told him, on Wedneſday the 13th of April, and that I would atteſt it upon oath, if there was any doubt or denial of it. This brought into my mind what the Vice-Chancellor, Dr Ironſide, told me, that in a diſcourſe the King was pleaſed to have with him, when he was in Oxford, in September, about our college, his Majeſty aggravated the undutifulneſs and rudeneſs of the Fellows, in not petitioning him, and repreſenting our caſe to him before the election. The Vice-Chancellor interpoſing, ſaid, that he had heard we had done it: the King anſwered, Ay, after the election was over. This, continues our author, ſeemed demonſtration, that the Earl of Sunderland did not deliver our petition in good time (30), and which I concluded fully was the reaſon, why Baron Jenner and the Biſhop of Cheſter were ſo inquiſitive to know the exact time from me.

(30) This he had apprehended from the firſt, which was the reaſon of his inſiſting ſo much as he did, upon petitioning the King a ſecond time, before they proceeded to an election.

The Biſhop of Cheſter told me, that I had a great enemy in the Cabinet-Council, called juſt before they came away. I aſked him who were preſent? He ſaid, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Preſident, Lord Privy-Seal, the Marquis of Powis, Father Peter, the Earl of Caſtlemain, and I think he ſaid Biſhop Leybourn. He would not tell me who the Lord was, but left me to gueſs, as I did eaſily; but he ſaid the King was pleaſed after all to ſay, that he was fully ſatisfied as to my behaviour.

In the interval between the Commiſſioners going away and return, I was ſoon convinced, that the Fellows were encouraged to perſiſt in their oppoſition to the King by ſeveral great men at London; that they ſhould be taken care of, in caſe they were expelled; that they would be looked upon as confeſſors for the Proteſtant religion, and ſuch like plauſible arguments, with which they were wrought upon; ſo that it was very eaſy to foreſee, that, upon their non-ſubmiſſion, the Commiſſioners came with full power to expel them.

Wedneſday November 16. The Commiſſioners met in the common room, and the buttery-book being ſent for afterwards, upon reading the King's mandate for the admiſſion of Mr William Joyner, who had been Fellow of the college about forty years before, and loſt his Fellowſhip by turning Papiſt, and Mr Job Allibon, brother to the Judge of that name, they were admitted and their names regiſtred, both of them taking only the oath required by the founder. The names of all the Fellows were called over, and certificates were produced in behalf of ſeveral of the abſent Fellows, which were read and allowed. Dr Younger was excuſed, upon the account of his attendance upon the Princeſs of Denmark. The names of the reſt, who had not taken the like care to get themſelves excuſed, were noted down. Soon after, the Biſhop of Cheſter made a long ſpeech, recapitulating the whole affair. All being ordered to withdraw but the Fellows, the Commiſſioners required ſuch of them, and only ſuch, as had contended with the King (for I was not ſo much as ſpoken to, much leſs preſſed, as is baſely and falſely ſuggeſted (31) in the printed pamphlet, intituled, An Impartial Relation of the whole Proceedings againſt St Mary Magdalen college in Oxon. which is very partial and faulty in ſeveral particulars relating to me), to ſubſcribe the following paper.

(31) P. 37, 38.

Here follows the petition, &c. as in p. 37. of the printed account. The expulſion being read ſoon after, Dr Smith then proceeds.

After the expulſion of my colleagues, which they had brought upon themſelves, I being extremely concerned for them, reſolved that very minute to go to London, and live there.

Accordingly he ſet out on Friday November 18, and ſtaid at London all that winter, and part of the following year (32), 'till he was expelled from his Fellowſhip by Biſhop Giffard, the then Preſident and Popiſh Fellows, and went down to Oxford a few days after, to remove his books, bedding, and other furniture of his chamber.

(32) A letter dated January the nineteenth, had been ſent to him by Mr Charnock the Vice-Preſident, citing him to come to the college; but he ſlighted the citation, and did not think fit to anſwer the fooliſh letter, (ſo he calls it) and left them to proceed againſt him as they pleaſed.

Upon my coming to town, continues he, I found the whole tranſaction of the affair relating to the college generally condemned, the King arraigned, as guilty of arbitrary government, in turning men out of their freeholds, the Commiſſioners loaded with calumnies, for executing the King's pleaſure, and acting, as they ſaid, againſt Law, in defence of a prerogative, which thoſe revilers would not acknowledge due to the Crown, and myſelf beſpattered with horrible, ſcandalous, and diabolical reflections; as that I was a Papiſt, or at leaſt would ſoon declare myſelf ſuch; that I had perjuriouſly violated my founder's ſtatutes; and that by this compliance I was making my court to get preferments, and ſuch like ſtuff. I confeſs it troubled me extremely to be thus calumniated, knowing that in the whole affair I acted according to my judgment and conſcience; upon which I did not chuſe to rely wholly, though I might have done it ſafely, knowing, from the regiſters of the college, what had been done in the like caſes by our predeceſſors, and eſpecially in Dr Walter Haddon's caſe, who was a lay-gentleman, and bred up in the univerſity of Cambridge in the time of King Edward the Sixth; in that of Dr Bond, under Queen Elizabeth; of Dr Oliver, who was recommended by King Charles the Firſt (though the King, then in Oxford, was aſſured, that the election would light neither upon Dr Oliver, or another of his Majeſty's chaplains; the King ſaying, as I have been moſt credibly informed, that he would ſend his letters however); and in thoſe of Dr Pierce and Dr Clerke, at which latter I was preſent*; and in the elections and admiſſions of Fellows (to the formalities of which we were as much obliged by ſtatute), whenever the King thought fit to interpoſe his royal authority. Beſides, I ſay,

* In the caſe of Haddon the ſtatutes were over-ruled, on account of the Reformation, as then eſtabliſhed by act of Parliament. Life of Walter Haddon, prefixed to his Poemata. Lib. dup. say, not relying upon my own understanding, I consulted both divines and civilians as to my behaviour in this perplexed affair, whose judgment, which could be no ways biassed, agreed with mine. Hereupon, to do myself right, and to vindicate my injured fame and credit, I found myself obliged to give a particular relation of my behaviour in the whole transaction, so far as I was concerned, either at the election or visitation, which I sent to my friend Dr William Lloyd, Lord Bishop of St Asaph, in a letter dated November 24; which satisfied his Lordship; who, as much as he disliked the exercise of the King's visitatorial power at that time, and the behaviour of the Commissioners for Ecclesiastical affairs, and for visiting the Universities either at London or Oxford, did me the justice to vindicate me in the midst of all the clamours raised upon me (as did several other persons), whenever a discourse happened to be started about me. I, finding that the case was either through ignorance misunderstood, or through malice and design perverted, to run down the King and his authority royal, in interposing in college elections, and that not one in a thousand has a right notion of it, designed to publish that letter, to satisfy my friends, that I was not so black a criminal as some of my maligners represented me to be; and therefore consulted and advised with Bishop Lloyd, whether I ought not to lay open the whole affair to the view of the world, at least to publish the letter written to him; which he would by no means give way to, or advise me to do, adding, among other reasons, that hereby I should but gratify the Jesuits; and this afterwards was the opinion of Dr Thomas Tenison (33), whom, in Bishop Lloyd's absence, and by his particular desire, I now and then consulted upon some emerging difficulty.

(33) Afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.

I can justly say it, and I appeal to God Almighty, the searcher of all hearts, that in the course of my life, in matters relating to the publick, I have endeavoured to discharge a good conscience; and that, the Grace of God assisting me, I have abhorred, and, the same Grace assisting me, shall continue to abhor, a wilful and designed contradicting the lights and directions of my conscience, or doing any thing contrary to it, though it were to gain the best preferment in the Church, or to save my life. And as to the other crimination, of my being a Papist, or would at least become such, I need only appeal to all who know me intimately, both before and since, and to the several theological writings which I have published in Latin and English, in which I have defended the doctrine of the Church of England against the Papists, to render it absurd, false, and incredible. It was a grievous affliction to me, to be so unworthily reproached by my brethren of the Clergy: one of whom brake out in a coffee-house into scurrilous language against me, such as was fitter for a rude, ill-bred, and hair-brained porter, than a scholar, a gentleman, or priest. But I have lived to see this man especially (with several other of my severe censurers), notwithstanding their pretended zeal at that time, in the defence of the Church of England against Popery (which certainly is the duty of every honest and conscientious clergyman of this Church), renounce his oaths, faith, declarations, and formerly avowed principles, and swear allegiance to an usurper, and justify all the villainies of the late Revolution.

Our author then takes notice, that collections were not long after made for the expelled Fellows, and the news being sent over into Holland, with many aggravating circumstances, the Princess of Orange sent over 200*l.* to be distributed among them, as one of the Fellows afterwards told him. After which he proceeds thus:

That night [of November 24] having sent away my letter, by a sure hand, to Bishop Lloyd: in the morning a gentleman came to me to my lodging, telling me, that the King hearing I was in town, commanded me to come to his levee the next morning: which was extremely surprizing to me. Friday morning, November 25, I went to Whitehall. The King was then under the Barber's hand; several lords and gentlemen attending, as is usual. Soon after, the King admitted me to the honour of kissing his hand, and called me into his closet; where he said, he had heard well of me, and that I was a loyal and honest man. I answered, that I had endeavoured to do my duty to his Majesty, as became a loyal and honest man, for which I suffered a thousand reproaches. He bid me not to value them; and then he was pleased to tell me, that he had a letter from the Bishop of Oxon, that the demies were mutinous. I said, that I had endeavoured to satisfy some of them, but I feared they were not to be wrought upon. The King was pleased to add these very words, The college has been mutinous and factious ever since my brother was restored: Some little discourse happened, about my having lived some time at Constantinople; and I thought fit to acquaint the King, that of late I had not been constantly resident in the college, but lived in London; which I thought proper to say, because I resolved to go down no more, while things continued in this disorderly condition After this short stay, the King said, Doctor, I thank you, I will stand by them who stand by me, you shall find it so, or words to that purpose. I most humbly thanked his Majesty, and was dismissed (34).

(34) When he returned to his lodgings, he set down this discourse while it was fresh in his memory.

Notwithstanding the King's gracious intentions, proceeds he, towards me, I never made any kind of application to his Majesty, either by Protestant or Romanist; and at that time dreaded preferment, as much as others were ambitious of it, and courted it; and scorned to make a visit to my Lord Sunderland, who, to make his court the better, had renounced his religion, and was primier minister (35); much more to the Jesuit Peters, whose face I never saw, but once en passant, though invited thereunto by one who had a considerable interest in them both; for though I might have pretended, with some tolerable kind of allowance, to a Prebend in the church of Windsor, which King Charles was pleased to promise me, or to a Prebend in Westminster, for which Archbishop Sancroft, of his own accord, without my request or suggestion, told me, that he would speak to the King [James] in my behalf; his Grace thinking it most agreeable for me to live in London, as well as others, who I saw advanced to great dignities in the Church: yet after that the troubles in the college had happened, I made it my business and endeavour to avoid it; and I thanked God heartily, that no preferment was forced upon me. So much do I prefer the credit and reputation of having acted according to my judgment in the affair of the college, before the best preferment which fell afterwards in the King's gift, though it had been the Bishoprick of Oxford, which not long after was vacant by the death of Bishop Parker; who being succeeded by Dr Giffard, titular Bishop of Madaura, in the Presidentship, the college began to fill with Papists, and our author was expelled the third of August, 1688 (36).

(35) The Doctor intimates his opinion, that his Lordship influenced Father Peters in sending the twelve Popish Fellows to Magdalen, and expelling the Protestants, in the general design to embarrass the King's affairs, and render him more odious to his Protestant subjects. In which last sentiment our author was not singular.

But upon the address of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and several other Bishops, October 3, to the King to restore the President and Fellows. His Majesty, on the 12th of that month, ordered the Bishop of Winchester to settle the Society regularly and statutably, which that Bishop shewed to our author and Dr Younger. In pursuance hereof, a citation was set up on the chapel gate, October 16, warning the President, Fellows, and all persons concerned to meet the Visitor there on the 2d of November following, by which time the Popish Fellows were ordered to be gone, which was a strain of the Bishop's civility to them. My Lord of Canterbury, and several others of great quality hearing of this delay, signified their just displeasure at it. Of which, the Bishop being sensible he hastens to Oxford on Saturday the 20th of October, anticipating the time prescribed by him in his instrument almost a fortnight, upon the security of which, continues our author, I staid in London. He was extreamly blamed for deferring it, and might if he had pleased at first have gone directly to Oxford, where a great many of the Fellows upon the news of the designed restoration were come already, and the King knew nothing, but that he had before this time obeyed his orders, and restored the college.

(36) Upon this occasion, he went to the college, removed his books and furniture, and after staying three or four days in a private lodging in the town, returned to London, without taking any notice of any of the Popish Fellows.

But thus it happened. The King designing to have, on Monday the 22d of October, a great assembly of the Lords, Bishops, and Personages of great quality, dignity, and office, to satisfy them, and by them the whole nation, about the legitimacy of his son the Prince of Wales, and to obviate and confound the villanous and diabolical slander, which was most maliciously spread abroad among the people, by his implacable enemies, who were then designing his overthrow and deposition, that it was a suppositious child, among others, took particular care, that the Bishop of Winchester, of whose loyalty at that time his Majesty had a very good opinion, should be sent for to be present, and an express was sent to him accordingly to Farnham. But he being gone thence to Oxford, the express went after him, and delivered him the King's letter for his appearance in the council-chamber on Monday. He not knowing the meaning and reaſon of the King's order delivered to him on Saturday night, was reſolved to be gone early the next morning for London, without reſtoring the college. The Fellows hearing of his intended ſudden departure went to St John's-college, where his Lordſhip lodged, and importuned him to reſtore them that morning, urging that the whole might be done in an hour or two's time; and upon his refuſing to comply with their earneſt requeſt, they uſed very rude expreſſions towards him, which put my Lord into a very grievous paſſion, and he made his coachman drive away, as ſome of the Fellows told me.

On Monday about one o'Clock in the afternoon, I ſpoke to him in the gallery at Whitehall, and aſked his Lordſhip when he would return to Oxford, he ſaid on Wedneſday. That afternoon I hired a couple of horſes and a man, and went to Beconsfield that night, and the next day to Oxford. The Biſhop got thither on Wedneſday the 24th, and reſtored and reſettled the college the next day in the morning, being the 25th.

In the pamphlets, which were ſoon after publiſhed, giving an account of the Revolution, and in order to the juſtification of the wickedneſs and villany of it, this accidental delay of our being reſtored, which is wholly to be imputed to the Biſhop of Winchester, is horribly miſrepreſented, particularly by Mr Bohun, and afterwards by Mr Tirryl, and by the whole litter of envenomed lying ſcribblers, upon this idle, abſurd, and forged pretence, that by the poſt juſt before the Biſhop was ſent for back, there came news, that the Dutch had on the 16th of the ſaid month ſuffered much in a ſtorm, and that they would not be able to ſail 'till the ſpring, and that therefore the Biſhop of Winchester was commanded to deſiſt, and the order given to him for reſtoring the college was revoked, which was a horrible lye. The King knowing nothing all the while, but that the college had been reſtored, before he ſent for the Biſhop to be preſent in that auguſt aſſembly, which was the only reaſon he was ſent to, and not in the leaſt to hinder or defeat the reſtoration of the college, as thoſe villainous writers have moſt falſely and wickedly aſſerted. The Viſitor returning in four or five days to Farnham, our author deſigned to return to London. But the Preſident deſiring him to ſtay to help ſettle the college, and make up the perplexed accounts of it, he complied. And, continues he, upon a diligent ſearch and inſpection, we found our writings and muniments ſafe, the old gold in the Tower which we wanted, untouched and entire, the plaſe left as we left it, and nothing as I remember miſſing. But after the Viſitor's departure I quickly found that I was an eye-ſore to ſeveral of my colleagues, who neither would nor could, it ſeems, forgive me for my behaviour at the election and viſitation, which caſt ſuch a reflection upon them. And the King's affairs being now more and more embroiled, they grew inſolent, many of them having gotten the victory over the King, and the whole nation, as they fancied, on their ſide; and being thus got again into poſſeſſion of the college, ſome of the junior Fellows eſpecially began to ſhew their malice and revenge upon me, taking occaſion in the common room, or in the cloyſters, to aſſault and abuſe me with baſe, dirty, and opprobrious language, for my not joyning with them. All this I could eaſily have digeſted, 'till my old friend Mr Dodwel acquainted me, that he had juſt then heard that both Preſident and Fellows, endeavoured to prepoſſeſs the Viſitor when lately in town, with a deſign to expel me. This, I confeſs, put me out of all patience, and filled me with equally great trouble and indignation, and made me almoſt reſolve, whatever the effect of this barbarous uſage might be, to quit the college, (as the leſſer evil of the two) where I had ſo many open maligners, and others, who ſeemed to carry all things fair with me, and treated me outwardly with reſpect, thus ſecretly to envy me *. Though I could not give an entire credit to Mr Dodwel's information, eſpecially as to what concerned the Preſident, whoſe pretenſions of reſpect and friendſhip were never greater than at that time, and who, I hoped and believed, abhorred the very thought of being in that black deſign againſt me; yet I thought fit not to ſlight it, but the ſame day, October 31, I wrote to my friend the Biſhop of St Aſaph; it concerning me, both in point of reputation and intereſt, to prevent the miſchief from falling upon me.

The pretence was that I had aſſiſted Dr Johnſton in the compoſure of his book, intituled, The King's viſitatorial power aſſerted, &c. He mentioning me there with honour, and citing my diary (37) in three or four places. The caſe in ſhort lies thus. I had made an acquaintance with this worthy, honeſt, and learned gentleman in the year 1671, at Pontefract in Yorkſhire, where he then lived, and where I continued ſeveral days, taking a progreſs that ſummer with one of our Yorkſhire Fellows into the north parts of England, which in all my perambulations I had not ſeen before, and whoſe friends lived in that town. This acquaintance quickly grew up into a ſtrict and dear friendſhip, which was afterwards kept up by a correſpondence of letters, during his ſtay in Yorkſhire, and after his coming to live in London. The King being made acquainted with the loyalty and worth of this gentleman, and his great ſkill in the hiſtory, antiquities, and laws of England, and his induſtrious reſearches into old records, gave him a conſiderable penſion, to render the loſs of his practice as a Phyſician, (and certainly a learned and judicious one) which he could not if otherwiſe employed, attend with conſtancy and aſſiduity, leſs uneaſy: and his chief province was to defend the rights and prerogatives of the Crown, which were then attacked by ſeveral little writers, with deſign to inflame the nation, under the pretence of liberty and property, againſt the encroachments of arbitrary power. Theſe calumnies were levelled againſt the King, not ſo much for his being of the Roman communion (though of this they made great advantage, in order firſt to leſſen him in the minds of the people, and turn their minds againſt him, and afterwards to abdicate and dethrone him) as for his being a King. For they were the ſame with which they had aſperſed the King his father of bleſſed memory, who died a martyr for the Church of England. This gentleman then was to give a true and impartial relation of the Viſitation of our college, and to that end had all the papers and regiſter of the Commiſſioners, both in London and at Oxford, which related to that affair, put into his hands. He was ſo civil as to conſult me about what concerned myſelf merely as matter of fact. I read ſeveral things out of my diary to him, and at the ſame time acquainted him particularly with what the Lord Chief Juſtice ſaid, as I had put it down in my note-book; whoſe words I found in the prints, and in common diſcourſe, to have been horribly perverted to his great prejudice and diſhonour; and for the Doctor's further ſatisfaction afterwards, I gave him a copy of a declaration or two I made, which only concerned myſelf, which he has printed. But as to any matter of arguments, ſtatutes, cuſtoms, uſages, and practices of the college in other viſitations, and the like, I never communicated to him one ſyllable, or gave him the leaſt light: for if I had deſigned it, things had been urged in ſeveral particulars with greater ſtrength and authority. But he mentioning in the cloſe of his book, that a member of the college had written a tract upon that ſubject; it was preſently concluded that I was the perſon. Tho' when I challenged the Doctor upon it, and deſired him to acquaint me who that Fellow was, he told me that it was Mr Charnock, ſome of whoſe papers he had ſeen, whoſe name I told him he ought to have mentioned to take off all poſſible umbrage and ſuſpicion from me. This ſilly and falſe ſuggeſtion was the only ground of the accuſation ſecretly managed againſt me; which ſoon after fell, and I heard no more of it (38).

Our author proceeds to mention ſeveral particulars relating to Oxford, after the arrival of the Prince of Orange, and among the reſt obſerves, that an aſſociation paper was ſigned by the Vice Chancellor, ſeveral Heads of Colleges, and ſome of the Canons of Chriſt-Church (39), to ſtand by that Prince. But that Dr Turner, Dr Adams, Dr Bury, Dr Halton, Dr Mills, Dr South, &c. refuſed to ſubſcribe it, as he was told by one of the non-ſubſcribers. Reflecting, ſays he, upon the horrible defection of theſe very heads of colleges, and others, who had been ſo zealous for the paſſing of the famous Decretum in a full Convocation 21 July 1683, and now renouncing that doctrine and their loyalty, and entering into a confederation or aſſociation in defence of the Prince of Orange, who came to pull the King his uncle and father-in-law out of his throne, and uſurp his crown. I ſoon after vented my juſt indignation againſt ſuch baſeneſs and wickedneſs, in theſe following lines:

(37) So he calls this MS.

(38) He ſtaid at Oxford 'till Auguſt 1, and then went to London. His ſuſpenſion from his preferments, for refuſing the oaths, taking place on that day, by the Act of Parliament for that purpoſe.

The accounts of the college being pretty well ſettled, the Doctor went with leave to London about the middle of January, and ſoon after viſited Lord Preſton, to aſk his advice about going to the King in France, in which he was diſcouraged by his Lordſhip. On the 12th of April, the day after the coronation, he went to Oxford, to preach before the univerſity on Sunday following; and he did accordingly, and his ſermon was printed ſoon after the news came of the diſmal earthquake at Jamaica, under the title of, A Diſcourſe concerning Divine Providence, in relation to National Judgments London, 1693. But the licence could not be obtained from the Biſhop of London's chaplain, before he had ſtruck out two or three paſſages, which he ſaid reflected upon the government. Our author had been ejected from his Fellowſhip at Magdalen-tide, 1692, but not before the following letter from Dr Hough, the Preſident, and now Biſhop of Oxford, was put into his hands on July 4, 1692, by Mr Shaw, to whom it was thus directed:

To William Shaw, Eſq; at his houſe in St James's ſtreet.

'My dear brother,

'You have a neighbour on the other ſide of the 'ſtreet, Dr Thomas Smith, Fellow of this college, to 'whom I muſt beg the favour of you to deliver a meſ- 'ſage in the name of myſelf and this ſociety, viz. that 'we deſire he will come down to Oxford and take the 'oaths, or ſend us a certificate of his having done 'ſome time before the 22d of this month, otherwiſe 'we can no longer forbear to elect another perſon into 'his place. You may aſſure him, it is not without a 'great deal of reluctance we proceed to this extremi- 'ty; but we have received a freſh command from the 'Queen, by the Judges of the Aſſize, requiring us to 'tender the oaths again to all ſuch as have not taken 'them, and to execute the laws immediately upon ſuch 'as refuſe. I am,

'Dear Sir,

'Your moſt affectionate friend,

'And faithful ſervant,

'JO. OXON.'

To this Dr Smith returned an anſwer the next day, in theſe terms:

'SIR,

'I deſire you to give my thanks to the Preſident 'for his civilities, which I ſhall always acknowledge; 'and withal to acquaint him, that I cannot come 'down to Oxford upon the accompt for which I am 'ſummoned; much leſſe can I or ſhall I ſend a certi- 'ficate, as I am required, preferring the peace of my 'mind and the ſatisfaction of my conſcience before the 'enjoying of my Fellowſhip, which, for the ſake of 'my principles, I am ready to loſe and be diſpoſſeſſed 'of: and that with the ſame (not to ſay a greater) 'willingneſſe and alacrity as I was firſt choſen and ad- 'mitted to it. That I wiſh all happineſſe and proſpe- 'rity to the college: and that I ſhall, during the re- 'mainder of the time, which, by the good providence 'of God, I have to live, endeavour to ſerve it, as I 'may, and as I ought, to the utmoſt of my power.

SMITH [GEORGE] (a), of Burnhall in the county of Durham, Eſq; eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was born at Durham, May 7, 1693; and after laying a good foundation of claſſical learning at Weſtminſter ſchool, was ſent to St John's-college in Cambridge. But he continued there only about two years, being removed to the ſiſter univerſity, and entered May 1, 1711, of Queen's-college, as well in regard to this being his uncle's college (b), as alſo for the ſake of having the learned Mr Edward Thwaites [A] for his tutor, who was a friend and correſpondent of his father; and being well ſkilled in the ſeptentrional literature, was the means of this his pupil's becoming a perfect maſter of the Saxon language, in which his father alſo took ſome pains to inſtruct him. He afterwards removed to the Inner Temple in London, in the view of ſtudying the Law, and he made a great proficiency in it, eſpecially in the more genteel and hiſtorical branch, his fortune ſetting him above purſuing the lucrative part by practice, for which he alſo became diſqualified by not complying to the government. This principle carried him into the Nonjuring Church, in which he took Holy Orders, and was made titular Biſhop of Durham. He imbibed theſe notions from his uncle, the learned Mr Hilkia Bedford [B], whoſe daughter

[A] His Tutor Mr Edward Thwaites.] This gentleman, then Fellow of Queen's-college, was likewiſe Regius Profeſſor of Greek in the univerſity. Beſides his accurate ſkill in the Greek and Latin tongues, as appears by his editions of Longinus and Ephraim Syrus, made himſelf a maſter of the ancient Septentrional languages. He ſuperviſed not only Dr Hickes's two books of thoſe languages for ſeven years ſucceſſively, while they were printing at the Theatre in Oxford, but gave the world the Saxon Heptateuch with King Alfred's preface, in a correct and beautiful edition, and encouraged Chriſtopher Rawlinſon, Eſq; a gentleman of the college to publiſh King Alfred's Saxon verſion of Boëthius de conſolatione philoſophiæ. Our Profeſſor alſo publiſhed a ſhort critical grammar, entituled Grammatica Anglo-Saxonica ex Hickeſiano linguarum Septentrionalium Theſauro excerpta, which is much eſteemed. He did not long ſurvive the publication of this ingenious performance. He had the misfortune by a fall from his horſe to break his leg, which being cut off by a ſurgeon, who had not properly ſecured the ſtump, an effuſion of blood enſued in the night, when having no perſon with him, he with much ado got out of bed, and had the courage and reſolution to fear it with his poker then in the fire. He died December 12, 1711, at the age of forty-four years, and was buried in Iſley church near Oxford (1).

[B] Hilkia Bedford.] This famous Nonjuring writer was the ſecond ſon of Helkia Bedford of Sibſey near Boſton in Lincolnſhire, (an ancient ſeat of the family) ſome time a merchant of London, by Mary his wife, eldeſt daughter to Richard Gardiner, Eſqr of Thame in Oxfordſhire, whoſe wife Anne was ſecond daughter to William Plat of Highgate (2). The founder of ſeveral Fellowſhips and Scholarſhips in St John's-college Cambridge, Mr Bedford was born in Hoſier-lane, London, July 23, 1663, and was burnt out of his father's houſe by the great fire in 1666. He was admitted of St John's college, Cambridge, November 4, 1679, the firſt ſcholar of Mr Plat's foundation, of which he likewiſe became a Fellow. He was afterwards introduced to the patronage of Heneage Finch, daughter Chriſtian, by Ellis his wife, ſecond daughter to William Cooper, of Scarborough, Eſq; he afterwards married; and ſhe brought him a numerous iſſue, whereof only two daughters ſurvived his death [C], which happened, after a very ſhort illneſs, on the fourth of November, 1756. He was buried, according to his own requeſt, in the church-yard joining to the chancel-wall of the church at Elwick, in which pariſh his ſeat of Burn-hall is ſituated. He is repreſented as an univerſal ſcholar. The Philoſopher, it is ſaid, found no ſcience out of the reach of his comprehenſive genius, nor the maſters of polite literature any graces in the claſſics, which had eſcaped his obſervance. He was particularly knowing in Antiquities, and had a curious collection of that kind [D]. But he applied himſelf much to the ſtudy of controverſial points, as appears by ſeveral excellent tracts which he publiſhed of that kind, to which, through his great modeſty, he never put his name. One of the lateſt of theſe pieces is intituled, Britons and Saxons not converted to Popery, in anſwer to a Popiſh book, bearing the title of England's Converſion and Reformation compared. He alſo ſupplied Mr Carte with ſome materials for his Hiſtory of England. But he is chiefly known in the republick of letters, by the edition of Bede's Hiſtorical Works (c), which was prepared for the preſs by his father, and publiſhed by this ſon at Cambridge, in 1722, folio, in a pompous manner, comprizing the venerable Father's Latin and King Alfred's Saxon verſion, compared with ancient manuſcripts; as alſo all his other hiſtorical works, with variety of remarkable readings, and brief but learned and uſeful notes; to which is added, his Life and Character, with curious remarks, &c. according to his father's direction, and ſome few additions prefixed by himſelf. An Abridgment of Bede, with his Life and explanatory notes, tranſlated into Engliſh from this edition, was publiſhed the following year in 8vo.

Earl of Winchelſea, to whom he was a conſtant companion and friend; but was deprived of his preferments in 1689, upon refuſing to take the oaths to the new government (3). In April 1714, being tried in the Court of King's Bench, before Lord Chief-Juſtice Parker, for writing, printing, and publiſhing, The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England aſſerted, in anſwer to Dr Higden's View and Defence, he was ſentenced to pay a fine of a thouſand marks, to remain a priſoner three years, and to give ſecurity for his good behaviour during life (4). He likewiſe publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation, done by himſelf, from the French, of an anſwer to Fontenelle's Hiſtory of Oracles; with a continuation of the ſame, in which is inſerted a letter of Mr Baker, the Antiquarian and his fellow-collegian, to him; wherein that gentleman obſerves, that the tranſlator had ſcarce finiſhed one laborious taſk, when he found himſelf obliged to undertake another of more labour and leſs ſatisfaction. Mr Bedford alſo publiſhed the Latin life of Dr Barwick, which he likewiſe tranſlated into Engliſh, with additions, and publiſhed it in 1724, 8vo. He alſo ſupplied Mr Hearne the Antiquary with Biſhop Fiſher's oration before King Henry VII. at Cambridge, anno 1507 (5). Our author had by his wife abovementioned, 1. Dr William Bedford, late Phyſician to Chriſt's-hoſpital London (6), and regiſter of the College of Phyſicians there, of which he was a Fellow and Cenſor, when he took the oaths as a qualification for that office (7). 2. Mr Thomas Bedford of Aſhburn in Derbyſhire, the editor of Hiſtoria Eccleſiæ Dunelmenſis (8), publiſhed, with his notes, in 1732, 8vo. 3. Dr John Bedford, a Phyſician at Durham, who married to his firſt wife a daughter of William Daviſon, of Bemiſh in that county, Eſq; ſiſter to the lady of Sir Robert Eden of Weſttaukland. His ſecond wife was Elizabeth, third daughter of Poſthumus Smith, Eſq; Commiſſary and Official-general of the Archdeaconry of Durham. He had alſo a third wife, Dulubella Horſeman, one of the co-heireſſes of Edward Horſeman, of Stretton in Rutlandſhire, Eſq; but has iſſue only by his ſecond marriage.

Elizabeth, who married Rowland Burdon of Newcaſtle in Northumberland, Eſq; who was heir to his uncle John Reeve, Eſq; of Great-Milton in Oxfordſhire; ſhe died in childbed * April 8, 1758, and was buried at Sedgefield, leaving iſſue a ſon, Rowland Burdon, born December 8, 1756. His grandfather, Rowland Burdon, married Martha, daughter of John Reeve, who was ſon to Mr Reeve of London, by Anne his wife, ſiſter to Francis Nourſe, Eſq; of Woodeaton in the county of Oxford, and became heir to his uncle Reeve, a rich Spaniſh merchant, who dying in November, 1757, worth about 100000 l. left the beſt part of it to the ſaid Rowland Burdon, his nephew, and the reſt to his youngeſt nephew, John Burdon, Eſq; of Great-Milton. This family of Burdon, which came from Stockton near Durham, took the name of Rowland for three ſucceſſions, from a marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of Rowland Wetherell of Stockton; by which marriage there was a prior alliance to the family of the Smiths.

* Of a daughter that died ſoon after.

Our author, George Smith, Eſq; had alſo a ſon, John Smith of Durham, M. D. who lived to the age of maturity. He was educated at Edinburgh, where applying himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic, he gave very extraordinary proofs of his abilities, of which he left a ſpecimen, in a book he publiſhed, intituled, Commentarius Medicus de aphthis noſtratibus, ſeu Belgarum Sprow. Lond. 1749, 8vo. He alſo publiſhed an elegant Latin theſis upon the theory of Phyſic, an exerciſe for his degree of Doctor in that faculty, which he took in November, 1747. He died in the twenty-ninth year of his age, 1752, at Durham, and was buried in Little St Mary's church there, leaving iſſue an only ſon George, a minor, by his wife Anne, daughter of Nicholas Shuttleworth of Durham, Eſq; a near relation of Richard Shuttlewoth, Eſq; of Gawthorp-hall in Lancaſhire, ſome time Member of Parliament for that county. The ſaid Dr John Smith was a perſon of great merit, virtue, and ſkill in his profeſſion, which ſkill was never more readily and attentively employed, than towards the comfort and relief of the poor. His ſole delight, indeed, was in acts of benevolence and charity towards his fellow-creatures. But the character of this ingenious young gentleman is with great truth expreſſed in the following epitaph:

Would'ſt thou be told, O reader! whoſe remains
This peaceful grave in ſacred truſt contains,
Know it is one whoſe inoffenſive plan
The good approv'd, and dignified the man.
Thro' whoſe juſt ways one gentle ſpirit mov'd,
In all reſpected, and in all belov'd.
So in thoſe lights that vary human life,
His duty pleas'd to parent, ſiſter, wife;
To theſe a friend, to no man elſe a foe;
His humble mind ev'n merit bluſh'd to ſhew:
Thus lov'd enough, tho' not enough enjoy'd,
He hail'd thoſe manſions oft his thoughts employed.
In life's gay ſpring bid the vain world adieu,
And left it's cares and fleeting joys to you (9).

[D] He had a curious collection of antiquities.] Among others, he was poſſeſſed of a curious antique pot, found in February 1756, in a field belonging to his eſtate. It contained 142 pieces of Scotiſh ſilver coin, about 300 years old, with which he was much delighted.

SMITH [Dr JOSEPH] (a), younger brother to the preceding Dr John Smith, became alſo an eminent Divine, and was likewiſe born at Lowther on the 10th of October, 1670, though not baptized 'till the 30th of that month. Loſing his father at five years of age, his mother took him, with the reſt of her family, to Guiſborough in Yorkſhire, where he received the firſt rudiments of Grammar learning: but in the latter end of the year 1681, by the advice of his eldeſt brother, who had been lately preferred at Durham (b), he was removed to the publick ſchool in that city [A], under Mr Thomas Batterſby, ſome time of Queen's-college in Oxford, a very diligent maſter; and, as the ſcholar had two qualities, inclination and genius, which can hardly fail of ſucceſs, he made a ſuitable proficiency, and was thought very fit for the univerſity at the age of fifteen. However, for further improvement, he was put under the tuition of Mr Francis Woodmas, then Minor Canon of that cathedral, a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed learning, and a compleat maſter of the claſſics. This ſtep, as well as his removal to Durham, was taken in compliance to the Dean, Dr Denys Granville, who now kindly invited him to his houſe, which he with pleaſure accepted of; and it was of no ſmall advantage to him in his future conduct: for here he received many uſeful inſtructions from this worthy patron, in whom he had alſo an excellent pattern of piety and learning ſet daily before his eyes. He continued at the Deanery 'till the Revolution; when Dr Granville, not being able to reconcile his conſcience to the new government, followed his maſter King James into France (c). At his departure, he preſſed this favourite youth to ſhare his fortunes, giving him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances to continue his kindneſs after their return (for that party much depended upon being recalled). But the young gentleman not being willing to run this riſk, nor to loſe the opportunity of an univerſity education, which was become his moſt ardent deſire, he reſolved now to purſue it; and receiving an account of the arrival of his eldeſt brother from Madrid ſoon after, he went with this deſign to meet him at London. During his ſhort ſtay at the metropolis, he found, in the room of Dean Granville, another patron in his godfather Sir Joſeph Williamſon; to whom being now firſt introduced, he met with a very kind reception. After a ſhort ſtay (d), he took his leave of his godfather, and departed with his recommendation to Oxford, where he was admitted, May 10, 1689, a ſcholar upon the foundation at Queen's-college; and being placed under the care of Mr William Lancaſter aforementioned, who was now become a noted tutor there, he imbibed ſuch ſalutary inſtructions, and acquired ſuch a fund of erudition both in divine and human literature, as rendered him an honour to the College and an ornament to the Church [B]. In 1693, being choſen a Taberder [C] of his college, he took his firſt degree in Arts in Michaelmas-term that year, and was intent on his ſtudies, when Sir Joſeph Williamſon took him from the college, by conſtituting him his Deputy-Keeper of the Paper-office at Whitehall; and Sir Joſeph being ſent ſoon after a Plenipotentiary to Ryſwick, Mr Smith accompanied him to that treaty [D] as his ſecretary. While he was abroad in this employ, the Univerſity created him Maſter of Arts by diploma, March 1, 1696. He was likewiſe elected in his abſence Fellow of his college, October 31, 1698, though not in Orders; the want of which qualification, though ordinarily requiſite, was diſpenſed with (e). He continued abroad ſome time longer with his godfather, making excurſions, and viſiting ſeveral foreign Courts, and obſerving the conſtitution and policy of each; upon which he left ſome memoirs in manuſcript, as he did alſo of the Ryſwick treaty: and he had a ſhare in the publication of The Acts and Negotiations, with the particular Articles at large of that Peace. In the interim, he kept up a correſpondence with ſeveral perſons of high character and eminent learning, who were of his acquaintance, both at home and abroad, having an excellent talent at the eaſy and familiar epiſtolary ſtyle, as he was alſo peculiarly happy in expreſſing himſelf in converſation. Theſe extraordinary accompliſhments procured him an offer of being promoted in the Secretary's office, by his godfather, which his old friend and aſſociate Mr Prior much perſwaded

(a) This name was given him by Sir Joſeph Williamſon, who ſtood godfather at the font, being then on a viſit to his friends at Bridekirk, where he was born.

(b) See his article.

(c) See his article.

(d) At this time he had a propoſal of marriage made to him from Mrs Sidney, a maiden lady of good birth and fortune; but he declined it then, and ſhe died of the ſmall-pox ſoon after.

(e) The ſame favour had been granted to Sir Joſeph Williamſon, as it was alſo to Mr Tickel the poet, both ſome time Fellows of the college.

[A] He was removed to Durham.] Soon after his coming thither, an unlucky accident happened to him, which had like to have proved fatal. Being at play with ſome of his ſchoolfellows, jumping from one tomb-ſtone to another, in the church-yard, he fell againſt one of the ſtones, and cut his ſkull near the temple very deep. That it was the cauſe of his left eye ſinking a little ever after, which, as he advanced in years, became more perceptible.

[B] An ornament to the college.] He had the good fortune to be contemporary with Mr Tanner and Mr Gibſon, both afterwards Biſhops, and well known in the learned world; and an intimacy was now contracted between the three, which ſubſiſted ever after. Biſhop Tanner, in his Will, directed his executor to conſult with Dr Smith and Dr Gibſon, in conjunction with Dr Conybeare Biſhop of Briſtol, about a proper perſon to finiſh his edition of Leland de Viris Illuſtr. & Boſtonus Burienſis; and Dr Gibſon, in the publication of his Quintilian, and ſome other authors, engaged the aſſiſtance of Mr Smith, who afterwards reaped the fruits of his friendſhip, as will be ſeen in the courſe of this memoir.

[C] He was now a Taberder.] The name of Taberder, though loſt every where elſe, ſtill continues in uſe at Queen's-college, where part of the members of that foundation (1) were uſually elected under twelve years of age, and diſtinguiſhed by that name, from taberdum, a ſhort gown they formerly wore, which was a coat without ſleeves, or a coat of mail, not unlike that worn by the Heralds of Arms; the coat of arms of the wearer was embroidered on it, on which account vanity brought it into much vogue among the nobility and gentry. The famous Jeffery Chaucer takes notice, in his prologue to the Canterbury Tales, of a well known inn on St Margaret's-hill, Southwark, noted by the ſign of the Taberd.

[D] He went with Sir Joſeph Williamſon to Ryſwic.] In the paſſage there happened ſuch a ſtorm, as put them into imminent danger of being ſhipwrecked in the river Maes. This incident is related, becauſe it proved an occaſion of Mr Smith's manifeſting an extraordinary firmneſs of mind; while moſt of the company were trembling under the apprehenſions of being every moment ſwallowed up in the gulph, he remained quite compoſed and reſigned.

perſwaded him to accept. He had alſo an offer from the Earl of Mancheſter, Charles Montague, to go with his Lordſhip as his ſecretary in his embaſſy to the Court of France, and another from Sir Philip Meadows, to accompany him in the ſame character, on his being appointed Envoy to the Court of Vienna. But he gave up all theſe hopeful proſpects for the ſake of the Church, to the ſervice of which his pious diſpoſition determined him to dedicate himſelf. In this reſolution, ſoon after his return in 1700 to Oxford, where he was moſt welcomly received by his friends, and much courted and admired by the politeſt perſons of the univerſity, he took Deacon's and Prieſt's Orders at Chriſt-Church, from the hands of Dr William Talbot, then Biſhop of that ſee; upon which occaſion he was often heard to ſay, that when he laid aſide his lay-habit, he did it with the greateſt pleaſure, as looking upon Holy Orders to be the higheſt honour that could be conferred upon him; and it was not long before he had an opportunity of exerciſing his new function. Dr Timothy Halton, then Provoſt of his college [E], being alſo Archdeacon of the dioceſe, gave him the donative of Iſley near Oxford, which belongs to the Archdeaconry. At the ſame time, he appointed him Divinity-lecturer in the college; and how acceptable thoſe favourite diſcourſes, (for ſo they were called) which he read in the diſcharge of that office, were to his auditors, is ſtill remembered to his praiſe. Upon Queen Anne's viſiting the univerſity in 1702, Mr Smith was pitched upon to addreſs her Majeſty with an oration; and in 1704, being elected Senior-Proctor of the univerſity, he diſcharged that office with remarkable prudence and diligence, and conſtantly attended the diſputations, and other exerciſes in the publick ſchools [F]. Dr Halton dying on the 21ſt of July this year, Mr Smith's friends propoſed him for a candidate to the Provoſtſhip, but he declined it, and employed his intereſt, which was very great, in the behalf of his quondam tutor Dr Lancaſter, who by that means carried the election, notwithſtanding he had quitted his Fellowſhip ſome time before [G]. This gentleman, as well as [E] Dr Timothy Halton, Provoſt of Queen's-college.] This gentleman was the ſon of Miles Halton, of Greyſtock in Cumberland, Eſq; High-Sheriff of that county, and younger brother to Emmanuel Halton, of Wingfield manor in Derbyſhire, Eſq; a very good Mathematician and Algebraiſt (2). Dr Halton was extremely well qualified for ſo important a poſt as the Provoſtſhip of his college, as alſo for that of Vice-Chancellor of the univerſity, which he filled with great honour in the moſt troubleſome times, though upon that account he was very hardly prevailed on to undertake it; as appears by ſome letters from his friends, particularly Biſhop Fell, Sir Leoline Jenkins, and Biſhop Compton. We ſhall inſert a copy of this laſt, which is in ſubſtance the ſame with the reſt.

'Dear Sir,

'Give me leave, for the ſake of the publick, to 'make a moſt unwelcome propoſition to you, that you 'would be content to be Vice-Chancellor one year 'more; as you are, without a compliment, the moſt 'fit and able perſon. In good truth, this is not very 'kindly propoſed; but the preſent juncture of affairs 'ſeems ſo earneſtly to require it, that I could not con'tain. This requeſt I hope you will oblige me in, 'and let me beg of you, in the freedom of friendſhip, 'and under the ſeal of it, to let me know, if any 'thing may be more particularly grateful to you than 'another, as ſome recompence for ſo great a truſt and 'trouble. And in all things I would deſire you to 'believe me,

'Dear Sir,

'Your very affectionate friend and brother,

May 2, 1685. Hen. London.'

Dr Halton had very conſiderable preferments beſides the Provoſtſhip, being Canon of St David's, Prebendary of Brecknock, and Archdeacon of Llanvais in the ſaid county; as he was likewiſe Archdeacon of Oxford, he was Rector too of Charleton * upon Otmore, and many years Juſtice of Peace for Oxfordſhire. His firſt ſtep to preferment was his being made chaplain to Dr Lucy, Biſhop of St David's, by whom he was promoted to the dignities in Wales, and he obtained the Archdeaconry of Oxford by the intereſt of Sir Joſeph Williamſon. As to his character, he was not only learned in his own profeſſion as a Divine, but well ſkilled in the Common as well as Canon Law, and no leſs eminent for keeping up a ſtrict regularity and diſcipline in the ſeveral publick ſtations to which he was advanced, without regarding perſons, or courting favour or rewards †. He had ſomething awful and auſtere in his look, but was of a humane, friendly, and generous, diſpoſition. He was a conſiderable benefactor to his college in his life-time, as well as at his death (3). His corpſe was depoſited in the old chapel, but has been ſince removed into the vault under the new one.

(3) Particularly in his donation of an eſtate at Llanvais, which dropped to him while Archdeacon of Brecknock.

[F] He was a prudent and diligent Proctor.] While he was in this office, he had the appellation of the handſome Smith, being tall and genteel and of a comely and engaging countenance, in oppoſition to his colleague Mr Smith, of St John's-college, the junior Proctor, who had a ſwarthy complexion. Their diligence in attending the publick diſputations provoked Mr Tickel's wit, who obſerved, there was a ſtorm work at the ſchools, for that the two Smiths made the ſparks fly In the exerciſe of this office coming once to a tavern, he ſtepped into ſome company, one of whom happened to be a relation of Prince George of Denmark: upon our magiſtrate's admoniſhing them for ſome irregularity, they began to ſpeak to one another in French diſgracefully of him, for ſo abruptly intruding upon them. Hereupon Mr Smith acquainted them, in the ſame language, with the nature and duty of his office, which, with his polite addreſs to them, as being foreigners, brought them to behave with much complaiſance; ſo that they prevailed upon him to ſtay ſome time with them, and were ſo much pleaſed with his converſation, that they gladly complied with his invitation to ſpend the next evening with him in his college; and always after treated him with great reſpect.

[G] Dr Lancaſter had quitted his Fellowſhip ſome time before.] Upon that account, the election was diſputed by his competitor Mr Thompſon, who being an actual Fellow, appealed to the Archbiſhop of York, their Viſitor (4). But his Grace confirmed the election, upon the opinion of his commiſſary, Dr Thomas Bouchier, who heard the cauſe. Dr Bouchier was likewiſe Regius Profeſſor of Civil Law in the univerſity, and had the reputation of being one of the ableſt and moſt eminent Civilians of his time. This Provoſt, Dr Lancaſter, was born at Bampton in Weſtmoreland, and educated at Queen's-college; was ſome time maſter of Barton-ſchool near Lowther (5), and afterwards became chaplain to Dr Compton, Biſhop of London, whoſe kinſwoman he married (6), and was promoted by him to the archdeaconry of Middleſex, as alſo to the vicarage of St Martin's in the Fields (7). But the Biſhop's right of preſentation being conteſted, Dr Gouch was nominated by the other claimant, pendente lite. However, the cauſe being determined in favour of Dr Lancaſter, he was confirmed in the vicarage (8). He was ſome time Vice-Chancellor of the univerſity (9), and had the offer of the Biſhoprick of St David's, which he refuſed, being fond of a collegiate life, and intent upon carrying on the buildings of his college. He had been very early ſent abroad, by the order and at

as his predeceſſor, proved a conſiderable benefactor to the college-buildings. In which ſpirit, he began to raiſe thoſe on the ſouth ſide, upon the benefaction of ſix thouſand pounds left by Sir Joſeph Williamſon for that purpoſe; in procuring which conſiderable donation, Mr Smith had been very inſtrumental [H]: and, in return, Dr Lancaſter, in 1704-5, preſented him firſt to Ruſſell-Court-chapel, and then to the Lecture-ſhip of Trinity-chapel, in Conduit-ſtreet Hanover-ſquare (f); which were both at that time in his gift, as Vicar of St Martin's in the Field's Weſtminſter. Theſe promotions brought Mr Smith to town, and he was ſoon after appointed chaplain to Edward Villiers Earl of Jerſey, Lord-Chamberlain, to whom he had the honour of being known at Ryſwick, where his Lord-ſhip was one of the Plenipotentiaries. My Lord now took him into his friendſhip and intimacy, not only introduced him to the Queen, and gave him an opportunity of preaching ſeveral times before her Majeſty, but obtained an actual promiſe of the firſt Canonry that ſhould become vacant in the church of Windſor; which he moſt deſired, as being neareſt to his other preferments. But this and all other proſpects in view from the ſame quarter were cut ſhort by his Lordſhip's death. Mr Smith had alſo the misfortune to loſe another view of promotion, by the death of William-Henry Granville, nephew to Dean Granville, and the laſt Earl of Bath of that family; to whom he was ſome time tutor, and read a courſe of lectures, ſome of which were upon points of religion, while his Lordſhip reſided with his aunt, the Lady Auverquerque, ſiſter to the Earl of Grantham. But having made two campaigns in Flanders, he died of the ſmall-pox in May 1711 (g). Mr Smith attended him during his illneſs to the laſt moments, and received a token from him, as a memento of his eſteem and affection (b); of which his Lordſhip had alſo, on many occaſions, before given diſtinguiſhing proofs. The death of theſe two great and valuable friends, which happened ſo near together, was a very great concern, as well as diſappointment, to our author. However, in the interim, having accumulated his degrees in Divinity, November 2, 1708 (i), he had been preſented by his college, on the 29th of the ſame month, to the Rectory of Knights-Emham, and the Donative of Upton-Grey, both in the county of Southampton: ſoon after which, he reſolved to perform his engagement, to marry Mrs Mary Lowther [I], niece to the late Provoſt Dr Halton, having

He ſided with the High-Church party in Queen Anne's reign, and was one of the bail for Dr Sacheverell. He died February 4, 1716, of the gout in his ſtomach, and was buried in the old church of St Martin's in the Fields. We have a ſermon of his preached on Lam. v. 16. before the Houſe of Commons, and printed in 1696, 4to. as alſo a Latin ſpeech, ſpoken upon preſenting Dr Jane, Canon of Chriſt-Church, to be Prolocutor of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, when that divine was choſen againſt Dr Tillotſon in 1689.

[H] Dr Smith was inſtrumental in procuring Sir Joſeph Williamſon's benefaction.] Upon ſome ſlight ſhewn by the college, Sir Joſeph had made a Will, wherein he had given but little to his alma mater, having diſpoſed of this intended benefaction there, towards erecting and endowing a college at Dublin, by the name of Queen's-college, the provoſts whereof were to be choſen from Queen's-college in Oxford. But ſoon after his arrival in Holland with Mr Smith, being ſeized with a dangerous fit of the gout, he ſent for his ſecretary, who had before reconciled him to the place of his education, and calling him to his bed-ſide, whiſpered him in the ear to go to his bureau, where he would find his Will in ſuch a drawer, which he ſhould take out, and make the alteration in favour of his own college, as abovementioned. All was done and ready to be executed, when the matter was in ſome danger of a miſcarriage, by the coming in of Sir Joſeph's lady (12), before the paper had been read to him. Our ſecretary, well knowing Sir Joſeph had no mind her Ladyſhip ſhould be acquainted with the affair, endeavoured to conceal it; which ſhe perceiving, ſaid briſkly, Mr Smith, What have you got there? To which he readily replied, Nothing but news, Madam; meaning ſuch news as ſhe was not to know: and ſhe was put off by this ſeaſonable and ready turn from enquiring any further.

(12) This lady, Katharine Obrien, Baroneſs Clifton, became the widow of Henry Lord Obrien, in Auguſt 1678; and in December following engaged with Sir Joſeph Williamſon, then Secretary of State. She was ſiſter and ſole heir to Charles Duke of Richmond, and brought Sir Joſeph large poſſeſſions in Kent and elſewhere, beſides the hereditary ſtewardſhip of Graveſend. having contracted a friendſhip with her while reſident in the college. In 1716, the Doctor exchanged the donative of Upton-Grey with Dr Grandorge [K], Prebendary of Canterbury, for the rectory of St Dionis Lime-ſtreet, London, to which he was preſented by that Dean and Chapter, on the 10th of February this year. While the cure of ſouls committed to his charge was chiefly confined to the pariſhes he was concerned in, it was amiable to ſee with what labour he applied himſelf to the diſcharge of his miniſtry, how orthodox in his doctrine, how warm and affectionate in his private exhortations; and as he was zealous in all the ſpiritual exerciſes of his parochial function, ſo was he happy in ſuch a force and readineſs of expreſſion, and command of reading and judgment, that even in the moſt difficult caſes he convinced at the ſame time that he informed. At the ſame time, he kept a careful and tender eye upon the ſtate of his pariſh at St Dionis, of which he was incumbent above forty years. Her ſaid grandfather ſerved his Majeſty King Charles the Firſt in the poſt of Colonel of Horſe, and was alſo Governor of the town and caſtle of Pontefract in Yorkſhire, at the firſt ſiege of that garriſon, December 25, 1644, when he, with his brother Chancellor Lowther, then adjutant, and Gerard his ſon, with ſeveral other of his kindred, behaved valiantly, and at length became great ſufferers in the royal cauſe, beſides his whole eſtate being confiſcated for his loyalty (15).

Mrs Mary Lowther was endowed with many amiable qualities and Chriſtian graces; ſhe died April 29, 1745, and was buried where ſeveral of the family lie, in the church of Kidlington near Oxford; ſhe brought Dr Smith three children, Joſeph, Anne, and William. This laſt died young, and was buried in the north church-yard of St Dionis London.

The firſt, Joſeph Smith, Eſq; LL.D. of Kidlington near Oxford, is ſtill living, and has iſſue one ſon, Joſeph Bouchier Smith, and a daughter, Mary Smith, by his ſecond wife, Elizabeth, only daughter of Dr James Bouchier, of Hanborough in Oxfordſhire, who ſucceeded his father, Dr Thomas Bouchier abovementioned, in the Regius Profeſſorſhip of the Civil Law at Oxford, and as Commiſſary of the dioceſe of Canterbury ‖; and was eſteemed for the quickneſs of his parts and knowledge in his profeſſion. By his father's marriage to Mrs Aſtell, who was niece to Sir Thomas Millington, of Gadfield in Hants (Phyſician in Ordinary to King William and Queen Mary, as alſo to Queen Anne, and Preſident of the College of Phyſicians †), this family came into a very conſiderable fortune, which, after ſome years conteſt at Law, was recovered, by the extraordinary aſſiduity of Dr William Bouchier, a Phyſician of great abilities, now living at Charleton-houſe near Sunbury in Surrey, who is another ſon of Dr Thomas Bouchier.

† A further account of him may be ſeen in Carter's Hiſtory of Cambridge.

2. Anne Smith is alſo ſtill living, the wife of Major James Hargrave, by whom ſhe has iſſue one ſon, Joſeph-Smith Hargrave, a minor. She was firſt married to the Reverend Mr William Lamplugh, once Fellow of New-college in Oxford, and preſented by that ſociety to the rectory of Alton-Barnes in Wiltſhire, and at the ſame time he became Rector of Sutton-Mandeville in that county, by an exchange for the rectory of Soham in Suffolk, which had been procured for him by his father-in-Law Dr Smith *, by whoſe intereſt he alſo obtained a Prebend of Lincoln, and the lecture-ſhip of Conduit-ſtreet chapel near Hanover-ſquare. Dr Smith alſo would willingly have reſigned the donative of Paddington to him, but the Biſhop of London, Dr Gibſon, did not approve of the propoſal, without a reſignation of Soham; which being equal in value to Paddington, the deſign did not take place. Mr Lamplugh's life was cut ſhort by the ſtone in 1737 ‡, after a ſhort enjoyment of his rectory of Alton-Barnes, where he had laid out about 600 l. in rebuilding the parſonage and outhouſes; which benefaction is recorded in a memorial of him in that church. He was grandſon to Dr Thomas Lamplugh, Archbiſhop of York, of whom we have ſome account by Le Neve §; to which we ſhall add the following remarkable anecdote, from the manuſcript already cited of Dr Thomas Smith, who relates, that, 'January 27, 1688-9, the 'Archbiſhop told him, the Biſhop of London [Dr 'Compton] ſhewed him the original Aſſociation-paper, 'which he would have had him to ſubſcribe. But he 'refuſed, aſking London, How he could do it? The 'Biſhop of London replied, among other things, that 'it was a juſt revenge.' Dr Smith proceeds thus: 'My Lord of York ſaid, that upon his waiting upon 'the King, after he came from Exeter, having kiſſed 'his Majeſty's hand, the King was pleaſed to take 'him into his cloſet, and then thanked him for coming 'up, ſaying, that he was an old cavalier, and further 'adding, that he would reward him: the Biſhop re'plied, that his duty was his reward. The King then 'told him, that he would make him Archbiſhop of 'York: upon which he fell upon his knees, deſiring 'his Majeſty not to do it. Sir, ſaid he, I can ſerve 'your Majeſty better in the Weſt, where I am known. 'The King bid him riſe, that it ſhould be ſo. Upon 'his coming into his dreſſing-room, the King ordered 'my Lord Preſton, then Preſident, to draw up a war'rant immediately for it.—That upon his doing ho'mage, the King ſaid, Remember, my Lord, what 'you have promiſed me: he anſwered, Ay, Sir, as 'long as I live. That upon the morning of the 'King's departure, the King was pleaſed to tell him, 'that he was chaſed away from his own houſe by the 'P. of O. and deſired him to pray for him. The 'Archbiſhop prayed God to bleſſe his Majeſty, ſaying, 'that he was an old man, and that if he ſaw his Ma'jeſty's face no more, he hoped they ſhould meet to'gether in Heaven. The Archbiſhop told me further, 'ſays Dr Smith, that he had heard that the P. of O. 'ſhould ſay of him, that he had left his flock, and 'committed the care of it to him, ſomebody replying '(but he could not learn the name of the perſon), that 'he had got an Archbiſhoprick by it. But, ſays the 'Archbiſhop to me, Doctor, I did my duty in coming 'away, without any deſign or expectation; beſides, 'if I had ſtaid at Exeter, I might have been ſuſpected 'to have been of the Spiritual Lords, whom the P. of 'O. mentions to have invited him into England.'

[K] Dr Grandorge.] This gentleman was ſome time Fellow of Magdalen-college in Oxford, and chaplain to the Earl of Thanet, who preſented him to the rectory of Hothfield in Kent; when he reſigned the rectory of St Dionis, as not within ſtatutable diſtance, to Dr Smith, for Upton Grey, which being a donative, was not within the ſtatute. Dr Grandorge was, not improbably, of the family of Andrew Grandorge, of Caën in Normandy, the inventor of weaving figures in linnen cloth, called damaſk, in the XVIIth century (16). The doctor died January 19, 1729-30, and was buried in Magdalen-college-chapel, under a ſtone marked only with his name, and date of his death.

application and influence, and his own generosity, in setting a good example, besides a handsome chased brass chandelier, pendant on iron-work, which he put up at his own expence (k). He likewise annually bought a great number of religious tracts, and distributed them among his parishioners, and he left there a handsome legacy to the poor. He was also a considerable benefactor to the parsonage and glebe houses [L]. After the accession of King George the First, he was again introduced to Court by the Earl of Grantham, Lord-Chamberlain to his late Majesty (l) King George the Second, then Prince of Wales, and was made chaplain to the Princess, by whom he was very graciously received; and he constantly attended in his turn of waiting, 'till her Royal Highness's accession to the Throne, when, notwithstanding the interest he had at that time, yet, as he never made any application for himself, and was too much inclined to the high-party, being called the Hanover Tory (though in reality no person more moderate than he in his political principles, nor better attached to the constitutional establishment), a stop was thereby put to his farther promotion from the Court, though he continued still her Majesty's chaplain, and was frequently invited to preach at the royal chapel of St James's. However, this disappointment was made up by his good friend Bishop Gibson, who, from the time of their being chums, or chamber-fellows, at Queen's-college, to his Lordship's death, ever retained a very great esteem and affection for him, and gave very early proofs of it; particularly in recommending him to Archbishop Tenison, to succeed himself as his Grace's chaplain; which, though prevented by a pre-engagement, yet this friend's kind intention was the same: and he was under very great obligations to him on many other accounts, and might have been under much greater, at the time when his Lordship was in high favour with the Ministry, could he have prevailed upon him to distinguish himself in his political principles, to which his Lordship took some pains to perswade him. But nevertheless, after the Bishop's advancemement to the see of Lincoln, he promoted the Doctor to the Prebend of Dunholm (m) in that church; and, upon his Lordship's translation to London, he gave the donative of Paddington in Middlesex to this friend, who appointed an afternoon lecture, at the request of the inhabitants, and procured two acts of Parliament, wherein he was at a considerable part of the expence, for twice enlarging the church-yard, which before was too small for the large number of burials there [M]. The same patron also promoted him, on the 8th of May, 1728, to the Prebend of St Mary Newington, in the cathedral church of St Paul's, on the demise of Dr Millington; which Prebend proved very advantageous to him ‖: notwithstanding, at the Bishop's request, he gave the rectory of Newington annexed to the prebend, to the present incumbent Dr Ralph Thoresby, son to the Antiquarian of that name (n). This request was very readily granted, Dr Smith not being desirous to hold a third benefice with cure of souls *. In the interim, as soon as the new church of St George's Hanover-square was finished, he was chosen lecturer, in March 1724-5, without any personal suit, being then confined by a fistula, occasioned, as was thought, by too intense an application to his studies. He had been some time, as is already observed, Lecturer of Trinity-chapel, now belonging to this parish, and in that station had gained a popularity without courting it. In reality, by his clear pathetic elocution, and graceful gesture, added to the matter and method of his performances in the pulpit, he might be justly reckoned one of the most eloquent and instructive preachers of his time, and even to the extremity of old age, that flowing stream of eloquence did not cease. The fistula having brought him into some danger of a consumption, he went to Bath, where he received great benefit; but his eyes remained in such a weak condition [N], that he was incapable for a time of much application to study. In 1731, he resigned his lectureship, and was succeeded in it by Dr Savage, then Rector of Clothal in Hertfordshire †. This resignation was the consequence of his promotion to the Provostship of his college in Oxford, to which he was elected on the twentieth of October, 1730, without his privity or knowledge, on the demise of Dr John Gibson, a near relation to the Bishop. As he had a particular affection for the college, he was much pleased with this

(k) Which, as the inscription on it shews, he gave in 1740.

(l) This noble Lord gave very considerable sums annually to the poor, and Dr Smith, whom he frequently consulted, received from him at different times some hundreds of pounds, to be distributed according to his own discretion.

* He was already possessed of St Dionis and Paddington, and it was a rule with the Bishop not to allow any of his clergy to hold three such benefices.

† Dr Smith had before resigned the lecture of Trinity-chapel in Conduit-street to Mr Offory Medlicott, one of the King's chaplains, and now endeavoured to serve him in that of St George's. N. B. This Mr Medlicott, of Tyschurst in Sussex, who came from Ireland, married first the daughter of General Pepper, a native of St Clement's in the suburbs of Oxford, and had to his second wife Mrs Pakenham, mother to Thomas Pakenham, Esq; now Lord Longford of Ireland.

‖ He renewed four or five times the lease of an estate of 1000 l. per annum, held of him as Prebendary by Sir Thomas Abney and his heirs, and raised the fine considerably, upon comparing the Parliament survey with the improvements made since. And he refused renewing the last time, except on the usual terms, not withstanding his great age and infirmities, saying, that unless he renewed on such conditions as were not prejudicial to his successors, he would sooner lose the benefit of it to himself, which was the means of his bringing them some time after to a compliance.

[L] He was a benefactor to the glebe houses.] The leases of these expiring in his time, he proposed, upon the renewal, to give them to Queen's college; but this design coming to the knowledge of the Dean and Chapter, they refused to renew the leases to him, tho' that privilege had never been denied to his predecessors; resolving to make use of this opportunity, as he was now far advanced in years, of letting the houses go at a rack-rent, 'till his death at least, for the augmentation of the living to the benefit of his successors.

[M] He procured two acts of Parliament for enlarging the church-yard.] He built some houses here, particularly one for himself, to which he was obliged afterwards to retire with his family for his health. The parsonage house, by his predecessor's neglect, was lost for want of being at the expence to keep it up. It adjoined to the church-yard, and is now, since the rebuilding of it, converted into a farm-house.

[N] His eyes were then in a weak condition.] Upon that account, he was obliged to have his sermons transcribed, which, by frequent alterations, were much interlineated. This office was performed, partly by Mr Alan Fisher, a while domestic tutor to his son, and afterwards, by Dr Smith's nomination (17), master of St Bee's school in Cumberland; and partly by Mr Anthony Thompson, who was born at Shap in Westmoreland, and being sent to Queen's-college, was recommended by the doctor to the Earl of Waldegrave, to be tutor to his two sons, the present Earl and his brother, and who afterwards going chaplain to that noble Lord, on his embassy to France, was, on the sudden death of his Lordship, in April 1741, appointed to act as Minister for the English Court there; in which post he continued, 'till the breaking out of the last war with France, when returning home, he was, by the interest of the Duke of Newcastle, promoted to the rich Deanery of Raphoe in Ireland (18), where he died in November 1756; but his son and family are settled there.

this election, eſpecially with the honourable manner of it, and he took great delight in ſatisfying all the demands of ſo important a poſt. How ſollicitous he was in keeping good order and diſcipline, with what gravity he preſided, with what lenity he admoniſhed, and with what juſtice and impartiality he behaved to all, ſhewing an example of piety and all ſocial virtues, is well remembered, and needs not be mentioned. He was not only an encourager of learning and all liberal ſciences, but the greateſt enemy to vice and all heretical doctrines. In this ſpirit, he drew up an excellent collection or ſeries of queſtions in Divinity, which he inſtituted for the uſe of the ſtudents of his college, and they were of infinite ſervice in grounding them early in their religious principles: ſo that the college now flouriſhed extremely, and many perſons of quality and fortune were educated under his mild and prudent government (o); and as he was always zealous in promoting it's welfare, it was the greateſt pleaſure to him to find his undertakings ſucceſsful, and in order thereto, he did, in 1731, draw up a ſtate of the college buildings, with an ichnography of the whole, and had cuts of the ſeveral parts of the ſaid buildings engraved in 4to. And when the Prince of Orange came to ſee the univerſity after his marriage, he preſented his Royal Highneſs with one of the books, as he had done before to the Queen (p). He was particularly obliged to his good friends, the Right Honourable Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, as well as to Colonel Selwin, Treaſurer to Queen Caroline, for their kind offices, at his requeſt, in procuring her Majeſty's benefaction of a thouſand pounds, which ſhe gave towards finiſhing the college edifice; and, as it greatly owed it's beauty and ornament to this royal munificence, Dr Smith had her Majeſty's ſtatue in marble placed over the gate-way, in an open temple, ſupported by eight duplicated columns, crowned with entablatures, upon which ſtand eight arches covered with a tholus; ſo that the whole together makes a noble appearance (q). After it was finiſhed, the Queen ſent for the Provoſt, and thanking him for the reſpect he had ſhewn to her, promiſed him another purſe of equal value with the former [O]; which would certainly have been fulfilled, had her Majeſty lived a month longer [P]. Studuit Henric. v. ſub Patrono ſuo Henrico Beaufort Cancellario Acad. poſtea Epiſcopo Winton, & Cardinali.* Pointer, in his Antiquities of Oxford, mentions an inſcription to the ſame purport, which was in Henry the Vth's chamber in the college, with his picture in braſs.

(q) A model was firſt projected by Dr Lancaſter, but improved and executed according to the ſtyle of the Luxemburg palace at Paris, by N. Hawkſmoore, a diſciple of Sir Chriſtopher Wren; and the ſtatue was performed by Mr [now Sir Henry] Cheere, of Weſtminſter, Knt.

[O] The Queen promiſed him another thouſand pounds.] This appears by the college regiſter, and her Majeſty's benefaction is particularly taken notice of to her honour, by Dr Thomas Shaw, D.D. and F.R.S in the dedication of his travels to Barbary and the Levant, inſcribed to the King, with a view of the frontiſpiece of this building at the head, curiouſly engraved. As the book has been well received by the publick, and, indeed, contains many intereſting particulars relating to thoſe countries not before obſerved, we ſhall oblige our readers with a ſuccinct account of the worthy author, as follows: He was born about the year 1691 (19), at Kendal in Weſtmoreland, and having gone through the ſchool there, was removed to Queen's-college; and having taken his degrees in Arts at the regular times, he went into Holy Orders, and was appointed chaplain to the Engliſh factory at Algiers. During that interval, he ſpent ſome part of his time in travelling into ſeveral parts of Europe, Aſia, and Africa; and on his return home, he was choſen Fellow of his college, took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, and publiſhed the abovementioned account of his travels at Oxford in 1738, in folio. He alſo beſtowed ſome pieces of antiquity in coins, &c. which he had collected in his travels, on that univerſity (20). In 1740, he was nominated by his college Principal of St Edmund-hall, to which he was a conſiderable benefactor in it's buildings, and was preſented at the ſame time to the vicarage of Bramley in Hants. He was alſo Regius-Profeſſor of Greek at Oxford 'till his death, which happened on the 18th of September, 1751, at Bramley, where he was buried, and a handſome monument, with an inſcription in Latin *, was ſoon after erected to his memory, by his widow, the relict of Edward Holden, Eſq; ſome time the Engliſh Conſul at Algiers. His monument aſſures us, with great truth, that he was a good natured man, and his book is an evidence of his learning both human and divine; a French tranſlation of which was printed in 1743, 4to. with ſeveral notes and emendations, communicated by our author to the editor, who dedicated it to the King of Pruſſia, and advertized it as a better edition than the original Engliſh (21), which was true enough at that time. But Dr Clayton, Biſhop of Clogher in Ireland, having attacked the travels, in his Deſcription of the Eaſt, &c. our author publiſhed A Supplement to a book of Travels and Obſervations, &c. wherein ſome objections lately made againſt it are fully conſidered and anſwered, with ſeveral additional Remarks and Diſſertations. Oxford, 1746, folio. In the preface to which he takes notice, that this ſupplement, beſides other occaſional diſſertations, contains a greater number of notes and emendations, than were inſerted in the French edition, whereby the original will now become more full and perfect than the tranſlation. Accordingly, after the Doctor's death came out a ſecond edition, with great improvements Lond. 1757, 4to. The contents of the ſupplement are interwoven in this edition, and the improvements were made and the edition prepared for the preſs, by the author himſelf; who expreſsly preſents the work with theſe additions, alterations, and improvements, to the reader, as an eſſay towards reſtoring the ancient geography, and placing in a proper light the natural and ſometimes civil hiſtory of theſe countries where he travelled. The doctor was ſucceeded at St Edmund hall, as alſo at Bramley, by Dr Fothergill, who was likewiſe ſome time Fellow, and an eminent tutor at Queen's college; where, on the death of Dr Joſeph Smith abovementioned, he was invited by ſome of the members of the college to ſtand for the Provoſtſhip againſt Dr Joſeph Browne, the preſent Provoſt, who carried the election by a majority of only one vote. Dr Fothergill died Octob. 12, 1760, of a dropſy (under which he had for ſome time laboured), two days after his return to Oxford from his native place at Ravinſtandale in Weſtmoreland, where he had been for the recovery of his health. He was buried in the chapel at St Edmunds-hall there, leaving the character of a perſon of great parts and underſtanding, and of a moſt faithful and exact memory: he was alſo eminent for his learning and for his performances in the pulpit, ſeveral of which are publiſhed (22). His natural diſpoſition was tender and humane, modeſt and humble; his heart was animated with a ſincere and truly Chriſtian piety, and the whole tenor of his words and actions ſuch as denoted his being always attentive to this awful truth, that he muſt one day be accountable to God for them.

[P] Had her Majeſty lived a month longer.] The following lines were intended by Dr Smith to be inſerted, in gratitude to her memory, among the Oxford verſes on her death †.

Above all empire, in her early youth,
True piety ſhe priz'd, and ſacred truth.
Oft have I ſeen her, with ſubmiſſive ear,
The oracles of God unfolded hear.
Oft have I ſeen her, with ſeraphic love,
Her prayers preferring to the throne above:
Where now the praiſes to the King of Kings,
Triumphant, with angelic notes, ſhe ſings.
Of Britiſh freedom ſhe approv'd the cauſe,
Nor wiſh'd for power to rule above the laws;

† In the Oxford verſes on Queen Caroline's death, is a Latin poem on that occaſion, inſcribed to Dr Smith by Mr Hobſon, ſome time Fellow of Queen's college, and author of a poem intituled, Chriſtianity the Light of the Moral World, in 4to. 1745.

Doctor had the honour of being acquainted with the Lady Elizabeth Haſtings, who, out of reſpect to him and his recommendation, had ſettled ſome conſiderable exhibitions on St Edmund-hall, an appendant to Queen's-college; but, on his advancement to the Provoſtſhip, ſhe choſe on that account to remove them thither, when he drew up rules and orders, at her Ladyſhip's requeſt, for the regulation and good government of the ſaid exhibitioners [Q]. Laſtly, our Provoſt was more than ordinarily ſollicitous, to procure the payment of Sir Francis Bridgeman's large donation for exhibitions (r), which was at a ſtand for ſome years, and given up for loſt; but by his diligence and penetration, he did with great difficulty gain his point, though there were ſo many parties concerned to be brought to agreement, ſome of which he happened to be well acquainted with. Accordingly he obtained a decree in Chancery, to oblige Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Bart. [R] in whoſe hands it lay, to pay the money juſt before he abſconded, otherwiſe it would abſolutely have been loſt. Dr Smith was likewiſe inſtrumental in obtaining the donation of John Michel of Richmond in Surrey, Eſq; towards the buildings, and his founding eight additional Fellowſhips and four Scholarſhips there [S]. He did alſo, by his own perſonal intereſt and ſollicitation, (r) Viz. Six or ſeven of 20 l. per ann. each, as the income of the eſtates to be purchaſed would admit. The ſum was about 4500 l. beſides 500 l. to the college buildings, and 250 l. for coſts of ſuit, and a licence of mortmain, which he obtained. Whence the college was alſo enabled to take and hold Mr Michel's donation. All which he completed May 25, 1734.

Science and letters were her favourite care,
And high attainments grac'd the royal fair;
She could each hour in doing good employ,
And caus'd the widow's heart to ſing with joy.
But theſe are themes my weak eſſays refuſe,
Fit for the labours of a nobler muſe:
Had Addiſon, reſerv'd by milder fate,
Surviv'd to ſee our heroine's courſe compleat;
Amidſt the foremoſt, in the rolls of fame,
Fix'd would have ſtood great CAROLINA's name.

[Q] Rules for the conduct of the ſaid exhibitioners.] For theſe uſes her Ladyſhip left her manor and eſtate of Whetdale in Yorkſhire, of about the value of 160 l. per annum; and the exhibitioners are to be elected by lot, from eight principal ſchools in that county, and from two in Weſtmoreland and two in Cumberland. This eminently pious and charitable lady was daughter to Theophilus, the ſeventh Earl of Huntingdon, by Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of Sir John Lewis, of Ledſtone in Yorkſhire, Bart. from whom deſcended the ſeveral manors and eſtates ſhe was poſſeſſed of in that county (23). She was pleaſed often to conſult Dr Smith in many of her charitable donations, which were very large and extenſive. He had a frequent correſpondence with her on this and other ſubjects, particularly upon the abjuration oath, and his opinion of the Methodiſts. The doctor had alſo a correſpondence upon divine and moral ſubjects, with the celebrated Mrs Aſtell, and communicated ſome particulars concerning her to Mr Ballard, who wrote her life or memoirs (24).

(23) A farther account of her Ladyſhip and her benefactions may be ſeen in Barnard's Life of her in 12mo, and in Wilford's Memorials of eminent Perſons, and in Ballard's Lives of Illuſtrious Ladies.

(24) The ſubſtance of which is inſerted in Biſhop Smalridge's article.

[R] Sir Orlando Bridgeman.] This unfortunate gentleman was poſſeſſed of an eſtate of 4000 l. per annum, but that revenue not being ſufficient to anſwer all the demands of his expenſive way of life, he contracted very large debts, as well by mortgages as life annuities; 'till being reduced and diſtreſſed by his creditors, in order to defeat all their power, he had recourſe to the not uncommon method of abſconding from his family and friends, and not being heard of for ſome time, a rumour was ſpread, by ſome means or other, that he had come to an untimely end; which was further confirmed, by the finding of a drowned body, that from ſome particular marks, as of a bent finger, or the like, was believed and atteſted to be his, by perſons of credit who had perſonally known him*. The truth of this account was ſo firmly believed, that his lady with the children went into deep mourning, as for a dead huſband and parent (25), and his eldeſt ſon Francis aſſumed the Baronet's title. Thus every thing ſucceeded to his wiſh, 'till he happened to betake himſelf to an inn upon the great road to Bath, not far from Windſor; where ſitting, in company of the innkeeper, upon a bench before the door, he took notice of the noblemens and gentlemens coaches that paſſed by, reading the arms, and telling his companion the names and titles of the ſeveral owners. This unſeaſonable piece of vanity betrayed him. The innkeeper was preſently ſtruck with ſurprize, that a perſon of ſuch an ordinary appearance (for he was diſguized in a mean habit) ſhould be ſo knowing in families of rank and diſtinction; and, as the ſtory of his abſconding was no ſecret, the man began to ſuſpect the truth, and acquainting his wife with what had paſſed, ſhe came into the ſame opinion; ſo that it was reſolved to give information to ſome of their gueſt's annuitants, whom they knew. Theſe being particularly concerned in the diſcovery, immediately diſpatched a proper perſon to the inn, who eaſily diſcerning the Baronet under his diſguiſe, after ſome expoſtulations inſiſted on his ſubſcribing a paper, by way of certificate, that he was alive and in good health. This being all that was neceſſary for the concerns of the annuitants, he was left at liberty to behave as he pleaſed in regard to the report of his death, which ſtill paſſed current for ſome time. But being ſeen afterwards by ſeveral perſons who knew him, notwithſtanding his diſguiſe, the truth began to get ground, and at length prevailed ſo much, that one of his principal creditors, who had a large mortgage upon his eſtate *, making ſtrict ſearch after him, he was apprehended and ſecured in Glouceſter jail, where he continued in confinement † ſome years, 'till death, that general jail-deliverer, releaſed him from all the troubles of this world, in the year 1746 ‖. So notorious a part, acted in the laſt period of life, naturally raiſes a curioſity to know ſomething more concerning the actor. And we can aſſure the reader, that Sir Orlando was a deſcendant, by a ſecond venter, of Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, in the reign of King Charles the Second; that he was bred a courtier from his youth, being Groom of the Bedchamber to the late King George the Second, when Prince of Wales; after whoſe acceſſion to the throne, he was made a Commiſſioner of Trade and Plantations. He was alſo nominated Governor of Barbadoes, and received 1500 l. as equipage-money for that poſt, juſt before he abſconded. As to his perſon, he was of a fair complection, and low of ſtature, but ſtrong built and full bodied, fleſhy though not fat. Laſtly, that vanity was his predominant paſſion, which proved his ruin. He was a beau at the age of ſixty-five ‡.

[S] He was inſtrumental in procuring Mr Michel's donation.] As this was a very extraordinary benefaction, we ſhall gratify our readers with the particular circumſtances and conditions of it, by laying before them an abſtract of the Act paſſed in 1751, for the better effecting the purpoſes mentioned in the Will; where it appears, that by his laſt Will, dated December 21, 1736, excluding all claimants of kindred, he bequeathed his manor and lands of Horton-Kirby, and all his manor lands and marſh lands in Plumſtead, and all his lands and marſh lands in Sandwich and Worde in the county of Kent, and his lands and tenements in Old Windſor in Berks, to Queen's-college in Oxford for ever, for eight Maſter-Fellows and four Bachelor-Scholars, at 50 l. a year for the firſt, and 30 l. a year for the laſt; after the payment of whom, a fund ſhould be reſerved to anſwer extraordinary occaſions, not exceeding 200 l. that the ſurpluſage ſhould be laid out in the purchaſe of advowſons and preſentations to livings, above the yearly value of 120 l. to be annexed for ever to the Fellowſhips of his donation. That the ſaid Maſters and Scholars ſhould be elected by the Provoſt and Fellows of Queen's-college, out of any other colleges or halls within the ſaid univerſity, and that ſuch only ſhould be capable of being elected, as ſhould within one year paſt have taken the degree of Maſter of Arts, or ſhould be within one year of taking the ſame; and that the ſame qualifications ſhould be obſerved

(f) He also procured, by his interest, several considerable private benefactions, of which 300*l.* was the gift of Thomas Lewis, of Soberton in Hants, Esq; whose daughter and heir was mother to Lord Plymouth. Some time a number of this college; and the Bishops, Lamplugh, Smith, Nicholson, Crew, Gibson, Tanner, Maddox, were all benefactors to the buildings.

solicitation, procure a charter of mortmain, in May 1732, to enable the college to take these several benefactions (s), not to mention what he gave himself by his will, which was very considerable (t). Such extraordinary services will always stand as so many memorials of his paternal affection to the college *, and of his generous principle in employing that interest for the society, which might have been of service to himself. He declined the office of Vice-chancellor, on account of the infirm state of his health, through a tenderness of constitution, which, as he advanced in years, occasioned frequent confinement; otherwise no person was better qualified to support the dignity of that post. However, as long as he was able, and the statutes of the college would admit, he discharged the duty of his parish at St Dionis; the cure of mens souls being the principal ingredient in his character. He used frequently to retire for his health, in the summer season, to his villa at Kidlington, where he purchased a manor and estate, now in the possession of his family, which though near Oxford, seemed formed for such a retirement as he grew latterly very fond of. It gave him a singular pleasure in the enjoyment of a few select friends, and those whom he liked; in whose company he would be very chearful and diverting, without scandal or reflecting served as to the Bachelor-Scholars, and that the Bachelors should undergo, as near as might be, the same examinations as are required upon elections at All-Souls college. And that after such first election, the Fellowships should be filled up by such Bachelor-Scholars, as had taken the degree of Master of Arts, or should be within one year thereof, and that other Scholars should be chosen in their places, &c. That both the Masters and Bachelors should be subject to the statutes and government of the college, as to all conformity, discipline, and obedience to superiors (taking Orders by the Masters, or the exercise of rendering by the Bachelors, only excepted). That there should be a building erected for the reception of the said Masters and Bachelors, consisting of two entire and regular stair-cases, uniform both within, and conformable to the new building without, to begin from the east corner of the college next to the high-street, and go on northwards towards the chapel; wherein should be eight chambers in the middle story for the Fellows, and four chambers for the Scholars in the upper or lower story, and the other story to be filled with such under-graduates of the college as they should think fit to place therein, to be their attendants. That their allocations in the chapel and hall should be appointed suitable to their rank and degree, and their commons allotted as near as might be, in the same proportion as their Fellows and Taberders. That the rents and profits of his estates, from the time of his death, should be received by the Bursar of the college. That the first receipts should be applied to erect the said buildings, and Robert Shippen, D. D. Principal of Brazen-nose-college, John Mather, D. D. President of Corpus-Christi-college, and John Coxed, B. C. L. Warden of New-college, together with Joseph Smith, D. D. Provost of Queen's-college, to be supervisors or directors of the said buildings; after the finishing of which the society to proceed to an election of Fellows and Scholars, as abovementioned. He also appointed Dr Shippen, Dr Mather, and Dr Coxed, Visitors of his small society, to determine finally all grievances and complaints; which Visitors are to meet annually upon St Bartholomew's-day, at the college, to audit the accounts of the Bursars, and to give directions to them for the application of the rents; and that upon the demise of one of the present Visitors, another should within one month be chosen by the senior of the two surviving, but to be a Doctor of Divinity or Doctor of Civil Law, and Head or Fellow of some other college or hall, resident in Oxford. That the clear yearly rents and profits of the said estates amounted to the sum of 500*l.* or thereabouts, upon an average. That the money received by the Bursars since the testator's death, amounted to the sum of 5241*l.* 11*s.* 0*d.* $\frac{1}{2}$, of which 1265*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* had been paid to Queen's college, to reimburse them for building the half stair-case next the street, and 3825*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.* had been laid out in the purchase of 4116*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* three per cent. Bank annuities, in the name of the said college; and the remainder, being 524*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.* $\frac{1}{2}$, remained in the hands of the Bursars. Moreover, it is hereby enacted, that the sum of 2000*l.* shall be paid out of the rents and profits of the above bequeathed estates, to the society of Queen's-college, in satisfaction for the inheritance of the ground on which the aforementioned chambers stand, and for all claims of ground-rent, as also for all the immunities, privileges, and advantages, which the Fellows and Scholars of Mr Michel's foundation shall have and enjoy, in the use of the public library, chapel, hall, kitchen, buttery, and cellars of the said college, and by the use of the furniture and goods, in common use in the said college, and in the attendance and service of all the officers, lecturers, readers, moderators, and servants, and the use of the garden, quadrangles, courts, and other public places, in the said college, and all other common advantages and emoluments; the said Fellows and Scholars of Mr Michel's foundation respectively paying, in respect of any of the same, only such fees, and so much for decrements, as the Fellows and other members of like rank and degree of Queen's college, do or shall pay; as also, as in full compensation and satisfaction for repairing the buildings for the Fellows and Scholars of Mr Michel's foundation, and their attendants, which the said Provost and Scholars are for ever hereafter to support and maintain, both within and without, at their own proper costs and charges.

(†) The fellowships and scholarships were filled up Octob. 26, 1764, and on All Saint's day following the several fellows and scholars were admitted into Queen's college, and put in possession of the apartments in the new buildings erected for their reception, according to the will of Mr Michel their founder. Mr Michel also gave, in his life-time, a large picture of Queen Mary, to the college hall, and presented the college with his own pedigree, very curiously done, at the expence of 100*l.* and is rolled out. He gave them likewise a valuable collection of coins, and some books upon that subject, which are repositted in the library, as appears by the following inscription in Latin (†):

(a) This library, which is of the Corinthian order *, was built by Dr. Halton, a great part at his own expence, besides his study of books. The Sum of 600*l.* was given also by his tutor, Dr Tho. To these Sir John Floyer, an eminent Physician at Litchfield in Staffordshire, added his library, containing many excellent books. The building was begun in 1693, on account of the legacy of Dr Tho. Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, some time Provost of the college, who bequeathed the greatest part of his books and manuscripts to it, leaving the rest to the Bodleian library, of which he had been Keeper.

reflecting on others. He was obliging, humble, and ſincere, ever friendly and generous in his temper, and more ready to ſerve others than himſelf; in which reſpect he had by his intereſt an opportunity of doing many kind and generous offices. He was a kind and loving huſband, a tender and indulgent father, and a good maſter, taking care of the ſpiritual, as well as temporal concerns of all that belonged to him. His liberality to the poor was extenſive, and diſtributed without oſtentation, and beſides the many public charities to which he was a conſtant ſubſcriber (u), he was a truſtee to others. About four years before his death he was greatly afflicted with the ſtrangury, which he bore with true Chriſtian fortitude and reſignation; but this obliging him to uſe frequent bleeding and evacuations, the decays of nature came thereby faſt upon him, till at laſt by a numbneſs of his limbs, and a total loſs almoſt of his ſight, he found death approaching, and took to his bed in the college on the Founder's day (w), Auguſt the fifteenth. He lived a dying life in this languiſhing condition for upwards of three months; during which interval he employed the time in divine contemplations, making frequent ejaculations and repetitions out of the Pſalms. On the day of his departure, being quite emaciated and worn out, he took a ſolemn leave of his family, and after recommending himſelf to the Almighty in fervent prayer, he cried out in the words of the burial ſervice, O death, where is thy ſting! &c. and expired. Thus died this venerable good man, on Tueſday, November 23, 1756, aged eighty-ſix years. His remains were depoſited on the 29th, according to his own appointment, in the vault under the altar of the new chapel at the college; all the members thereof, as well as ſome of the heads of other colleges, attending him to the grave. An elegant Latin ſpeech was ſpoken on the occaſion, by Mr Thomas Hodgſon, ſome time a Fellow of the college, and a handſome copy of verſes to his memory was afterwards inſerted in the London Magazine in 1757, by Mr John Hodgſon, of the ſame college, whoſe poetical genius has on ſeveral occaſions been diſplayed to his honour [T]. We have two ſermons publiſhed by our author (x). One on the death of Queen Anne, intituled, The duty of the living to the memory of the dead. The other preached before the ſons of the clergy, printed under the title of the faithful ſtewardſhip. He alſo publiſhed in 1754, 8vo. A clear and comprehenſive View of the Being and Attributes of God, formed not only upon the Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures, but the ſolid Reaſonings and Teſtimonies of the beſt Authors, both Heathen and Chriſtian, which have writ upon that ſubject [U]. (w) This was always a memorable day with him, and particularly in 1740; which being the 400th year from the founding of the college, a grand jubilee was kept (the ſame being obſerved there once in 100 years) when the celebrated Mr Powell ſung there a Te Deum, accompanied with the choir from Magdalen college.

(x) See Letſome's Preacher's Aſſiſtant, and Hiſtorical Regiſter, 8vo. Both the ſermons went thro' two editions, and ſeveral copies of the latter were ſent by Sir Geo. Wheeler to the Weſt Indies, and diſperſed there.

[T] Mr Hodgſon's poetical genius has been diſplayed to his honour.] They are wrote in a true poetical ſpirit, and therefore we ſhall oblige the reader with a tranſcript of them, as follows *:

Not in oblivion's gloom expire,
The breaſts that glow with ſacred fire,
Ordain'd by heav'n their worth to ſave,
The hallow'd Muſe receives the hearſe,
And bids them live in endleſs verſe,
Triumphant o'er the withering grave.

II.

Thee, SMITH, ſhe mark'd, when, from its clay,
Emerg'd thy pure ethereal ray,
To mix with ſainted ſouls on high:
And, while Philippa's ſons the tear
Of gratitude pour'd o'er thy bier,
Entun'd thy heart-felt elegy.

III.

Ah me, ſhe cry'd! the good and wiſe,
In death's cold arms extended lies;
See virtue mourn the afflicting blow!
His was the courtly grace and eaſe,
That taught her harſher voice to pleaſe,
And ſooth'd the roughneſs of her brow.

IV.

Say ye, who all attention hung
O'er the ſweet accents of his tongue,
Whene'er he pour'd th' inſtructive lore,
How, taught in holy hope to riſe,
Ye burn'd impatient for the ſkies,
Allur'd by fading earth no more.

V.

Nor did perſuaſive ſpeech alone
Fix on his lips her ſacred throne;
More ſtrong his fair example taught.
The laws he preach'd his ſteps purſu'd;
While every eye with wonder view'd,
And emulative ardour caught.

VI.

Oft' has the drooping head of care,
Rais'd by his hand from fell deſpair,
View'd days of brighter tenor flow.
Oft' has his judgment's piercing rays
Unravell'd doubts perplexing maze,
And giv'n the heart new peace to know.

VII.

Smit with the charms of varied good,
Each virtuous breaſt his friendſhip woo'd.
Oh WILLIAMSON ‖! thy fav'rite boaſt;
Ev'n the fair pride of ſovereign power †,
Call'd him to ſhare the ſocial hour,
And pomp in grateful converſe loſt.

VIII.

But chief for long try'd wiſdom known,
Fair learning mark'd him for her own,
Exulting in his generous ſway:
Kind gentle warmth his influence ſhed,
Each ſcience rais'd its laurell'd head,
Each latent genius ſprung to day.

IX.

Now, whilſt he ſoars to purer light,
The Muſe, he nurs'd, purſues his flight,
Far as the confines of the ſkies:
There harps angelic take the ſtrain,
And hail him to th' ethereal plain,
Whilſt his hands reach th' immortal prize.

time to ſome general good, and it is to be wiſhed that he had begun earlier in life, to give us other ſpecimens, as well as this, of his valuable compoſitions, of which he left a conſiderable number in manuſcript. However, we have ſome ground to hope that ſome of them will be publiſhed by his friends, though, as he had not ſuch a deſign, they muſt needs appear to a diſadvantage.

We muſt not conclude this memoir, without mentioning the application that was made to Dr Smith, after the death of Biſhop Beveridge in 1707, to look over his Lordſhip's manuſcripts, and chiefly thoſe on the XXXIX Articles, and his Private Thoughts on Religion, which he reviſed and publiſhed (31); but the laſt being very imperfect, he was obliged to make large additions, and he took a great deal of pains to finiſh it, according to the mind and ſentiments of the learned and pious author, of whom he gave an excellent character in the preface (32); and the work has gone through ſeveral editions.

(31) See Carter's Hiſtory of Cambridge, for Bp Beveridge, &c.

(32) It has been already cited more than once under that prelate's article, in this Work.

To this muſt alſo be added, that, in 1742, Sir Thomas Hanmer, Bart. gave the univerſity of Oxford the benefit of the impreſſion of his manuſcript of Shakeſpeare, occaſioned by an inſtimation given him by Dr Smith, that ſuch a preſent would be acceptable to them; and the affair was afterwards conducted by him and Dr Shippen, Principal of Brazen-noſe college, for they were both particularly conſulted in the publication of this beautiful edition of Shakeſpeare, as appears by the correſpondence Sir Thomas had with Dr Smith on that occaſion. The edition was printed at Oxford in 4to. 1744, on the fineſt royal paper, to which is prefixed a good cut to every play, done (by Gravelot) at the expence of Sir Thomas. This worthy gentleman, who died at his ſeat in Suffolk in May 1746 ‡, had been Knight of the Shire for that county, as alſo for Flintſhire, and ſometime Member for Thetford He was unanimouſly choſen Speaker of the Houſe of Commons in the 12th of Queen Anne.

‡ His corpſe was conveyed to his ſeat at Hanmer, and interred in the chancel built by himſelf in that church, where there is a handſome monument of white marble with an inſcription erected to his memory. Gent. Mag. for Nov. 1762.

In a letter to Dr Smith, dated London, March 18, 1741-2, he writes as follows:

'Dear Sir,

I have received the favour of your letter, by which you deſire me to open a little the plan I would propoſe for a new impreſſion of Shakeſpeare, upon which ſubject, if I ſpeak unſkilfully and improperly, I may well be forgiven, it being ſo new to me.

My aim in general is to promote a correct and a beautiful edition of his dramatic works, more worthy of the author than any of thoſe which have hitherto been beſtowed upon him. It muſt be in ſix volumes in quarto, in as large a letter at leaſt as that publiſhed by Mr Pope, but upon much better paper, for it ought to be the fineſt royal, as good as the large paper of Dr Middleton's late Life of Cicero. I propoſe to have a good cut prefixed to every play, done by the very beſt deſigner and engraver; which copper-plates are now under hand, and in pretty great forwardneſs: and theſe I deſign ſhall be at my expence. I will give them freely to the public, that the book may be brought within the compaſs of a reaſonable price, which I would not have exceed four pounds at the moſt: if it can be afforded cheaper, I ſhall be glad (33), nor do I deſire more copies for myſelf than ten or twelve to give to my particular friends.

(33) The ſubſcription price was three guineas, but the book now ſells for eight or ten, being grown very ſcarce.

[The principal point of all is to employ ſome gentlemen of great care and exactneſs to be correctors of the preſs; for as it hath coſt the pains of many years to rectify the miſtakes of former impreſſions, it would be very unhappy to have the ſenſe perverted and obſcured by any new blunders to be committed in this.

You will wiſh perhaps that I ſhould ſay a word or two upon the time of proceeding in this affair. I find the artiſts I have to deal with in preparing the copper-plates the moſt dilatory men in the world, and I would fain have that trouble off my hands before I enter into any other part of it. Probably the finiſhing of theſe will take this whole ſummer; and it will be neceſſary for me alſo to take a journey into Wales §, ſo that the beginning of next winter will be as ſoon as the preſs can be ſet at work.] However, I ſhould be glad to be favoured with an anſwer, that I may know how it reliſhes, and whether any objections are made. I ſhould be glad to have it in my power to oblige the univerſity, to which I had the honour to belong, and for which I have always retained the greateſt reſpect. I am,

N. B. The parts included in hooks were omitted in the former printed copy.

§ The buſineſs of this journey was probably to treat for the timber on ſome part of his eſtate there, the reverſion of which eſtate was claimed by Mr Hervey. See Sir Thomas Hanmer's article, remark [B].

SIR,

Your moſt humble and obedient ſervant,

Tho. Hanmer.

[You may pleaſe at all times to direct to me at this place; for though I ſhould be any where elſe, my porter will ſafely ſend your letters to me.']

In another letter, dated Milden-hall, Suffolk, May 19, 1742, Sir Thomas expreſſes himſelf in theſe terms:

'Dear Sir,

I ought to acknowledge the favour of your letter, though, as it found me here under the affliction of my nephew's death, I have had no opportunity ſince of knowing from you or Dr Shippen, what further information or ſatisfaction is deſired from me. This in general may be depended on, that ſince the univerſity is pleaſed to accept ſo ſmall a preſent from me, they ſhall make what uſe of it they pleaſe; I will preſcribe in nothing to them. The edition muſt be in quarto, becauſe the plates are prepared for a volume of that ſize; but whether a ſmall number only ſhall be upon the beſt royal paper, and the reſt upon leſs, ſhall be left with them to determine. I wiſh only the purchaſe may not be too dear: nor would it be the intereſt of the univerſity to have it ſo, becauſe it would be an obſtruction to the ſale of the book. If you have any further commands for me upon this ſubject, or any other, pleaſe to direct to me at Hanmer, near Whitchurch in Shropſhire, for thither I am removing tomorrow. I am,

SIR,

Your moſt humble and moſt obedient ſervant,

Tho. Hanmer.'

Dr Smith's anſwer to this, taking notice of the rumour about an edition intended by Mr (now Dr) Warburton (Biſhop of Glouceſter) produced the following:

Milden-hall near Newmarket, Suffolk,
October 28, 1742.

'Dear Sir,

I have much doubted with myſelf whether it were proper for me to return an anſwer to the favour of your letter, till after hearing again from you or Dr Shippen. There ſeem to ariſe ſome difficulties with reſpect to the deſign of printing a new edition of Shakeſpeare, and I beg it may be laid aſide, if you are not fully ſatisfied that ſome advantage may ariſe from it to the univerſity; for I have no end in view to myſelf to make me deſire it. I am ſatisfied there is no edition coming or likely to come from Warburton, but it is a report raiſed to ſerve ſome little purpoſe or other, of which I ſee there are many on foot. I have reaſon to know that gentleman is very angry with me, for a cauſe of which I think I have no reaſon to be aſhamed, or he to be proud. My acquaintance with him began upon an application from himſelf, and at his requeſt the preſent Bp of Saliſbury * introduced him to me (34) for this purpoſe only, as was then declared, that as he had many obſervations upon Shakeſpeare then lying by him, over and above thoſe printed in Theobald's book, he much deſired to communicate them to me, that I might judge whether any of them were worthy to be added to thoſe emendations, which he underſtood I had long been making upon that author. I received his offer with all the civility I could: upon which a long correſpondence began by letters, in which he explained his ſenſe upon many paſſages, prevalent attacks of infidelity and free-thinking. The ſubject itſelf is common by being ſo frequently treated on, but our author's method of handling it with regard to the arrangement of the ſeveral arguments and ſolutions, which are enlarged upon under each head, and his tender affectionate manner of applying them to excite a ſuitable practice, are in a great meaſure new, and different from any other treatiſes that have yet appeared of the like ſort. Difficile eſt proprie communia dicere. HOR.

* Dr Sherlock.

(34) In the preface to Mr Warburton's edition of Shakeſpeare, he ſays, Sir Thomas was recommended [or introduced] to him. See Sir H. Spelman's article, at the end of remark [O], p. 3780.

Dr Smith was ſucceeded in the Provoſtſhip of Queen's college by Dr Joſeph Browne, Canon-reſidentiary of the church and Chancellor of the dioceſe of Hereford; and in his Prebend of Stoke-Newington, in the church of St Paul, London, by Dr Nicholls, Maſter of the Temple, and now alſo Rector of St James's, Weſtminſter.

paſſages, which ſometimes I thought juſt, but moſtly wild and out of the way. Afterwards he made a journey hither (35) on purpoſe to ſee my books; he ſtaid about a week with me, and had the inſpection of them: and all this while I had no ſuſpicion of any other deſign, in all the pains he took, but to perfect a correct text in Shakeſpeare, of which he ſeemed very fond. But not long after, the views of intereſt began to ſhew themſelves, ſeveral hints were dropt of the advantage he might receive from publiſhing the work thus corrected; but as I had no thoughts at all of making it public, ſo I was more averſe to yield to it in ſuch a manner as was likely to produce a paltry edition, by making it the means only of getting a greater ſum of money by it (36). Upon this he flew into a great rage, and there is an end of the ſtory; with which I have thought it beſt to make you acquainted, that as you mention the working of his friends, you may judge the better of what you ſee and hear from them, and may make what uſe you pleaſe of the truth of facts, which I have now laid before you.

As to my own particular, I have no aim to purſue in this affair: I propoſe neither honour, reward, or thanks, and ſhould be very well pleaſed to have the books continue upon their ſhelf, in my own private cloſet. If it is thought they may be of uſe or pleaſure to the public, I am willing to part with them out of my hands, and to add, for the honour of Shakeſpeare, ſome decorations and embelliſhments at my own expence. It will be an unexpected pleaſure to me, if they can be made in any degree profitable to the univerſity, to which I ſhall always retain a gratitude, a regard, and reverence; but that I may end as I began, I beg the favour of you, if upon more mature conſideration among yourſelves, you ſee reaſon to diſcourage you from proceeding in this affair, that you will give it over, and not look upon yourſelves to be the more obliged to proſecute it from any ſteps already taken with,

(36) This ſhews that he had no doubt of his right to publiſh a handſome edition of his copy ſo perfected, which right he afterwards expreſly aſſerted againſt Mr Warburton's pretences to the contrary, mentioned in his preface before cited.

SOMERS [JOHN Lord], an illuſtrious ſtateſman, of conſummate abilities and irreproachable integrity, was deſcended of reputable parents in the city of Worceſter [A], where he was born in the year 1652; and being put to the college ſchool there (a), was ſoon taken notice of for the quickneſs and ſolidity of his parts, and had the character of being the brighteſt boy in it; when he was removed to Oxford (b), and admitted a gentleman-commoner of Trinity college (c). In the univerſity, the ſame good ſenſe grew into a judicious and elegant taſte of claſſical learning, and he would certainly have become equally the delight and boaſt of that eminent ſeat of the Muſes, had he ſtaid longer in it (d); but he left it without taking any degree *. His father having always intended to breed him to his own profeſſion, the law, had entered him a clerk to Sir Francis Winnington [B] for ſome time; after the expiration of which he was removed to the Middle-Temple (e). Here two different talents were obſerved to concur in his genius, which are almoſt certain indications of the poſſeſſor's becoming a great man: to an exquiſite taſte of polite literature, was joined a turn to buſineſs in the practice of the law. This implied ſolidity of judgment, and prompted an induſtrious application; whilſt the other furniſhed delicacy of ſentiment, and an elegant diction. Accordingly we find an unwearied diligence following Mr Somers through all the ſtages of his life, which gave him ſuch a thorough inſight into the laws of the land, that he paſſed for one of the greateſt maſters of his profeſſion, at his firſt appearance in it [C]: at the ſame time he found leiſure to read and digeſt the fineſt authors both of the learned and modern languages, and was engaged with ſeveral of the politeſt writers of the age, in the Engliſh tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives in proſe, and Ovid's Epiſtles in verſe; in the firſt, he performed the Life of Alcibiades, and in the other Dido's Epiſtle to Æneas, and that of Ariadne to Theſeus (f). Neither in his profeſſion could ſuch accompliſhments be confined wholly to the lucrative part of it. On the contrary, he was not ſatisfied with occaſionally looking into the hiſtory and original of ſuch particular laws and cuſtoms as his practice led him to, he made the knowledge of the conſtitution in general a diſtinct branch of his ſtudies; ſo that he became [A] Deſcended of reputable parents, &c.] His father, Mr John Somers, was an attorney at law, poſſeſſed of a good eſtate, which his Lordſhip inherited; and his mother, Mrs Catherine Ceaverne, was a gentlewoman of a good family in Shropſhire. His grandfather was alſo a citizen of Worceſter of good ſubſtance (1).

[B] He was clerk to Sir Francis Winnington.] This eminent lawyer, we are told, from being a ſervitor in Trinity college, had raiſed a great eſtate by the law, though his talent conſiſted rather in ſpeaking fluently than eloquently, knowing how to wrangle better than to argue (2). He was Solicitor-General to King Charles the Second, in which poſt he was ſucceeded by Heneage Finch, ſecond ſon to Chancellor Finch, and younger brother to Daniel Earl of Nottingham (3).

[C] One of the greateſt maſters of his profeſſion at the time of his firſt appearance in it] Mr Addiſon obſerves, that though he had made a regular progreſs through the ſeveral honours of the Long Robe, he was always looked upon as one who deſerved a ſuperior ſtation to that he was poſſeſſed of, till he arrived at the higheſt dignity to which theſe ſtudies could advance him (4).

a master in it †: and, siding against the Court, he early published several pieces in the political way, which were universally esteemed [D]. As in pleading at the bar, his oratory was masculine and persuasive, free from every thing trivial and affected. So his style in writing was chaste and pure, but at the same time full of spirit and politeness, and fit to convey the most intricate business to the understanding of the reader with the utmost clearness and perspicuity ‖. One of the first of these tracts was, his History of the Succession of the Crown of England [E]: written in favour of the attempt to exclude

[D] He wrote several pieces in the political way, &c.] Bishop Burnet mentioning the return of the bill against the Earl of Shaftesbury Ignoramus, by the Grand-Jury; and observing, that in defence of these ignoramus juries it was said, that by the express words of their oath, they were bound to make true presentments of what should appear true to them; and, therefore, if they did not believe the evidence, they could not find a bill though sworn to, proceeds thus: 'A 'book, says he, was written to support that, in which 'law and reason were brought to confirm it. It passed 'as writ by Lord Essex, but I understood afterwards 'it was writ by Somers, who was much esteemed and 'often visited by Lord Essex; and, who trusted him-'self to him, and wrote the best papers that came out 'at that time (5).' Mr Walpole tells us, that he had met with a small piece, said to be written by Lord Somers, which, perhaps, says he, was one of the tracts hinted at here. It is intituled, The security of Englishmens lives: or, The trust, power, and duty of the Grand-Juries of England, explained according to the fundamentals of the English Government, &c. I believe the reader will be before-hand with me, in concluding this to be the very book mentioned by Burnet. As this as well as the other pieces here intimated were published without his name, Mr Addison makes this remark upon it (7). 'It is to be lamented, 'says he, that this extraordinary person, out of his 'natural aversion to vain-glory, wrote several pieces 'as well as performed several actions, which he did 'not assume the honour of: though, at the same 'time, so many works of this nature have appeared, 'which every one has ascribed to him, that I believe 'no author of the greatest eminence would deny my 'Lord Somers to have been the best writer of the age 'in which he lived.' Thus this author, out of gratitude to his benefactor, who first brought him into the eye and notice of the world; and, therefore, such a stroke of panegyric is excusable, especially in a funeral oration, as that may well be called whence this passage is cited (8). But to speak impartially, may it not, without breach of candor, be said, that in Mr Somers's conduct, in forbearing to set his name to the political pieces he wrote in the reign of King Charles the Second, there was at least a mixture of self-security with that of self denial. A prudent regard to his own interest cannot fairly be denied to have it's weight in this restraint, from appearing publickly against the Government; which was the side he took in these tracts. At the same time, I agree with Mr Walpole, that 'such deathless monuments of his 'parts and virtue as Lord Somers erected during the 'course of his life, diminish the regret we should 'otherwise feel; that though his Lordship wrote 'several pieces, we are ignorant even of the titles 'of many of them (9);' and how little any fame of this kind was his object may be inferred from hence, that 'tis not known he ever, upon any occasion, laid his claim to them, even after the Revolution, which was a compleat spunge of the motive of self-preservation. However, he did not always keep the same absolute reserve with regard to his other pieces; at least, if any credit may be given to the writer of his life, who gives us the following, as he calls it, pleasant story, concerning a small piece of poetry which his Lordship writ, and which was owned with great impudence by a man now [in 1716] living. 'This person being introduced to my Lord when he was Chancellor; his Lordship took occasion to ask him, whether he writ such a paper of verses? Yes, my Lord, replied he, 'tis a trifle; I did it off hand. Upon which, his Lordship laughing pretty heartily, the pretended Poet withdrew in the utmost confusion, curfing the gentleman who had contrived to bring him to my Lord, to shew an instance of uncommon effrontery (10)'

[E] History of the succession of the Crown of England.] The whole title runs thus: A brief History of the succession of the Crown of England, collected out of records; written for the satisfaction of the Earl of H. *. In this curious piece he endeavours to prove the Parliament's power to settle the descent of the Crown, by the constitution of our kingdom. To which purpose he produces all the remarkable instances from the earliest ages to the reign of King James the First, wherein the succession by proximity of blood was broken and over-ruled by the States by of the Realm (11). He proceeds to declare, that it was as easy to shew, that in all other kingdoms the next in blood hath been frequently excluded from the succession. As an illustrious instance, instar omnium, (the reasoning in it being such as in his sentiments extends to all), he recites the speech, which the Ambassadors sent from the States of France, made to Charles of Lorrain, when they had solemnly rejected him, and placed Hugh Capet upon the Throne: notwithstanding Charles was the son of Lovis the Fourth, d'Outremer; and after the death of his nephew, Lovis the Fifth, Le Faincant, without issue, was next in blood to the Crown (12). 'They told him, that every body knew the right of succession to the Crown of France belonged to him, and not to Hugh Capet; but yet, say they, the very same laws which give you the right of succession, do judge you also unworthy of the same; for that you have not hitherto endeavoured to frame your manners according to the prescript of the laws, nor according to the usages of your country, but have rather allied yourself with the German nation, our enemies; and have loved their vile and base manners. Wherefore, as you have forsaken the ancient virtue and sweetness of your country; we have also forsaken and abandoned you, and have chosen Hugh Capet for our King (13), and put you back; and this without any scruple of conscience at all, esteeming it better and more just to live under him, enjoying our ancient laws, customs, privileges, and liberties, than under you, the heir by blood, in oppression, strange customs, and cruelty. For as those who are to make a voyage at sea don't much consider whether the pilot be owner of the ship, but whether he be skilful and wary. So our care is to have a prince to govern us gently and happily; (which is the end for which princes were appointed) and for these ends we judge this man fitter to be our king. Our author then proceeds to answer the objections, which he reduces to four. In speaking to the third, which is of those who maintain, that as William the Conqueror subdued the kingdom, the descent being settled by him becomes unalterable; he observes, 'That granting for argument sake, the absolute 'conquest by King William, yet that prince did 'not institute a succession by proximity of blood; 'and 'tis plain he never designed the Crown should 'so descend, but gave it to his second son; and 'thereby gave an example of excluding and preter-'mitting the unworthy. To the fourth objection, 'that the fundamental laws of the land, against 'which no Act of Parliament can be of force, had 'so established the succession, that the course of it 'cannot be altered; having first observed, that this 'argument is answered by the foregoing history, 'he turns it against the objectors, in asking them, 'by what authority those laws were made? If by 'the king alone, then no doubt but he may change 'them too; if by the people, they run before they 'are aware, into the guilt of worshipping that idol, 'the multitude; and make a great step towards 'placing the government upon contract and consent. 'He then challenges them to shew this law; and 'when the maxim, that the descent of the Crown 'purges all defects whatsoever, is alledged to be 'a part of this law, he remarks, that the first 'mention of that maxim is in the Year-Book of 'Henry

(11) It must be owned, that this task was become less difficult by the conference about the succession, wrote by Parsons the Jesuit.

(12) Lovis IV. stiled d'Outremer, left two son, Lotharius and this Charles. Lotharius, the eldest, succeeded Lovis IV. and then Lotharius's son, Lovis V. le Faineant. It is remarkable, that Charles did not share the kingdom with his brother Lotharius, as had been the custom in France. See the Hist. of that kingdom.

clude the Duke of York: the great political ſubject from the year 1678, 'till the diſſolution of the Parliament in 1681; which year he had a conſiderable ſhare in another piece, intituled, A juſt and modeſt Vindication of the Proceedings of the two laſt Parliaments; in anſwer to King Charles the Second's Declaration to all his loving Subjects, touching the cauſes and reaſons that moved him to diſſolve the two laſt Parliaments [F]. And

'Henry the Seventh, where the Judges declare, 'that the king is a perſon able and diſcharged from 'any attainder, eo facto, that he took upon himſelf 'the government, and to be king. He remarks 'ſhrewdly, that Henry the Seventh was then king, 'de facto, and in poſſeſſion of the Throne; and it 'was ſomewhat of the lateſt to conſider, whether 'he was qualified or not. Certainly, ſays he, it 'would have been ſtrange ſelf denial in the Judges, 'and a neglect of themſelves, which is not uſual 'with them, to have alledged an incurable diſability 'in the king, from whom they had their patents 'and authority. That not above three years before 'this opinion of the Judges, in the firſt of Richard 'the Third, the whole Parliament did not only give 'their opinion, but aſſured Richard, that all learned 'men of that time held clearly, that an attainder 'did hinder the deſcent of the Crown, and incapacitate the attainted perſon to take it; and in the 'following words of the Act of the ſeventh year of 'Edward the Fourth, George Duke of Clarence 'was attainted of treaſon; by reaſon whereof all the 'iſſue of the ſaid George, was, and is, diſabled, and 'barred of all right and claim, that in any caſe he 'or his iſſue might have or challenge by inheritance 'to the crown and dignity royal of theſe realms. 'After that, continue they, we conſider, that you '[Richard] be the undoubted heir, &c.; and ſo 'they proceed, in affirming, that all learned 'men in the laws do approve his title (14).' He concludes his anſwer with obſerving, 'that either 'the Judges intended no ſuch thing by their opinion, 'or elſe at leaſt, that extra-judicial opinions were 'then as apocryphal as they have been ſince.' This fling at the Judges will perhaps be better underſtood, when we conſider the complaiſance paid by the Bench to the Crown at this time, when the Commons voted an impeachment againſt three of them (15), for drawing the proclamation againſt petitioning for a Parliament. 'But when, continues 'our author, I reflect what ſort of men I am arguing 'with, and how willingly they uſed to ſubmit to 'authority, I think I ſhall convince them beſt by 'citing the opinions of two great men, the one a 'Cardinal, the other a Lord-Chancellor, both of 'them martyrs for the Papal Supremacy! I mean 'Fiſher and Sir Thomas More. 'Tis well known 'how reſolutely, even to death, they refuſed the 'Oath of Succeſſion, which the Parliament had 'framed, becauſe therein the King's Supremacy was 'avowed; and, therefore, they cannot be ſuſpected 'to diſſemble, when, at the very ſame time, they 'declared, that if that of Supremacy was left out, 'they would willingly ſwear an oath to maintain the 'ſucceſſion of the Crown to the iſſue of the King's 'preſent marriage, as it was then eſtabliſhed by 'Parliament, for which they gave this reaſon, that 'this was in the power of a Parliament to determine, 'but not who was ſupreme head of the Church. 'Sir Thomas went farther, and owned a very ſtrange 'opinion of their power in this point, but he ſays 'it expreſsly at the ſame time, that the Parliament 'had unqueſtionable authority, in ordering of the 'ſucceſſion; and that the people were bound to 'obey them therein.' In anſwer to the objection, that an Act of Parliament to diſinherit the next heir, is unjuſt and without a ſufficient ground. Mr Somers writes thus: 'I will not at preſent enter 'into a diſpute, how far the difference of religion, 'which will alſo neceſſarily draw on a change in 'the government, does juſtify men in ſeeking to 'preſerve the two deareſt things on earth in an 'orderly and lawful way. I will not, though 'I ſafely might, challenge thoſe men to tell me, 'whether ever any ſettled nation, which had laws 'of their own, and were not under the immediate 'force of a conqueror, did ever admit of a king 'of another religion than their own (16). I will 'not inſiſt on it, that the Crown is an inheritance, 'accompanying an office of truſt, and that if a man's 'defects render him incapable of the truſt, he has 'alſo forfeited the inheritance. I need not ſay 'how far a nation is to be excuſed for exerciſing 'juſtice ſummarily and without the tedious formality 'of law, when the neceſſity of things requires haſte, 'and the party flies from juſtice, and his confederates 'are numerous and daring, and the prince's life 'in danger. But this I will ſay, that if the Parliament has power in this thing, which I need not 'prove by ſhewing, that the ordinary courſe of law 'allows heirs to be diſinherited by fines and recoveries; and that the Parliament in all ages has 'frequently done it, by making the ſtrongeſt ſettlements, where equity has dictated it, though the 'heirs were never in any wiſe criminal. Theſe, 'according to Sir Thomas More's opinion, the people, 'are bound in conſcience to obey; and muſt not 'pretend to enquire whether they were made upon 'juſt grounds. For by the ſame reaſon, they may 'pretend that all other laws were made without juſt 'cauſe, and refuſe obedience to any of them; 'and ſurely thoſe that ſhould do ſo, would be an 'excellent loyal party. God defend the nation from 'ſuch loyalty as oppoſes itſelf to the king and the 'laws; and God defend the king from the pretended duty and ſubmiſſion of thoſe men, who, 'whilſt they talk of his power, ſo much renounce 'it openly, and oppoſe what would be the greateſt 'ſecurity of his perſon, and in effect ſet up his 'ſucceſſor above him, even in his life time.'

This piece was reprinted in 1714 (17), under the title of A brief Hiſtory of the ſucceſſion of the Crown of England; wherein facts collected from the beſt authorities are oppoſed, to the novel aſſertion of indefeaſible hereditary right. To which is ſubjoined the following preface. 'The great noiſe that has 'been of late revived about hereditary right, which 'the next of blood in the royal family has to the 'Crown of Great-Britain, makes me believe, that 'the reprinting of the following hiſtory at this time 'may be of ſervice, eſpecially to ſuch as have not 'opportunity or leiſure to peruſe our hiſtory at large. 'It was collected and firſt publiſhed in King Charles 'the Second's time, when the endeavour was made 'to ſet aſide the Popiſh heir; and afterwards reprinted at the time of the Revolution; to ſhew in 'a ſhort compaſs, what notion our anceſtors, as well 'princes as people in all times, had of this matter; 'by which I think it does ſufficiently appear, that 'even our Princes themſelves have all of them 'eſteemed that the beſt title that came by acts of 'ſettlement. And thoſe who received the Crown, 'have ſeldom thought themſelves rightly fixed until 'they had obtained ſome act of recognition.'

[F] He had a ſhare in the juſt and modeſt Vindication, &c.] This piece was firſt written by Algernoon Sydney, but new drawn by Somers, and corrected by Jones *. In it, among other things, it is ſuggeſted, that diſſolving the Parliament was an arbitrary act, wherein the king had exceeded the power of his prerogative in breach of the conſtitution, diverſe ſtatutes having provided both for the holding of annual Parliaments, and that they ſhould not be prorogued or diſſolved 'till all the petitions and bills before them were anſwered and redreſſed. 'That 'Parliaments ſhould thus meet and thus ſit, continues 'he, is ſecured to us by the ſame ſacred tie, by 'which the King, at his Coronation, does oblige 'himſelf to let his Judges ſit to diſtribute juſtice 'every term, and to preſerve inviolably all other 'rights and liberties of the ſubjects.' The author afterwards remarks, 'that though, to the diſhonour 'of our country, it does appear that ſome Engliſh-men were concerned in the unhappy advice of 'breaking the two laſt Parliaments, and ſetting out 'this preſent defence of it; yet the Galliciſms, 'which are found in the paper, ſhew the writer to 'have been of another nation, or at leaſt to have 'had his thoughts ſo much taken up for the intereſts 'of France, (whilſt he was labouring this way to 'heighten

And the ſame year he was the reputed author of another, written in defence of the Grand Jury, for not finding the bill of indictment for High-Treaſon againſt the Earl of Shafteſbury (g). In the ſame ſpirit he appeared Counſel for Pilkington and Shute, Sheriffs of London, Corniſh and Bethel, Aldermen, together with Ford, Lord Grey of Werk, Sir Thomas Player, Mr John Jekyl, father of Sir Joſeph Jekyl (b), and ſeveral others, who were tried on the 8th of May, 1683, for a riot in the city at the election of the Sheriffs the precedent year [G]. As he foreſaw a change in the government eſtabliſhed by Law would unavoidably follow a change in the religion of the governor (i), and upon that account had promoted every orderly and legal way of compaſſing the excluſion of the Duke of York; ſo he continued to oppoſe all the illegal and arbitrary proceedings of King James the Second: and being employed as Counſel in the tryal of the ſeven Biſhops in 1688, he argued with great firmneſs of ſpeech, and perſpicuity of reaſon, againſt the diſpenſing power uſurped by that unfortunate Prince [H]. With theſe principles, and ſuch abilities, it is no wonder that he was admitted into the moſt ſecret counſels of the Prince of Orange, and was one of thoſe who concerted the meaſures for bringing him over (k). After his arrival in England, he was choſen repreſentative for his native city of Worceſter, in the Convention which met upon the ſummons of that Prince, January 22, 1688-9 (l); and, in the conference between the two Houſes about the word abdicated, he was appointed one of the managers for the Houſe of Commons [I], whereby the Lords were induced

'heighten and perpetuate the differences between 'the King and his people) that he could not expreſs 'himſelf in any other idiom than theirs; he would 'not otherwiſe have introduced the King, ſaying, 'that it was a matter extremely ſenſible to us; a 'form of ſpeech peculiar to the French, and un-'known to any other nation. The reader, who 'underſtands that language, will obſerve ſo many 'more of this kind, as will give him juſt cauſe to 'doubt, whether the whole paper was not a tranſ-'lation, and whether the Engliſh one, or that 'which was publiſhed in French, was the original. 'Let us then no longer wonder, that the time of 'diſſolving our Parliaments is known at Paris ſooner 'that at London, ſince it is probable the reaſons 'now given for it were formed there too. The Peers 'at Oxford were ſo totally ignorant of the counſel, 'that they never once thought of a diſſolution, 'till 'they heard it pronounced; but the Ducheſs of 'Mazarine had better intelligence, and publiſhed the 'news at St James's many hours before it was done. 'This declaration was not communicated to the 'Privy-Council 'till Friday the eighth of April, 'when his Majeſty, according to his late method, 'did graciouſly declare to them his pleaſure to ſet 'it forth, without deſiring from them any advice 'in the matter. But Monſieur Barillon, the French 'Ambaſſador, did not only read it to a gentleman 'the fifth of April, but adviſed with him about it, 'and demanded his opinion of it, which his 'Excellency will the better remember, becauſe of 'the great liberty which the perſon took in ridiculing 'it to his face (18).'

(18) Ibid.

Some of the reaſons given for this diſſolution were their intire neglect of the public, and falling into factions; their iſſuing arbitrary orders for taking his Majeſty's loyal ſubjects into cuſtody for matters that had no relation to privilege of Parliament; their declaring many eminent perſons enemies to the King and kingdom without any order or proceſs of Law, any hearing of their defence, or any proof ſo much as offered; their reſolves againſt any perſons that lend his Majeſty money, or buy any tally of anticipation, thereby endeavouring to reduce him to a more helpleſs condition than the meaneſt of his ſubjects; their taking upon them to ſuſpend the laws and acts of Parliament, by voting againſt the proſecution of Diſſenters (19).

[H] He was Counſel for the Biſhops, and ſpoke admirably well againſt the diſpenſing power.] Being the youngeſt Counſel employed on that ſide, his turn was to ſpeak laſt of all. But this, which is ordinarily a great diſadvantage (eſpecially where ſome of the moſt eminent Lawyers are retained, as in the preſent caſe) (22), our young Barriſter by the force of his excellent parts, converted it into an occaſion of diſplaying his ſuperior merit. Among other things, he produced the caſe of Thomas and Sorrel in the Exchequer-Chamber, upon the validity of the diſpenſation of the ſtatute of Edward the Sixth, touching ſelling of wine, arguing, 'that there it 'was the opinion of every one of the Judges, that 'there never could be an abrogation or a ſuſpenſion '(which is a temporary abrogation) of an Act of 'Parliament but by the Legiſlative power: That 'indeed it was diſputed, how far the King might 'diſpenſe with the penalties in ſuch a particular 'law, as to particular perſons; but it was agreed 'by all, that the King had no power to ſuſpend any 'law; of which there could be no diſpenſation, but 'by an Act of Parliament. That by the laws of 'all civilized nations, if the Prince does require 'ſomething to be done, which the perſon who is to 'do it takes to be unlawful, it is not only lawful 'but his duty, reſcribere Principi; which is all the 'Biſhops had done here, and that in the moſt humble 'manner. That the matter of fact, alledged in the 'Biſhops petition, had been proved perfectly true, 'by the journals of both Houſes; that there could 'be no deſign to diminiſh the prerogative by it, 'becauſe the King has no ſuch prerogative: that the 'petition could not be ſeditious, becauſe it was pre-'ſented to the King in private, and alone; nor falſe, 'becauſe the matter of it was true; nor malicious, for 'the occaſion was not ſought, the thing was preſſed 'upon them; nor in ſhort a libel, becauſe the intent 'was innocent, and they kept within the bounds ſet 'by Act of Parliament, that gives the ſubject leave 'to apply to the King when he is aggrieved.'

(22) The other Counſel were Sir Francis Pemberton, Sir Robert Sawyer, Heneage Finch, Eſq; Serjeant Levinz, &c. See the tryal, in the State Tryals.

The writer of his life obſerves (23), that what Mr Somers urged in this ſhort, but very juſt argument, made more than ordinary impreſſion on the jury, and was more taken notice of than the argument of the elder lawyers, who pleaded the Biſhop's cauſe before him. It has been often ſaid that this cauſe was the firſt event that produced him into the world (24). But the ſame writer aſſures us, not without great appearance of truth, that from the time of his being engaged for the Sheriffs Pilkington and Shute, &c. his practice increaſed daily: and continues he, 'tis ſaid, he got 700 l. per annum by it in King James the Second's reign.' If this was an extraordinary gain at that time, it muſt be allowed that the times are much altered ſince in favour of the lawyers. The ſame writer having obſerved afterwards, that Mr Somers inherited a good eſtate after the death of his father, declares, 'that he was looked upon as one of the moſt riſing Counſel in England, before he appeared at the trial of the Biſhops (25).'

[I] One of the managers for the Houſe of Commons, &c.] The ſpeech he made on this occaſion is too well known, induced to agree to make uſe of that term againſt their own amendment. In the beginning of May, 1685, he was made Sollicitor General (m) [K], and knighted. While he held this poſt, came on the tryals of the Lord Preſton, Mr Aſhton, and Mr Elliot, for high-treaſon; and in that of the Lord Preſton, the Sollicitor made a very diſtinguiſhed figure [L]. And when the legality of the act, in the Convention for recognizing their Majeſties, was called in queſtion by one of the Members of the Houſe of Commons, as not being ſummoned by writ, he ſpoke with remarkable ſpirit in defence of it [M]. On the ſecond of May, 1692, he was made Attorney General (n), and was advanced thence to the poſt of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, on the twenty-third of March enſuing *. He had now an opportunity of diſplaying all thoſe extraordinary improvements in learning and knowledge, which he was eminently poſſeſſed of, in the buſineſs of his profeſſion; yet the temper which he invariably preſerved upon all occaſions, whilſt he ſat on this Bench, rendered him more particularly conſpicuous. He was fair and gentle almoſt to a fault, conſidering the dignity of his poſt, and had all the patience and ſoftneſs, as well as the juſtice and equity, becoming a great magiſtrate. However, it was not the ability and unblemiſhed integrity of the Judge, that recommended him to that confidence, which King William expreſſed for him on all occaſions: it was the uncommon reach of his known, and has been ſo often printed, that it would be abuſing the readers patience to inſert it here at length, notwithſtanding it is acknowledged to be one of thoſe deathleſs monuments of the important ſervices done by his Lordſhip to his country. It is ſufficient to give the purport of it as follows:

The Lords had changed the word abdicated for deſerted for theſe two reaſons, firſt, becauſe abdicated was a word not known to the Common Law, and ſecondly, becauſe the common acceptation of the word, amounts to a voluntary expreſs act of renunciation, which was not in this caſe, nor what would follow from the premiſes. To this firſt objection our manager replies, that their firſt reaſon had the ſame force againſt their own word deſerted, which had no determined ſenſe given to it in the Common Law. That they were both Latin words, and that the word abdicate doth naturally and properly ſignify, entirely to renounce, throw off, diſown, relinquiſh any thing or perſon, ſo as to have no further to do with it, and that, whether it be done by expreſs words or in writing, (which was the ſenſe put upon it by their Lordſhips, and is properly called reſignation or ceſſion) or by doing ſuch acts as are inconſiſtent with holding or retaining of the thing, which the Commons take to be the preſent caſe, and therefore made choice of the word, as that which did above all others moſt properly expreſs their meaning. This he proceeds to ſhew was the bare ſignification of the word from the authorities cited in the margin (26). He further obſerves, that Grotius ſeems to expound the word to mean, that he who hath abdicated any thing hath ſo far relinquiſhed it, that he hath no right of return to it, which is the ſenſe the Commons put upon it. On the other hand, the word deſerted in the common acceptance, both of Civil and Cannon Law, ſignifies only a bare withdrawing, a temporary quitting and neglect only, which leaveth the party at liberty of returning to it again (27), which as the Commons do not take to be the preſent caſe, ſo neither can they think that their Lordſhips do, becauſe it is expreſsly ſaid in one of their reaſons given in defence of the laſt amendment, that they had and were willing to ſecure the nation againſt the return of King James. He was anſwered among others by the Earl of Nottingham, who acknowledged that he had fully made out the ſignification of the word abdicate in the Civil Law; but inſiſting upon it that it was a word not known to the Common Law, our manager in his reply evaded that argument, by obſerving, that the ſame objection however did not lie againſt the word vacant, which had been applied in a parallel caſe, in 1 Henry IV. upon record the words which he produced.

[L] He made a diſtinguiſhed figure at Lord Preſton's tryal.] The tryal was held January 17, before Lord Chief Juſtice Holt, at the Old-Bailey. All our Sollicitor's ſpeeches on this occaſion are well worth the peruſal of ſuch readers as have any curioſity of this kind (29). But as they are too long to be inſerted here, we ſhall only give the following ſpecimen from that ſpoken at the opening of the charge. In which having informed that jury, that the general deſign of the conſpiracy was to depoſe the King and Queen, which was to be effected by a French army and a French fleet, he proceeds in theſe terms. 'It will be eaſily granted, that nothing more dreadful can enter into the imagination of an Engliſhman, than the deſtruction of our fleet, and the conqueſt of the kingdom by the arms of France But yet it will be part of the evidence that we ſhall offer to you, that the priſoners and others of the conſpirators ſeem to be of another mind; for among the papers which were taken with the priſoners, you will ſee one which is ſtiled, The reſult of a conference, wherein they pretend to ſhew the poſſibility of reſtoring King James by the power of the French King, and yet to preſerve the Proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom. They themſelves went no farther than to think it poſſible, and I believe it will be hard, to perſuade any other Engliſhman that it is poſſible; unleſs ſome one inſtance could be given that the French King ever employed his arms for ſetting up any body but himſelf, his own religion, and his own government. I never heard, that he did pretend to form any part of his glories upon the virtue of moderation or ſelf-denial: and there can hardly be imagined a greater inſtance of ſelf-denial, than for the French King, after he had deſtroyed the Dutch and Engliſh fleets, and ſubdued our forces at land, not to make uſe of his ſucceſs, ſo as to add theſe three kingdoms to his conqueſts, and poſſeſs himſelf of the uncontеſted dominion of the ſea for ever, but only to intitle him, at ſo great a hazard and expence, to become a mediator between King James and the people of England, and by his mediation to eſtabliſh the Proteſtant religion, and the liberties of the people. And yet as abſurd as this ſeems, you will find this to be the reſult of one of their conferences, &c.'

(29) The tryal is inſerted among the State Tryals, and the Sollicitor's ſpeeches, both at the entrance and the opening, are printed in the Memoirs of his Life, p. 26 to p. 38.

[M] He ſpoke in defence of the legality of the Convention] Biſhop Burnet, who furniſhes this particular, gives us the ſubſtance of his ſpeech, and tells us, he ſaid, if that was not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high treaſon; the laws repealed by it were ſtill in force; ſo they muſt preſently return to King James: all the money ſeized, collected, and paid, by virtue of that act of parliament, made every one that was concerned in it highly criminal. This, continues the Biſhop, he ſpoke with much zeal, and ſuch an aſcendant of authority, that none were prepared to anſwer it. So the bill paſſed without any more oppoſition. The Right Reverend hiſtorian concludes with a remark, that this was a great ſervice done in a very critical time, and contributed not a little to raiſe Somers's character (30).

his capacity for all affairs of publick concern, that made that prince conſider him above all his miniſters (o); and ſeveral perſons of real worth felt the happy effects of the ſhare he had in the royal favour [N]. After the death of Archbiſhop Tillotſon, in 1694, Sir John Somers,

(o) Burnet, Vol. II. p. 108. fol. edit.

[N] Several perſons felt the effect of this favour.] When he did not think it proper to countenance ſome perſons, whoſe learning he admired, though he did not like their characters, he was very bountiful to them at the ſame time, that he gave them to underſtand, he could excuſe their viſits. For inſtance, he gave a certain perſon 100 l. and directed one, whom he entruſted with that commiſſion, to let him know, it was on condition he ſhould give no more attendance upon him: the perſon, though a Clergyman, having no good reputation for his morals. This particular comes from the writer of his Memoirs (31), who having obſerved that his Lordſhip did not confine his protection of men of letters to his countrymen only, but that foreigners alſo ſhared of his favour and bounty, and Mr Le Clerc in particular, goes on to Mr Bayle, as follows. 'About the time that Mr Bayle's Hiſtorical 'and Critical Dictionary was much talked of as a work 'which was ready to be publiſhed, my Lord Somers 'had ſuch a character of it, that he was deſirous to 'do ſomething for the author. Accordingly he wrote 'to a friend in Holland, intimating, that if Mr Bayle 'accepted of his patronage for his dictionary, he had 'one hundred and fifty guineas at his ſervice. Mr 'Bayle, continues this writer, had been ſuſpected of 'caballing with perſons in the French Intereſt, and it 'was ſo far proved upon him, that King William or-'dered him to be removed from his Profeſſor's place 'by the magiſtracy of Rotterdam. This highly diſ-'guſted that gentleman, and on many occaſions he ex-'preſſed his reſentment againſt King William, but in 'none more than this. For when a friend of his com-'municated to him my Lord's generous diſpoſition 'towards him, and repreſented how much it would 'be for his honour and advantage, Mr Bayle anſwered, 'It was true; but he could not, bring himſelf to pay 'that compliment to a Lord, who was Miniſter to a 'Prince, of whom he had reaſon to complain. That 'King William, concludes this writer, had reaſon to 'complain of him, we may very well imagine, when 'he was ſo well with the French Court, that Count 'Guiſcard offered him 1000 crowns a year, and the 'liberty of his religion, if he would return to France, 'and be tutor to his ſons, the King having given him 'permiſſion to do it (32).' Mr Walpole calls this life of Lord Somers a poor performance (33), and the notorious weakneſs of this laſt remark is one egregious proof of the juſtice of his cenſure. However, the truth of that part of the paſſage here cited, which preceeds this remark, is countenanced by the hiſtory of Mr Bayle's life. In which we have a letter of that author to Mr Naudis, his couſin, upon the ſubject of his removal from his Profeſſorſhip, wherein he expreſſes his reſentment of it in theſe terms. 'You muſt know, 'ſays he, that the 30th of October laſt (34) I was de-'prived of my yearly penſion of 500 gilders, and of 'the leave I had of reading public and private lectures. 'This was done by the Council of this city, which is 'compoſed of twenty-four perſons, and is called in 'Dutch Vroedſchap. The Burgomaſters, who are 'four in number, choſen out of that council, notified 'this reſolution to me [on the ſecond of November] 'without acquainting me why they now deprived me 'of what they had granted me in 1681. I have been 'told that ſeveral members of the Council vigorouſly 'oppoſed this injuſtice, but the majority carried it. 'Let us diſtinguiſh the cauſe of this proceeding from 'the pretence of it. The pretence, with which they 'diſguiſe this conduct in private converſation, and 'which was even alledged by ſome the day in which 'this reſolution was taken, is, that the book which 'I publiſhed in 1682 concerning comets, contains 'dangerous propoſitions, and ſuch as a Chriſtian ma-'giſtrate ought not to ſuffer young perſons to be in-'fected with. The better to colour this pretence, the 'authors of this conſpiracy againſt me have obtained, 'by a long ſeries of intrigues, that ſome Dutch Mini-'ſters, obſtinate men, great enemies of foreigners, 'and of the new [i. e. Des Cartes] philoſophy, paſſio-'nate and ſeditious men, ſhould examine the book 'concerning comets, and report, that it contains 'a dangerous doctrine. All this has been done with 'great ſecrecy, without giving me the leaſt notice of 'it; without any regard to the declarations, which I 'have an hundred times made to the magiſtrates and 'miniſters, &c. either publicly or in converſation, 'that I was ready to ſhew, that my book concerning 'the comets, contained nothing, which was repugnant 'either to right reaſon, or the confeſſions of faith of the 'Proteſtant churches. An infinite number of honeſt 'men here are filled with indignation at ſuch a conduct, 'which is not practiſed even in the church of Rome. 'If an author be accuſed there of hereſy, he is heard in 'own defence, and permitted either to explain his 'words, or retract his errors. This, my dear couſin, 'ought to leſſen your ſorrow for continuing to live in 'France. You will be a much better Proteſtant, if 'you ſee our religion only where it is perſecuted: you 'would be ſcandalized, if you was to ſee it where it 'is eſtabliſhed by Law. But let us come to the real 'cauſe of my misfortune. You muſt know, that un-'der a republican government, every city and every 'town is uſually divided into two or more factions. 'In Holland there are every where two parties, the 'one weak and of little credit, but compoſed of men of 'merit; the other powerful, which proudly abuſes it's 'ſuperiority and power. When I came here, I had 'my patrons and benefactors among the weak party, 'which was not then ſo weak as it is now. I have 'always cultivated their friendſhip, and could never 'follow the maxims of the courtiers. I never endea-'voured to inſinuate myſelf into the favour of the 'other party, which is daily gaining the aſcendant. 'This I thought would be baſe and mercenary; ſo 'that when, above a year ago, ſeveral of our magi-'ſtrates were depoſed, and others of the reigning party 'choſen in their ſtead, the ballance could no longer 'be even; and the new comers have deprived me of 'my place, in order to ſhew what they could do 'againſt thoſe, who do not ſtoop before them, and 'dare to keep a correſpondence with their ancient 'friends; and as the pretence was my teaching the 'youth dangerous doctrines, they were obliged to 'forbid me to teach privately, as well as publickly. 'Thus the two ſprings of my maintenance are ſhut 'up. I never had one penny of my father's eſtate; 'I never was inclined to hoard up money; nay, 'I never was in a condition to do it. I depended 'upon my penſion, which I thought was to continue 'all my life-time, but I find now that there is nothing 'laſting in this world. You may eaſily gueſs that 'I have ſtrong reaſons to be uneaſy with regard to the 'time to come, being in a country where living is 'expenſive. But, thank God, I have not yet felt 'any uneaſineſs, and am perfectly reſigned to the will 'of heaven, &c.'

M. Des Maizeaux remarks upon this letter, 'that Mr Bayle was not well acquainted with the real cauſe of his misfortune. It was a ſecret which the magiſtrates did not think fit to let him know: but it was owing to the ſituation of public affairs at that time. The King of France deſiring to put an end to the war, of which he could hardly bear the expence any longer, employed Mr Amelot his Ambaſſador in Switzerland, to make propoſals to ſome perſons of credit in Holland. He promiſed to yield a ſtrong barrier to the Dutch to cover their country, to grant them a full liberty for their trade, and all other advantages they could deſire. Mr Halewin, a Burgomaſter of Dort, being charmed with thoſe promiſes, entered into a negotiation with Mr Amelot, without the knowledge of the States. King William, being informed of it, cauſed Mr Halewin to be arreſted, and being found guilty he was condemned to perpetual impriſonment, and all his eſtates forfeited. As ſoon as this gentleman was arreſted, Mr Jurieu (35) conceived great hopes, that the whole Geneva cabal would now have been diſcovered; and that Mr Minutoli, Goudet, Baſnage, de Bauval, and Bayle, would be accuſed by Mr Halewin: he boaſted already that he was the firſt who diſcovered the dangerous plot, which was carrying on in Switzerland. But all his hopes ſoon vaniſhed, and it appeared that none of theſe gentlemen were in the leaſt concerned either with Mr Halewin or Mr Amelot. Yet, though

Somers, who had held the ſtricteſt friendſhip with him for many years, made uſe of his intereſt to procure an additional annuity for his widow from the King (p); and a few years afterwards, he obtained a handſome allowance, to enable Mr Addiſon to compleat his education, by making the tour of Italy (q). From 1695, the firſt year after the death of Queen Mary, he was conſtituted one of the Lords-Juſtices of the kingdom, during his Majeſty's abſence abroad, every year as long as he held the Great Seal. This honour was, indeed, nothing more than an appendage to his place [O]. In the mean time, the title of it was raiſed into that of Lord High-Chancellor of England, on the 22d of April, 1697, when he was alſo called to the Peerage, by the title of Lord Somers, Baron of Eveſham in the county of Worceſter (r). For the ſupport of theſe honours and dignities, his eſtate not being ſufficient, his Majeſty made him a grant of the manors of Reygate and Howlegh in Surrey [P], and another grant of two thouſand one hundred pounds per annum, out of the fee-farm rents (s). He was now at the head of the Whigs, and it was reckoned, that the chief ſtrength of that party lay in his credit with the King [Q], and the though Mr Bayle was innocent, he ſuffered by theſe ſecret negotiations; they were the true cauſe of his misfortune. The ſecret practices of France put King William in mind of the project of peace; about which Mr Jurieu had made ſo much noiſe; and as the peace of Nimeguen had been procured by ſuch pamphlets diſperſed at Amſterdam and other places, the king thought the ſame practices were now revived at Rotterdam. This great prince, who had not leiſure enough to examine that project, was alarmed by the notion of a peace negotiated in the manner juſt mentioned, and thought there really was, as Mr Jurieu pretended, a party endeavouring to procure it, of which Mr Bayle was at the head; whereupon he ordered the magiſtrates of Rotterdam to diſmiſs him from his profeſſorſhip and his penſion. The magiſtrates obeyed the command, but concealed the cauſe of his deprivation from Mr Bayle (36).' By the by it is obſervable, that this politic conduct of the magiſtrates proved a touch-ſtone of Mr Bayle's ſpirit and temper.

[O] Was nothing more than an appendage of his place.] The ſame may be ſaid of his being appointed one of the governors of the Charter-Houſe upon the firſt vacancy (37), and one of the truſtees or commiſſioners of Greenwich-Hoſpital (38). But the year proved unlucky to him in another reſpect. It was this year that the Earl of Bellamont informed him of the great ſpoil committed by ſome pirates in the Weſt-Indies, and repreſented the abſolute neceſſity of redreſſing them. The Lord-Keeper communicated it to the King, who commanded the Lords of the Admiralty, to examine the affair and provide a ſhip for that ſervice. But that board declaring, there was not one to be ſpared from the occaſions of the war; rather than ſuch a neceſſary ſervice ſhould be loſt, the Lord-Keeper conſented to be at part of the charge of fitting out a ſhip called the Adventure Gally, on purpoſe of which Captain Kidd was made commander, who turned pirate himſelf. This public-ſpirited act was afterwards made an article in his Lordſhip's impeachment by the Houſe of Commons (39).

[P] He obtained a grant of the manors of Ryegate and Howlegh, &c.] Theſe manors formerly belonged to the Lord Munſon, who forfeited them for his ſiding with Cromwell, and being concerned in the death of King Charles the Firſt. After the Reſtoration they were given to the Duke of York, and he having forfeited them by his Abdication, they merged in the Crown. The yearly value of both was not above 600*l. per annum*. The grant was made to Joſeph Jekyll, Eſq; in truſt for his Lordſhip, who by this means came to have great influence in the election of Members of Parliament for that borough; which before this was intirely under the direction of Sir John Parſons a [wealthy] Brewer in London. Thus the writer of his life (40), and ſo far may paſs without cenſure; but when he proceeds to tell us, that in carrying theſe elections his Lordſhip met with great oppoſition from the neighbouring gentry, inſomuch that ſeveral of his friends in London became freeholders in this manor, as Mr Congreve, Mr Tonſon, and others, to ſtrengthen that intereſt; it muſt occur to every reader, that this buſy management, which is related in the view of doing honour to his Lordſhip, is really one of thoſe few blemiſhes that appear in his character. But who can help ſmiling at this writer's weakneſs, when he finds him afterwards, by way of defence of his Lordſhip againſt that part of his impeachment by the Houſe of Commons, which relates to the grant of Ryegate, obſerving, 'that this 'manor was cried up to be of great value, whereas, 'indeed, it is not 500l. a year. What the party 'diſliked moſt in it, was the influence it gave the 'proprietor, in elections for Members of Parliament; 'in which, however, my Lord Somers did never 'carry above one Member, except in one election, 'when Mr Thurland and Mr Harvey (41) turned out 'Sir John Parſons and his ſon; but Thurland, for-'getting by whoſe favour he was choſen, fell in with 'the oppoſite party; and ever after that, my Lord 'Somers compounded the matter with Sir John 'Parſons, who was conſtantly choſen with a friend 'of his Lordſhip's. It is ſaid, continues he, that 'this agreement was made when Sir John Parſons 'gave his vote for Sir Thomas Abney to be Lord-'Mayor, in oppoſition to Sir Charles Duncombe, and 'that it was my Lord Somers, who engaged Sir John 'to vote for Sir Thomas, which vote carried the 'election.'

[Q] His credit with the King.] We have a remarkable inſtance of this credit and confidence of the King related by Burnet, who, in his account of Charnock, one of the chief conſpirators in the Aſſaſſination-Plot, in 1695, tells us, 'that endeavours were uſed to perſuade him to confeſs all he knew, for he had been in all their plots from the beginning. His brother was employed to deal with him, and he ſeemed to be once in a ſuſpence; but the next time that his brother came to him, he told him, he could not ſave his own life without doing that which would take away the lives of ſo many; that he did not think his own life worth it. This ſhewed a greatneſs of mind, and had been very valuable, if it had been better directed. Thus, continues the Biſhop, this matter was underſtood at the time. But many years after this, the Lord Somers gave me a different account of it. Charnock, as he told me, ſent an offer to the King of a full diſcovery of all their conſultations and deſigns, and deſired no pardon, but that he might live in ſome eaſy priſon, and if he was found to prevaricate in any part of his diſcovery, he would look for the execution of the ſentence. But the King apprehended that ſo many perſons would be found concerned, and thereby be rendered deſperate, that he was afraid to have ſuch a ſcene opened, and would not accept of this offer' (42). We have another inſtance of his credit with the King, related by the ſame hiſtorian, as follows: 'His Lordſhip, [in 1695] propoſed that which would 'have put an effectual ſtop to clipping for the future. 'It was, that a proclamation ſhould be prepared with 'ſuch ſecrecy, as to be publiſhed over all England on 'the ſame day, ordering money to paſs only by weight, 'but, that at the ſame time, during three or four days 'after the proclamation, all perſons in every county, 'that had money ſhould bring it in to be told and 'weighed; and the difference was to be regiſtered, 'and the money, to be ſealed up to the end of the 'time given, and then to be reſtored to the owners; 'and aſſurance was to be given, that this deficiency 'in weight ſhould be laid before the Parliament, to 'be ſupplied another way, and to be allowed them in 'the following taxes. But though the King liked this 'propoſition; yet all the reſt of the Council were 'againſt it. They ſaid, this would ſtop the circula-'tion of money, and might occaſion tumults in the 'markets: that, thoſe whoſe money was thus to be 'weighed, would not believe the difference between 'the tale and the weight would be allowed them, 'and the prudent methods he took to govern the party, and to moderate that heat and thoſe jealouſies, with which his Majeſty had been ſo long diſguſted in the firſt years of his reign (t). However, his conduct did not eſcape the cenſure of ſome of his own party, for being too compliant with his royal maſter's humour and notions, or at leaſt of being too ſoft or too feeble in repreſenting his errors to him (u). Upon the diſcovery of the Aſſaſſination plot in 1695, ſuch an alteration was made by him in the commiſſion of the Peace, as gave great diſguſt to many people [R]; and, not long after the concluſion of the treaty of Ryſwick, his influence in Parliament began viſibly to decline, his Majeſty being not only obliged by the new Parliament, which met in December 1698, to reduce his army to a very low ſtate both in England and Ireland, but alſo to ſend home his Dutch guards, notwithſtanding the great reluctance he expreſſed on that occaſion (w). The King, before his departure for Holland the preceding ſummer, communicated to the Lord Chancellor a propoſition made by Count Tallard, to prevent a war about the ſucceſſion of Spain, upon the death of the then feeble monarch of that kingdom; and the Chancellor received, in Auguſt following, a letter from his Majeſty, then in Holland, informing him, that freſh offers had been made to the ſame purpoſe, and requiring him privately to diſpatch full powers, under the Great Seal, with the names in blank, to empower his Majeſty to treat with the aforementioned Count. The order was punctually complied with, and the negotiations being immediately entered upon, a treaty was concluded. This was the firſt Partition treaty; and in the next ſeſſion of Parliament, which began November 16, 1699, great complaints were made in the Houſe of Commons againſt the Chancellor: and the Houſe having reſolved, on the ſixth of December, to puſh the reſumption of the grants of the Iriſh forfeited eſtates, by tacking it to the land-tax bill; an addreſs was concerted, April 10, 1700, praying, that John Lord Somers, Lord Chancellor of England, ſhould be removed for ever from his Majeſty's preſence and council (x), which was then paſſed in the negative (y). The Parliament being prorogued the next day, his Majeſty, on the 19th, retired to Hampton-Court, where, in a few days, ſending for the Lord Chancellor, he wiſhed him to ſurrender the Seals voluntarily; which being declined by his Lordſhip [S], the King ſent to demand them, and they were accordingly delivered up at the cloſe of that month. This ſtep was the occaſion of his Majeſty's loſing many of his friends, eſpecially of the Whig party; but though his removal diſpleaſed numbers, yet it ſeemed not to affect his Lordſhip, who retired with content and temper, and upon all occaſions in Parliament ſerved the King, as if he had not loſt his place (z). On the 14th of April, 1701, the Houſe of Commons having firſt, at his own requeſt, admitted him to ſpeak before them in his own defence, ſent up an impeachment of high crimes and miſdemeanors againſt him to the Lords; and, in conſequence

'and ſo might grow mutinous. Therefore, they were 'for leaving this matter to the next Parliament. So 'this propoſition was laid aſide, which would have 'ſaved the nation above a million of money. For 'now, as all people believed, that the Parliament 'would receive the clipt money in it's tale, clipping 'went on, and became more viſibly ſcandalous than 'it ever had been (43).' We have given the King's approbation of this propoſal as an inſtance of Lord Somers's credit with his Majeſty, who otherwiſe could not, 'tis apprehended, have gone into a project that lay open to ſuch unanſwerable objections. In ſhort, what ſuperior abilities ſoever in other parts may be allowed to Lord Somers, 'tis certain, in this moſt arduous one, ariſing from the bad ſtate of the coin, he muſt yield the palm to Lord Halifax, who was the only perſon that appeared equal to the taſk (44).

[R] He made an alteration in the commiſſion of the Peace, which gave great diſguſt to many people.] The fact was thus: When the deſign of the Aſſaſſination and Invaſion Plots, in 1695, and the following year, were diſcovered, a voluntary aſſociation being entered into by both Houſes of Parliament, it was ſent round the nation. In ſuch a time of danger, it was thought, that thoſe who did not enter voluntarily into it were ſo ill affected, or at leaſt ſo little zealous for the public good, that it was not fit they ſhould continue Juſtices of the Peace. Whereupon, an order paſſed in Council, that all thoſe, who had ſo refuſed, ſhould be turned out of the commiſſion. Lord Somers had obeyed this order, according to the repreſentations made to him by the Lords Lieutenants and Cuſtodes Rotulorum of the ſeveral counties, who were not equally diſcreet. However, he laid thoſe repreſentations before the Council, and had a ſpecial order for every perſon that was ſo turned out. But it was now charged upon him, that he had adviſed and procured thoſe orders (45).

(45) Burnet.

[S] He refuſed to deliver up the Seals voluntarily.] The writer of his life tells us (46), that 'it was ſaid by 'ſome who where no ſtrangers to the Lord Somers, that 'his Lordſhip repreſented to his Majeſty at Hampton-Court, that though he was very willing to reſign 'the Seals and retire from buſineſs; yet, being con-'vinced that thoſe who had adviſed his Majeſty to 'take them from him, did it with a view rather to 'ſerve themſelves than the government; if his Majeſty 'would conſent, that he ſhould continue in his poſt, 'he doubted not to be able to vindicate himſelf 'againſt all the calumnies of his enemies, and maintain 'himſelf in it with the reputation due to his zeal and 'integrity.' The garb in which this ſtory is expoſed by our life-writer, is another glaring inſtance of his poor talent that way. The laſt expreſſion eſpecially is apparently irreconcilable to that modeſty which was a moſt diſtinguiſhing part of Lord Somers's character. Yet the ſimple fact itſelf may deſerve notice, and is confirmed by Mr Oldmixon (47), who told the ſame ſtory many years afterwards, with ſomewhat better judgment, as follows: 'The King, ſays he, ſome time before the prorogation, which was April 11, had given his Lordſhip a hint of the neceſſity he ſhould be under to part with him, in order to accommodate matters with thoſe in the oppoſition to the meaſures of the adminiſtration. His Lordſhip, upon this, told his Majeſty, that he knew very well what his enemies aimed at, by their abuſing and perſecuting him as they had of late done. That the Seal was his greateſt crime, and if he quitted it, he ſhould be forgiven; but knowing what ill uſe would be made of it, if it were put into their hands, he was reſolved, with his Majeſty's permiſſion, to keep it in defiance of their malice, and to ſtand all the trials they ſhould put upon him with the ſupport of his innocence, and the hopes of his being ſerviceable to his Majeſty. That he feared them not, but if he would be as firm to his friends as they would be to him, they ſhould be able to carry whatever points he had in view for the public welfare, in a new Parliament. The King ſhook his head, as a ſign of his diffidence, and only ſaid, it muſt be ſo. Mr Oldmixon tells us alſo, that the gentleman who was his informer had it from Lord Somers himſelf.'

quence thereof, an addreſs was preſented on the 23d to his Majeſty, to the ſame purport with that which miſcarried in the preceding ſeſſion, and on the 19th of May, the articles of his impeachment were exhibited to the Lords; but, upon a quarrel between the two Houſes, he was acquitted by the Lords, on the 17th of June, without any further proſecution of the Commons [T]. King William dying not long after, his Lordſhip being in no favour at the new Court, withdrew to a private way of life, paſſing his time with univerſal eſteem in the moſt polite and uſeful ſtudies [U]. During this retirement, he was choſen Preſident of the Royal Society, of which he had been long a member (a a); yet he attended in the Houſe of Lords, and, perſevering in his principles, he oppoſed the bill to prevent Occaſional Conformity [W], and was one of the managers for the

(a a) He was alſo choſen Recorder of Glouceſter. Life, p. 110.

[T] He was acquitted, &c.] The whole account of this proſecution is ſo largely ſet forth in the general hiſtories of England, that to repeat them here would be deviating from the deſign of this work. Therefore, referring the reader to thoſe hiſtories, we ſhall only mention ſome particulars ſcarcely taken notice of in them. The firſt relates to Kidd's affair, and is, if true, an undeniable teſtimony of the innocence of Lord Somers, as well as of the other Lords and gentlemen concerned in it. 'When the Parliament, that debated this matter, was riſen, his Majeſty was pleaſed to honour a noble Lord with his company at dinner. While they were at table a diſcourſe aroſe concerning Kidd, and the trouble occaſioned by that buſineſs to the perſons concerned in the grant. Upon which his Majeſty ſaid, that if by the law of England he could be witneſs, he could of his own knowledge juſtify the Lords concerned, in all they had done in that affair (48). Another particular which more properly falls under the plan of this work, relates to Lord Haverſham's ſpeech, in the conference between the two Houſes, on the twenty-fourth of June, when his Lordſhip declared his opinion of the proſecution in the following terms: 'One thing there is, though I cannot ſpeak it, being bound by the orders of the Houſe. Yet I muſt give ſome anſwer, that is, as to the Lords voting in their own caſe. It requires an anſwer, though I cannot go into the debate of it. The Commons themſelves have made this precedent. For in theſe impeachments they have allowed men, guilty of the ſame crimes, to vote in their own Houſe; and, therefore, we have not made any diſtinction in our Houſe, that ſome ſhould vote and ſome not. The Lords have ſo high an opinion of the juſtice of the Houſe of Commons, that they hope juſtice will never be made uſe of as a maſk for any deſign: and, therefore, give me leave to ſay, though I am not to argue it, 'tis a plain demonſtration, that the Commons think theſe Lords innocent, and I think the propoſition is undeniable, for there are ſeveral Lords in the ſame crimes, in the ſame facts, there is no diſtinction; and the Commons leave ſome of theſe men at the head of affairs, near the King's perſon, to do any miſchief, if they were inclined to it, and impeach others; when they are both alike guilty, and concerned in the ſame fact. This is a thing I was in hopes I ſhould never have heard aſſerted, when the beginning of it was from the Houſe of Commons.' This was ſpoken with an eye to the Earl of Jerſey, who was Plenipotentiary with the Earl of Portland, and ſigned the Partition Treaty; he was then Lord Chamberlain, and though he was much more concerned in the affair of the treaty than Lord Somers, yet he was left near the King's perſon a Privy-Counſellor, and no vote to remove him. In return for that complacency his Lordſhip gave his vote againſt Lord Somers (49). Sir Joſeph Williamſon ſigned the Partition Treaty as a Plenipotentiary, was then a Privy-Counſellor, and unimpeached. Thirdly, the Lord Somers was accuſed for aſſerting the Iriſh grants. Sir Edward Seymour and Sir Stephen Fox did the ſame when they were Lords of the Treaſury; but not a word was ſaid of them. Fourthly, the Lord Somers was charged for being concerned in the ſetting out the Adventure Galley, which Kidd ran away with; the Duke of Shrewſbury and the Earl of Romney lay open to the ſame charge, yet no notice was taken of them. Theſe are glaring inſtances of the rage of that party which puſhed on this proſecution; and they are ſet up here as ſo many ſea-marks for the direction of others, to avoid ſhip-wrecking honour and conſcience againſt the ſame rocks. Such things indeed are generally laughed off as a game between the ins and outs, neceſſary to be played upon ſome occaſions, by every gentleman of fortune, who is actuated by a becoming ambition not to lead the life of a drone in contemptible obſcurity. But may it not be juſtly ſtiled the worſt ſort of gaming? 'Tis remarkable in the game, (if we muſt give it that name) now under conſideration, many of the gameſters lived to ſee and condemn their own folly in playing it: to which reflection the late Lord Bolingbroke in particular, one of the ableſt and moſt active of the party concerned, was brought by ſad experience (50).'

[U] He paſſed his time in the moſt polite and uſeful ſtudies.] No pains has been wanting to do juſtice to this part of his character. We are told by one writer, 'that his Lordſhip now gave himſelf up intirely to the ſtudies of Hiſtory, Antiquities, and other curious parts of learning. That he took a particular pleaſure in prints and medals, and was a maſterly judge of their genuineneſs and excellence. He alſo delighted himſelf in his retirement, at his ſeat near Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire, and the ſweets of ſolitude and the Muſes ſoon made more than amends for the loſs of the fatigues and honours of his office of Chancellor *. Again, all the leiſure his Lordſhip had, by being out of the miniſtry, he employed in entertaining himſelf with medals, prints, and books, of which he had a collection equally large and well choſen (51).' This is evidently nothing elſe but a copy (and a clumſy one it is) of Mr Addiſon's original, expreſſed in the following terms: 'This great man, ſays that excellent author, 'was not more conſpicuous as a Patriot and a Statesman, than as a perſon of univerſal knowledge and 'learning. As by dividing his time between the 'public ſcenes of buſineſs and the private retirements 'of life, he took care to keep up both the great and 'good man; ſo by the ſame means he accomplished 'himſelf not only in the knowledge of men and things, 'but in the ſkill of the moſt refined arts and ſciences. 'He enjoyed, in the higheſt perfection, two talents, 'which do not often meet in the ſame perſon, the 'greateſt ſtrength of good ſenſe and the moſt exquiſite 'taſte of politeneſs. Without the firſt, learning is but 'an incumbrance, and without the laſt is ungraceful. 'My Lord Somers was maſter of theſe qualifications 'in ſo eminent a degree, that all the parts of knowledge appeared in him with ſuch an additional 'ſtrength and beauty, as they want in the poſſeſſion 'of others. If he delivered his opinion of a piece 'of poetry, a ſtatue, or a picture, there was ſomething ſo juſt and delicate in his obſervations, as 'naturally produced pleaſure and aſſent in thoſe who 'heard him (52).'

[W] He voted againſt the Occaſional Conformity bill, in 1703.] However, there is good reaſon to believe that he promoted the bill for ſettling the firſt-fruits and tenths, towards augmenting the poorer benefices of the Clergy. The writer of Biſhop Burnet's life, having mentioned that Prelate's deſigns in this particular, in the year 1696 and 1697, proceeds to inform us, that he had concerted his meaſures, in 1701, with Lord Godolphin and Lord Somers; and in confirmation of it, has inſerted a letter of this laſt, wrote in anſwer to one from the Biſhop, as follows:

'November 22, 1701.

'My Lord,

'I acknowledge the honour of your Lordſhip's 'letter of the 17th with great thankfulneſs. I wiſh 'it may lie in my power to contribute to the excellent 'deſign. I promiſe you no man ſhall enter into it 'more willingly, and ſhall labour in it more heartily. When I have the honour of ſeeing 'your Lordſhip, we ſhall, I hope, diſcourſe at large 'upon the Lords, in the conference between the two Houſes upon it in 1702; and, when it was brought into the Houſe the next year, 1703, he gave his vote in the negative (bb). In 1706, though unpoſſeſſed of any publick employ, he projected a plan for uniting the two kingdoms, which was generally approved; and this being a point which Queen Anne had greatly at heart, her Majeſty took notice of his merit, and appointed him one of the managers of the Union [X]. The ſame year he propoſed a bill for preventing delays and expences in the proceedings at Law, as alſo ſome regulations with regard to paſſing private Acts of Parliament [Y]. Upon a change of the miniſterial meaſures in 1708, he was placed at the head of the miniſtry, in the poſt of Preſident of the Council [Z]; and he concurred in rejecting the propoſals for a general peace, offered by the French in 1709 at Gertruydenberg [AA], and in the reſolution for carrying on the war (cc). The ſame year

'upon the whole ſubject. In the mean time, allow 'me to aſſure you, that I am, with great and ſincere 'reſpect, (53) Life of Biſhop Burnet, prefixed to the Hiſtory of his own Time, p. lxvii. edit. 1753, 8vo.

[X] He was one of the managers of the Union] Mr Walpole declares it was projected by him. Biſhop Burnet ſays he was the chief manager of the treaty. Mr Addiſon goes further, and inſinuates a probability of his projecting not only that plan, but the bill of Regency. Theſe are his words: 'As he [Lord 'Somers] was admitted into the ſecret and moſt 'retired thoughts and counſels of his royal Maſter, 'King William; a great ſhare in the plan of the 'Proteſtant ſucceſſion is univerſally aſcribed to him: 'and if he did not intirely project the Union of the 'two kingdoms, and the bill of Regency, which ſeem 'to have been the only methods in human policy 'for ſecuring to us ſo ineſtimable a bleſſing, there is 'none who will deny him to have been the chief 'conductor in both theſe glorious works. For poſterity 'are obliged to allow him that praiſe after his death, 'which he induſtriouſly declined, while he was 'living (55).' And to the ſame purpoſe, Burnet obſerves, ſpeaking of Ferguſon's plot for a rebellion in Scotland, to be aſſiſted from France, that the Lords concluded the whole matter with voting, that the encouragment of this plot came from the not ſettling the ſucceſſion of the Crown of Scotland in the Houſe of Hanover. That they laid this vote before the Queen, and propoſed, that when this was done they would promote the Union of the two kingdoms upon juſt and reaſonable terms. This being ended, they made a long and vigorous addreſs, in anſwer to that which the Commons had made againſt them. This addreſs was penned with great care and much force. Both the addreſſes were drawn up by the Lord Somers (56).

[Y] A bill for the amendment of the proceeding at Law, and in paſſing private Acts of Parliament.] Biſhop Burnet, who is again our informer, gives us the particular circumſtances of theſe two facts, as follows: 'His Lordſhip, ſays the Prelate, made a 'motion in the Houſe of Lords to correct ſome pro-'ceedings in the Common Law and in Chancery, 'that were both dilatory and chargeable. He began 'the motion with ſome inſtances that were more 'conſpicuous and groſs, and he managed the matter 'ſo, that both the Lord Keeper and the Judges 'concurred with him: though it paſſes generally for 'a maxim, that Judges ought rather to enlarge than 'contract their juriſdiction. A bill paſſed the Houſe, 'that begun a reformation of the proceedings at Law, 'which, as things now ſtand, are certainly amongſt 'the greateſt grievances of the nation. When this 'went through the Houſe of Commons, it was viſible 'that the intereſt of under-officers, clerks, and 'attornies, whoſe gains were to be leſſened by this 'bill, was more conſidered than the intereſt of the 'nation itſelf. Several clauſes, how beneficial ſoever 'to the ſubject, which touched on their profit, were 'left out by the Commons. But, what fault ſoever 'the Lords might have found with there alterations, 'yet, to avoid all diſputes with the Commons, the 'amendments were agreed to. There was another 'general complaint made of the private Acts of Parlia-'ment, that paſſed through both Houſes too eaſily, 'and in ſo great a number, that it took up a great 'part of the ſeſſion to examine them, even in that 'curſory way that was ſubject to many inconveniences. 'The fees that were paid for theſe to the ſpeakers 'and clerks of both Houſes inclined them to favour 'and promote them. So the Lord Somers propoſed 'ſuch a regulation in that matter as will probably have 'a good effect for the future (57).'

(57) Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time, Vol. IV. p. 140. 8vo. edition.

[Z] He was made Preſident of the Council, and voted againſt accepting the terms of peace at Gertruydenberg, &c.] It is not unentertaining to hear the ſame Hiſtorian deſcanting upon this promotion of Lord Somers. 'The great capacity and inflexible integrity of this 'Lord, ſays the Biſhop, would have made his pro-'motion to this poſt very acceptable to the Whigs at 'any juncture, but it was moſt particularly ſo at this 'time: for it was expected, that propoſitions for a 'general peace would be quickly made; and ſo they 'reckoned, that the management of that upon which 'not only the ſafety of the nation, but of all Europe 'depended, was in ſure hands, when he was ſet at the 'head of the councils, upon whom neither ill practices 'nor falſe colours were like to make any impreſſion. 'Thus the minds of all thoſe who were truly zealous 'for the preſent conſtitution were much quieted by 'this promotion, though their jealouſies had a deep 'root, and were not eaſily removed (58).' In the former remark, we are taught to aſcribe to Lord Somers the projection of thoſe plans which were neceſſary for the ſafety and welfare of the kingdom, and here we are directed to look upon him as the Palladium, the virtue of whoſe preſence was ſufficient to ſecure the poſſeſſion of thoſe bleſſings. The uſe of this will appear preſently.

[AA] He concurred in rejecting the French propoſals at Gertruydenberg.] 'Tis well known what uſe the Tories made of the Miniſtry's rejecting theſe propoſals at Gertruydenberg, to effectuate a change of hands; and in the General Dictionary there are extracts from two letters (59) of his Lordſhip, written at the breaking up of the negociations, to the Earl of Wharton, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which diſcover our Preſident's temper upon this occaſion. The firſt of theſe extracts is as follows: 'As for news, I never 'was ſo little able to anſwer your demands. It is 'avowed, that no reſolution is yet taken as to the 'continuing or determining the preſent Parliament. 'But the falling of ſtocks here, and the uneaſineſs 'occaſioned in Holland, while the uncertainty con-'tinues, ſeems to make it abſolutely neceſſary to have 'this matter remain no longer in ſuſpence. In the 'mean time, our late diſturbances, and the unſettled-'neſs of our affairs, give courage to our enemies; 'for the French Ambaſſadors at Gertruydenberg have 'ſent a very inſolent letter, or rather manifeſto, to the 'penſioner, in order to juſtify their breaking off the 'negociation. I hope ſo unneceſſary and ſo inſolent 'a provocation will give the Dutch courage enough 'to reſent it as they ought, but I have not the reſolu-'tion taken upon it. It breaks my heart to think 'what a noble game we are unneceſſarily throwing 'away.'

(59) Under his Lordſhip's article.

This letter was dated July 15, 1710, and the negociations were accordingly broke off on the 20th, after all the preliminaries for a treaty of peace were agreed on, only the Dutch inſiſted, that the French King ſhould take upon himſelf to compel his grandſon, Philip, to quit the throne of Spain, and not leave the allies ingaged in a war with Spain, when France ſhould be in peace. This the French King abſolutely refuſed to year he alſo voted for the condemnation of Dr Sacheverell (dd), and the next year, 171· upon the new change of hands, he was diſmiſſed from the Preſident's poſt, and ſucceed by the Earl of Rocheſter, the Queen's uncle. After this removal, he made a diſt guiſhed figure in the debates of the Houſe of Lords for ſome time (ee); but it was long, before he grew very infirm in his health, which impaired his underſtanding ſo much, as rendered him incapable of executing any office under King George the Firſt (ff); after whoſe acceſſion, therefore, he had no other poſt than a ſeat at the Council-table, and he attended there upon ſome occaſions 'till the year 1716, when he was ſeized with an appoplectic fit, which carried him off the ſtage of this world, on the 26th of April that year (gg). to engage for, and the French Miniſters returned to Paris the 25th inſtant.

On the twenty-eighth, his Lordſhip writes thus to the ſame friend:

'I am not able to ſend you any certainty as to the 'diſſolution. 'Tis a ſtrange uncertain ſtate we are in; 'and perhaps we may have this good effect of the 'preſent irreſolution, as not to be without hopes of a 'good Parliament, in caſe they will put us upon a 'new election, that is by your Lordſhip's help and 'not otherwiſe.

'Your Lordſhip has heard that Mr Creſſet was 'going for Hanover. After his diſpatches were 'finiſhed, and he had his laſt inſtructions from the 'Queen, he was taken ill on Tueſday, and died on 'Thurſday morning. His death has given much 'diſturbance to our great men, and has diſconcerted 'their affairs. I cannot find that all the endeavours 'poſſible have ſucceeded to ſhew a way to preſerve 'credit, or to furniſh the neceſſary ſums for the army, 'unleſs the preſent Parliament be continued. This 'article, and the French preſumptions in breaking 'off the conferences, are the grounds of our hope. 'And we are apt to add to theſe two, that there is 'no certainty what the complexion of the new Parlia- 'ment will be, nor what will be the turn they will 'take, ſince they are not Whiggs only, who will be 'affected by the diſſolution.' Whoever reads theſe extracts, together with Biſhop Burnet's obſervation in the preceeding remark, will be apt to infer, that his Lordſhip, with his party, came to Court in 1708, in the ſame diſpoſitions as all parties have done, and as Lord Bolingbroke confeſſes, the Tories, who ſucceeded in 1710, actually did. That the principal ſpring of their actions was to have the government of the State in their hands, that their principal views were the conſervation of this power, great employments to themſelves, and great opportunities of rewarding thoſe who had helped to raiſe them, and of hurting thoſe who ſtood in oppoſition to them. Though it was true, at the ſame time, that with theſe conſiderations of private and party intereſt, there were others intermingled, which had for their object the public good of the nation, at leaſt, what they took to be ſuch (60). Thus that active and leading man in the Tory miniſtry frankly and ingenuouſly gives us, and ſo much is certain that in it we ſee, the true reaſon of Lord Somers's diſmiſſion from the Preſidency of the Council abovementioned.

[BB] His character by Dean Swift.] This occurs in the Dean's Hiſtory of the four laſt years of Queen Anne, a poſthumous piece; in the entrance upon which he prepares his readers for what follows, by giving the characters of thoſe in the oppoſition in 1710. Wherein he ſeems to have ſet Lord Clarendon's method for his pattern. 'It may not be improper, 'ſays he, to deſcribe thoſe qualities in each of them 'which few of their admirers will deny, and which 'appear chiefly to have influenced them in acting their 'ſeveral parts upon the public ſtage. For I don't 'intend to draw their characters entire, which would 'be tedious, and little to the purpoſe, but ſhall only 'ſingle out thoſe paſſions, acquirements, and habits, 'which the owners are moſt likely to transfer into 'their particular ſchemes, and which were moſt 'ſubſervient to the deſigns they ſeemed to have in 'view.' He then proceeds in theſe terms: 'The 'Lord Somers may very deſervedly be reputed the 'head and oracle of that party. He hath raiſed him- 'ſelf by the co-incidence of many circumſtances to 'the greateſt employments of the State, without the 'leaſt ſupport from birth or fortune: he hath con- 'ſtantly, and with great ſteadineſs, cultivated thoſe 'principles under which he grew. That accident, 'which firſt produced him into the world, of pleading 'before the Biſhops whom King James had ſent to the 'Tower, might have proved a piece of merit, as 'honourable as it was fortunate; but the old repub- 'lican ſpirit, which the Revolution had reſtored, 'began to teach other leſſons, that ſince we had 'accepted a new King from a Calviniſtical common- 'wealth, we muſt alſo admit new maxims in religion 'and government. But ſince the nobility and gentry 'would probably adhere to the eſtabliſhed Church, 'and to the rights of monarchy, as delivered down 'from their anceſtors, it was the practice of theſe 'politicians to introduce ſuch men as were perfectly 'indifferent to any or no religion, and who were 'not likely to inherit much loyalty from thoſe to 'whom they owed their birth. Of this number was 'the perſon I am now deſcribing. I have hardly 'known any man with talents more proper to acquire 'and preſerve the favour of the prince, never offending 'in words or geſture, which are in the laſt degree 'courteous and complimenting, where he ſet an ex- 'cellent example to others his colleagues, which they 'did not think fit to follow. But this extreme civility 'is univerſal and undiſtinguiſhed, and in private con- 'verſation, where he obſerveth it as inviolably as 'if he were in the greateſt aſſembly, it is ſometimes 'cenſured as formal. Two reaſons are aſſigned for 'this behaviour; firſt, from the conſciouſneſs of his 'humble original, he keepeth all familiarity at the 'utmoſt diſtance, which otherwiſe might be apt to 'intrude; the ſecond is, that being ſenſible how ſub- 'ject he is to violent paſſions, he avoideth all incite- 'ments to them, by teaching thoſe whom he converſeth 'with, from his own example, to keep a great way 'within the bounds of decency and reſpect: and it is 'indeed true, that no man is more apt to take fire 'upon the leaſt appearance of provocation, which 'temper he ſtrives to ſubdue with the utmoſt violence 'upon himſelf; ſo that his breaſt has been ſeen to 'heave, and his eyes ſparkle with rage, in thoſe very 'moments, when his words and the cadence of his 'voice were in the humbleſt and ſofteſt manner. 'Perhaps that force upon his nature may cauſe that 'inſatiable love of revenge, which his detractors lay 'to his charge; who, conſequently, reckon diſſembling 'among his chief perfections. Avarice he has none, 'and his ambition is gratified by being the uncontested 'head of his party. With an excellent underſtanding 'adorned by all the polite parts of learning, he hath 'very little taſte for converſation, to which he prefers 'the pleaſure of reading and thinking; and in the 'intervals of his time amuſeth himſelf with an illiterate 'chaplain, an humble companion, or a favourite 'ſervant. Theſe are ſome few diſtinguiſhing marks 'in the character of that perſon, who now preſideth 'over the diſcontented party; although he be not a great part of which he will find in the courſe of this memoir, and the reſt will be produced, in reciting the criticiſm paſſed upon both by Mr Walpole, who has daſhed out the chief features of his Lordſhip's character, in the following terms: 'Lord Somers, 'ſays that ſprightly and ſpirited writer, is one of thoſe divine men, who, like a chapel in 'a palace, remain unprofaned, while all the reſt is tyranny, corruption, and folly. All 'the traditional accounts of him, the hiſtorians of the laſt age, and it's beſt authors, 'repreſent him as the moſt uncorrupt Lawyer and the honeſteſt Stateſman, a maſter 'Orator, a Genius of the firſt taſte, and as a patriot of the nobleſt and moſt extenſive 'views; as a man who diſpenſed bleſſings by his life, and planned them for poſterity. 'He was at once the model of Addiſon and the touch-ſtone of Swift; the one from him 'and the other for him. The former, however, has drawn a laboured, but diffuſe and 'feeble, character of him, in the Freeholder for May 14, 1716, neither worthy of the 'author nor his ſubject. It is known that Lord Somers ſurvived the powers of his under-'ſtanding. Mr Addiſon ſays, his life, indeed, ſeems to be prolonged beyond it's natural 'term, under that indiſpoſition which hung upon the latter part of it, that he might 'have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the happy ſettlement take place, which he had propoſed 'to himſelf as the principal end of his publick labours.—A very wiſe way, indeed, of 'interpreting the delay of Providence! as if a man was preſerved by Heaven in a ſtate of 'dotage, 'till an event ſhould arrive which would make him happy, if he retained his 'ſenſes! Equally injudicious is another paſſage intended for encomium, where we are 'told, that he gained great eſteem with Queen Anne, who had conceived many unrea-'ſonable prejudices againſt him. Mr Addiſon might as well have ſaid, that the Queen 'had at firſt diſbelieved, and was afterwards converted to, Sir Iſaac Newton's ſyſtem of 'comets. Her Majeſty was full as good a judge of Aſtronomy as of Lord Somers's 'merit [CC]. In truth, Mr Addiſon was ſometimes as weak a writer, when he wrote 'ſeriouſly,

'anſwerable for all their miſtakes; and if his precepts 'had been more ſtrictly followed, perhaps their power 'would not have been ſo eaſily ſhaken. I have been 'aſſured, and heard him profeſs, that he was againſt 'engaging in that bloody proſecution of Dr Sacheve-'rell, as what he foreſaw was likely to end in their 'ruin, and he blamed the rough behaviour of ſome 'perſons to the Queen, as a great failure in prudence; 'and that, when it appeared, her Majeſty was firmly 'reſolved upon a treaty of peace, he adviſed his 'friends not to oppoſe it in it's progreſs, but find fault 'with it, after it was made; which would be a copy 'of the like uſage they themſelves had met with after 'the treaty of Ryſwic; and the ſafeſt as well as moſt 'probable way of diſgracing the promoters and 'adviſers. I have been the longer in repreſenting to 'the reader ſome idea of this extraordinary genius, 'becauſe whatever attempt hath hitherto been made, 'with any appearance of conduct or probability of 'ſucceſs, to reſtore the dominion of that party, was 'undeniably contrived by him. And I profeſs the 'ſame for the future, as long as his age and infirmities 'will leave him capable of buſineſs (61).'

(61) Swift's Hiſtory of the four laſt years of Queen Anne, p. 944. edit. 1758, 8vo.

Mr Walpole has made this attempt of Swift not leſs than that of Addiſon the ſubject of his ridicule. He obſerves, that it is a character of Lord Somers very different from what he had given in his Catalogue, &c.; and from the picture drawn of him in the dedication of A Tale of a Tub. Yet, continues he, diſtorted as the features are in this new hiſtory, it is a pleaſure to find that party malice attempting to diſcolour rather than to alter them. How lovely does a character burſt forth, when the greateſt objections to it are, that it was ſteady to it's principles, of univerſal civility, conſcious of an humble birth, of no avarice, of ſatisfied ambition, that the perſon ſo accuſed did violence to himſelf to govern his paſſions, and (one can ſcarce repeat ſeriouſly ſuch a charge) preferred reading and thinking to the pleaſures of converſation. How black a Stateſman not to be fickle! How poor a Philoſopher to maſter his paſſions, when he could not eradicate them! How bad a man to endeavour to improve his mind and underſtanding! Can one wonder that Bolingbroke and Pope always tried to prevent Swift from expoſing himſelf, by publiſhing this wretched ignorant libel (62); and could it avoid falling, as it has, into immediate contempt and oblivion. However, as the greateſt character cannot be clear of all alloy, Swift might have known that Lord Somers was not intirely juſtifiable in obtaining ſome grants of Crown lands, which though in no proportion to other grants in that reign, it would have become him to reſiſt, not to countenance by his example (63).'

(62) See Dean Swift's article. However, he yielded to their advice, ſo that the piece being poſthumous, muſt be read with that conſideration in the author's favour.

[CC] The Queen was no capable judge of Lord Somers's merit] I cannot help thinking this cenſure a little too ſevere. The criticiſed paſſage concludes a diſplay of his Lordſhip's perſonal qualities and accompliſhments, in diſtinction to his abilities, either as a Lawyer or a Stateſman. 'Let us take a view of the whole. 'His [Lordſhip's] life was in every part 'of it, ſays Mr Addiſon, ſet off with that graceful 'modeſty and reſerve, which made his virtues more 'beautiful the more they were caſt in ſuch agreeable 'ſhades. His religion was ſincere, not oſtentatious, 'and ſuch as inſpired him with an univerſal bene-'volence towards all his fellow-ſubjects, not with 'bitterneſs againſt any part of them. He ſhewed his 'firm adherence to it as modelled by our national 'conſtitution, and was conſtant to it's offices of devo-'tion both in public and in his family. He appeared 'a champion for it with great reputation in the cauſe 'of the ſeven Biſhops, at a time when the Church 'really was in danger. To which we may add, that 'he held a ſtrict friendſhip and correſpondence with 'the great Archbiſhop Tillotſon, being acted by the 'ſame ſpirit of candour and moderation, and moved 'rather with pity than indignation, towards the perſons 'of thoſe, who differed from him in the uneſſential 'parts of Chriſtianity. His great humanity appeared 'in the minuteſt circumſtances of his converſation. 'You found it in the benevolence of his aſpect, the 'complacency of his behaviour, and the tone of his 'voice. His great application to the ſeverer ſtudies 'of the Law had not infected his temper with any 'thing poſitive or litigious. He did not know what 'it was to wrangle on indifferent points, to triumph 'on the ſuperiority of his underſtanding, or to be 'ſupercilious on the ſide of truth. He joined the 'greateſt delicacy of good breeding to the greateſt 'ſtrength of reaſon. By approving the ſentiments of 'a perſon, with whom he converſed in ſuch particulars 'as were juſt, he won him over from thoſe points 'in which he was miſtaken; and had ſo agreeable 'a way of conveying knowledge, that whoever con-'ferred with him grew the wiſer, without perceiving 'that he had been inſtructed. We may probably 'aſcribe to this maſterly and engaging manner of 'converſation the great eſteem which he had gained 'with the late Queen, while ſhe purſued thoſe meaſures 'which had carried the Britiſh nation to the higheſt 'pitch of glory, notwithſtanding ſhe had entertained 'many unreaſonable prejudices againſt him, before 'ſhe was acquainted with his perſonal worth and 'behaviour.' Surely, the Queen may be allowed to be a better judge of this kind of merit than ſhe could be of Sir Iſaac Newton's ſyſtem of comets.

[DD] Chancellor

'ſeriouſly, as he was admirable in touching the delicacies of natural humour. He ſays 'that my Lord Somers was often compared with Sir Francis Bacon, and gives the prefe- 'rence to the former, becauſe he, all integrity, did not behave ſo meanly, when perſe- 'cuted by the Houſe of Commons, as the other under the confuſion of guilt. This 'argument is as poor as the panegyric. To argue from their behaviour, they ſhould 'have been in ſimilar circumſtances. If they are to be compared, the ſuperior penetra- 'tion of genius cannot be denied to Bacon; the virtue will all be Somers's. If he muſt 'be compared with another Chancellor, it muſt not be with Clarendon, who was more 'moroſe and ſevere, and had leſs capacity and a thouſand prejudices. The great Chan- 'cellor de l'Hoſpital ſeems to reſemble Somers moſt in the dignity of his ſoul and the 'elegance of his underſtanding [D D]. The momentous times in which he lived gave 'Lord Somers opportunities of diſplaying the extent of his capacity, and the patriotiſm 'of his heart, opportunities as little ſought for by the former, as they were honeſtly 'courted and purſued by the latter. The excellent ballance of our conſtitution never 'appeared in a clearer light, than with relation to this Lord, who, though impeached by 'a miſguided Houſe of Commons, with all the intemperate folly that at all times dis- 'graced the free States of Greece, yet had full liberty to vindicate his innocence and 'manifeſt his integrity; which could never have ſhone ſo bright, unleſs it had been juri- 'dically aſperſed. In our conſtitution, Ariſtides may be traduced, clamoured againſt, 'and, when matter is wanting, ſevere addreſſes may be made, propoſed, or voted, for 'removing him for ever from the ſervice of the Government*; but, happily, the factious 'and the envious have not a power to condemn by a ſhell, which many of them cannot 'ſign (i i). It was no inglorious part of this great Chancellor's life, that, when removed 'from the adminiſtration, his labours were ſtill dedicated to the ſervice of the govern- 'ment of his country. In this ſituation, above all the little prejudices of a profeſſion (for 'for he had no profeſſion but that of Solon and Lycurgus), he ſet himſelf to correct the 'grievances of the Law, and to amend the vocation he had adorned (k k). The union 'of the kingdoms too was projected by him; and it was not to his diſgrace, that the 'Princeſs, whoſe prejudices he had conquered, and whoſe eſteem he had gained, offered 'him up as one of the firſt ſacrifices on the altar of Utrecht. Such deathleſs monuments 'of his parts and virtue diminiſh the regret we ſhould otherwiſe feel, that though Lord 'Somers wrote ſeveral tracts, we are ignorant even of the titles of many of them. So 'little was fame his object!' He concludes with doing juſtice to Mr Addiſon, in obſerving, that this modeſty is particularly mentioned in the Freeholder he had quoted [E E]. Mr Walpole

[D D] Chancellor de l' Hoſpital ſeems to reſemble Somers moſt.] Every one will allow the happy choice of this compariſon, after reading the account which the French writers give of the Chancellor de l'Hoſpital; who, according to them, was one of the greateſt men in the ſixteenth century. He was born at Aigueperſe in Auvergne in 1505, and learned the languages, polite literature, and the Law, in the moſt celebrated univerſities of France and Italy. He had a ſolid judgment, great eloquence, together with an extraordinary delicacy of manners, and an inviolable integrity. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf eaſily among the firſt and moſt eminent perſons of his profeſſion; and paſſed, by the force of his merit, through all the honourable poſts of the Long Robe. He was made Counſellor to the Parliament of Paris in 1524; afterwards became Preſident of the Chamber of Accounts, Maſter of Requeſts, Counſellor to the Grand Council, Chancellor to the Princeſs Margaret, ſiſter to Henry the Second; and at laſt, Chancellor of France in 1560. There had not been of a long time a perſon in this poſt that was more worthy of it, nor more capable of diſplaying the evils which then threatened the kingdom. He aſſiſted at the aſſembly of Fontainbleau the ſame year, as alſo at that of Orleans in the beginning of the reign of Charles the Ninth; at thoſe of St Germain en Laye in 1561; at the conference held at Poiſſy the ſame year; at the aſſembly of Moulins in 1566; and had a ſhare in all the important affairs of State 'till 1568. He made the public good of the kingdom and the true intereſt of his maſter, the King, the rule of his actions. He prevented the inquiſition from being introduced into France, by conſenting to the edict of Romorantin, publiſhed in 1560, againſt the Proteſtants; and did all that lay in his power to prevent the civil wars of France. After the affair of Vaſſey, ſeeing both ſides prepare to take up arms, he oppoſed it with all his power; and when the Conſtable meant to check him, by telling him, that it was not the buſineſs of the gentlemen of the Long Robe to give their opinion upon points of war, he replied, though ſuch people are not ſkilled in the handling of arms, yet they may know when it is proper to make uſe of them. But his pacific views cauſed him to be excluded from the Council of War, and occaſioned his diſgrace. Queen Catharine of Medicis, who had contributed to raiſe him to the Seals, diſliked his conduct; and, by repreſenting it as the effect of diſloyalty, procured him to be diſmiſſed in 1568. After this he retired to Vignay, a manor-houſe, which he had in Beauce, where he paſſed the reſt of his life, he died March 13, 1573, aged ſixty eight years. It was obſerved, that in his countenance he reſembled Ariſtotle. There are ſome ſpeeches of his beſides a collection of Latin poems which were printed after his death, and are in good eſteem. In religious matters he was acted by the ſame ſpirit of moderation as Lord Somers, rather inclined to ſhew favour to, than to perſecute, the Huguenots, upon which account he underwent the ſame fate with Lord Somers, in that article; and in ſpight of the gravity of his aſpect (65), and the ſtrictneſs of his morals, he is charged with being neither Calviniſt nor Catholic, with having no religion of any kind, and being really an infidel; inſomuch that it was a common ſaying among the people, Dieu nous garde de la meſſe du Chancelier; God preſerve us from the Chancellor's maſs; and we have ſeen already that he was accuſed of diſloyalty as well as Lord Somers.

[E E] This modeſty is particularly mentioned in the Freeholder.] The words in that paper are as follow: 'It is to be lamented that this extraordinary perſon, 'out of his natural averſion to vain glory, wrote 'ſeveral pieces as well as performed ſeveral actions, 'which he did not aſſume the honour of; though, 'at the ſame time, ſo many works of this 'nature have appeared, which every one has 'aſcribed to him, that I believe no author of the 'greateſt eminence would deny my Lord Somers to 'have been the beſt writer of the age in which he 'lived.' This modeſty is extended to his actions alſo afterwards. Having mentioned his impeachment, his urgently preſſing the proſecution of it, and that he would not let the matter reſt 'till it was brought to an iſſue; Mr Addiſon proceeds thus: 'For the ſame virtue 'and greatneſs of mind, which gave him a diſregard 'of fame, made him impatient of an undeſerved 'reproach. There is no queſtion, continues he, but

Beſides the pieces already mentioned in the courſe of this memoir, Mr Walpole mentions ſome others; as (1.) Dryden's Satire to his Muſe (ll). Which, however, he obſerves has been diſputed, and thinks that the groſs ribaldry of it cannot be believed to have flowed from ſo humane and poliſhed a nature as that of Lord Somers. 2. The Argument of Lord Keeper Somers, on his giving Judgment in the Bankers caſe, delivered in the Exchequer-chamber, June 23, 1696. (3.) He was ſuppoſed too, but on what foundation he does not know, to write the preface to Dr Tindal's Rights of the Chriſtian Church (mm). A few years ago came out a collection of ſcarce pieces, in four parts, each conſiſting of four volumes in 4to. from pamphlets chiefly collected by Lord Somers. But a much more valuable treaſure, his Lordſhip's collection of original papers and letters, was loſt by a fire in the chambers of the honourable Charles Yorke, Eſq; his Majeſty's Sollicitor-General, which happened in Lincoln's-Inn-ſquare, on Saturday morning, January 27, 1752.

'this wonderful man will make one of the moſt 'diſtinguiſhed figures in the hiſtory of the preſent age, 'but we cannot expect that his merit will ſhine out 'in it's proper light, ſince he wrote many things 'which are not publiſhed in his name; was at the 'bottom of many excellent counſels, in which he did 'not appear; did offices of friendſhip to many perſons 'who knew not from whom they were derived; and 'performed great ſervices to his country, the glory of 'which was transferred to others; in ſhort, ſince 'he made it his endeavour rather to do worthy actions 'than to gain an illuſtrious character.' The conciſe Latin of which is his Lordſhip's motto, Prodeſſe quam conſpici, perfectly, elegant, and comprehenſive, truely characteriſtic of the noble turn and temper of his mind, both in the ſenſe and expreſſion; and the force of it is rather extenuated and enfeebled, as Mr Walpole juſtly obſerves, by dilating and running it into an infinite number of words, a great fault in the Freeholder. It were to be wiſhed that Mr Addiſon had exerted his poetical talents in an epigram on the ſubject; which, perhaps, is the beſt form for caſting a motto into a tranſlation. In that caſt I have met with the motto of Lord King, a ſucceſſor of Lord Somers in the Great Seal. The motto was, Labor ipſe voluptas, as aptly choſen for the perſon as that of Lord Somers; and is thus turned,

'Tis not the ſplendor of the place,
The gilded coach, the purſe, the mace;
Nor all the pompous train of ſtate,
With crowds, that at your levee wait,
That make you happy, make you great.
But whilſt mankind you ſtrive to bleſs,
With all the talents you poſſeſs.
Whilſt the chief joy you do receive,
Ariſes from the joy you give.
This takes the heart, and conquers ſpight,
And makes the heavy burden light.
For pleaſure rightly underſtood,
Is only labour to be good.

SOMNER [WILLIAM], a man of great knowledge in the Hiſtory and Antiquities of this country, and Author of the valuable Saxon Dictionary; of which Language he was one of the firſt revivers in this kingdom; was the ſon of Mr William Somner, Regiſtrary of the Court of Canterbury under Sir Nathanael Brent, Commiſſary: and deſcended from an honeſt and creditable family (a) [A]. He was born, the 30th day of March, 1606, within the pariſh of St Margaret's in Canterbury (b), and educated in the free-ſchool of that city; where, if one may judge from his ſubſequent works, he made conſiderable improvements [B]. Without proceeding further in his learning, or having the benefit of an univerſity-education, he was taken as Clerk to his father, in the Eccleſiaſtical courts of that dioceſe. And, in a proper time, preferred to a creditable office in thoſe courts by Archbiſhop Laud (c) [C]. 'His employment leading him in ſome manner, and his thoughts and affections having ever much inclined him, to the ſtudy and 'ſearch of Antiquities, he made them the amuſement of his leiſure hours. More particularly, as bound in duty and thankfulneſs [to uſe his own words (d)], he applied 'himſelf to the Antiquities of Canterbury, the place of his birth and abode [D].' But, at the

[A] Deſcended from an honeſt and creditable family.] Mr Kennett in his Life of our Author (1), obſerves, That the 'name of Somner hath been eminent in 'other ages, and in other counties. John Somenour 'of Multon near Croyland was a commoner of ſome 'figure in the reign of King Henry V. (2). There 'was a publick Hall or Inn in Oxford, called from 'the firſt owner of it, Hoſpitium Somneri, or Somenorſtyn (3). And there is now, or lately was, a 'gentile branch of this ancient name in the county 'of Bucks.'

[B] He made conſiderable improvements.] Mr Kennett conjectures, that he here imbibed the inclinations to Antiquity from the freſh memory of the late maſter John Twine, L.L.B. who dying in 1581, had been very inquiſitive into former ages; had left a public monument of ſuch knowledge, in his book, De rebus Albionicis, &c; and had made particular Collections of the Antiquities of this City: whoſe fame in this part of learning might well incite an emulous youth, and raiſe that ſpirit, which carried him at laſt beyond this great example (4).

(4) Life, p. 5.

[C] Preferred to a creditable office in thoſe Courts by Archbiſhop Laud.] What office in particular it was, is not ſpecified; only, that in vertue of it, he was entruſted with the Records of that Metropolitical Church. Undoubtedly it was the place of Regiſter of the Archbiſhop's Court. He expreſſed his gratitude to the Archbiſhop, in the Dedication of his Antiquities of Canterbury to him; wherein he acknowledges his Grace's intereſt both in the Author, and in the Work. In the author, as ſubſiſting in his place and profeſſion, under God, chiefly by his Grace's Favour and Goodneſs. In the Work,——as it is a Diſcourſe of Antiquities; His Grace's tranſcendent and unpatterned care and coſt for the Collection whereof, of all ſorts, from all parts, crowned by his ſingular Piety and Nobleneſs in diſpoſing them to the good and ſervice of the publick; as they were thankfully acknowledged and worthily celebrated by all the Lovers of Antiquities; ſo did they give his Grace an eſpecial intereſt to the fruits of all their Labours who were that way inclined.

[D] The Antiquities of Canterbury.] This work Mr Somner finiſhed in the thirty-third year of his age (5); and it was publiſhed in 1640, 4to. under this title, 'The Antiquities of Canterbury; or, A Survey 'of that ancient Citie, with the Suburbs and Cathe-'dral; containing principally Matters of Antiquity 'in them all; Collected chiefly from old Manuſcripts, 'Leiger-books, and other like Records, for the moſt 'part never as yet printed: With an Appendix here 'annexed;

the same time, his constant delight was in the Classic Authors (e); as well as in old Manuscripts, Leiger-books, Rolls, and Records. His Learning in the most useful points, made him so quickly known to be a man of use and service to his country, that upon the great questions, in descents of families, tenure of estates, dedication of churches, right of tithes, and the like, he was consulted as an oracle (f). In the course of his studies, and his search after Antiquities; finding, at every step, how necessary was the knowledge of the Languages of the first Inhabitants of this country, the Britans and Saxons, he set himself in good earnest about learning of them. For the first, the British or Welch, there were rules of Grammar, Dictionaries, and other sufficient memoirs, beside the living dialect, to guide a man of industry and resolution. But the Saxon language was disus'd, and the monuments of it so few and so hidden, that it required infinite courage and patience, to attempt and prosecute the knowledge of it [E]. However, being sensible

'annexed; wherein (for better satisfaction to the 'Learned) the manuscripts and records of chiefest 'consequence are faithfully exhibited. All (for the 'honour of that ancient Metropolis and his good 'affection to Antiquities) fought out and published by 'the industry and good will of William Somner.'—— This accurate performance is the more laudable, because he could find no way but what he made. There had been indeed two discourses of the like kind, namely, Tho. Spotte's History of Canterbury (6); and Collections of the Antiquities of Canterbury, by John Twine; to which he refers in his Comment. de Rebus Albionicis, but both these were lost to the use of our Author (7), and we do not hear they are yet recovered. So that he had no one writer to transcribe or imitate, but all the labour and glory were his own. It was done in such a juncture as preserved the memorial of many Epitaphs, Inscriptions, and proper observations, which otherwise had been lost to all succeeding ages, during our unhappy civil wars. The greatest encomiums have been given to it, by Mr William Burton (8), Mr Philpot (9), Mr Fotherby (10), and especially by Dr Meric Casaubon (11), and Mr Kilburne (12): The former of whom styles it 'a pious 'and laborious work, and highly useful, not only to 'those who desir'd to know the state of that once 'flourishing city, but to all that were curious in the 'ancient English history;' and the latter says, that he 'only briefly touches upon the City of Canterbury, 'because Mr William Somner had so elaborately, 'judiciously, and fully wrote of the same, that there 'was left but little (if any thing observable) which 'he had not there set down.' A new Title-page to it was printed in 1662, but it was not a new edition. —— It was reprinted in 1703, fol. with very great Additions; particularly a Second Part, treating of the Cathedral Church, Archbishoprick, Priory of Christ-Church, and Collegiate Church, with a catalogue of the Deans and Canons, the Archdeaconry, Monastery of St Augustin, Parish churches, &c. by Nicolas Battely, Vicar of Beaksborn. Illustrated and adorned with several useful and fair Sculptures, particularly of the Monuments. But the fine Font, given by John Warner, Bishop of Rochester, is omitted in this edition.

[E] That it requir'd infinite courage and patience, to attempt and prosecute the knowledge of it.] The learned Mr Kennett (13) hath made very curious observations upon that occasion, which we shall lay before the reader.——'When the Saxons had made 'the Britans strangers in their own land, then the 'language which the Conquerors brought with them, 'soon grew into contempt among themselves. Even 'so early as the year 652, "Many out of this island "were sent to the Monasteries of France for Education, "and to bring back the manners and language of "those parts (14)." In the reign of Edward the Confessor, "by the great resort of Normans to his "Court, the whole island began to lose their English "rites, and to imitate the manners of the Franks; "especially it was esteem'd a piece of breeding for "all the great men to speak the Gallic idiom, and to "despise the language and customs of their own "country (15)." 'This inglorious affectation is 'confess'd by an Historian who liv'd in that age. 'It lookt like an omen of being shortly to be conquer'd 'by that nation, of whose tongue and fashions they 'were so industriously fond. The event was so. 'Three and twenty years after came in the Norman 'Lords, who threatened an extirpation to that lan-'guage of which the Natives began to be asham'd. For 'these new Masters "hated the English, and so much "abhorred their Language, that the Laws of "land were managed in the French tongue; the "children were taught French in the Schools, and "not English; and even the English manner of "writing was left off, and the French manner came "to be used in books and all manner of writings (16)." 'The ignominious marks of a conquered people. 'The same Author from his own experience does 'again lament, that "the Saxon Hand, which had "been us'd in all writings, grew into disgrace, and "the French hand, became it was more legible and "more pleasing to the eyes, did every where ob-"tain (17); so as, in the very next reign, the Saxon "Letters were so obsolete and so unknown, that none "but few of the elder people were able to read them "(18)." Nay, in the year 1095, Wulstan, Bishop 'of Worcester was depos'd, when scarce any other 'thing was objected against him, but that "he was "an old English idiot, who did not understand the "French tongue (19)." 'It is true, the next successor 'Henry the First, gave a Charter to William Arch-'bishop of Canterbury, confirming to him the posses-'sions of his See, in the Saxon language and cha-'racters (20). This was but a single instance, and 'perhaps done to oblige his Queen of the Saxon line, 'and to ingratiate himself with the English Subjects, 'who might hope by this marriage they had a better 'title in him. And therefore it is a mistake in the 'learned Mabillon (21), and some other Authors, 'who assert, the Saxon way of writing was lost from 'the very time of the Norman Conquest. It was 'with the Saxon characters as with signs of the Cross 'in public deeds, which were for the most part 'chang'd into the Norman way of seals and subscrip-'tions, yet some Charters were with the old form of 'Crosses. The Saxon Dialect obtained no doubt in 'Country Vills, with some borrowed variation from 'the French, and some remains of it did intermix 'with the Court language. But the Barons and 'Knights, who were most of them Norman, were so 'afraid of their children's talking the old English, 'that in the reign of Henry the Second, "They sent "them over into France for education, to wear off "the barbarousness of the native tongue (22)." 'At 'the beginning of the reign of Edward the third, 'Robert Holcot, a Dominican, confesses, "there was "no institution of children in the old English, but "they first learn'd the French, and from the French "the Latin tongue, which he observes to have been "a practice introduc'd by William the Conqueror, "and to have ever since obtain'd (23)." 'Tho' 'from the first decline of the Barons, and advance 'of the Commons who were more of English blood, 'the Country language grew more into request; 'till 'at last the Commons in Parliament at Westminster 'the 36. of Edw. the third, shewed so much of 'the English spirit, as to represent to the King "the "great mischief which would happen to divers of the "Realm, if that the Laws were pleaded, shewed, "and judged in the French tongue, which is much "unknown in the said Realm, &c. Upon which it "was ordain'd and stablished, that all Plees, &c. "should be pleaded, shewed and defended, answered, "debated, and judged in the English tongue, &c. "(24)." 'Yet this law did by no means restore the 'Saxon, either in the Alphabet or in the prime 'Dialect: It only redeemed the kingdom from an old 'token of subjection, and did honour to the then 'compound language, much vitiated by imported 'words and phrases. And still there seem'd a dash ſenſible of what Sir Henry Spelman had found by his own experience, 'that the know'ledge of the Saxon language was ſo far neceſſary, as without it the Antiquities of Eng'land could not be diſcovered, or muſt be but imperfectly known (g);' he earneſtly ſet about it, through the advice and encouragement of his conſtant friend Dr Meric Caſaubon. When he began, he had a hard taſk; ſince he was in a manner to invent the language as well as to reſtore it. For upon his firſt eſſays that way, he had but two poor Manuſcripts, and one of them on ſo obſcure a ſubject, as might have exerciſed a critic, ſooner than inſtructed a novice. But, animated rather than diſcouraged by difficulties, he proſecuted the ſtudy of the Saxon tongue, with ſuch induſtrious perſeverance, and proportionable happy ſucceſs, that he ſurpaſſed not only thoſe that went before, but alſo moſt of thoſe that have come after him (b). Having thus made himſelf maſter of the Saxon tongue, his next work was, to write large and learned Notes and obſervations on the Laws of King Henry I. publiſhed by Sir Roger Twiſden in 1644, fol. with a very uſeful Gloſſary (i), in the room of the old one, which was faulty in many places (k). From the time of his engaging in the Antiquities of Canterbury, he laid the foundation of a larger deſign, namely, to collect materials for a juſt and perfect Hiſtory of the county of Kent (l). But, as he complains, 'being ſoon after overtaken by that impetuous 'ſtorm of civil war, he was neceſſitated to betake himſelf to other thoughts (m).' His Treatiſe of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent is ſuppoſed to have been part of that intended work [F]. At the ſame time, his Enquiries into the Cuſtoms and Tenures of his native County, produced his excellent Treatiſe of Gavelkind [G]. It was finiſhed about

'of the Norman ſpirit, which by the ſame law pro'vided "that all ſuch Pleas ſhould be entred and
"enroll'd in the Latin." 'If there were any con'veyance of the true Saxon tongue, it was in the 'Monaſteries; but in thoſe only which were founded
'before the Norman Conqueſt; for in ſuch, intereſt
'did oblige them to underſtand the language of their 'original Charters. It was for this reaſon, that in 'the Abbey of Croyland, "a Tutor was appointed "to teach Saxon to ſome of the younger brethren,
"that in their old age they might be more fit to "alledge the Records of their Monaſtery againſt their "adverſaries (25)." 'And it was no doubt for the 'like reaſon, that in the Abby of Taviſtoke, which 'had a Saxon Founder about 691, "there were
"ſolemn Lectures in the Saxon tongue, even to the "time of the ſuppreſſion of the Abbeys, that the "knowledge of that language might not fail, as it has
"ſince well nigh done (26)."

When Mr Somner began to learn Saxon, there were very few Saxon Books in print; except King Alfred's Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, publiſhed by John Foxe in 1571. and W. Lambarde's Saxon Laws; the firſt volume of Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, &c. But he Himſelf greatly facilitated the knowledge of it by his moſt valuable Saxon Dictionary, as it hath been ſince by the labours of Abr. Wheloc, Will. Liſle, Dr Tho. Marſhall, Francis Junius, Biſhop Gibſon, Edward Thwaites, Tho. Rawlinſon, Eſq; Tho. Benſon; eſpecially the learned Dr Hickes. And the beneficent Dr Richard Rawlinſon hath encouraged the ſtudy of it as much as poſſible, by founding a Lecture for the teaching of it at Oxford.

[F] Treatiſe of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent.] It remained in manuſcript 'till 1693, when it was publiſhed by James Brome, M. A. Rector of Cheriton, and Chaplain to the Cinque-Ports. Oxford 1693, 8vo. with notes by Mr Edmund Gibſon, afterwards the late learned Biſhop of London; and the Life of Mr Somner, prefix'd, by Mr White Kennett, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough.

[G] His excellent Treatiſe of Gavelkind.] That it was finiſhed about the beginning of the year 1647, is manifeſt from this Teſtimonial, inſerted in the Appendix.

'I have perus'd this learned treatiſe of Gavel kind,
'and judge it very fit to be publiſhed.
'Apr. 7, 1647. Ja. Armachanus.'

But there were two reaſons, that hindered the publication then. Namely, the diſtreſs and perſecution of the writer, which might take from him the deſire and ability of printing. And, the ignorance and affectation of thoſe times, that hated all Antiquity eccleſiaſtical and civil; and doted on a new Goſpel, and new Laws: ſo that 'till the nation was diſpoſſeſt of this ſpirit, it was not fit to caſt the pearl before them. At laſt, upon the Nation's returning to their ſenſes at the Reſtoration in 1660, the book came out, with this title: 'A Treatiſe of Gavelkind, both 'Name and Thing; Shewing the true Etymology, 'and Derivation of the one; the Nature, Antiquity, 'and Original of the other: With ſundry emergent 'Obſervations, both pleaſant and profitable to be 'known of Kentiſh-men and others, eſpecially ſuch 'as are ſtudious either of the ancient Cuſtom, or the 'common Law of this Kingdom. By (a well-wiſher 'to both) William Somner.' Lond. 1660. 4to. The Treatiſe is divided into theſe five heads. 1. The true Etymologie and derivation of the name, where he refutes the fancy of Lambard, Coke, Camden, Verſtegan, Cowell, Spelman, Dodderidge, and many other Lawyers and Antiquaries, who would derive it from the Saxon ȝyfe-eal cyn give to all kindred, or to all alike. Whereas he proves the name is by no means borrowed from the partible nature of the land; but from ȝafol or ȝavel a tribute or cuſtomary rent, and ȝecynde nature, ſort, or kind; implying it to be land not held in fee, as Knights ſervice; but chargeable with ſuch rents as made it Socage tenure. 2. He enquires into the nature of Gavelkind in point of partition, and proves it was neither from the name, nor bare nature of the land; but partly from the nature of the land, and partly from a general cuſtom extended through the whole county in ſuch cenſual land. 3. He ſearches into the Antiquity of Gavelkind-cuſtom (in point eſpecially of partition) and why more general in Kent than elſewhere. 4. Whether Gavel kind be properly a tenure or cuſtom? where he treats with incomparable learning of all feudatory right, and all menial ſervice. 5. Whether before the ſtatute of Wills (32, and 34 Henry VIII.) Gavelkind-land in Kent were deviſable or not? which he reſolves in the negative, and anſwers all arguments of thoſe who held the contrary. At the end, is an Appendix of Charters, and other original Papers, referred to, in the Treatiſe.—"In this elaborate work, the learned Author is moſt happy in the Etymology and deſcription, not only of Gavelkind, but alſo of Socage, of the Normans Fief de Haubert, and Fief de Roturier; of the Saxons Boclanb and Folclanb; of the Feudiſts Allodium and Feudum, &c. wherein he is ſingular and diſſenting from all precedent writers, with ſuch a vein of modeſty, and ſuch a ſtrength of reaſon and authority, as has yet ſatisfied all readers, and ſilenc'd all Critics. He has farther explain'd all the different tenures In capite; Knights-ſervice; Fee-farm; Frank-almoign; Divine ſervice; Eſcuage certain; Burgage; Villenage, &c. with all lands denominated from their ſervice, as Work land; Boc-land; Averland; Drof-land; Swilling-land; Mol-land; Berland; Ware land; Terra-Sufanna; For-land; Bordland; Scrudland; Over-land; Mondy-land, &c. Wherein he ſupplies and corrects Littleton, and his oraculous Commentator, Sir Edward Coke: He fills up the defects of Spelman, and prevents the induſtry of future Gloſſographers. By this one performance he indeed ſhew'd himſelf an abſolute Civilian, and a complete common Lawyer (27)." Mr Battely ſays (28), about the beginning of the year 1647; but the publication of it was retarded by the want of Peace in this country, 'Peace that mother of Arts,' as he calls it (n). At length, after it had lain by him above twelve years, he publiſhed it in 1660, upon the encouragement of ſome worthy and judicious friends (o). During our unhappy civil wars Mr Somner adhered inviolably to the Royal cauſe, with two of his brothers (p): and, after the King's murder, he bewailed his death in two Poems [H]. In the mean time, he employed himſelf in his beloved ſtudy of Antiquity, and compoſed, 'A diſcourſe of Portus Iccius, wherein the late conceits of Chifletius, in his Topographical diſcourſe, are examined and refuted: the judgment of Cluverius concerning the ſame Ports aſſerted and embraced, and the true ſite thereof more clearly demonſtrated [I].' His ſkill in the Saxon tongue, obliging him to enquire into moſt of the European languages ancient and modern; this made him run through the old Gallic, Iriſh, Scotch, and Daniſh dialects, eſpecially the Gothic, Sclavonian, and German. Of his perfection in the latter, he gave the world a public ſpecimen, in his curious Obſervations on ſome old German words, that had been collected by the learned Lipſius: which Obſervations were publiſhed by Dr Meric Caſaubon [K], at the end of his Commentary on the Hebrew and Saxon languages in 1650. His next opportunity of ſerving the world, was in drawing up the learned Gloſſary, printed at the end of the Ten Writers of the Engliſh Hiſtory [L], publiſhed by Sir Roger Twiſden in 1652. Mr Somner's reputation was now ſo well eſtabliſhed,

But, notwithſtanding this ſuppoſed correctneſs, in 1726, there came out a ſecond edition, corrected from the many errors of the former impreſſion; with Mr Somner's Life, written, newly reviſed, and much enlarged, by Wh. Keanett, Biſhop of Peterborough, 4to.

[H] He bewailed his death in two Poems.] The firſt is intituled, "The Inſecuritie of Princes conſi-"dered in an occaſional Meditation upon the Kings "late Sufferings and Death." Which begins thus:

"O how doth ſad experience verifie
'His perilous eſtate, that ſits on high!
'The lowly ſhrub ſtands ever firm and faſt,
'Whilſt lofty cedars ſhake with every blaſt.
'No ſtormy winds diſturb the humble vale,
'Whilſt the proud mountain feels the ſmalleſt gale.
'Safety but ſeldom at the Court reſides;
'It flies the Prince, and with the peaſant 'bides."

The other Poem hath prefixed to it the Pourtraiture of King Charles I. before his Εικων Βασιλικη, with this title, "The Frontiſpiece of the King's Book "opened; with a Poem annexed, The Inſecuritie "of Princes, &c." Both printed in 4to.

[I] A diſcourſe of Portus Iccius, &c.] This diſcourſe remained in manuſcript 'till 1694, when it was tranſlated into Latin by Mr Edmund Gibſon, afterwards the late excellent Biſhop of London; and printed at Oxford, with this title, 'Julii Cæſaris Portus Iccius 'illuſtratus: five 1. [K] Obſervations upon ſome old German words, &c.] Dr Caſaubon, whilſt he was employed in his Eſſay on the Saxon tongue, hapned upon an epiſtle of Juſtus Lipſius to Schottus, which contain'd a large catalogue of old German words, in uſe with that nation, about eight or nine hundred years before. The Doctor thought many of them had a great affinity to the Saxon; and therefore, being then at London, ſent down the Catalogue to Mr Somner at Canterbury, and deſir'd his opinion of them. Who within few days return'd his Animadverſions, nd ſhew'd the relation of the German with the Saxon tongue. But becauſe they were too long to be inſerted by Dr Caſaubon, in the body of his diſcourſe; he plac'd them as an Appendix under this title Gulielmi Somneri Cantuarienſis ad verba vetera Germanica a V. Cl. Juſto Lipſio Epiſt. Cent. III. ad Belgas Epiſt. XLIV. collecta, Notæ (30).

[L] The Ten Writers of the Engliſh Hiſtory] That valuable collection came out in 1652, fol. with this title, 'Hiſtoriæ Anglicanæ Scriptores X. Simeon 'Monachus Dunelmenſis. Johannes Prior Hagulſtal-'denſis. Richardus Prior Hagulſtaldenſis. Ailredus 'Abbas Rievallenſis. Radulphus de Diceto Londo-'nienſis. Johannes Brompton Jornallenſis. Gerva-'ſius Monachus Dorobernenſis. Thomas Stubbs 'Dominicanus. Guilielmus Thorn Cantuarienſis. 'Henricus Knighton Leiceſtrenſis. Ex vetuſtis Manu-'ſcriptis nunc primum in lucem editi.'

This great work may be ſaid to have been the joint undertaking of Sir Roger Twiſden, Archbiſhop Uſher, John Selden, Eſq; and the amanuenſis Mr Ralph Jennings. Theſe learned men being ſenſible, that the obſcure and obſolete words, which often occurred in thoſe monkiſh hiſtorians, wanted an explanation; and knowing none ſo well qualified for giving the juſt and true meaning of them as Mr Somner, they committed the buſineſs to him, which he diſcharged with great abilities and integrity. Sir Roger Twiſden takes from thence occaſion to give this good character of our author. "De Gloſſario verbum Sine quo hoc je-"junum & parum utile prorſus extitiſſet opus, illud a "Guilielmo Somnero, priſtinæ probitatis & candoris "viro, patriarumq; antiquitatum indagatore ſaga-"ciſſimo, & ad hoc linguæ Anglo-Saxonicæ peritiſſimo, "in tuam gratiam elaboratum intelligas." And, a little lower, he ſtyles him, a man "ſummæ modeſtiæ "& ingenuitatis, &c." i. e. 'of the greateſt modeſty 'and ingenuity; and of primitive candor and probity; 'a moſt induſtrious ſearcher into the antiquities of his 'country, and withal extremely well ſkill'd in the 'Saxon language.——This Gloſſary, being a key to 'recluſe and antiquated words, improv'd whatever 'of this nature had been done before: it amends and 'ſupplies the old Gallic Gloſſary of Pintanus; the 'Signification of words by Skenæus; the explanation 'of Terms prefix'd by Mr Lambard to his Saxon Laws; 'the Onomaſticon of Clement Reiner, in his Apoſtol. Bened. in Anglia; the Gloſſography to the Works of 'Chaucer; the Etymologicon of Jo. Ger. Voſſius; the 'Gloſſary of Dr Watts, adjoin'd to his nobie edition 'of Mat. Paris; and above all the excellent Gloſſary 'of Sir Henry Spelman, then only publiſht to the 'letter N. Nor has Mr Somner, like the former 'Gloſſographers, confin'd himſelf to the antiquated 'names of things; but with happy learning has com-'mented on the name of this iſland, and ſeveral parts 'of it; to which he has affixt ſuch new and appoſite 'derivations, as delight and ſatisfie all judicious 'readers. It is indeed a work of that extent, as may 'ſerve for a clavis [key] to all other Hiſtorians, and 'to all Records (31).' But it might be greatly improved, from our Author's ſubſequent Collections which remain in the Archeves of Canterbury; from Fr. Junius's Etymologicon Anglicanum; and from Dr Wilkins's Gloſſary at the end of his edition of the Saxon Laws, &c.

bliſhed, that no monuments of Antiquity could be further publiſhed without his advice and aſſiſtance. Therefore he helped Mr Dugdale and Mr Dodſworth in compiling the Monaſticon Anglicanum [M]. And, through the importunity of his friends, he undertook, about the ſame time, to collect a Saxon Dictionary. For his ſupport during that laborious work, Roger Spelman, Eſq; granted him the Salary, ſettled on the Saxon Lecture founded by his grandfather Sir Henry Spelman [N]. He uſed ſuch expedition, that the Dictionary was printed off, and publiſhed in 1659, fol. [O]. As he had been always a zealous Royaliſt, ſo, at the dawning of the Reſtoration, he joined thoſe Noblemen, and Gentlemen of the county of Kent (q), who were promoting a Declaration, and getting hands to a Petition, for a full and free Parliament; for which he was impriſoned in the caſtle of Deal, or Dover; but releaſed upon the King's coming (r). By way of reward for his ſervices and ſufferings, he was promoted, in 1660, to the Maſterſhip of St John's Hoſpital in the ſuburbs of Canterbury; of which he recovered ſome part of the Endowment: and alſo appointed Auditor of Chriſt-Church, in the ſame city, by the Dean and Chapter, to whom he was a father and friend, more than an honorary ſervant (s). He continued happy in the friendſhip and acquaintance of the greateſt men that were his contemporaries [P], 'till the time of his death; which happened March 30, 1669. He was buried April the 2d, in the church of St Margaret's in Canterbury, where many of his anceſtors lay (t). In the beginning of his laſt illneſs, he took an opportunity to tell his

He likewiſe gave information of ſeveral particulars relating to the city and county. And tranſlated all the Saxon originals, and the Engliſh tranſcripts from the Itinerary of Leland, and other records, into plain and proper Latin; as Sir John Marſham acquaints the reader in the Propylæum.—— In the library of the Cathedral church of Canterbury, there is a copy of this firſt volume; wherein is inſerted after the Propylæum a printed leaf, containing ſix copies of verſes made by Kentiſh-men, in commendation of Mr Dodſworth, Mr Dugdale, and Mr Somner, who are there ſaid to be the joint collectors of that glorious work (32).

[N] Roger Spelman, Eſq; granted him the Salary, ſettled on the Saxon Lecture, &c.] Mr Kennett gives us the following account, of the occaſion of founding that Lecture. "The great Sir Henry Spelman, while he was at Cambridge with Mr Jeremy Stephens, to ſearch the Libraries there, and collect materials for his deſigned Volumes of Britiſh Councils, finding many Saxon Manuſcripts, and very few that underſtood them; reſolved to found a Lecture in that language, in order to reſtore and improve the ſtudy of it. This generous act was ſoon done by him, and he firſt conferr'd that office on Mr Abraham Wheelock, of King's college Cambridge, that had aſſiſted him in ſome tranſcripts of that tongue; and, for endowment, ſettled on him and his ſucceſſors a ſufficient yearly ſtipend, with preſentation to the Vicarage of Middleton, nigh Linn Regis in Norfolk (33). By the death of Mr Wheelock in 1657, the diſpoſal of that Lecture fell to Roger Spelman, Eſq; ſon of Sir John, ſon of the Founder, who deſign'd to beſtow it on Mr Samuel Foſter, a learned and worthy Divine. But Archbiſhop Uſher, a friend to Antiquities and Mr Somner, recommended him to the patron, 'that he would confer 'on him the pecuniary ſtipend, to enable him to 'compile a Saxon Dictionary, which would more 'improve that tongue than bare Academic Lectures '(34)."

Upon this occaſion, Mr Kennett makes the following proper Reflections. "And herein that Prelate was like himſelf, judicious. For the endowment of public Lectures has often met with this ill ſucceſs; to make the Readers neglect, and the Hearers deſpiſe them. Whereas if the ſame rewards were given, on condition of printing thoſe Lectures, or publiſhing ſome other remains of that Art or Science: mens induſtry would be greater, and the republic of letters much better ſerv'd. This ſeem'd the intention of the wiſe and pious founder Sir Henry Spelman, in eſtabliſhing this lecture: The words of his foundation being, 'to promote the Saxon tongue, either by 'reading it publicly, or by the edition of Saxon 'Manuſcripts, and other books (35).' Which laſt deſign Mr Wheelock had moſt anſwered, by publiſhing the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Bede, with the Saxon Paraphraſe of King Alfred. The Saxon Chronology with his own Latin verſion, and Mr Lambard's Saxon Laws, with ſome Additions. Cambr. 1644, fol.

This reaſon of the thing, and the will of his grandfather, inclin'd Mr Spelman to comply with the advice of Archbiſhop Uſher, and to preſent Mr Somner to the annual ſalary of that Lecture. Which this man of tenderneſs and modeſty would not accept, without the free conſent of Mr Foſter, before nominated to the place: who preferr'd the public before his own intereſt, and Mr Somner before himſelf. Therefore content with the eccleſiaſtical benefice, he left the annual portion of money to Mr Somner, who receiving this reward, would not omit the duty for it (36)."

(36) Life, p. 72—74.

[O] The Dictionary was printed off, and publiſhed in 1659] Mr Battely juſtly ſtyles it, 'the true and 'laſting Monument of his praiſe: a work of incredible 'Labour to himſelf, and of ſingular Benefit to the 'world (37).' The previous aſſiſtances of the like kind, which came into the hands of Mr Somner; were, 1. Archbiſhop Ælfric's Gloſſary, tranſcrib'd by Fr Junius, from a very ancient copy in the library of Sir Peter Paul Rubens of Bruſſels. 2. Two ancient Saxon Gloſſaries in the Cotton Library, the one a thin folio, the other a more thick octavo. 3. Laurence Nowell's Saxon Vocabulary, procur'd and lent by Mr Selden. 4 John Joſceline's collections, tranſcrib'd and communicated by Sir Symonds Dewes, Bart.—— From theſe, and all other Saxon books then extant, Mr Somner made immenſe Collections, in two large Volumes folio, for the compiling of his Dictionary. When it was finiſh'd, he ſent it to Oxford, where it was printed; and came out in April 1659, with an elegant inſcription to all Students in the Saxon tongue; a grateful Dedication to his patron Roger Spelman, Eſq; and a proper Preface. The Author and his work recommended by verſes, both Engliſh and Latin: With an Appendix of the Grammar and Gloſſary of Ælfric. And at the end of all, is a Catalogue of thoſe worthy perſons who contributed to the great charge of the Impreſſion: for it was printed by ſubſcription. ——Mr Somner made afterwards ſeveral additions and corrections to it, from notes and obſervations ſent him by Mr George Davenport a great proficient in that language. his wife, that he had never been let blood, nor taken any phyſic; which was a juſt argument, not only of his happy conſtitution, but of his exact temperance and ſobriety. He was twice married. His firſt wife was Mrs Elizabeth Thurgar, of a good family in Cambridgeſhire, who lived with him about thirty years: and by her he had three daughters, and one ſon, which all dyed young. His ſecond wife was Barbara, daughter of Mr John Dawſon, a great Royaliſt in Kent, by whom he had, one daughter that dyed unmarried; William educated at Merton-college, and Vicar of Liminge in Kent; John, a Surgeon; and another ſon. He left but a ſmall competence, which if not frugally managed, could never have anſwered the ſupport of his widow, and the education of his children. However, by his laſt Will he gave ſeveral Legacies to the poor. His many well choſen Books, and curious Manuſcripts, were purchaſed by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, and depoſited in the publick Library of that church (u) [2]. Mr Somner's whole life was, like his writings, void of prejudice and paſſion. He was courteous, without deſign: wiſe, without a trick: and faithful, without a reward. Humble, and compaſſionate: moderate, and equal: never fretted by his afflictions: nor elated by the favours of heaven, and good men (w). His profeſſion was, that 'he loved truth (x) 'of all ſcience) for itſelf; and was all together unbiaſt with any by-reſpects, whether 'of 'vain-glory, ſingularity, or the like: making it his conſtant endeavour, that Truth alone 'might triumph over falſhood, Antiquity over Novelty (x).

SOUTH [Dr ROBERT], a learned and witty Divine, was of a genteel extraction, being deſcended from the Souths of Kelſtone and Kielby in Lincolnſhire (a); but his father, Mr William South, ſettling in London, became an eminent merchant there, and marrying a gentlewoman of the name of Berry, deſcended from the Berryes in Kent [A], had this ſon, born at his houſe in Hackney, in the year 1633. He early diſcovered an extraordinary genius for letters, and having gone through the firſt rudiments of Grammar with uncommon ſucceſs, was ſent to Weſtminſter-ſchool, where he was entered King's ſcholar in 1647. And he made himſelf remarkable the following year, by reading the Latin prayers in the ſchool, on the day of King Charles the Firſt's martyrdom, and praying praying for his Majeſty by name (b). After the famous Dr Buſby had cultivated and improved ſo promiſing a genius with particular induſtry and encouragement for four years, he was choſen a ſtudent to Chriſt-Church-college in Oxford in 1651 (c); where having the advantage of a handſome allowance from his mother (d), and the countenance of his relation, Dr John South, of New-college, Regius-Profeſſor of the Greek tongue (e): he obtained thoſe acquiſitions in literature, that made him the admiration and eſteem of the whole univerſity, and drew upon him the eyes of the beſt maſters of humanity, and other ſtudies, by the quick progreſs he made through them. He took his firſt degree in Arts, February 24, 1654-5 (f), having wrote an elegant copy of Latin verſes, congratulating Cromwell, then Protector, upon the peace concluded that year with the Dutch [B]. In 1655, he wrote his famous Latin poem, intituled, Muſica Incantans: ſive Poema exprimens muſicæ vires, juvenem in inſaniam abigentis, & muſici inde periculum *. He commenced Maſter of Arts on the 12th of June, 1657, after performing all the preparatory exerciſes for it with the higheſt applauſe [C], and ſuch a peculiar turn of wit and humour, as juſtly entituled him to repreſent the Terræ Filius, in which character he ſpoke the uſual ſpeech at the celebration of the Act the ſame year (g). In 1658, he entered into Holy Orders, being ordained by one of the deprived Biſhops, according to the rights and ceremonies of the Church of England (h). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the pulpit as much as he had done in the roſtrum, and the following year he was pitched upon to preach the aſſize ſermon before the Judges, in which he expreſſed ſuch a warm zeal againſt the Independents, as highly pleaſed the Preſbyterians; and Dr Edward Reynolds, who had been ſome years before Dean of Chriſt-Church, happening to be one of his auditors, did, in going

[B] Verſes upon the peace with the Dutch in 1654.] Theſe ſtand at the head of his Opera Poſthuma Latina, &c. printed in 1717, 8vo. which contain ſeveral other Latin compoſitions of his in verſe, beſides one in proſe, all written while he was an under graduate. Beſides theſe, we have an account of another compoſition in the Athen. Oxon. where Mr Wood, whoſe temper and talents were naturally at variance with thoſe of Mr South, having told us, that 'he obtained under Dr Buſby a conſiderable ſtock of grammar and philological learning, but more of impudence and faucineſs, proceeds in the ſame ſtrain, from the ſcandalous Chronicle, to retail the following ſtory: That before or about the time that our Wit took the degree of Batchelor of Arts, he was appointed to do ſome exerciſe in the public hall of his college, which was to ſpeak a ſpeech upon ſome great and ſignal occaſion; and that, when he had prepared it, and made it proportionable to the tranſcendency of his parts and abilities, he gave out to ſeveral of his acquaintance, that he intended ſeverely to laſh the ſectaries of his Houſe, and of the Univerſity. This being known abroad, there flocked into the hall, on the appointed day, a great concourſe of the younger ſtudents, who were the greateſt wits, but eſteemed by the ſectaries to be of the moſt profligate principles, both in that Houſe and other Houſes in the univerſity. Theſe laſt are the words of the Chronicle; after which the Antiquary goes on thus: In the reſolution to ſatisfy all their expectations, our author, South, came forth, and addreſſed himſelf with a ſufficient meaſure of confidence (whereof there was no want in him) to ſpeak to this ingenious auditory; and, indeed, the whole ſcope of his oration was (if you will believe a rank Fanatic) (3), little other than a moſt blaſphemous invective againſt godlineſs, and the moſt ſerious and conſcientious profeſſors of it. But before he had proceeded far in it, my author (ſays Wood) tells me, that the hand of the Lord was ſtretched out againſt him, and he was ſuddenly ſurprized with ſuch a qualm as did diſturb him afterwards at Whitehall, as I ſhall tell you anon. Whereupon, being conſtrained abruptly to break off, it was ſo great a diſcomfort to him, that he was ſcarce able to bear it, becauſe, firſt, that he eſteemed himſelf a perſon of great fame in the univerſity; and, ſecondly, that it would be a great diſparagement to him among the wits of his acquaintance. However, this influence it had upon him, as it was obſerved by ſome perſons then living in the univerſity, that from that time he lay under ſome convictions of the evil of abuſing thoſe good parts which God had given him, in defaming thoſe perſons and things which the Lord doth teſtify his greateſt approbation of (4); and ſo from henceforward he ſeemed to be much more ſerious than before, and by degrees inſinuated himſelf into the good opinion of the then preſent Dean of his Houſe, Dr Owen, as alſo with thoſe of the Preſbyterian and Independent party thereof (5).' Thus far the Oxford Antiquary, who we ſee has taken care to draw up the ſtory in ſuch a manner as to leave a door open to eſcape from the ſhame of any charge that might be brought of his vouching for the truth of it. And the concluſion, that he was a favourite of the Dean, Dr Owen, needs no other voucher for it's credibility than the merit of thoſe ingenious exerciſes and other performances, eſpecially the compliment in the verſes to the Protector, wrote by our ſtudent as already mentioned. This Dean, however blame-worthy in other reſpects, being a remarkable great encourager of this kind of true merit, of which he was himſelf not only a good judge but an excellent performer.

[C] He took his degree of Maſter of Arts after having performed the exerciſes with great applauſe.] Notwithſtanding what we have ſeen aſſerted by Mr. Wood in the preceding remark of our ſtudent's being in favour with Dr Owen, when he took his firſt degree, and is maintained by the writer of his life (6), that this ſecond degree was not obtained without ſome oppoſition from the Dean, who having found that he frequented the meeting of thoſe Royaliſts, among whom were Dr. John Fell, where Divine Service was performed, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, expoſtulated with him very ſeverely, and even threatened to expel him, if he continued in that practiſe; telling him that he could do no leſs in gratitude to his Highneſs the Protector, and his other great friends, who had thought him worthy of the dignities, he then ſtood poſſeſſed of. To which ſays this writer, Mr South made this grave, but very ſmart reply. Gratitude among friends, is like credit among tradeſmen, it keeps buſineſs up, and maintains the correſpondence. And we pay not ſo much out of a principle, that we ought to diſcharge our debts, as to ſecure ourſelves a place to be truſted another time. And in anſwer to the Dean's making uſe of the names of the Protector, &c. he ſaid, Commonwealths put a value upon MEN as well as MONEY, and we are forced to take them both, not by WEIGHT, but according as they are pleaſed to STAMP them, and at the current rate of the coin; by which he exaſperated the Doctor two different ways, and made him his enemy ever after. This ſtory, it muſt be owned, ſmells as ſtrong of partiality as that of the Fanatic does of prejudice, and is greatly diſcredited by the conſequence which is annexed to it, that our ſtudent having proved an over-match for the Dean, in obtaining his degree of Maſter of Arts, made uſe of the power thereby conferred upon him, to oppoſe the Dean afterwards, when he ſtood candidate to ſerve in Parliament for the Univerſity (7). Whereas it has been already obſerved (8), he was choſen their Repreſentative in 1654. What Mr Wood relates, has a better air of probability; that after the Protector's death, our ſtudent ſided with the Preſbyterians, ſo far as to condemn, and in a manner, to defy the Dean, who thereupon told him, he was one that ſat in the ſeat of the ſcornful (9).

going out of the church, ſalute the preacher, very kindly embraced him, and promiſed to do all that lay in his power for him [D]. But upon the dawn of his Majeſty's reſtoration, in the latter end of the year, he preached with no leſs warmth againſt the hypocriſy of the Preſbyterians; and, on the tenth of Auguſt, 1660, he was choſen publick Orator of the univerſity [E], after he had preached a moſt excellent ſermon (i), on the 29th of July preceding,

(D) Dr Reynolds promiſed to do all that lay in his power for him.] The text of this Sermon was, Whoſoever ſhall deny me before men, him will I alſo deny before my Father which is in Heaven; Matt. ch. x. v. 33. 'It was called by him Intereſt depoſed, and Truth reſtored,' and had this remarkable paragraph in it concerning the Teachers of thoſe days: 'Where 'ſuch men talk of ſelf-denial and humility, I cannot 'but think of Seneca, who praiſed poverty, and that 'very ſafely in the midſt of his riches and ſplendid 'gardens, and even exhorted the world to throw away 'their gold, perhaps (as one well conjectures) that he 'might gather it: ſo theſe men deſire men to be humble, that they may domineer without oppoſition. 'But it is an eaſy matter to commend patience, when 'there is no danger of any trials, to extol humility in 'the midſt of honours, to begin a faſt after dinner (10).' In the ſame ſpirit he proceeds thus: 'Let Chriſt and 'Truth ſay what they will, if intereſt will have it, 'gain muſt be Godlineſs. If Enthuſiam is in requeſt, 'learning muſt be inconſiſtent with grace. If pay 'grows ſhort, the Univerſity-maintenance will be too 'great.' And, in the cloſe of the ſame Sermon, having applied himſelf to the Judges with proper exhortations that beſpoke his intrepidity of ſoul, he addreſſed himſelf to the audience in theſe words. 'If 'ever it was ſeaſonable to preach courage in the deſpiſed abuſed cauſe of Chriſt, it is now; when his 'truths are reformed into nothing, when the hands 'and hearts of his faithful Miniſters are weakened and 'even broke, and his worſhip extirpated into a mockery, that his honour may be advanced; well to 'eſtabliſh our hearts in duty, let us propoſe to ourſelves before hand the worſt that can happen. 'Should God in his Judgment ſuffer England to be 'transformed into Munſter; ſhould the Faithful be 'every where maſſacred; ſhould the places of learning be demoliſhed, and our colleges reduced not 'only to (as one (11) in his zeal would have it) three, 'but to none: yet aſſuredly, Hell is worſe than all 'this, and is the portion of ſuch as deny Chriſt. 'Therefore let our diſcouragements be what they 'will, loſs of places, loſs of eſtates, loſs of life and 'relations; yet ſtill this ſentence ſtands ratified in the 'decrees of Heaven.' Curſed be the man that for any of theſe denies the truth, and deſerts his Lord. The compliment paid to the preacher by Dr Reynolds, will not be ſurprizing, after reading the following account of him by the Oxford Antiquary, who tells us, that he was the ſon of Auſtin Reynolds, one of the Cuſtomers of Southampton, where he was born in Nov. 1599, and being bred at the free-ſchool there, became Poſt-maſter of Merton college in 1615, as alſo Probationer-Fellow in 1620, in which place (which he got by his ſkill in the Greek tongue,) as alſo throughout his Bachelorſhip, he ſhewed himſelf a good diſputant and orator. After he had taken the degree of Maſter of Arts, he went into Orders, and became a noted Preacher, and was made Preacher at Lincoln's-Inn, and Rector of Braynton in Northamptonſhire. After the Rebellion broke out in 1642, he ſided with the Preſbyterian party, and in 1643, was one of the Aſſembly of Divines, a Covenanter, a frequent Preacher in London, and ſometimes before the long Parliament, by whom he was appointed, in 1646, one of the ſix Miniſters to go to Oxford, and preach the ſcholars into obedience to them. After which he was one of their Viſitors in the Univerſity, was made Dean of Chriſt-Church, in the room of Dr Samuel Fell, ejected, and Vice-Chancellor in 1648, when he was created Doctor of Divinity; he was alſo Vice-Chancellor in 1649. But being ejected from his Deanery in 1650, for refuſing to take the Independent Engagement (12), he retired to his former cure for a time. He lived afterwards moſtly in London, preached there, and flattered Oliver, &c. after whoſe death he did the like to Richard, and being then Vicar of St Laurence-Jewry, he was the Orator of the London Miniſters, to welcome that muſhroom Prince to the Throne, October 11, 1658. After this he ſtruck in with General Monk, to bring in the King, uſing his intereſt thereto in London, where he was the pride and glory of the Preſbyterian party (13). When the ſecluded Members were reſtored to Parliament, they reſtored him to his Deanery of Chriſt-Church on the 11th of May 1659. And on the 26th of May following, 1660, he, together with Mr Edmund Calamy, was made Chaplain to his Majeſty, then at Canterbury, in order to his Reſtoration. After which he preached ſeveral times before the King and both Houſes of Parliament; and in the latter end of June, being deſired to quit his Deanery (14), he was the next month elected, by virtue of the King's letter, Warden of Merton-College, and was conſecrated Biſhop of Norwich on the 6th of Jan. the ſame year (15). He was, concludes our Antiquary, a perſon of excellent parts and endowments, of a very good wit, fancy, and judgment, a great Divine, and much eſteemed by all parties, for his preaching and fluid ſtile (16): and Sir Thomas Browne, who knew him well, gives him the character of a perſon of ſingular affability, meekneſs, and humility, of great learning, a frequent preacher, and conſtant reſident (17). He wrote ſeveral things, which, after their appearance ſeparately in 4to. were printed together, and publiſhed with the title of his works, London, 1658, fol. and again, with the addition of thirty Sermons, in 1679, fol. after his death, which happened July 28, 1676. He was buried at the upper end of the chapel which he built in 1662, joining to the Biſhop's Palace in Norwich. Over his grave was ſoon after fixed to the wall, a marble table with his Epitaph engraven on it (18).

[E] He was made Orator to the Univerſity.] Mr Wood, who omits no opportunity of exerciſing his defamatory talents againſt our author, tells us, 'that he 'tugged hard, (ſo he expreſſes it) ſuch was the high 'conceit of his worth, to be Canon of Chriſt-Church, 'as belonging to the Orator's office, but was kept 'back by the endeavours of the Dean *. That this 'was a great diſcontent to him, and being not able 'to conceal it, he clamoured at it, and ſhewing much 'paſſion in his Sermons, 'till he could get preferment, 'they were therefore frequented by the generality, 'though ſhunned by ſome. This perſon, continues 'the Antiquary, though he was a junior maſter, and 'had never ſuffered for the royal cauſe, yet ſo great 'was his conceit, or ſo blinded he was with ambition, that he thought he ſhould never be enough 'loaded with preferment; whilſt others that had ſuffered much, and had been reduced to a bit of bread 'for his Majeſty's cauſe, could get nothing (19)', Hinc ſc. illæ lackrymæ. This was the great offence and grief, Mr South's promotion and favour with the Chancellor, drew upon both the unforgiving anger and reſentment of the hiſtorian, and againſt both did he not ſpare to ſhoot ſome of his ſharpeſt bluntly-pointed arrows, even noiſy and ſcolding words. As that 'in the latter end of the year 1659, when it 'was viſible that Monarchy would return upon the ſucceſs of Monk, he was ſomething at a ſtand, yet ſtill 'was accounted a member of the Fanatic Ordinary; 'but when his Majeſty's Reſtoration could not be 'withſtood, then did he from the Pulpit exerciſe his 'gifts againſt the Preſbyterians, as a little before he 'had done againſt the Independents, telling his auditory 'of their wry faces, ill looks, puling tones, &c. All 'which was to obtain the applauſe, (and it's conſequences) of the prelatical and loyal party; but as it 'fell out, he miſſed his ends, for by his too much 'concernment and eagerneſs to trample upon them, 'the graver ſort of the ſaid party, would put their 'hats before their eyes, or turn aſide, as being much 'aſhamed at what the young man did utter. Not 'content with this, proceeds our retailer of ſcandal, 'he informed the leading men of the royaliſts (who 'were ſoon after reſtored to their places in the Univerſity) of the behaviour and manners of thoſe that 'had been the prime men in the interval, and of 'ſuch

* Whether this ſhaft is aimed more againſt the Dean or our Orator, is not eaſy to determine, ſince we find our Antiquary obſerving, that Dr Strode being choſen Orator in 1629, was inſtalled Canon of Chriſt-Church in 1638, before which time King Charles I. had ſettled a Canonry of the ſaid church upon him that ſhould be elected publick Orator; but that pious act hath been ſince annulled by pretended authority, and now ſuch a thing ſeems totally to be forgotten among us. preceding, before the King's Commiſſioners, who were appointed to rectify all the abuſes that had been committed in the univerſity during the Uſurpation. In the execution of the orator's office, he received, with an elegant Latin ſpeech, the Earl of Clarendon, on his firſt entrance into the univerſity, on the ſeventh of September 1661, after his Lordſhip had been choſen their Chancellor; and in another, introduced him to his inveſtiture into that dignity in the Convocation-Houſe, on the 9th of that month (l). Whereupon, the Chancellor took him into his protection, and made him his Domeſtic Chaplain [F]. Thus he was put into the road to Church preferments, and was inſtalled Prebendary of Weſtminſter, March 30, 1663 (n); and purſuant to his patron, the Chancellor's letter, was created Doctor of Divinity on the firſt of October following, though not without a conſiderable oppoſition, as being then a Maſter of Arts of ſix years ſtanding only [G]. The Chancellor alſo gave him afterwards the fine-cure of Llanchiadar in Mochnant, in North-Wales (o). After the Earls baniſhment, in 1667, the Doctor was appointed Chaplain to James Duke of York (p); and on the twenty-firſt of December 1670, he was collated by King Charles to a Canonry of Chriſt-church, in the room of Dr Richard Gardiner [H] deceaſed, into which he was inſtalled on the twenty-ninth of [F] The Chancellor made him his Chaplain.] Here his old friend has another fling at him; the Chancellor, ſays he, being much delighted with a ſermon that his Chaplain had preached before him, made way for him to preach the ſame ſermon again before his Majeſty: and having paſſed the ſcrutiny of ſo wiſe and learned a man, and ſo great and famous a Counſellor, every one's expectation was heightned, and happy was he or ſhe, amongſt the greateſt wits in the town, that could accommodate their humour in getting convenient room in the chapel at Whitehall, to hang upon the lips of this, ſo great an oracle. The day appointed being come, which was the 13th of April 1662, for the acting of this ſcene over again, our author aſcends the pulpit, and the eyes of all were immediately faſtned upon him. After he had performed his obeyſance to his Majeſty, he named his text, which was, Eccl. vii. 10. Say not thou what is the cauſe that the former days were better then theſe? For thou doſt not enquire wiſely concerning this. Then after a witty preamble, he proceeded to the diviſion of the words; and having performed that with great dexterity, he lays by the text for the preſent; and, according to the ancient and laudable manner, addreſſed himſelf to the Bid-Prayer; which being ended, he reſumed his text, and attempted to handle the ſeveral parts of it. The prohibition in the text, he laboured to enforce by an induction of many particulars. The firſt was that the Pagan times were not better than theſe, then, the Popiſh times were not, &c. But the laſt inſiſted on was the times of the great Rebellion, and whilſt he was endeavouring to evince that which indeed was the main thing that he intended to handle, it pleaſed God, as the Fanatic obſerved *, that he was ſuddenly taken with a qualm, drops of ſweat ſtanding on his face as big as peaſe, and immediately he loſt the uſe of his ſpeech, only he uttered ſome few words to this effect, Oh Lord! we are all in thy hands, be merciful unto us; and then came down. The expectations of all being thus ſadly diſappointed, they were contented with the divertiſement of an anthem, and ſo the ſolemnity of the ſervice for that day ended. In the mean time great care was taken of Mr South, and by the uſe of cordials, and other means proper for him in that condition, he quickly recovered his ſpirits, and was every way as well again as before. To all which, (continues our tale bearer) the Fanatic adds thus †. 'And we ſhould be glad to hear he 'were more ſenſible of the hand of God upon him 'at that time, wherein it is to be feared, he ſought 'his own honour more than Chriſt's, and therefore 'met with this rebuke from the Lord, which indeed, 'we ſhould hope in charity, had ſome great influence 'upon him: for the next Lord's day after, he ap-'peared again before the ſame ſplendid auditory, and, 'as we are informed, he did beforehand free his ſer-'mon from many of thoſe luxuriances, which before 'it was attended with, brings it forth in a leſs whoriſh 'attire than he had cloathed it with the day before; 'and ſo, according to our beſt information, he went 'on and finiſhed his diſcourſe, without the leaſt di-'ſturbance or interruption, &c. [G] He was oppoſed in his degree of Doctor of Divinity.] The oppoſition is taken notice of by the writer of his life (21), but without any ſuch rhetorical ſtrains as it is adorned with by Mr Wood, as follows: On the firſt day of October 1663, there was a Convocation of the univerſity celebrated, and therein were the letters of his patron, Edward Earl of Clarendon, Chancellor of the ſaid univerſity, read in behalf of his Chaplain Mr South, to be created Doctor of Divinity; which being done, the Bachelors of Divinity and Maſters of Arts were ſo amazed at ſuch a matter, as firſt, that the ſaid perſon ſhould venture upon ſuch a degree, being but ſix years ſtanding in that of Maſter; ſecondly, that he ſhould be ſo impudent to overtop a hundred of his ſeniors at leaſt; and thirdly, that he had not at all ſuffered for his Majeſty's cauſe, but rather, that he had preached againſt it, when he cloſed with the Independents, they all ſtiffly denied the paſſing of thoſe letters, and were ſo reſolute againſt their taking effect, that the Houſe being in a tumult thereupon, the Doctors of Divinity, who were greatly conſenting to the creation (for they were not to be overtopped) did ariſe from their ſeats, and went down and mixed themſelves among the Maſters, to perſuade them to yield their conſents; but all being done in vain, they went to ſcrutiny. Which being done, the ſenior Proctor, according to his uſual perfidy, (which he frequently uſed in his office, for he was born and bred a Preſbyterian) did pronounce him the ſaid Mr South virtute juramenti ſui, paſſed by the major part of the Houſe. Whereupon, by the double preſentation of Dr John Wallis, he was firſt admitted Bachelor then Doctor of Divinity (22).

[H] Richard Gardiner.] This gentleman, who was born in Hereford, and bred at the ſchool there, became ſtudent of Chriſt-church about 1607, took the degrees in Arts, entered into Holy Orders, and became a quaint preacher and orator. At length, King James the Firſt being much pleaſed with a ſpeech that he had ſpoken before him in the Scotch tone, when he was Deputy Orator, gave him the reverſion of the next Canon of Chriſt-church; into which, upon the death of Dr Thomas Thornton, he was inſtalled in 1629 (23); and, taking his degrees in Divinity the following year, he was made one of the Chaplains in Ordinary to King Charles the Firſt. In 1648, he was thruſt out of his Canonry by the Parliamentary viſitors, and lived obſcurely in Oxford twelve years, 'till the return of King Charles the Second, who reſtored him to what he had loſt. And whatſoever he got from that time to the day of his death, he beſtowed on charitable uſes, his kindred, and the college which gave him breeding. He publiſhed ſeveral ſermons (24), which are mentioned by Mr Wood; as alſo a piece intituled Specimen Oratorium, printed at London in 1653, in two ſheets 8vo. containing, 1. A Letter from the Univerſity to King James the Firſt, to thank him for his Works preſented to the public Library. 2. Oration in the Convocation when his Majeſty's Works were received. 3. Funeral Oration on Dr Budden, 1620. 4. Oration on preſenting the Dean of Chicheſter to be Prolocutor to the Lower-Houſe of Convocation, November 11, 1640. 5. Gratulation for the King's ſafe return from the battle of Edge hill, October 29, 1642. of the ſame month. In 1676, he attended Laurence Hyde, Eſq; younger ſon of the Earl of Clarendon, in the quality of Chaplain, on his embaſſage to Poland. The Doctor very gladly accepted this offer, which gave him an opportunity of gratifying his naturally curious and inquiſitive temper. In order to complete which, he ſtaid behind the Ambaſſador at his own requeſt (q); and what improvements he made thereby may be beſt ſeen in the account of that country, which he ſent in a letter from Dantzic, December 16, 1677, to Dr Edward Pococke [I], then Regius Profeſſor of Hebrew, and one of the Canons of Chriſt-church, with whom he held a moſt intimate friendſhip. Soon after the Doctor's return home, he was preſented by the Dean and Chapter of Weſtminſter, upon the death of Dr Edward Hinton, in 1678, to the rectory of Iſlip in Oxfordſhire, a living of conſiderable revenues, out of which he allowed a hundred pounds per annum to the Reverend Mr Penny, a ſtudent of Chriſt-church, his Curate; and expended the reſt in educating and apprenticing the poorer children of the pariſh (r). Moreover, after he had been two years incumbent, in 1680, he cauſed the chancel of the church, that had been ſuffered to run to ruin by his predeceſſor, to be rebuilt at his own expence [K]; and finding

He died, and was buried in one of the iſles joining to the choir of Chriſt-church cathedral, on the north ſide, after his death, which happened December 20, 1670, aged 79, as appears from his epitaph, which was written by Dr South, at the requeſt of his executors, in theſe terms:

[I] In a letter to Dr Pococke.] He had promiſed to ſend this account to the Doctor when they parted at Cornbury, the Earl of Carendon's ſeat in Oxfordſhire. He begins with an account that the Embaſſador ſet ſail from Portſmouth on board the Tyger man of war, with the Swallow in company, and ſome merchant-ſhips under convoy, on the eleventh of June preceding, and after ſtaying ſome days in the Sound to diſpatch meſſages with compliments to the Courts of Sweden and Denmark, caſt anchor before Dantzic on the eleventh of Auguſt, where being received under the diſcharge of the artillery on the ramparts, he was the next day conducted to an audience of the Queen of Poland, (who made a journey thither while the King, her huſband, was in the field) wherein he paid her Majeſty the uſual devoirs in the name of his royal maſter, and preſented the young Princeſs, her daughter, with a very rich jewel, and a croſs of diamonds of great value. He afterwards, with a very magnificent retinue, ſet forward from Poland, and was received by the King, in his camp, near Leopol in Ruſſia, with demonſtrations of reſpect and kindneſs ſuitable to his character and perſon, where his Majeſty did him the honour of ſending ſome of his chief officers to ſhew him the army and their way of encamping. The peace being happily concluded to the advantage of Poland, between his Majeſty and the Turks and Tartans, whereof his Excellency Mr Hyde had no ſmall ſhare in the management; the King returned in November to Zolkiew, his own patrimony, which is a town in Ruſſia, adorned and defended by a caſtle, and intermixed with ſeveral delightful gardens, with a fair church in the middle of it, built with various kinds of marble, and where the Embaſſador, waiting upon him, had his public audience in the moſt ſolemn manner. He was firſt carried in the King's coach, attended by ſix of his own, twenty-four pages and footmen in rich liveries, and ſixty odd coaches of the chief nobility. When arrived at the Court, he was received by the Chief Marſhal (who is in the nature of a Lord Chamberlain) at the ſtairs-foot of the palace, and conducted to his Majeſty, who received him ſtanding under a canopy. When his Excellency delivered his maſter's compliments in a Latin ſpeech *, in which he gave aſſurances of his maſter's inviolable attachment to that Prince's intereſts, congratulated him upon the laſt treaty of peace, brought to a happy concluſion with the Infidels, and made overtures to enter into ſuch alliances with the Crown and Republic of Poland as ſhould be judged moſt conducive to the honour and ſafety of both nations. To this his Poliſh Majeſty gave a very agreeable and ſatisfactory anſwer in the ſame language, which he had readily ad unguem (25); and cauſed the Embaſſador afterwards to ſit down at the ſame table with him, where he was attended by the chief officers of State ſtanding, it being a cuſtom in Poland to admit none to that honour but the Princes of the Blood. Our author then deſcribes the perſon, dreſs, and accompliſhments both of the King and Queen. After which he proceeds with a deſcription of ſuch towns and principal cities as his curioſity led him to viſit; theſe are, Cracow, Vilne (26), Poſen, Gueſna, Lowitz, Warſaw, Thorn, Marienburgh, and Dantzic; which done, he concludes with an account of the religion, cuſtoms, and manners of the Poles; but this laſt part he acknowledges is taken moſtly from Mr Hauteville. He cloſes the whole with a compliment to Dr Pococke, whom he now again calls, as he had done at the head of his letter, his beſt friend and moſt honoured inſtructor, wiſhing to return to Chriſt-church, in the view of being reſtored to the happineſs of this friend's converſation, than which nothing could be more improving or deſired by him (27). Thus, confirming what we have already obſerved (28) from Mr Locke, upon Dr Pococke's moſt improving converſation.

* The ſpeech was written in Engliſh by Mr Hyde, and turned into elegant Latin by Dr South. Life, p. 23.

(25) He obſerves, that, to ſpeak good Latin, is their chief ſtudy in the univerſity, which came into vogue from an interview that King Caſimir II. had with the King of Sweden, when the latter, with all his Court, ſpoke the language fluently, which King Caſimir, not his attendants, not being able to do, he was ſo much aſhamed, that he gave great encouragement to that ſtudy. Life, p. 34.

(26) Theſe are their two univerſities, and may be called ſiſters, he ſays, from their affinity in ignorance. Ibid. p. 33.

finding the manſion-houſe belonging to the Rector much too mean for the largeneſs of the ſtipend, he cauſed the ſhattered remains to be totally pulled down, and an edifice erected in a more convenient part of the town, having purchaſed the ſcite, with a handſome garden, as a perpetual manſion for himſelf and ſucceſſors; ſo that, it might then, and may ſtill, vie with moſt parſonage-houſes in England [L]. In 1681, the Doctor, who was then one of his Majeſty's Chaplains in Ordinary, being in waiting, preached before the King upon theſe words, The Lot is caſt into the Lap, but the diſpoſing of it is of the Lord. Wherein, having ſpoken of the various changes and diſpenſations of Providence, and the unaccountable accidents and particulars of life, he introduced three examples of unexpected advancements in the following manner: 'Who, ſays he, that had looked 'upon Agathocles firſt handling the clay, and making pots under his father, and afterwards turning robber, could have thought that from ſuch a condition, he ſhould come 'to be King of Sicily? Who that had ſeen Maſinello, a poor fiſherman, with his red 'cap and his angle, would have reckoned it poſſible to ſee ſuch a pitiful thing, within 'a week after, ſhining in his cloth of gold, and with a word or a nod abſolutely commanding the whole city of Naples.——And who, that beheld ſuch a bankupt beggarly 'fellow as Cromwell firſt entring the Parliament-Houſe with a thread-bare torn cloak, 'and greaſy hat, perhaps neither of them paid for, could have ſuſpected, that in the 'ſpace of ſo few years he ſhould, by the murder of one King and the baniſhment of another, aſcend the throne? At which the King fell into a violent fit of laughter, and 'turning to Lord Rocheſter ſaid, Ods, fiſh, Lory, your Chaplain muſt be a Biſhop, therefore 'put me in mind of him at the next vacancy (s).' During the remainder of King Charles the Second's reign, the Doctor continued a ſtrenuous aſſertor of the prerogative againſt all attempts that were made towards it's diminution; and, by the intereſt of his patron, who on his return from his embaſſy, was raiſed to the peerage (t), in conjunction with his own merits, had ſeveral offers of advancement into the Hierarchy, but he modeſtly declined theſe, as having wherewithal to ſupport himſelf according to the dignities he ſtood poſſeſſed of in the Church, and the diſtribution of charities he had already ſettled and intended to lay ſchemes for; in order to which, he made ſome purchaſes about this time of houſes upon Ludgate-hill and Token-houſe-yard. On the acceſſion of King James the Second to the Throne, his patron's brother, the Earl of Clarendon, going Lord-Lieutenant to Ireland, made him an offer of an Archbiſhopric of that kingdom, but he continued fixed in his reſolves of living privately (u), which theſe two noble Peers were forced to do ſoon after, by their diſmiſſion from Court [M]. After the quelling of [L] It may vie with moſt parſonage houſes in England] Dr White Kennet, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, in his Parochial Antiquities gives a view of it, in a plate inſcribed to Dr South, whoſe coat of arms is engraved over it, in theſe terms: Viro reverendo Roberto South, S. T. P. Rectori eccleſiæ de Iſlip, tabulam hanc, quæ amplum & elegantem, Rectoriæ Manſum, ſuis impenſis conſtructum repræſentat, D. D. White Kennet. Nos admiremur, imitentur poſteri. The writer of his life (29) ſuggeſts, that the Rector was the more readily induced to this act of generoſity by the honour done to the village in the birth of King Edward the Confeſſor, which is declared by that King, in his charter or grant of the village and other lands thereto adjacent to St Peter's church in Weſtminſter.

(29) P. 107.

[M] The two Peers were diſmiſſed from Court.] We have already related the occaſion of this diſmiſſion in the courſe of this work (30), where we have alſo given an account of the Earl of Rocheſter's diſpute introductory to it, in defence of his religion, from Biſhop Burnet, as the beſt authority that occurred at that time. But as that Prelate makes no mention of Dr South, and beſides, is not ſo full as the writer of Dr South's Memoirs, whoſe account is likewiſe different in ſome particulars from that of his Lordſhip, we ſhall lay it before the reader as follows: That unhappy Prince [King James] being fully bent upon a general toleration of all Chriſtian diſſenters from the Church eſtabliſhed, and puſhed forward, upon extremities, to obtain liberty for the exerciſe of the Romiſh religion, by taking off the Teſt and Penal laws, took upon him to cloſet the chief men about him, and either to bring them over to his will by perſuaſion or threats. Among others, the Earl of Rocheſter, who was his Majeſty's brother-in-law, and therefore very dear to him, was examined concerning his opinion and ſentiments, relating to the King's will and pleaſure, to which his Majeſty was fully bent to have obedience paid by all about him, on pain of removal. Hereupon, the good Earl, after having, like a faithful Counſellor, pointed out the fatal conſequences of his Majeſty's impolitic reſolves, and begged him to deſiſt from an enterprize that would be found impracticable; very ſubmiſſively and prudently made anſwer, that he had been bred up in the principles of a religion that taught him that obedience to his Prince which he had never failed in, and that his duty to God, who was the King of Kings, obliged him to continue in the practice of them. However, if his Majeſty ſhould be ſo pleaſed (ſo certain was he of the truth of the doctrines he had received from the primitive Church) he was willing to abide by the reſult of a diſpute between two Church of England Divines and two of the Church of Rome, being not fearful of venturing to ſay, that to which ſide ſoever the victory ſhould incline, his Lordſhip would from that time abide by that which conquered. Hereunto the King very readily agreed, and immediately nominated the Fathers Giffard and Tilden for his two champions, and appointed the rule of Faith to be the ſubject matter of the controverſy. The perſons at firſt propoſed by the Earl were, Dr Jane and Dr South, but the latter was ſo unacceptable to his Majeſty, by the bitter invectives he was ſaid to make uſe of in the pulpit againſt the Papiſts and Preſbyterians, who then joined in their endeavours for liberty of conſcience, that he told his Lordſhip he could not agree to the choice of Dr South, who inſtead of arguments would bring railing accuſations, and had not temper of mind enough to go through a diſpute that required the greateſt attention and calmneſs. Hereupon the Earl choſe Dr Patrick, then Dean of Peterborough, and Miniſter of St Paul's Covent-garden, a very able Divine, in his room, but he would needs have the aſſiſtance of Dr South in a conſultation held the night before the conference was to commence, wherein were ſuch irrefragable arguments drawn up by him on the ſubject they were to diſcourſe, as totally obtained a conqueſt over their two opponents, and made the King diſmiſs his two pretended advocates with this rebuke, that he could ſay more in behalf of his religion than they could; and that he never heard a good cauſe managed ſo ill, nor a bad one ſo well. So that, concludes this writer, if Dr South could not be ſaid to be in the battle, he was a very great inſtrument of obtaining the victory; and Dr Jane has often owned (though a moſt excellent caſuiſt himſelf) that the auxiliary arguments contributed by Dr South did more of Monmouth's rebellion, toward the ſuppreſſion of which, the Doctor openly profeſſed, that if there ſhould be occaſion he would change his black gown for a buff coat, the reſidue of King James's reign being taken up in acts of bigotry and violence gives us no particulars further of our Divine, than that he ſpent the greateſt part of his time at Iſlip and Oxford, going ſometimes to his paternal eſtate at Caverſham in Oxfordſhire, near Reading, where he was buſied in preparing for the preſs moſt of thoſe extraordinary ſermons which have ſince ſeen the light, and exerciſed himſelf in devotions to deprecate the judgments that ſeemed to hang over the national Church. But as he had imbibed the moſt generally received opinion of Paſſive Obedience, ſo he made that principle the rule of his conduct; and when the invitation to the Prince of Orange to come over and reſcue our laws and liberties, ſigned by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and other Biſhops, was offered to him, he refuſed it, ſaying, 'his religion had taught him to bear all things, 'and howſoever it ſhould pleaſe God that he ſhould ſuffer, he would, by the divine 'aſſiſtance, continue to abide by his allegiance, and uſe no other weapons but his prayers 'and tears for the recovery of his ſovereign from the wicked and unadviſed counſels 'wherewith he was entangled (w).' In the ſame principle, after the arrival of the Prince of Orange, the Doctor refuſed to ſubſcribe the Aſſociation paper, ſigned by the Vice-Chancellor and ſeveral Heads of Colleges in Oxford, to ſtand by that Prince [N]. However, after the Revolution was brought about, the Doctor complied with the neceſſity of the times, and took the oaths to the new government (x). Yet, when offers were made him by ſome great men at the helm, who had then the benefit of the royal ear, to procure him one of the ſees vacated by the Nonjuring Biſhops in 1692, he excuſed himſelf on this account: 'That notwithſtanding he, for his part, ſaw nothing that was 'contrary to the laws of God, and the common practice of all nations, to ſubmit to 'Princes in poſſeſſion of the Throne, yet others might have their reaſons for a contrary 'opinion; and he bleſſed God, that he was neither ſo ambitious nor in want of pre-'ferment, as for the ſake of it, to build his riſe upon the ruins of any one Father of the 'Church, who for piety, good morals, and ſtrictneſs of life, which every one of the 'deprived Biſhops were famed for, might be ſaid not to have left their equal (y) [O].' The ſame turn of mind diſpoſed the Doctor to diſlike the Act of Toleration, nor did he well reliſh ſome proceedings at Court, whereby he ſuſpected (how juſtly it is not our buſineſs here to determine) ſome perſons to be countenanced and in great power, who were enemies to the Church eſtabliſhed. He laid hold of all occaſions to decry their meaſures and baffle their deſigns. And as he had vigorouſly exerted himſelf with the Commiſſioners appointed by the King in 1689, for an union with diſſenting Proteſtants, in behalf of the Church Liturgy and forms of prayer, and entreated them by no means to part with any of it's ceremonies that might have endangered the loſs of the whole: ſo he ſcarce ever preached, but he ſet before his auditors the miſchiefs that would ariſe by admitting ſuch vipers, as he called them, into the revenues of the Church, that would eat their way through their adopted, not natural, mother's bowels. In 1693, our learned Divine took up his pen in defence of the Orthodox doctrine, upon that prime article of the Chriſtian Faith, the Trinity, againſt the miſrepreſentations of it, by Dr William Sherlock

(31) Ibid. p. 110, 111, 112.

[N] He refuſed to ſubſcribe the Aſſociation, &c.] This has been already obſerved from the MS. of Dr Smith (32), from whom we have likewiſe the following particular concerning our author's antagoniſt, Dr William Sherlock's conduct at the ſame time. The London clergy, by concert with the Biſhop of London, deſired him, in their name, to thank the Prince of Orange for the hazard he had run in this expedition, and for his care in protecting our religion; but withal to deſire him to have a tender regard for the King. But the Biſhop not delivering this in ſuch terms as they expected, they took great offence at it. Dr Sherlock, ſaying that he and the reſt of them would ever maintain the loyal principles of the Church of England, and that if the Biſhop of London forſook that, they would forſake him. Thus we ſee theſe two divines, however furiouſly they buffeted one another afterwards, upon the important religious point of the Trinity, were about this time under the influence of the ſame principles of State, and theſe principles were found, at laſt, to be made of the like bending metal in both, upon the intereſting point of the Revolution; very contrary to thoſe of the aforementioned Dr Thomas Smith, who we have ſeen was ſtiffly reſolved to follow King James's fortunes into France, had not the Lord Preſton told him he might do his Majeſty more ſervice here (33). Whereupon he tells us, that he ſet himſelf to conſider upon what methods he ſhould enter, to do that little ſervice he was able: And the convention being opened, he went every day to Weſtminſter, to perſuade ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen, with whom he had the honour to be acquainted, to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to hinder the curſed (as he calls it) abdication, which was then viſibly deſigned and addreſſed to them, in order to the inviting of the King back to England, from whence he had been driven away. 'For my active behaviour, continues he, 'herein, and my loyal zeal on many rencounters in 'the Court of Requeſts, I was taken notice of, and 'threatned to be complained of and puniſhed. Be-'ſides the warm conteſts I had with ſeveral Biſhops, 'and others of the Clergy, who, partly through mi-'ſtaken principles, partly through fear of loſing their 'preferments in the Church, were now giving up 'themſelves into the hands of the Prince of Orange, 'in order (as ſome of them idly and fooliſhly talked) 'to the better ſecuring the Church of England from 'Popery, and maintaining the Proteſtant intereſt in 'Holland, and the other countries beyond ſea.'

[O] The deprived Biſhops had not their equals.] In the ſame ſpirit, Dr. Beveridge, as is well known, refuſed the Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, while Dr Ken was living; and we are told that Dr Sharp, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, declined to accept of any of theſe biſhopricks, out of a particular friendſhip and eſteem for the perſons deprived (34). This brings to mind the characters given of them by the author of the hiſtory of Faction. Theſe, ſays that author, ſpeaking of the deprived Biſhops, were the meek, pious, and learned Dr Sancroft, Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the ſeraphic Dr Kenn, Biſhop of Bath and Wells; the evangelical Dr Turner, Biſhop of Ely; the vigilant Dr Lake, Biſhop of Chicheſter; the reſolute and undaunted Dr White, Biſhop of Peterborough; the unchangeable Dr Lloyd, Biſhop of Norwich; and the irreproachable Dr Frampton, Biſhop of Glouceſter.

Sherlock. The controverſy ſpread itſelf far and wide, and being carried on by both parties with too much heat and acrimony [P], was at length determined, by the royal authority, entirely to the ſatisfaction of Dr South, who finding his conduct in it unreaſonably impeached afterwards by Dr Stillingfleet, took an occaſion in publiſhing the third volume of his ſermons in 1698, to lance ſome fleches of his wit againſt that learned Prelate [Q]. Much about this time the Doctor's unwearied application to his ſtudies brought [P] With too much heat and acrimony.] 'Tis worth while to hear Biſhop Burnet upon this occaſion. 'Dr 'S—— (ſays his lordſhip) a learned, but ill-natured 'Divine,——attacked Sherlock's book on the Trinity, 'not without wit and learning, but without any meaſure of Chriſtian charity, and without any regard 'either to the dignity of the ſubject, or the decency 'of his profeſſion. He explained the Trinity in the 'common method, that it was one eſſence in three Subſiſtancies. Sherlock replied, and charged 'this with Sabellianiſm; ſome others went into the 'diſpute with ſome learning, but with more heat. 'The Socinians divided them into real and nominal Trinitarians. Sherlock they put into the 'firſt claſs; as for the ſecond claſs, they pretended it had been the doctrine of the weſtern Church, 'ever ſince the time that the fourth council in the 'Lateran ſat (35).' The Biſhop has undeniably here ſpoken the general ſenſe of the nation at this time, though very unwillingly intimated in reſpect to our author's ſuperiority in explaining the ſubject of the diſpute. As to the indignity and indecency of his management of it, they are confeſſedly inexcuſable, unleſs the inexpugnable confidence of his antagoniſt, added to his own ardent zeal for the eſtabliſhed doctrine of the Church of England, may be taken for an excuſe; in defending which 'tis remarkable that, his good ſenſe and great learning are conſtantly made the dupe of his boundleſs inexhauſtible wit; of which the following in his ſecond piece againſt Dr Sherlock, is one conſpicuous inſtance. 'The ſoul of Socrates, 'ſays he, vitally joined with a female body, would 'certainly make a woman; and yet, according to 'this author's principle, (affirming that it is the ſoul 'only which makes the perſon) Socrates with ſuch a 'change of body, would continue the ſame perſon, and 'conſequently be the ſame Socrates ſtill. And in like 'manner for Xantippe, the conjunction of her ſoul 'with another ſex, would certainly make the whole 'compound a man, and nevertheleſs Xantippe would 'continue the ſame perſon, and the ſame Xantippe 'ſtill; ſave only, I confeſs, that upon ſuch exchange 'of bodies with her huſband Socrates, ſhe would have 'more right to wear the breeches, than ſhe had before '(36).' The ſarcaſm is a confirmation of Burnet's remark of our author's ill-nature, as it plainly alludes to the common bruit concerning his antagoniſt, which repreſents him as being a little unhappy in this reſpect with his conſort. During the heat of this controverſy, out comes a piece, intituled, Archæologia, &c. written by Dr Burnet, maſter of the Charter-houſe, impugning the divine authority of the old Teſtament. Whereupon all the three divines received a not improper chaſtiſement in the following very humerous ballad, to the tune of a ſoldier and a ſailor, &c.

(36) Tritheiſm, charged upon Dr Sherlock, &c. p. 129.

A Dean and Prebendary
Had once a new vagary;
And were at doubtful ſtriſe, Sir
Who led the better life, Sir;
And was the better man,
And was the better man.

The Dean he ſaid that truly,
Since Bluff was ſo unruly,
He'd prove it to his face, Sir,
That he had the moſt grace, Sir:
And ſo the fight began, &c.

When Preb. replied like thunder,
And roar'd out, 'twas no wonder,
Since gods the Dean had three, Sir,
And more by two than he, Sir;
For he had got but one, &c.

Now while theſe two were raging,
And in diſpute engaging,
The maſter of the CHARTER,
Said both had caught a Tartar,
For gods, Sir, there was none, &c.

That all the books of Moſes,
Were nothing but ſuppoſes:
That he deſerv'd rebuke, Sir,
Who wrote the Pentateuch, Sir,
'Twas nothing but a ſham, &c.

That as for father Adam,
With Mrs Eve his madam,
And what the Serpent ſpoke Sir,
'Twas nothing but a joke, Sir,
And well invented ſham, &c.

Thus in this battle royal,
As none would take denial,
The dame for which they ſtrove, Sir,
Could neither of them love, Sir,
Since all had given offence, &c.

She therefore ſlily waiting,
Left all three fools a prating:
And being in a fright, Sir,
Religion took her flight, Sir,
And ne'er was heard of ſince.
And ne'er was heard of ſince.

Whether this ballad is worded with that decency that the ſubject of the diſpute, or the very eminent and learned perſons concerned in it, deſerve, we ſhall not determine. But the reception it met with, being tranſlated into ſeveral languages, particularly Latin, by a curious hand, at the Univerſity of Cambridge, and the preſents ſent the author by the nobility and gentry, made it evident, that their ſentiments were againſt having the myſteries of our Holy Religion diſcuſſed and canvaſſed after ſo ludicrous a manner.

[Q] He exerciſed his wit againſt Biſhop Stillingfleet.] This Prelate in the preface to his Vindication of the Trinity, quotes the following ſentence againſt the treatment given each other by our antagoniſt. 'Oderit Rixas & jurgia præſertimque inter Eruditos, ac Turpe eſſe dicebat viros indubitate doctos caninâ rabie famam Viciſſim ſuam rodere ac lacerare ſcriptis trucibus tanquam viliſſimos de Plebe Cerdones in Angiportis ſeſe, luto & ſtercore conſpurcantes *. He ever hated broils and opprobrious language, eſpecially among the learned, and ſaid it was a very odious and unſeemly thing for men, who were undoubtedly renowned for knowledge and underſtanding, to inſult and tear to pieces each others reputations in their inhumane writings, with a canine fury, not unfitly compared to coblers ſprung from the vileſt dregs of the people, beſpattering each other in lanes and narrow paſſages with dirt and dung.' This Dr South took to be levelled at him in behalf of Dr Sherlock, whom he called not only the aggreſſor but the tranſgreſſor too. Therefore, notwithſtanding his great deference for his Lordſhip's unqueſtionable merit in polemical and caſuiſtical Divinity, joined to his obedience to the royal mandate and the Epiſcopal order, held his hands from entering the liſts with him in a controverſial way; yet he could not reſtrain himſelf from having a fling at them both in the dedication mentioned above to Narciſſus Boyle, Archbiſhop of Dublin; where among other remarkable paſſages are to be found theſe, 'Surely, ſays he, it would be a 'very odd way of ridding a man of the plague by running him through with a ſword; or of curing him of 'a lethargy by caſting him into a calenture, a diſeaſe brought upon him the bloody-flux, which was followed by the ſtrangury, that excepting ſome tranſitory releaſes, ſcarce left him to his laſt moments. Yet notwithſtanding theſe pains, he ſtill kept the ſprightlyneſs and vivacity of his temper with the few friends he converſed, which were always well choſen. During the greateſt part of the reign of Queen Anne, he was in a ſtate of inactivity, and the infirmities of old age growing faſt upon him, he performed very little of the duties of the miniſterial function, otherwiſe than when his health would allow of his attending the divine ſervice at Weſtminſter Abbey; though he would take a journey to his ſeat near Reading, having always two chairmen attending his coach to take him out when he was uneaſy, through his indiſpoſition beforementioned, and carry him in the chair. Notwithſtanding his ill ſtate of health, he continued his wonted recourſe to books, and the improvement of his mind almoſt to the day of his death; and it was with great difficulty that his Surgeon, who had the cure of a ſore leg under hand, prevailed on him not to creep into his ſtudy too often; which yet he could not refrain. Yet, notwithſtanding all theſe impediments to activity and motion, none ſhewed a greater concern for the Church, when he judged it to be in danger. In this ſpirit he was unwearied in his application to many of the Lords ſpiritual and temporal, to be mild and gentle in their ſentence againſt Dr Sacheverell, who was highly indebted to him for a very ſucceſsful advocate. Upon the change of the miniſtry in 1710, the Doctor was again ſollicited and courted (z) to accept of ſome higher dignities of the Church, and particularly to ſucceed Dr Sprat in the Biſhopric of Rocheſter and Deanery of Weſtminſter in 1713, but he returned for anſwer, 'That ſuch a chair would 'be too uneaſy for an old infirm man to ſit in, and he held himſelf much better ſatisfied 'with living upon the eves-droppings of the Church (a a) than to fare ſumptuouſly, by 'being placed at the pinnacle of it.' In the ſame humour, upon the promotion of Dr Atterbury, to thoſe moſt deſirable dignities, being aſked by a gentleman concerning the ſtate of his health. 'Within an inch of the grave, no doubt, ſays he, ſince I have 'lived to ſee a gentleman, who was born the very year in which I was made one 'of the Prebendaries of this church, appointed to be Dean of it [R].' On the death of the Queen, telling a particular friend, who uſually viſited him once or twice a week, 'that it was time for him to prepare for his journey to a bleſſed immortality; ſince all 'that was good and gracious, and the very breath of his noſtrils, had made it's departure 'to the regions of bliſs and eternal happineſs.' Accordingly, he began thenceforward to ſet his houſe in order, and to provide for the further good of poſterity, as appears by the benefactions in his laſt Will [S]. In 1715, he publiſhed a fourth volume of ſermons, which

'of a contrary nature indeed, but no leſs fatal to the 'patient, who equally dies, whether his ſickneſs or 'his phyſic, the malignity of his diſtemper, or the me-'thod of his cure diſpatches him. And in like manner 'muſt it fare with a Church, which feeling itſelf infec-'ted with the poiſon of Socinianiſm, flies to Thritheiſm 'for an antidote. But at length ſteps in the royal au-'thority to the Church's relief, with ſeveral wholſome 'injunctions in it's hands, for the compoſing, healing, 'and ending the diſputes about the Trinity then on 'foot, and theſe indeed ſo wiſely framed, ſo ſeaſona-'bly timed, and by the King at leaſt ſo graciouſly in-'tended, that they muſt in all likelihood, without 'any other Irenicon (37), have reſtored peace to the 'Church had it not been for the importunity and im-'partiality of ſome, who having by the awe of theſe 'injunctions endeavoured to ſilence the oppoſite party, 'which by their arguments they could not do, and 'withal looking upon themſelves as privileged perſons, 'and ſo above theſe ordinances, which others were to 'be ſubject to, reſolved not to be ſilent themſelves: 'but renewing the conteſt, partly by throwing Mug-'gleton and Rigaltius, with ſome other full ſtuff in 'their adverſaries faces; and partly by a ſhameful re-'printing (without the leaſt reinforcing) the ſame tri-'theiſtic notions again and again, they quite broke 'through the royal prohibitions, and ſoon after began 'to take as great a liberty in venting their innovations 'and invectives, as ever they had done before: ſo 'that he who ſhall impartially conſider the courſe 'taken by theſe men, in reference to thoſe who are 'engaged on the other ſide of the controverſy, about 'the Trinity, will find, that their whole proceeding in 'it, reſembles nothing ſo much as a thief's binding 'the hands of an honeſt man with a cord much fitter 'for his own neck. But bleſſed be God, matters 'ſtand not ſo with you in Ireland, the climate there 'being not more impatient of poiſonous animals, than 'the Church of poiſonous opinions, an univerſal con-'current orthodoxy ſhining all over it, from the ſupe-'rior Clergy who preſide, to the inferior placed under 'them, ſo that we never hear from thence of any 'Preſbyter, much leſs of any Dean, who dares inno-'vate upon the faith received, and leaſt of all ſhould 'ſuch a wretch chance to ſtart up among you) can I 'hear of any Biſhop likely to debauch his ſtyle and 'character ſo low, as either to defend the man, or 'colour over his opinions. Nor laſtly, do we find 'that in the judgment of the Clergy there, a man's 'having wrote againſt one ſort of hereſy, or hetero-'doxy, ought to juſtify or excuſe him in writing for 'another, and much leſs for it worſe.'

[R] Appointed to be Dean of it.] This anſwer gave occaſion to ſeveral perſons that were not acquainted with the Doctor's way of talk, to ſuggeſt that he took the gift of this preferment away from him in diſguſt. But the truth is on the contrary ſide; for he had a great eſteem for the new Dean's parts and perſon, received viſits from him to his dying day; and made it one amongſt his other requeſts, that at his burial my Lord of Rocheſter might perform the laſt office (38).

[S] The benefactions by his laſt Will.] This bears date March 30, 1714, and was drawn up by himſelf. Thereby the Doctor, beſides his church preferments, appears to have been poſſeſſed of ſeveral good temporal eſtates, hereditary and acquired, which he diſpoſes of in the following manner. In the firſt place, he bequeaths his eſtate of inheritance, rented at 75 l per annum, in the Hamlets of Whitley, in the pariſh of St Giles, Reading, in Berkſhire, to Robert South, his nephew by half blood, charged with the payment of 900 l. to his three nieces the ſaid Robert's ſiſters, and 400 l. to two of the daughters of his ſiſter Joan Hall, deceaſed. After which he bequeaths to Mrs Margaret Hammond, his houſe keeper, relict of Mr Edward Hammond, Clerk, all the reſidue of his leaſe of his meſſuages and tenements in or near Holyday-yard in London, held for a term of years from the Chapter of St Paul's; though, ſays he, I could, and do moſt heartily, wiſh, that at, or before her death, ſhe would give and ſettle the ſame to ſome charitable uſe for ever: and this to the great honour of Almighty God; the benefit of the publick, to my own great ſatisfaction, the good of her own ſoul and the juſt reputation of us to all poſterity. He alſo bequeaths to the ſame Mrs Hammond one eſtate in the pariſh of Caverſham in Oxfordſhire, and another in the manner of Cantlers or Cantlow, in Kentiſh town in Middleſex, during her which he inſcribed to Mr Bromley, as a teſtimony of his high eſteem, and ſincere affection to that friend, though at that time in diſgrace at Court; and in the ſame ſteady zeal to his firſt connections, he proceeded to ſhew his regard to the family of the Duke of Ormond, (who had unhappily forfeited his title by a bill of attainder in Parliament) in cauſing himſelf to be brought in a chair to the election of a new High-Steward of Weſtminſter, vacant upon the forfeiture of his Grace. The candidates were the Duke of Newcaſtle and the Earl of Arran, the late Duke's only brother, who had loſt his election, had not Dr South, though in a manner bed-ridden, made the voices of the Prebendaries equal, by ſaying very briſkly, when he was aſked whom he would vote for, her life, and after her death he gives them both to the Chapter of Chriſt-Church, in Oxon. for ever, in truſt, that out of the clear profits, they ſhall pay to and among the following Vicars, Curates, and Incumbents, for the time being, ten pounds a piece yearly for ever, free from all deductions of taxes, or any other duties, chargeable upon the ſaid premiſes, to be paid half yearly, viz. the Vicar of Southſtoke cum Capellis, and the Vicar of little Compton, the Curate of Drayton, the Curate of Stratton Audley, and the Vicar or Curate of Dorcheſter, all in Oxfordſhire. To the Vicars of Eaſt Garſden and of Ardington, both in Berkſhire. The Curates of South Littleton and of Offenham in Worceſterſhire; to the Vicar of Netherſoll in Glouceſterſhire, and the Vicar of Cereton in Wiltſhire. And in caſe the ſaid yearly rents and profits ſhould happen to fall ſhort of ſatisfying the ſaid ſum of ten pounds to each of the ſaid Vicars, &c. then there ſhould be an equal and proportionable deduction out of every one of the ſaid ſalaries. But if it ſhould happen in any following year (as no doubt it will) that more ſhould accrue out of the yearly rents, than is ſufficient to anſwer the ſaid yearly ſtipends, then he wills, that all deficiences ſo happening in any former year or years ſhall be made up and ſupplied to the ſaid Vicars, &c. out of ſuch overplus. 'And my further Will, proceeds he, by all means is, that if any of the Vicars, &c. receiving this my charitable benefaction, ſhall be convicted at the mouth of two or more witneſſes, or generally noted for, though not formally convicted thereof by witneſſes, of any thing groſly immoral, as whoredom, fornication, drunkenneſs, or common ſwearing, or any thing ſcandalous, or againſt the act of uniformity, or rule of the Church of England, ſuch as are preaching in, or going to, any conventicle or meeting of the Diſſenters from the Church of England, for religious worſhip; that then, and in every ſuch, and the like caſe, the ſtipend allotted to ſuch Vicar, &c. ſhall forthwith ceaſe, and the perſon or perſons ſo guilty be utterly deprived of the ſame for ever And that it be from time to time paid to ſuch Vicars, &c. as ſhall be ſo qualified as in the premiſes has been expreſſed, and known to the Dean himſelf, or to any one or more of the Prebendaries of Chriſt-Church in Oxon. for the time being, to be of a ſober unblameable life, and of ſtrict conformity to the Church of England, as now by Law eſtabliſhed.' He further bequeaths all the overplus of the money remaining of the yearly profits of the ſaid two eſtates, to ſix poor ſcholars for ever, twenty nobles a piece yearly, to be all of Chriſt-Church, and bred in Weſtminſter ſchool, to be at the nomination of the ſaid Chapter of Chriſt-Church, and the remainder of the ſaid profits to be applied towards the finiſhing of the new buildings then carried on in Chriſt-Church. He then confirms a deed of ſettlement, formerly made to the Dean and Chapter of St Peter's Weſtminſter, for erecting and endowing at his ſole charge a charity-ſchool at Iſlip. He proceeds to give further to the Dean and Chapter of Chriſt-Church the ſum of 500 l. to be laid out in purchaſing the perpetual advowſon of a good living, for one of the ſtudents of that College, who ſhall profeſs the ſtudy of Divinity, the ſaid 500 l. to be paid by his executrix within five years after his deceaſe. In the next place, he gives to the Dean and Chapter of St Aſaph, &c. in North Wales, the ſum of 100 l. in truſt, to be laid out for the apprenticing out twenty poor youths, born in the pariſh of Llanchiadar in Mocknant aforeſaid, to good honeſt trades, by 5 l. a peace to be paid by his executrix, when ſhe ſhall have received of his tenant for the tythes of Llanchiadar, all that ſhall be due from him on that account, and not otherwiſe, and before the full receipt thereof. He further gives the ſum of 100 l. to the public library of Oxford, for the buying into it ſuch modern authors of principal note, as the Vice-Chancellor and Head Librarian, for the time being, ſhall judge to be moſt uſeful, and moſt wanting there. He further gives the ſum of 200 l. to twenty poor ejected Clergymen, Nonjurors, at the choice and nomination of his executrix, to be diſtributed to them by ten pounds a piece. He likewiſe gives the ſum of 200 l. to forty poor widows of Miniſters, at the choice of his executrix, to be diſtributed at five pounds a piece, both to be paid within two years after his deceaſe. He alſo gives the ſum of 100 l. towards the maintenance of the poor children, taught and bred in the Grey-Coat Hoſpital in Tothill-fields. He likewiſe gives 100 l. to fifty poor houſe-keepers or widows, thoſe of Clergymen excepted as having been provided for in his Will before, within the city of Weſtminſter, to be diſtributed by his executrix, at forty ſhillings a piece, and to be at her nomination, but ſtill ſuch as ſhall be truly conformable to our Church as now by Law eſtabliſhed, and diligent attenders upon the ſervice and worſhip thereof, either at Weſtminſter Abbey (which ſays he I moſt like) or in ſome pariſh church thereabouts, and this to be done as ſpeedily, as it can with any tolerable convenience, be after my funeral. 'Alſo to the poor of the pariſh of Caveſham or Caverſham in Oxfordſhire, where, ſays he, I have dwelt for many years laſt paſt, I give ten pounds, having been all along very liberal to that place, and the poor thereof during all the time I ſpent there. And ten pounds to the poor of the town and pariſh of Iſlip in the county of Oxford alſo, to which I have been a conſtant, and (as they themſelves very well know) no ordinary benefactor, I give five pounds to the poor of the pariſh of Hackney in Middleſex, near London, where I was born and baptized. I give five pounds alſo to the poor of the place where I ſhall happen to be buried, in caſe it proves to be none of thoſe three places already mentioned, but not otherwiſe He concludes with appointing Mrs Hammond his ſole executrix and reſiduary legatee. Further in a codicil annexed, dated June 2, 1714, he bequeaths 500 l. towards carrying on the new buildings at Chriſt-Church, to be paid out of a deed or deeds of aſſignment for 977 l. to his ſaid executrix, as ſecurity for the repayment of 617 l. lent by him to William Vernon of Weſtminſter, gentleman. He alſo, as a pledge of reſpect, gives to the Honourable William Bromley, then Secretary of State, to Francis Gaſtril, Biſhop of Cheſter, to Dr John Hammond, and Dr William Stratford, both Canons of Chriſt-Church, five Carolus pieces of gold each for a ring. In another codicil, dated the ſame day as the former, he gives to Robert South, Attorney at Law, in Northampton, ſon to his half brother Mr James South, deceaſed, his the Doctor's father, drawn by the excellent hand of Vanzoeſt, then hanging in his lodgings at Chriſt-Church, as alſo a gold ring ſet with an amethyſt, with his father's arms, curiouſly engraved upon it; likewiſe a pebble ſtone artificially ſet in a gold ring (to be uſed as a ſeal) with the ſame coat of arms caſt or engraven on it; moreover an agate of a pretty large ſize, and handle tipped with ſilver, and bearing his father's arms alſo upon it, intended chiefly for the ſmoothing of writing paper; and together with this a ſmall ſilver ſeal, with the ſame engravement upon it, commonly uſed by himſelf in ſealing his letters. 'Which ſaid legacies, continues the Doctor, whether he ſhall paſs a due value upon them or no (for I have heard of his character) I have thought fit to leave him as the propereſt things to remind him of the worthy father, whom he is deſcended from, and the family which he belongs to, and deſerves with the utmoſt reſpect to be remembered by him.'

Heart and hand for my Lord Arran.

So that the Dean, who had the caſting vote, determined the choice in his Lordſhip's favour. This being the laſt time he went abroad, it is eaſy to imagine, that weakneſs, the attendant upon old age, made quick advances towards his diſſolution, which happened on Sunday the 8th day of July, 1716 (bb). Four days after his deceaſe, the corpſe having for ſome time lain in a decent manner in the Jeruſalem-chamber, was brought into the college-hall, where a Latin oration (cc) was ſpoken by Mr John Barber, Captain of the King's ſcholars. Thence it was attended by the Biſhop of Rocheſter, with the Prebendaries who were in town, the maſters, the ſcholars, the whole choir, and all the ſervants belonging to the royal foundation, with many members of the univerſity and college of Chriſt-Church in Oxford. Upon their entrance into the abbey, the choir performed the part of the funeral ſervice, 'till the body was placed in the area of the church; after which followed evening prayers, and an anthem ſuitable to the occaſion (dd). Prayers being ended, the corpſe was attended in the ſame manner to the grave, near the ſteps of the altar, adjoining to the late Dr Buſby's, where the choir performed the laſt part of the ſervice, the Right Reverend the Dean reading the burial office, with ſuch affection and devotion, as ſhewed his concern for this loſs to the Church (ee). A ſumptuous marble monument, after the model of Dr Buſby's, and adjoining to it, was erected to his memory with a Latin epitaph by Dr Freind, then Head-Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, containing his eloge. The purport of which is, that he did honour to his age and country; his judgment was penetrating, and his knowledge extenſive. He poſſeſſed at once all thoſe extraordinary talents, that were divided amongſt the greateſt authors of Antiquity; he had the ſound, diſtinct, comprehenſive, knowledge of Ariſtotle, with all the beautiful lights, graces, and embelliſhments, of Cicero. One does not know which to admire moſt in his writings, the ſtrength of reaſon, force of ſtyle, or brightneſs of imagination. As to his moral and religious conduct, he was not only a ſon, but a father to the Church of England; ſincere and hearty to her friends, and ever bold and undaunted in the defence of truth and loyalty; wherein his arguments were ſo ſolid and nervous, that as few have come near him, ſo none have excelled him. Inſomuch, that while he was poſſeſſed of Tertullian's oratory and force of perſuaſion, he was inveſted and cloathed with St Cyprian's devotion and humility. He was a true friend to Monarchy, even when rebellion was ſucceſsful and faction meritorious. His charity to the poor was very liberal, and the greateſt part of it induſtriouſly concealed, having our Saviour's rule not to let our light ſhine before men always upon his mind, whereby we may be aſſured, that he found greater ſatisfaction in the duty than he could propoſe from the title of a generous benefactor. To deſcribe him fully, ought only to be attempted by a perſon that is bleſſed with ſuch a ſhare of wit and devotion as he enjoyed. Here we ſee the bright ſide of the Doctor's character, which is repreſented as all pure gold without any alloy. Nevertheleſs an alloy it undeniably had mingled in it's compoſition, and which therefore, as it becomes an impartial hiſtorian, we ſhall lay before the reader, in the words of a late writer, who in a panegyric, intituled, The life of Archbiſhop Tillotſon (ff), recounting ſuch Proteſtants as had attacked his Grace's Sermons, ſets our Divine at the head of them. 'One of the moſt forward and petulent, ſays he, was Dr South, whoſe learning and genius, were accompanied with an unreſtrained acrimony of temper, and a boundleſs ſeverity of language, mixed with the loweſt and falſeſt, as well as the trueſt wit, both in his converſation and writings, againſt thoſe, who differed in the leaſt from him, eſpecially in matters, which he imagined or repreſented, to concern the intereſts of the Eſtabliſhed Church, for which, after the Reſtoration, he appeared the moſt zealous champion on all occaſions, though before that event, he had inſinuated himſelf into the good opinion of Dr John Owen, Dean of Chriſt-Church, where he was educated, and of the Independent party, whom he afterwards abandoned, and joyned with the Preſbyterians [T].' The Doctor is alſo repreſented

[T] He herded firſt with the Independents and afterwards with the Preſbyterians.] In order to confirm the juſtice of this repreſentation, it is obſerved, 'that the circumſtances are related by Mr Wood, who has drawn his character in a manner not at all favourable to his memory, and has the more weight from his own conformity to the Doctor's profeſſed principles, both in Church and State (39). Enough has been ſaid already to evince Mr Wood's prejudice againſt our author, where the root from whence it ſprung is now laid open. And we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew hereafter, that his Grace of Canterbury was handled with little leſs ſeverity by him (40); a circumſtance, which is ſunk into a dead ſilence in the account of his life, the greateſt blemiſh of which, is the blackning and blanching of characters, as beſt ſerves the purpoſe of heightning the otherwiſe ſufficiently confeſſed merit of the ſubject. In this deſign we ſee the writer raking up, and retailing every little tale in diſparagement of Dr South. Thus, for inſtance, to ſet off the moderation of the Archbiſhop's temper and principles, having remarked, 'that he was ſtigmatized with the name of Latitudinarian, by perſons of very oppoſite characters, is introduced a piece, intituled, The Principles and Practices of certain moderate Divines, &c written (41) by Dr Fowler, afterwards Biſhop of Glouceſter, who is dignified with the epithet of pious and rational, becauſe in it he complains, that this term of reproach, this word, as he calls it, of a foot and a half long, Latitudinarian, was frequently thrown out at that time, not only in converſation, but from the pulpit; and that it accompanied good ſtore of other bombaſts and little witticiſms, in ſeaſoning, not long ago, the ſtately Oxonion theatre. Which paſſage evidently refers to the ſpeech of Dr South, then Orator of the univerſity of Oxford, in which he treated not only the new Philoſophy and the Royal Society, but likewiſe moderation, comprehenſion, and other topics of that kind with his uſual virulence and buffoonry, ſo juſtly complained of by Dr Wallis in a letter to Mr Boyle (42), as unſuitable to a learned body, on ſo ſolemn an occaſion.' Again for proof of the vivacity of the Archbiſhop's repreſented by another author, as of a moroſe and reſerved perſon, who declares, that it was the fourneſs of his diſpoſition, which made him unfit for converſation, that made him a ſcholar; on the contrary, the writer of his life maintains him to be ſo far from deſerving this character of moroſeneſs and a ſour wit, that whoever was once in his company went off with ſuch a reliſh of his wit and good humour, as to covet the coming into it, though at the expence of bearing a part in the ſubject of his rallery, ſo that what was ſaid of Horace, might, on as juſt grounds be worked into his character,

Ridentem Flaccus amicum
Tangit, & admiſſus circum præcordia ludit.

Whatever may be thought of this compariſon in favour of the Doctor's converſible wit in particular; the uſe, which he is obſerved to make of his wit in general, by the author of the Tatler (gg), will hardly be diſputed. That ingenious writer, an acknowledged wit of the firſt rank, who cannot be ſuſpected of partiality on the Doctor's ſide, in a paper, the ſubject of which, was confeſſedly ſuggeſted by reading one of his ſermons, having inculcated the practice of virtue from the contemptibleneſs of vice, proceeds thus. 'I have oftned wondered, conſidering the excellent and choice ſpirits, that we have 'among our Divines, that they don't think of putting vicious habits into a more con-'temptible and unlovely figure, than they do at preſent; ſo many men of wit and 'ſpirit as there are in ſacred Orders, have it in their power to make the vogue on 'their ſide. The leaders in human ſociety are more effectually prevailed upon this way, 'than can eaſily be imagined. I have more than one in my thoughts, at this time, 'capable of doing this, againſt all the oppoſition of the moſt witty as well as the 'moſt voluptuous. There may poſſibly be more acceptable ſubjects, but ſure there are 'none more uſeful. It is viſible, that though mens fortunes, circumſtances, and plea-'ſures, give them propenſions too ſtrong to regard any mention, either of puniſhments 'or rewards. They will liſten to what makes them either inconſiderable or mean 'in the imagination of others, and by degrees in their own. It is certain, ſuch 'topics are to be touched upon in the light we mean, only by men of the moſt 'conſummate prudence, as well as excellent wit; for theſe diſcourſes are to be 'made, if made to run into example, before ſuch as have their thoughts more intent 'upon the propriety than the reaſon of the diſcourſe. What indeed led me into this way 'of thinking is, that the laſt thing I read was a ſermon of the learned Dr South, upon 'The ways of pleaſantneſs.' This admirable diſcourſe was preached at Court, where the 'Preacher was too wiſe a man not to believe the greateſt argument in that place, againſt 'the pleaſures then in vogue, muſt be, that they loſt greater pleaſures by proſecuting 'the courſes they were in. The charming diſcourſe has in it whatſoever wit and wiſdom 'can put together. This gentleman has a talent of making all his faculties bear to the 'great end of his hallowed profeſſion. Happy Genius! he is the better man for being 'a wit.'

biſhop's wit, we have the following inſtance of his talent at repartees, drawn from him on occaſion of Dr South's Animadverſions on Dr Sherlock's Vindication of the Trinity, in 1693. Dr South being deſirous, 'tis ſaid with what probability is left to the reader's judgment) to know the Archbiſhop's opinion of his performance, wherein he had occaſionally reflected upon his Grace, for his ſignal and peculiar encomium, as he calls it, of the reaſoning abilities of the Socinians, procured a friend of his to draw it from his Grace, who gave it to this effect, that the Doctor wrote like a man, but bit like a dog. This being reported to the Doctor, he anſwered, that he had rather bite like a dog than fawn like one. To which the Archbiſhop replied, That for his own part, he ſhould chuſe to be a ſpaniel, rather than a cur (43). Thus his Grace muſt needs be a match for Dr South as a wit, and that too in a ſpecious of wit, which is undeniably the ſpawn of ill nature and malevolence, and which, as ſuch, is allowed to be a foul diſgrace to the univerſal wit of his rival, who is however, here, inſinuated to bring this rebuke upon himſelf, by paying a kind of homage to his Grace's judgment. It would be running into the like ridicule, to ſet Dr South upon a level with Tillotſon as a preacher, though ſome of his performances that way are indiſputably excellent. Yet he characteriſed them in general, moſt aptly, who called them not Sunday, but week day ſermons. The peculiar turn and temper of theſe, as well as his other writings, were undeniably the produce of the idioſyncracy of his nature, to uſe a term of Dr Henry More, and the ſame may be ſaid of other writers and preachers, Dr Tillotſon not excepted, who on that account, incurred the imputation of a Latitudinarian, from a ſpirit of the ſame kindred with that which branded Dr South as an intolerant (44).

SPEED [JOHN], author of the Hiſtory and Maps of Great Britain, a man of wonderful induſtry, abilities, and ingenuity, conſidering his education and profeſſion, was born at Farrington in Cheſhire (a) [A], in the year 1552 (b). He was brought up a taylor, and free of the Merchant-taylors company in the city of London. But Sir Fulk Grevile, a great encourager of learning, obſerving his natural diſpoſition, took him off from his ſervile employment, and by a proper allowance enabled him to follow entirely his ſtudies [B]. The firſt fruits of them was his 'Theatre [or Maps] of the Empire 'of (a) Fuller's Worthies of England, in Cheſhire, p. 181.

[A] Was born at Farrington in Cheſhire.] So Dr Fuller was informed by Mr Speed's own daughter, Mrs Blackmore, a ſtationer's wife in St. Paul's Churchyard (1).

(1) Worthies, ubi ſupra.

[B] But Sir Foulk Grevile——enabled him to follow entirely his ſtudies.] This Mr Speed thankfully acknowledges, in theſe words. Sir Foulk Grevil,—— 'in whoſe perſon ſhineth all true vertue and high No-'bility.—Whoſe merits to me-ward, I do acknow-'ledge, in ſetting this hand free from the daily im-'ployments

‘ of Great Britaine [C].’ Which was followed with his Hiſtory of Great Britaine [D]; a work of infinite labour, and, allowing for the author's want of a learned education, well executed. For it is digeſted in a much better manner than the chronicles of Fabian, Grafton, Holinſhed, and Stow, and elegantly printed. The account and character given of it by Biſhop Nicolſon, and others [E], is ſet down below. Mr Speed was alſo author of

‘ ployments of a manuall Trade, and giving it full ‘ liberty thus to expreſs the inclination of my mind, ‘ himſelf being the procurer of my preſent Eſtate (2).’

[C] Theatre [or Maps] of the Empire of Great-Britaine.] The title of this work is, ‘ The Theatre of ‘ the Empire of Great-Britaine: preſenting an exact ‘ Geography of the Kingdomes of England, Scotland, ‘ and Ireland, and the Iſles adjoyning. With the ‘ Shires, Hundreds, Cities, and Shire-Townes within ‘ the Kingdome of England, divided and deſcribed by ‘ John Speed.’ Lond. 1606 fol. Theſe Maps are the beſt that had till then been made of the Britiſh Dominions. The corners of them are ornamented with coins, and the ichnography of the moſt conſiderable cities and towns in the reſpective counties. They were deſigned to go along with his Hiſtory; and, in the Contents, are made the Four firſt Books of that work.——Biſhop Nicolſon's judgment and opinion of theſe Maps is as follows (3). ‘ His Maps, ſays he, ‘ are extremely well; and make a noble Apparatus ‘ (as they were deſigned) to his Hiſtory. But his ‘ Deſcriptions of the ſeveral Counties are moſtly ſhort ‘ abſtracts of what Camden had ſaid before him, ſav- ‘ ing only that of Norfolk, which (he owns, tho' he ‘ is not always ſo civil to his chief benefactor) he had ‘ from Sir Henry Spelman.’ Is not this a little too Severe? Our author makes a due acknowledgment of his Benefactors, particularly with regard to his Maps, in theſe words (4).—‘ So plenteous is our Story, and ‘ ſo largely requires it to bee writ. Through all ‘ which my weake body with many yeeres labour hath ‘ alone trauelled, as well in the reuieuing of the Geo- ‘ graphicall parts of the Land, as in the compiling of ‘ the ſucceeding Hiſtory, though far vnable to perfect ‘ either, according to their owne worths. But leſt ‘ the waight of the whole ſhould reſt vpon ſo ſlender ‘ a proppe as my ſelfe: I have laid my buildings vpon ‘ far ſtronger arches, as by the many alleaged autho- ‘ rities may appeare. For firſt the Chards for the moſt ‘ part traced by others(5), and moſt of them diuulged ‘ vnto view, were the foundations of my begunne ‘ paines; in ſupplying their wants with my many ad- ‘ ditions, and dimenſions of the Shire-townes, and ‘ Cities true platformes. The further deſcriptions of ‘ ſundry provinces, I have gleaned from the famous ‘ workes of the moſt worthy and learned Cambden, ‘ whoſe often ſowed Seedes in that Soile hath laſtly ‘ brought forth a moſt plenteous harveſt.’ An Epi- tome of it was publiſhed in 1676.

[D] Which was followed with his Hiſtory of Great-Britaine.] This is intituled, ‘ The Hiſtory of Great- ‘ Britaine under the Conqueſts of the Romans, Saxons, ‘ Danes, and Normans. Their Originals, Manners, ‘ Warres, Coines, and Seales: with the Succeſſions, ‘ Lives, Acts and Iſſues of the Engliſh Monarchs from ‘ Julius Cæſar, to our moſt gracious Soveraigne King ‘ James.’ Firſt printed in 1614, large folio. Re- printed ſince, with ſome pretended additional decora- tions, but much inferior, in print and paper, to that firſt and beſt edition. In this Hiſtory, our Author had the Aſſiſtance of ſeveral perſons of the greateſt learn- ing. The reign of King Henry V. for inſtance, was compiled from collections, notes, and extracts made by George Carew Earl of Totneſs. That of Henry VII. is almoſt wholly the Lord Viſcount St Albans, Sir Francis Bacon's. The notes and collections of Sir Robert Cotton, were made uſe of in the reign of King Henry VIII. Thoſe of Sir Henry Spelman, in ano- ther. The life of King John was written by Dr Bark- ham, Dean of Bocking; who alſo drew up the life of King Henry II. in oppoſition to, or for ſuppreſſing, one written by the learned Edmund Bolton (6); who being a Roman Catholic was thought to favour too much the haughty carriage of Thomas Becket (7). The Catalogue of the religious Houſes, at the end of King Henry the eighth's reign, was compoſed by Wil- liam Burton, Eſq; (8) But let us hear Mr Speed's own account of his chief aſſiſtants.—‘ For the body of the ‘ Hiſtorie, ſaith he, many were the manuſcripts, notes ‘ and Records, wherewith my honoured and learned ‘ friends ſupplied me; but none more (or ſo many) as ‘ did the worthy repairer of eating times ruines, the ‘ learned Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baronet, another ‘ Philadelphus in preſerving old Monuments, and an- ‘ cient Records: whoſe Cabinets were unlocked, and ‘ Library continually ſet open to my free acceſſe ‘ from whence the chiefeſt garniſhments of this ‘ have beene enlarged and brought: ſuch as a ‘ antique Altars, and Trophies in Stone, by him pre- ‘ ſerved from periſhing oblivion: The Coins of gold, ‘ ſilver, alcumy, and copper, of the Britaine Ro- ‘ mans, Saxons, Danes and Engliſh, with the Br ‘ Seales of thoſe Kings ſince the ſame were in uſe: ‘ all of them ſo followed from the originall medalles, ‘ and moneyes, by the moſt exquiſit and curious hand ‘ of our age (9), as any eye may witnes they are the ‘ true prints from thoſe ſtamps. The like moſt ac- ‘ ceptable helpes, both of Bookes and Collections, ‘ (eſpecially in matters remoter from our times) I con- ‘ tinually received from that worthy Divine, Maſter ‘ John Barkham, a gentleman compoſed of Learning, ‘ Vertue, and Curteſie, as being no leſſe ingenuouſly ‘ willing, then learnedly able, to advance and for- ‘ ward all vertuous endeavours. Beſides theſe, ſome ‘ other ſupply I have had: for my diſeaſe growne ‘ dangerous, and life held in ſuſpence; it behoved ‘ him who had towards the publiſhing beſtowed ſo ‘ great coſt, to forward the finiſhing; and to that end ‘ hee procured mee to his further charges an aſſiſtant ‘ (10) in the lives of our middle Engliſh Kings: whoſe ‘ Stories and raignes (by the Judicious) may by their ‘ ſtiles bee knowne to bee writ with another penne. ‘ Laſtly for the matters of Herauldrie, the willing and ‘ ready paines of Maſter William Smith, Rough * ‘ Dragon (an officer at Armes) was ever at hand: and ‘ by theſe hands this building is mounted to ſuch an ‘ height as thou ſeeſt (11).’—But Dr Thomas Smith affirms, that Sir Robert Cotton had the reviſing, cor- recting, and poliſhing of the whole work. His words are theſe. ‘ Hanc benevolentiam, ſi quis un- ‘ quam, ſæpiſſimè expertus eſt Joannes Speedus, Civis ‘ Londinenſis, ob induſtriam ſaltem maxime commen- ‘ dandus, qui generalem magnæ Britanniæ hiſtoriam ‘ qualem qualem vernaculo idiomate pro captu, modu- ‘ lo, viribuſque ſuis ſcribere aggreſſus, tanto oneri ‘ plane ſuccubuerat, niſi Cottonus ſubſidiariam labo- ‘ ranti operam præſtitiſſet: cujus conſiliis monitiſque ‘ tanquam filo Ariadnæo ſeſe ex iſta labyrintho tandem ‘ feliciter extricavit. Cottonus enim ſchedas inculſas ‘ ſcabraſque ingenio, tanquam lima, perpolivit; ubi ‘ neceſſitas poſtulaverat, recoctas denuo reformavit, & ‘ inſigni obſervationum ſupplemento è penu ſuo auxit, ‘ ut opus illud qualecunque, quod longe alium auctorem ‘ in vetuſtis Scriptoribus tabulariiſque publicis verſa- ‘ tiſſimum deſideraret, ſi non cum laude, ſaltem cum ‘ venia & fructu legeretur (12).’

[E] The account and character given of it by Biſhop Nicolſon and others.] ‘ John Speed, ſays the Biſhop, ‘ muſt be acknowledged to have had a head the beſt ‘ diſpoſed towards Hiſtory of any of our writers; and ‘ would certainly have outdone himſelf, as far as he ‘ has gone beyond the reſt of his profeſſion, if the ad- ‘ vantages of his Education had been anſwerable to ‘ thoſe of his natural genius. But what could be ex- ‘ pected from a Taylor (13)? However, we may ‘ boldly ſay that his Chronicle is the largeſt and beſt ‘ we have hitherto extant: It begins with the firſt In- ‘ habitants of the Iſland, and ends with the union of ‘ the Kingdoms under King James, to whom it ‘ is dedicated. Tho' ſome ſay (14) he ſpent twice ‘ ſeven years in compiling the whole, he himſelf owns ‘ he made more haſte than he ought to have done; ‘ and that he was forced to truſt a deal of his work in ‘ the hands of his friends and journeymen. And the ‘ Truth of this honeſt acknowldgement and confeſſion ‘ is obvious enough to a diſcerning Reader; who will ‘ eaſily find a mighty Difference in the ſtyle, as well ‘ as matter, of ſeveral of the reigns (15).’—Degory Whear ‘ commends this Hiſtory in the Firſt place; ‘ and beſtows upon it the higheſt praiſes that can be.

Adding, that our Author 'having travelled over all 'Great Britain, read diligently all our own Hiſtorians, and thoſe of our neighbour Nations, together 'with a diligent Search in the Publick Offices, Rolls, 'Monuments, and ancient Charters, built up a ſplendid and admired Theatre of the Britiſh Empire; 'which, with great expedition and labour, he perfected in fourteen years, in Ten Books.——Wherefore I do moſt earneſtly exhort young Men, and eſpecially thoſe who are of Noble birth, and intend to travell, that they would firſt peruſe this beautifull Theatre of Great-Britain, and run over all the parts of it, before they travell into foreign countries, or viſit ſtrange Nations (16).'——James Tyrrell, Eſq; gives this character of it.——'It muſt be confeſſed, ſays he, that Mr Speed was the firſt Engliſh writer, who ſlighting Geoffrey's tales, immediately fell upon more ſolid matter; giving us a large Account of the Hiſtory of this Iſland during the Time of the Roman Emperors and Engliſh Saxon Kings; and had he not, by making his Reader follow thoſe Emperors in all their foreign wars and expeditions, wherein Britain was no way concerned, he had rendered his work leſs irkſome, and more profitable than now it is. But notwithſtanding He and Stow, had many choice Collections of noble Manuſcripts relating to our Engliſh Hiſtory, and might have had the view of ſeveral others if they would have been at the pains of ſeeking after them; yet it muſt be owned that they did not make that improvement of thoſe opportunities as might have been expected from ſuch great aſſiſtances; there being not much to be found material in either of them, but what was in the other Hiſtorians before publiſhed: though this muſt be allowed in their Commendation, that they are both of them (eſpecially the former) commonly right in their Chronologies, and the latter has given us a choice Collection of the Antient Coins of the Roman Emperors, as well as of the Engliſh Saxon Kings; and has alſo been more exact than any other Writer, in his account of their Wives and Iſſue (17).' But as to this laſt particular, he hath been much outdone by Mr Sandford's and Stebbing's Genealogical Hiſtory.——Finally, Mr Wood obſerves (18), that Mr Speed's part in this Hiſtory, is ſuch for Style and Induſtry, as is perhaps without many fellows in Europe.

SPELMAN [Sir HENRY], Knt. was deſcended from an ancient family of his name, which, as he himſelf hath ſhewn (a), flouriſhed in the time of Henry the Third, at Bekington in Hampſhire; and in the following century, removing thence into Suffolk, came at laſt to ſettle in Norfolk, where our author's great-grandfather was poſſeſſed, in the XVth century, of a conſiderable eſtate, being Lord of Stowe, Breclys, Magna & Parva Wotton, Colny, Welinge, Roclond, and Crowis; and marrying the heireſs of the Narburgh family, his eldeſt male iſſue became Sir John Spelman, Knt. of Narburgh; who having ſeveral children, his fourth ſon, Henry Spelman, Eſq; was ſeated at Congham (b), a ſmall village near Lyn-Regis in that county; at which place his wife Frances, daughter of William Sanders of Ewel in Surrey, brought him this his eldeſt ſon [A], the

[A] Brought him this eldeſt ſon.] Dr Gibſon, the late Biſhop of London, ſpeaking of our author's family, relates it thus (1). 'His father's name was Henry Spelman, Eſq; as we learn from a pedigree of the family under Sir Henry's own hand, and not John, as a certain writer has affirmed. Referring in the margin to the Life of Sir Henry Spelman in Latin, prefixed to the third edition of his Gloſſary; where that writer, who

However, he applied himſelf cloſely to his books, and was greatly pleaſed with this ſituation: but was unhappily torn from it by the death of his father, being called home on that occaſion by his mother, to give her ſuch aſſiſtance as he was capable of, in managing the affairs of the family. He had not ſpent two years and a half in the univerſity, and was not yet quite ſeventeen years old. After he had continued with his mother about twelve months, ſhe ſent him to London, and had him admitted of Lincoln's-Inn, with a deſign of breeding him to the Law [E]. Having now again obtained his liberty with his books, he gave his attention chiefly to polite literature, and the more liberal branch of the ſtudy he was intended for, in which branch of it he took a ſingular delight; but having an averſion, too often ſeen in young minds, to the flat drudgery neceſſary for attaining to the lucrative part of that profeſſion, he made no extraordinary progreſs therein, ſatisfying himſelf probably with a general knowledge of ſuch laws and cuſtoms, as are of common and ordinary uſe in practice. When he had ſpent near three years in theſe ſtudies, being almoſt of age, he went down into Norfolk, and was ſoon after married to Eleanor, the eldeſt daughter of John le Strange, a gentleman of an ancient family [F] in the who ſubſcribes himſelf J. A. in the firſt page of his account, has, indeed, theſe words, nomen patri Johannes erat. But turning over the leaf, I was not a little ſurprized, to find in the very next page Sir Henry's pedigree traced after Sir Edward Byſhe, in theſe words: 'Henricus Spelman Elizabetham duxit filiam 'et hæredem Gulielmi Narburgh; ex qua genuit Jo-'hannem Spelman, qui uxorem habuit Elizabetham, fi-'liam & hæredem Henrici Fowick, Equitis Aurati. 'Ex iis natus Henricus hunc autorem noſtrum Henri-'cum dedit.' Reflecting upon theſe two moſt extraordinary accounts, there was no avoiding this plain inference, that the inexcuſable oſcitancy of Mr J. A. was a proper bait for the little leſs blamable promptneſs of his cenſurer, in finding fault. In the mean time, great allowance is to be made for the author of the General Dictionary (2), who has very faithfully tranſcribed this notable remark of Dr Gibſon, the then [viz. in 1739] actually Biſhop of London.

(2) Under the article SPELMAN [Sir HENRY].

(3) Ubi ſupra.

(4) In Vita Henrici Spelmanni, prefixed to the third edition of his Gloſſary, in fol. 1684.

[B] He was born in 1562.] Dr Gibſon obſerves (3), that Sir Henry was about eighty years of age when he died in 1641; whence the author of the General Dictionary infers, that he was born in 1561; and Mr J. A. (4) had before expreſſed the age at which he died, in theſe terms: obiit octageſimo ætatis anno & quod excurrit. This may [poſſibly] either mean that he died ſome time after his birth-day, in the year that he arrived at the age of fourſcore, or elſe that he died in his eightieth year current. This laſt author honeſtly declares, that he had no acquaintance at all with the Spelmans family, but had his information chiefly from Anthony Wood, the Oxford Antiquary; and Dr Gibſon, no doubt, not caring to enter into ſuch minutiæ, has here apparently given a looſe tranſlation of the Latin writer, leaving it undetermined, as a matter of no moment; which is certainly well judged: but here the copyer, willing to ſqueeze ſomething out of his words, infers from them, that Sir Henry was born about 1561. This remark, it is hoped, will excuſe the following, otherwiſe intolerable, diligence. Sir Henry, in his letter to Mr Richard Carew, printed at the end of his larger work upon Tythes, and dated September the 18th, 1615, writes thus: Denuo otii deſiderio captus Londinum tertio hinc anno veni. And in the preface of his Gloſſary, ſpeaking again of his coming to ſettle in London, he ſays, Provectus itaque ad ſenectutis confinia annum nempe quinquageſimum.—— Londinum tranſfero. If theſe two paſſages be compared, take them in what ſenſe you pleaſe, the inference is unavoidable, that he could not be born before the year 1562; and, on the other hand, if he died in his eightieth year, that is, when he was full ſeventy-nine years old, it is equally evident, that he could not be born after 1562, in which year we have therefore ventured to place his birth.

[C] He was put to ſchool at Walſingham.] Mr Wood, it ſeems, could give his friend J. A. * no information concerning this particular; Sir Henry being bred at Cambridge, did not lye directly in the road of the Oxford Antiquary; but it is ſomething remarkable, that Dr Gibſon ſhould tread in the ſame ſteps, and paſs it over in a dead ſilence, ſince the treatiſe where it is expreſsly declared muſt in ſome manner have been peruſed by him. He gives us his word for it, and, in further proof, has drawn up a very faithful general plan of it; in which he has given us the title at length of the very chapter where it is found, and concluded the whole with a very pertinent remark in favour of the author, which ſeems chiefly taken from a paſſage in this chapter. I mean Sir Henry Spelman's Hiſtory and Fate of Sacrilege. In which treatiſe (5), in ſpeaking of Walſingham-abbey, he has theſe words. 'One 'Sydney, Governour of the Spittle there, as was com-'monly reported when I was a ſcholar at Walſingham, 'was by the townſmen employed to have bought the 'ſite of the abbey,' &c. A ſufficient apology has been already offered for the author of the General Dictionary, who here again hath diligently followed the then Biſhop of London.

(5) Hiſtory of Sacrilege, p. 259.

* His words are, De puerili noſtri Equitis ætate perpauciſſima habeo quæ dicam.

[D] When he had ſcarcely paſſed ſix months in the fourteenth year of his age.] This preciſion was incidentally occaſioned by our being drawn into the enquiry under the note [B], in the manner there related; when we could not avoid obſerving, that Sir Henry, in the preface to his Gloſſary, ſays, Nondum xv annorum Puer è ſchola rapior Cantabrigiam; and finding him likewiſe complaining to his friend Mr Carew in theſe terms, Cantabrigia (miſerum me) mater exoit cum 17 ætatis non ſalutaveram, we became irreſiſtably puſhed into the exactneſs here marked.

[E] With a deſign of having him bred to the Law.] Dr Gibſon (and his tranſcriber) tells us, that he was ſent to ſtudy the Common Law at Lincoln's-Inn, either with a deſign to practiſe it, or (which is more probable) as an uſeful accompliſhment of an Engliſh gentleman. Sir Henry's own account of it is thus expreſſed: 'Emiſit [mater mea] me tamen ſub anno al-'tero Londinum juris noſtri capeſſendi gratia, cujus 'cum veſtibulum ſalutaſſem, reperiſſem linguam pere-'grinam, dialectum barbaram, methodum inconcinna-'am, molem non ingentem ſolum, ſed perpetuis hu-'meris ſuſtinendam. Excidit mihi fateor animus, 'blanditioribuſque ſubridens muſis rigidam hanc Mi-'nervam ferreis amplexibus coercendam leni molimine 'delibavi. Excuſſit me interea (O intelicem!) e cli-'entela ſua, gratiæ, poteſtatis, dignitatis, immenſæque 'apud nos largitrix opulentiæ, illa inquam veſtitu ſim-'plici & inculto, ſed jurium omnium municipalium 'abiit dictis invidia) nobiliſſima Domina, omni utpote 'juſtitia moderamine prudentia ſublimi jue acumine '(temere licet eum periſtrinxerit Hotomannus) reſertiſ-'ſima.' We muſt leave it to the learned reader to judge, whether the words (which we have relied on), Juris noſtri capeſſendi gratia, cujus cum veſtibulum ſalutaſſem, Excidit mihi animus, Excuſſit me immenſæ apud nos largitrix opulentiæ illa—Domina, are ſufficient to juſtify what is here aſſerted in the text, againſt the opinion of the late Biſhop of London.

[F] A gentleman of an ancient family.] Sir Henry drew up the pedigree of this family under the following title: Familiæ Extraneorum, ſive Le Strange, accurata deſcriptio. He found ſomething very particular in the ſame County. Being thus, agreeably to his affections (e), ſettled in the country, he applied himſelf immediately to rural affairs, and the particular care of his domeſtic. He kept his land in his own hands, and took pains to manage it to the beſt advantage; and notwithſtanding his family increaſed apace, yet he found wherewithal to make ſome new purchaſes (f). In the mean time the match he had entered into brought another care upon him in the guardianſhip of his brother-in-law Sir Hamon le Strange, during whoſe minority he reſided at Hanſtanton, the ſeat of his ward. However, though the greateſt part of his time was ſpent in attending to theſe engaging duties, yet did he not neglect to make a proper uſe of his education, and found ſome ſpare hours to improve thoſe beginnings which he had made in the knowledge of the conſtitution, and laws, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, of his country. While he was yet a young man, he wrote a Latin treatiſe intituled Aſpilogia (g), wherein he diſcourſes with great variety of literature concerning thoſe marks of honour now called Arms. It was likewiſe in his younger years that he collected the tranſcripts of ſeveral foundation-charters of the monaſteries in Norfolk and Suffolk. In 1694, being thirty-four years of age, he likewiſe wrote A Diſcourſe concerning the Coin of the kingdom, particularly to ſhew what great treaſures were exhauſted from England by the uſurped tyranny of Rome [G]. Before this he had been admitted a member of the Society of Antiquaries [H], which brought him intimately acquainted with Sir Robert Cotton, Mr Camden, and ſeveral others, the moſt eminent men in England for that kind of literature. In 1604 he was appointed High-Sheriff of Norfolk, and probably about the ſame time it was that he wrote a deſcription of that County, which he communicated to John Speed, who printed it in 1606 [I]. Thus he began by degrees to be taken notice of, diſtinguiſhing himſelf, upon all occaſions, by his great prudence and abilities; inſomuch that in 1607 he was pitched on by his Majeſty [K. James I.] to be one of the Commiſſioners for determining the unſettled titles to lands and manors in Ireland [K]. This Poſt carried him three times in tracing this pedigree, which led him to write another piece, intituled Hiſtoria Familiæ de Shereburn. This laſt family he traces up as far as to one Thokas, who was converted to Chriſtianity, and baptized by St Felix, at this time with Honorius Archbiſhop of Canterbury, at whoſe requeſt that Saint came to England from Burgundy. From this Thokas he traces it without a ſingle hiatus down to Chriſtopher Shereburn, who died July 6, 1676. This Chriſtopher married firſt Anne Veer, of the family of the Earl of Eſſex, and afterwards Duke of Norfolk, and had Frances, who married into the family of Le Strange. Sir Henry, it ſeems, was quite ſtruck with this ſingular pedigree, and has expreſſed it in a diſtich prefixed to the Reader.

[G] A Diſcourſe concerning the Coin of the kingdom.] This was wrote in the thirty-ſixth year of Queen Elizabeth, as appears from the following paſſage in the Concluſion of it to that Queen. 'Moſt Royal, therefore is the prudence and expediting of your excellent Majeſty, who (as it were with Lynceus Eye,) looking into the loweſt ſecret of the practices of your Enemies, have not only for theſe thirty-ſix years entirely cancelled and made them fruſtrate, but foreſeeing alſo what mighty conſequences might depend on mean beginnings, ſpareth no diligence to defeat them, whilſt they are yet in the ſhell; or ſo to ſhoot the mark at which they are levelled, that being hatched, they will be able to perform nothing.' We muſt not omit to inform the Reader, that the Editor of this piece tells us, he dares not poſitively aſſert it to be Sir Henry's; 'but my finding them, ſays he, among his other papers, and the accurate knowledge of our Engliſh affairs which appears in them, inclined me to believe that he was really the Author of it (6).'

[H] He was admitted a member of the Society of Antiquaries before 1694.] This appears from the account which he gives of it in the Introduction to his Diſcourſe concerning the original of the four Law Terms, as follows. 'About forty-two years ſince, ſays he, divers gentlemen of London ſtudious of Antiquities, formed themſelves into a College or Society of Antiquaries, appointing to meet every Friday weekly in the Term at a place agreed of, and for learning ſake to confer upon ſome queſtions in that faculty, and to ſup together. The place, after a meeting or two, became certain at Derby-houſe, where the Heralds Office is kept, and two queſtions were propounded at every meeting to be handled at the next that followed; ſo that every man had a ſeven-night's reſpite to adviſe upon them, and then to deliver his opinion. That which ſeemed moſt material was by one of the Company (choſen for the purpoſe) to be entered in a book, that ſo it might remain unto Poſterity. The Society increaſed daily; perſons of great worth, as well noble as learned, joyning themſelves unto it. Thus it continued divers years; but as all good Uſes commonly decline, ſo many of the chief Supporters thereof either dying or withdrawing themſelves from London into the Country, this among the reſt grew for twenty years to be diſcontinued. But it then came again into the minds of divers principal gentlemen to revive it, and for that purpoſe upon the day in the year 1614, there met at the ſame place, Sir James Sey, Knight, then Attorney of the Court of Wards, ſince Earl of Marlborough, and Lord Treaſurer of England; Sir Robert Cotton, Knight and Baronet; Sir John Davies, his Majeſty's Attorney for Ireland; Sir Richard St-George, then Norroy; Mr Hackwell, the Queen's Sollicitor; Mr Camden, then Clarencieux; myſelf, and ſome others: Of theſe, the Lord Treaſurer, Sir Robert Cotton, Mr Camden, and myſelf, had been of the Original Foundation (7).' What Perſons his admiſſion into this Society brought him acquainted with, will be ſeen in the Catalogue of ſome of their names, viz. Thomas Earl of Dorſet; Henry Earl of Northampton; Fitz-Allen, the laſt Earl of Arundel; William Lord Burleigh; the Herberts, Earls of Pembroke; the learned Lord Lumley; Sir Phillip Sidney; Sir Henry Billingsley; Sir Gilbert, and Sir William Dethicke; Sir Henry Fanſhaw; Dr Bartholomew Clerk, and Dean Couſins; Sir Walter Cope and Raleigh; Dr Cowell; Francis Thynne, Eſq; Lancaſter; Mr Glover, Somerſet; Heneage, Keeper of the Records; Benefield; Erdſwick; Lambert Valence, Eſq; Mr Talbot; and Mr John Stowe, &c. Mr Archdeacon Nicolſon not only ſuggeſts that this deſcription of Norfolk by Sir Henry Spelman is a good one, but affirms that his book is the only good one. Sir Henry it appears was a great Encourager of Mr Speed, and furniſhed him afterwards with notes and collections for the life of one of our Kings, which he printed in 1614, in his Hiſtory of Great Britain, &c. before which work there appears, among others, a Recommendatory Poem by Sir Henry (9).

[K] One of the Commiſſioners for determining the unſettled titles to lands and manors in Ireland.] The ſeveral Manors and Eſtates within the Counties of Roſcommon, Sligo, Mayo, and Galway, being unſettled as to their titles, K. James I. by Commiſſion under the Great Seal, bearing date the Second of March, in the fourth Year of times into that kingdom; and, as he diſcharged his ſhare of the truſt with great reputation, ſo, in the courſe of it, he muſt needs feel the advantage of the progreſs he had already made in ſearching into the originals of the ancient uſages and cuſtoms. No wonder then that we find him reſolved ſoon after to puſh that ſtudy. The natural bent of his genius had always apparently lain more this way than to buſineſs of any kind. Beſides, the occupation of farming, and a country life, in which his love and concern for his family had ſo long engaged him, contrary to the conſtitutional turn of his temper, had, for ſome time, begun to grow exceedingly tedious and irkſome to him, and he had met with ſome remarkable diſappointments in it [L]. He therefore determined to live no longer under that reſtraint, but to paſs the remainder of his life amongſt books, and in the ſociety of his learned acquaintance. With this reſolution, in the year 1612, he ſold the ſtock upon his farms, let out his eſtate to tenants, quitted the country, and ſettled in London with his wife and family. He was now in the fiftieth year of his age, and the time he had hitherto paſſed in his ſtudy ſeems to have been laid out chiefly for his own gratification; though not without being ſometimes of ſervice both to his friends and country, but without an eye to any particular great undertaking. He now fixed his choice upon a moſt uſeful and important ſubject, the grounds of the Law from original records [M]. With this deſign he made it his firſt buſineſs to collect all ſuch books and manuſcripts as related to that Article. And with indefatigable diligence he read over the Fathers, Councils, and as many of the hiſtorians of the middle age as he could meet with, whether foreign or domeſtic (b). He had not been long engaged in this ſtudy, when he was interrupted, in ſome meaſure, by an incidental diſcourſe with his Uncle, Mr Francis Saunders, who complained to him of many croſſes and diſappointments that he unexpectedly met with in a building he had then in hand upon the Glebe of his Appropriate parſonage at Congham. The Nephew was glad of ſo favourable an opportunity, and preſently took occaſion to declare his ſentiments freely upon it, which were, that God was not pleaſed with his Uncle's deſign, ſince it tended to the defrauding of the Church; adding moreover ſome reaſons which induced him to think it utterly unlawful to keep Appropriate parſonages in Lay hands. He had the ſatisfaction to find that what he ſaid, notwithſtanding it ſo nearly touched his Kinſman in point of Intereſt, had made ſome impreſſion upon him (i). Wherefore, while he was in a diſpoſition to liſten to ſuch arguments, our Author drew up his Thoughts in writing, and ſent the paper to Congham. But his Uncle dying upon the ſame day, Auguſt 16, 1613, that the Meſſenger arrived there, gave occaſion to its being printed that year (k) (though without any deſign of publiſhing it) (l)

of his reign, did authorize certain Commiſſioners (among whom our Author was one) by Letters patents to make grants of the ſaid lands and manors to the reſpective owners. This Commiſſion held ſeveral Years, and our Author tells us himſelf that he was three times in Ireland, twice in the remote Counties, and once in the nearer parts of that Kingdom. Several Letters patents paſſed under his Majeſty's great ſeal by vertue of the commiſſion for the ſtrengthening of ſuch titles as might otherwiſe ſeem defective; and Sir Henry himſelf intimates that he had been of ſervice to the Owners of thoſe Eſtates, his Hiberniæ tractum ultimum, propinquiorem tertio ex re luſtro alienâ, fideique multa credita per annos plures ſatis (ſi et mihimet) auſpicate ſequor. Theſe are his words in the preface to his Gloſſary, where he expreſsly intimates, that his attendance on this public affair had been ſome diſadvantage to his private affairs; immediately after which he relates how, grown weary of a country life, he therefore went to ſettle in London; nor do I ſee any thing in this preface to ground ſuch an obſervation upon as is made by Dr Gibſon (10), and that in it Sir Henry ſeems to complain of the like prejudice to his family, occaſioned by his attendance on the other commiſſion he was afterwards engaged in, which was to enquire into the oppreſſion of Exacted fees.

(10) In the Life of Sir Henry, ubi ſupra.

[L] He had met with ſome remarkable diſappointments in it.] This had happened in his purchaſe of Blackburgh and Wrongey Abbies, mentioned in the text, his right to which was, it ſeems, about this time, called into queſtion. The caſe was thus: Theſe two Abbies had been granted and annexed to the Biſhopric of Norwich, where Edmund Sclater, being made Biſhop 27 of Eliz. made a leaſe of moſt of the manors and lands thereof, and amongſt them of theſe two Abbies to the Queen for twenty-nine Years at the loweſt rent he might. Queen Elizabeth aſſigneth this leaſe to Sir Thomas; he leaſeth it to his Lady, afterwards Counteſs of Southampton; ſhe ſelleth her term in theſe Abbies, with the manors and lands belonging to them, to one Fiſher, a Skinner in London, by the procurement of one Wrenham her Servant; Fiſher entereth and enjoyeth them as undoubtedly his own, leaſeth them for twenty-one Years to one Harpley at a great encreaſed rent. Wrenham dieth without contradicting any thing; his Son, John Wrenham, pretending that Fiſher had the grand leaſe but in truſt for his Father, exhibits one bill in Chancery againſt Fiſher; another againſt his Son, Sir Edward Fiſher, as having it from his Father; and a third againſt Harpley the Underleaſer. Lord Chancellor Egerton by a decree declareth Harpley's leaſe to be good, who thereupon enjoys it quietly, and dieth; his Executrix ſelleth it to Sir Henry Spelman, and Wrenham exhibits a bill againſt him. It is true, it does not appear, by any thing here produced, that this Law-ſuit commenced before Sir Henry's ſettling in London; but as the ſame Author [Mr. Jeremy Stephens] afterwards informs us, that by this affair Sir Henry firſt diſcerned the Infelicity of meddling with conſecrated places, and it will appear preſently, that he had been of this opinion for ſome time before he came to London; thence I have ventured to place it here.

[M] The grounds of the Law from original records.] We have already taken notice, from Sir Henry's own words, that he had ſome knowledge of the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom then in uſe before he left Lincoln's-Inn; and there can be no doubt but that knowledge had been continually improved as his Occaſions required, eſpecially as we find him afterwards very pathetically regretting the diſtaſte he had to that ſtudy in his Youth. But ſuch a general knowledge would not ſatisfy a mind ſo curious, and a judgment ſo ſolid, as his appears to have been in all his Writings. Theſe inclined him to ſearch into the reaſons and foundations of the law, which he knew were not to be learned but from the cuſtoms and hiſtories of our nation in Elder Ages, nor theſe uſages to be traced but by a ſtrict Examination of the moſt ancient records. Upon this Dr Gibſon makes the following remark: It is very much, ſays he, to the diſadvantage of the law, that they, who by their abilities are beſt qualified to improve the knowledge of it from original records, are ſo much taken up with the buſineſs of their profeſſion, that they have little time to beſtow upon ſuch enquiries. As, on the other hand, Men who are born to leiſure and Eſtates, however inclinable they may be to the polite parts of learning, do ſeldom care to engage in a ſtudy which, at firſt ſight, ſeems to be ſo rough and tedious; but it was the Happineſs of Sir Henry Spelman (and much more of the Engliſh nation) that he had both time and inclination to it, I mean to examine the ancient laws and monuments, not only of our own, but alſo of moſt other Northern kingdoms.

with the title De non temerandis Eccleſiis. The meeting of the Society of Antiquaries, having been diſcontinued for twenty years, was revived in 1614 by Sir Henry, together with ſome others, particularly ſuch as had been of the old Society. Upon this occaſion our Author wrote A diſcourſe concerning the original of the four Law terms of the year [N]. And an unforeſeen accident gave occaſion to the reprinting and publiſhing his tract De non temerandis Eccleſiis in 1615, 8vo [O]. About the ſame time he wrote an Apology for this treatiſe

(N) A diſcourſe concerning the original of the four Law terms.] Upon the revival of the Society of Antiquaries, Sir Henry ſays (11), 'at their firſt meeting ſeveral rules 'for their government and limitation being drawn up, 'and Mr Hackwell choſen their Regiſter and Con-'vocator (it is his expreſſion) of their Aſſemblies for 'the preſent, they agreed upon two queſtions for the 'next meeting, and ſo ſupping together, departed. 'One of the queſtions was touching the original of 'the terms, about which, as being obſcure and gene-'rally miſtaken, I beſtowed, ſays he, ſome extraordi-'nary pains, that coming ſhort of others in under-'ſtanding, I might equal them, if I could, in dili-'gence. But notwithſtanding one of their rules was, 'that they ſhould neither meddle with matters of ſtate, 'nor of religion, yet before their next meeting, they 'had notice that his Majeſty took a little miſlike of 'their Society, not being informed that they had re-'ſolved to decline all ſtate affairs. Hereupon they 'forbore to meet again; and ſo, ſays Sir Henry, all 'our labours loſt. But mine lying by me, and hav-'ing been often deſired of me by ſome of my friends, 'I thought good, upon a review and augmenta-'tion, to let creep abroad in the form you ſee it, 'wiſhing it might be rectified by ſome better judg-'ment.' As to the Society of Antiquaries, it appears by a manuſcript ſuppoſed to be printed in 1619 (12), that there was a deſign to revive it, and ſome attempts made to procure a grant from King James I. to conſtitute it a royal corporation, under the title of King James's Academy or College of Honour, but it came to nothing. What Mr Hearne obſerves (13) of them, is ſeen by what is related of them in Remark [H] to be very juſt, that this Society, in the time of Queen Elizabeth and King James, was made up of right learned Antiquaries, who as they undertook great matters, ſo their performances were anſwerable to their undertakings; and had they gone on, there is no doubt but we had had a complete account publiſhed of the moſt material things in our hiſtory and antiquities. What follows is an account of their diſſolution, which, becauſe it is ſomething different from that of Sir Henry, we ſhall give it in Mr Hearne's own words, thus. 'But it 'being ſuggeſted, that the ſaid Society would be preju-'dicial to certain great and learned bodies, for that 'reaſon the members thought fit to break it off. Nor 'were there wanting powerful men that proved enemies 'to them, and among other things they were pleaſed to 'alledge, that ſome of the Society were perſons not 'only diſaffected to, but really of a quite different per-'ſuaſion from the Church of England (14).'

[O] Occaſion to the reprinting and publiſhing his tract De non temerandis Eccleſiis in 1615] The whole title runs thus: De non temerandis Eccleſiis, Churches not to be violated. A Tract of the rights and reſpects due unto Churches, written to a Gentleman who, having an appropriate Parſonage, employed the Church to profane Uſes, and left the Pariſhioners uncertainly provided of divine Service in a pariſh there adjoyning. There can be no better proof of Sir Henry's Sincerity in this advice to his Uncle, than that which he gave from his own practice. For, being poſſeſſed of the Impropriation of Middleton in Norfolk, he took a Courſe to diſpoſe of it for the Augmentation of the Vicarage, and alſo ſome additions to Congham which lies near it. He never put up any of the rent to his own private uſes, but diſpoſed of it by the aſſiſtance of Mr Thorowgood, a neighbouring Clergyman, to whom he gave a power to augment the Vicar's portion, which was carefully performed; and, having a ſurpluſage in his hands, he waited an opportunity to purchaſe the Appropriation of Congham, to be added to the Miniſter there, where himſelf was Lord and Patron. The ſame Author informs us likewiſe, that, while Sir Henry Spelman lived, there came ſome unto him, almoſt every term at London, to conſult him how they might legally reſtore and diſpoſe of their Impropriations to the benefit of the Church; and there wanted not others that thanked him for his book, promiſing they would never purchaſe any appropriate parſonages to augment their Eſtates. Sir Ralph Hare, in particular, who was an intimate friend to Sir Henry, upon reading this book offered to reſtore a good Parſonage (the only one he had in his Eſtate) which he preſently performed, and, procuring a licence from the King, gave the perpetual advowſon to St John's college in Cambridge. Then follows the particular inſtance of Sir Roger Townſend, and ſeveral others, to which Dr Gibſon has added (15) what was then, in 1695, a late benefaction of this kind, made by Mrs Anne Saville, then living, and daughter of John Saville of Medley, Eſq; which Lands purchaſed the rectory of Ardwick in the Weſt riding of Yorkſhire, for which ſhe gave about 900l. and ſettled it in the hands of Truſtees for the uſe of the Church for ever, and this from a generous and pious principle, upon the reading of Sir Henry Spelman's treatiſe De non temerandis Eccleſiis. Mr Jeremy Stephens takes notice of ſeveral colleges in Oxford, who, being poſſeſſed of Impropriations, had taken a Courſe, by leſſening their fines upon renewal of the leaſes, to reſerve a good portion of their tythe Corn from their tenants, thereby to increaſe the Vicar's maintenance. But it may be queſtioned whether this was occaſioned by what Sir Henry Spelman had ſaid, ſo much as by K. James I's letter, ſent for this purpoſe, to the Univerſities in 1603 (16), and more particularly to the diſpoſition ſhewn by K. Charles I. to reſtore all ſuch Impropriations to the Church as were then in poſſeſſion of the Crown. The occaſion of reprinting and publiſhing this piece in 1615 is declared by the Printer, who, having printed it for the Author above two Years before, with no Intent to have it publiſhed, found it to be lately printed in Scotland (contrary, ſays he, both to the Author's and my Expectation) and dedicated by another man to the Biſhops and Clergy there, which I ſuppoſe, continues he, had the Author known, or once miſdoubted the ſequel, inſtead of De non temerandis Eccleſiis, he would have put another title, De non temerandis Scriptis alienis; wherefore I have, in the right as well of the Author as of myſelf, to whom the right of the ſole printing belonged, cauſed it to be reprinted (17). As Our Author omits no opportunity of doing honour to his Countryman Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, ſo in this tract [page 98. Edit. Ox. 1668.] he inſerts a paſſage from the ſecond part of his reports (18), where that Great Lawyer obſerves, that it is recorded in hiſtory, that there were, amongſt others, two grievous perſecutions; the one under Dioclefian, the other under Julian named the Apoſtata; for it is recorded, that the one of them (19) intending to have rooted out all Profeſſors and Preachers of the Word of God, occidit omnes preſbyteros. But, this notwithſtanding, religion flouriſhed, for ſanguis Martyrum eſt ſemen Eccleſiæ, the blood of the Martyrs is the ſeed of the Church, and this was a cruel and grievous perſecution. But the perſecution under the other (20) was more grievous and dangerous, quia, as the hiſtory ſaith, ipſum occidit preſbyterium, he deſtroyed the very order of prieſthood, for he robbed the church and ſpoiled ſpiritual perſons of their revenues, and took all things from them whereof they ſhould live. And upon this, in a ſhort time enſued great ignorance of true religion and the ſervice of God, and thereby great decay of Chriſtian profeſſion. For none will apply themſelves or their ſons, or any other that they have in charge, to the ſtudy of Divinity, when after long and painful ſtudy, they ſhall have nothing whereupon to live. The contraſt between theſe two perſecutions has been lately ſet in the ſtrongeſt light by Mr Warburton (21), now Biſhop of Glouceſter, who endeavours to ſhew, that the defeat of the leſs violent attempts of Julian to ruin Chriſtianity was a more ſignal atteſtation of its divine original, than that of turning the blood of the Martyrs into the ſeed of the Church, ſince the diſappointments that the Apoſtate continually met with in the purſuit of that, as he calls it, more artful method, threw him upon the daring and deſperate attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jeruſalem, which gave occaſion to the moſt remarkable miracle that had been wrought ſince the deſtruction of that that Temple in the defence of the Chriſtian religion. However, in juſtice to this writer it ought to be obſerved, that as he declares he has taken more pains than any writer had before him to prove Julian's defeat to be a miracle, ſo he acknowledges it was not the general opinion. We gladly alſo take this firſt opportunity of doing another piece of Juſtice to this Biſhop, by declaring, that ſince the letter at the end of Dr Joſeph Smith's Article was printed off, where it is ſaid, that his Lordſhip [then Mr Warburton] was introduced by the Biſhop of Saliſbury to Sir Thomas Hanmer, we have been ſince ſhewn a paſſage in his Lordſhip's preface to his edition of Shakeſpeare, where he aſſerts that Sir Thomas was introduced to him as a poor Critic, which, if we had then known, ſhould have been inſerted as a marginal note to the aforeſaid letter of Sir Thomas Hanmer. However, the difference between them may be eaſily adjuſted. We need only ſuppoſe (what is highly probable) that the ceremonial was conducted by the Biſhop of Saliſbury with ſuch a reſpectful addreſs to both, that each might well enough look upon the introduction to be made to himſelf.

[P] He wrote an Apology for this treatiſe.] This was wrote in anſwer to ſome reflections upon his book De non temerandis Eccleſiis by an unknown Author, who had called upon Sir Henry for a further explanation and defence of his opinion concerning the right to the ſet portion or quantum of Tythes, as alſo with reſpect to ſuch Parſonages as have Vicarages well endowed. Both thoſe articles Sir Henry excuſes himſelf from entering into at preſent. Though he had declared in the Epilogue to that work, that he then deſigned to ſhew his mind further, particularly on theſe two paſſages, having already ſpoke to both of them in his larger work of Tythes, to which he had referred in an advertiſement before this De non temerandis Eccleſiis. In the Appendix to the ſecond edition of which book, written about the ſame year with this Apology, he obſerves 'that the argument had many adverſaries, not only of 'the Laity, but of the Churchmen themſelves. All 'were not pleaſed with this form of maintenance, others 'not ſatisfied how it is due. Some take Scripture in 'one ſenſe, ſome in another. Thus he that cometh 'upon the ſtage is the object and ſubject of every 'man's opinion. To ſatisfy all I labour not, ſays he, 'but to the worthier ſort I would perform what I could. 'To theſe latter ſort, ſome of whom had objected to 'his application of the 12th verſe of the 83d Pſalm 'only to the ſanctified things of the Jews, which they 'ſaid were ſpoken of all the houſes and cities in general, 'he had given his reaſon et fidei et facti, which becauſe 'it had ſatisfied them, he printed it in this Appendix.' The Author, to whom the Apology now under conſideration is directed, was, it ſeems, diſpleaſed with him for paying ſo much reſpect to Churches, and particularly for applying the word Eccleſia to a material Church, urging that the term belongs to an aſſembly or congregation: this Sir Henry takes notice of in his Gloſſary, under the article Eccleſia, producing ſome inſtances of the uſe of that word in ancient Authors, to defend his acceptation of it.

[Q] A Latin Epiſtle to Mr Carew.] That Gentleman had objected to Sir Henry's arguments againſt Impropriations, that the Clergy themſelves [in the Biſhops] had conſented to it in paſſing the Act of the 27th year of Henry VIII; to which he anſwers in this Epiſtle, that in the firſt place he could not but agree with Baronius, who in his anſwer to Cardinal Aſcham, had maintained, that the Church had no power to ordain any thing againſt itſelf, Eccleſiam nihil poſſe in ſe ſtatuere h. e. in ſuam perniciem cum Baronio Aſcanio Cardinali reſpondente in ſententiam iniero. However, he endeavoured to prove that it was his opinion the Biſhops did not conſent in that Act to the taking away of parochial tythes, which was not the intent of the Act. Mihi autem videtur cum de abolendis monaſteriis cogitaret Senatus ille Conſultus (an. 27 Henrici Octavi) nihil etiam tunc in animo habuiſſe de tollendis parochianis decimis prædiiſve, ſed de his tantum egiſſe, quæ ipſis cœnobiis inhærebant. Et ſi quis id in cornu haberet fœni, latuiſſe hoc opinor ſanctos Patres, qui Concilio aderant. In illo enim Actu ne verbum quidem de parochianis decimis, nec de Eccleſiis prædiiſve parochialibus, ſed nec de ipſis quas vocant appropriatis. Cum vero in vulgus jam exiiſſet Actus ille Parliamentarius, reperintque omnia demoliri et vi eripi, e Juriſconſultorum prodiit interpretatione ut præda hoc etiam in caſſes Regios redigeretur: Partita ergo Ea demum inter regni Nobiles, neceſſario tandem habitum eſt, ut ſubalternis corroboraretur legibus.

[R] He ſtruck a remarkable Circle in the map of Norfolk.] This is in the eighth chapter of his Hiſtory of Sacrilege, where he tells us he deſcribed with a pair of compaſſes, in the map of Norfolk, a circle of twelve miles in the ſemidiamiter, according to the ſcale of the map, placing the center about the chief ſeat of the Yelvertons. Within this circle and the borders of it were incloſed the manſion-houſes of about twenty-four families of gentlemen, and the ſite of as many monaſteries, all ſtanding together at the time of the diſſolution. He then obſerved, that the gentlemen's ſeats continued at that day in their own families and names. But the monaſteries had flung out their owners, with their names and families (all of them ſave two) thrice at leaſt, and ſome of them four, five, or ſix times, not only by failure of iſſue or ordinary ſale, but very often by grievous accidents and misfortunes. He obſerved yet further, that though the ſeats of theſe monaſteries were in the fatteſt and choiceſt places of all that part of the country (for our anceſtors, ſays he, like Abel, offered the beſt unto God,) yet it hath not happened, that any of them, to my knowledge, or any other in all this country, hath been the permanent habitation of any family of note; but, like deſolate places, left to the Farmers and Huſbandmen. No man almoſt adventuring to build or dwell upon them, for dread of infelicity that purſueth them. Among the Abbies contained in this remarkable circle, are thoſe of Blackborough and Wrongey, the leaſe of which was purchaſed by Sir Henry, and it is not improbable that purchaſe gave occaſion to this his ſo uncommon a curioſity. What makes it ſtill more credible is, that about the time of drawing it, there ſeems to have been a hearing of his cauſe before my Lord Chancellor. For after Wrenham had exhibited a bill againſt him, as is mentioned in Remark [L], the ſuit proceeded to a hearing between Wrenham and the Fiſhers, when the Chancellor decreed it againſt the Fiſhers, and all claiming under them. This explains an expreſſion of Sir Henry, in his Epiſtle to Mr Carew, written in 1615. Otii deſiderio captus Londinum veni pace vero mihi videbar exoptatiſſima fruiturus, qua Muſarum limina ex voto delibarem. Sed Eu! nova in me rerum tempeſtas, nova litium moles inopinata proruit, qua luctantem adhuc varieque agitatum neſcio quouſque detinuerit: Poetæ autem illud teneo, Dabit Deus his quos finem. Here he alludes to the two contrary decrees of Lord Chancellor Egerton; by the firſt Sir Henry was encouraged to purchaſe this leaſe, which was taken from him by the laſt. Yet his fortune was ſtill harder afterwards by the next decree. For the Lord Chancellor Egerton going out of his place, is ſucceeded by Sir Francis Bacon, who reverſeth the former decree, and decreed it back again to Sir Edward Fiſher; and by another decree giveth to him Sir Henry Spelman's leaſe, without calling or hearing Sir Henry. This, it muſt be owned, was ſingularly unlucky, to loſe his leaſe in conſequence of a decree made in favour of it. But the matter did not end here: Wrenham complaineth in a petition to King James, and taxeth the Lord Chancellor Bacon with corruption and injuſtice. The King himſelf peruſeth all the proceedings, and approveth the Lord Bacon's decree; and Wrenham is cenſured for his ſcandal to loſe his ears in the pillory, &c. A parliament followeth in the nineteenth year of King James; both Wrenham and Sir Henry Spelman ſeverally complain there. It is found that the Lord Chancellor Bacon had, for theſe decrees, of Sir Edward Fiſher a ſuit of hangings of eighty-nine pounds. The Lord Chancellor for this, among other ſuch crimes, is depoſed. The Biſhop of Lincoln is ſet in his room. The ſuits are again in agitation before him, between Wrenham and Fiſher; and Sir Henry Spelman, by a petition to the King, obtaineth a review of the proceedings againſt him, upon which a recompence is given him by a decree againſt Sir Edward Fiſher. The Biſhop of Lincoln is removed by King Charles I, and the Lord Coventry made Lord Keeper, a view of ſhewing the unhappineſs that attended the Lay Poſſeſſors of Abbey Lands (m). In 1621, an Apology for Archbiſhop Abbot, touching the death of Peter Hawkins the Keeper, wounded in the Park of Bramſil, July 24, came into the hands of Sir Henry on the 28th of October, and he wrote an anſwer to it on the 19th, wherein he endeavours to ſhew, that the Archbiſhop not only contracted an irregularity by that Act, but alſo intimates, that he could not be effectually reinſtated without ſome extraordinary form of a new conſecration (n) [S]. All this while he continued in the eager purſuit of his grand Inquiry into the foundation of our laws. The chief diſcouragement he found in theſe ſtudies was the vaſt number of obſolete words which were hard to be underſtood, and yet are ſo important, that the drift and meaning of the whole ſentence depends upon them. However he went forward, and whenever he met with any ſuch word, he ſet it down in its proper order, with a diſtinct reference to the place, till by degrees he had collected a variety of inſtances, and, by comparing the ſeveral paſſages where the ſame word occurred, he was able to give a tolerable conjecture of the true ſignification of it. After he had made a conſiderable collection of this kind, and obſerved how by this means the reading of the old hiſtorians became every day more eaſy, he began to digeſt his materials, and from the ſeveral quotations to draw a judgment of the ſtrict acceptation of each word in the reſpective ages when it was uſed. But, though a number of inſtances gave him good ſatisfaction as to the words or terms, yet, finding that many of our laws ſince the conqueſt were taken from the conſtitutions of the Saxons, and that many obſolete terms in our Latin hiſtorians are by whom the other differences are at laſt compounded, and the grand leaſe divided into many parcels. Wrenham, that raiſed this tempeſt, is never the richer by it, but liveth a Projector. Sir Edward Fiſher, of 8000 l. (as Bedon, his ſervant, proteſteth) ſpent in the ſuit, is conſumed, and not to be ſeen of every man. Sir Henry Spelman, a great Loſer, and not beholden to Fortune; yet happy in this, that he is out of the briars; but eſpecially in this, that he hereby firſt diſcerned the infelicity of conſecrated places.

[S] An Anſwer to the Apology for Abbot.] Our Author's zeal for the ſacred honour of the Church flames out no where with ſo much warmth, as in this piece. He produces ſeveral canons which abſolutely forbid hunting to the clergy, and particularly the uſe of the croſs-bow (uſed by the Archbiſhop in this action,) 'that 'deadly engine, ſays he, which imagineth miſchief as 'a law, whoſe force a man cannot mitigate, as in other 'weapons, and is properly numbered among the inſtru-'ments of war, and therefore by a multitude of canons 'prohibited to clergymen.' He obſerves, likewiſe, that the uſe of this engine has not the advantage of exerciſe common to all others, ſince every limb and feature in the body, even the eye itſelf, the minuteſt of all others, is kept abſolutely without any motion at all. He likewiſe takes notice, that Archbiſhop Abbot muſt needs have been very unſkilful in handling the croſs-bow, otherwiſe this misfortune could not have happened to him, as appeared by the ſituation of Hawkins with reſpect to him, and the deer; which he takes to be an aggravating circumſtance in the offence. The Apology having alledged the Charta de Foreſta in the Archbiſhop's favour, our Author very tartly, in his Reply, obſerves, that the Charta de Foreſta is Clero lachrymabile nomen; for the firſt breach that ever was made on the freedom of Clergymen, and which gave paſſage to all that followed, aroſe from the occaſion of Clergymen's hunting in Foreſts, which Henry II, greatly diſcontented with, never reſted till, by aſſent of the Pope's Legate, Hugo Petreleonis, he obtained a law, in the twenty-firſt year of his reign, ann. 1157, to convene them before ſecular Judges, and there to puniſh them. The ſtatute of Richard II. had been likewiſe alledged by the Apologiſt, which only forbids perſons not poſſeſſed of 10 l. per ann. from keeping a greyhound, and thence concludes, that Clergymen of that worth are not excluded, and conſequently may legally hunt, at leaſt, with greyhounds. In conſequence of this argument, Sir Henry diſtinguiſhes three faculties in the perſon of a Biſhop; 1. his ſpiritual function, wherein he is a Biſhop; 2. his legal ability, wherein he is a Layman, and has liberty to contract; 3. his temporal dignity, wherein he is a Baron and Peer, and poſſeſſeth their privileges. Hence it appears what portion the Church had in the Biſhops, what the Commonwealth, and what the King. When the King granted temporal lands, they take them as Lay-Barons do; yet they could not uſe them otherwiſe than might conſiſt with their ſpiritual function. Hence notwithſtanding they are not forbid, if poſſeſſed of 10 l. per ann. to keep a greyhound by the ſtatute law, yet they are forbid to hunt by the canon law. The Apologiſt had further urged an ancient record, whereby the Biſhop of Rocheſter, at his death, was to render the Archbiſhop of Canterbury his kennel of hounds as a mortuary, whereof, as he was credibly informed, the law taketh notice for the King ſede vacante under the name of muta canum, or mulctura. For the Record, ſays King Harry, that relateth, &c. I muſt, ſays Sir Henry (as it is in the law,) demand oyer of the record, we ſhall otherwiſe ſpend many words in vain: but that dogs ſhould be given for a mortuary, is againſt all likelihood; for a mortuary is an offering given by him that dieth unto the Church, in recompence of his tythes forgotten; and it is a plain text, Deut. xxviii. 18. Non offeres mercedem proſtibuli nec pretium canis in domo Domini. But if there be no other words to ſignify a kennel of hounds, than muta canum and mulctura, the expoſition may be doubtful, though it comes really near it. Frederic II, Emperor, in the prologue to his ſecond book De venatione, ſpeaking of a hawk's mue, ſays, Domicula quæ dicitur muta, following the Italian vulgar, which cometh a mutando, becauſe the hawk doth then change her coat (21); and for the affinity between dogs and hawks, it may be κυλακρεσικῶς, transferred to a dog-kennel. But all that may have dogs, may not uſe them; as I may have a coat of cloth of gold, but not wear it, notwithſtanding the ſtatute of Apparel. Beſides, religious perſons were in ancient times driven to keep dog-kennels for the King's hounds. For Rad. Niger in Ann.—ſaith, that King Henry II. Abbates Hippodromos & canum Cuſtodes fecit. Laſtly, whereas the Apologiſt would juſtify the Archbiſhop from the practice of his Predeceſſors, eſpecially Cranmer and Whitgift, and more particularly the latter of theſe, who, ſays he, killed twenty bucks in Lord Cobham's park, near Canterbury, in one Journey, uſing hounds, greyhounds, or his bow at his pleaſure, although he never ſhot well. Sir Henry very alertly replies, that this argument only proves the offence to be grown inveterate, and therefore God had now ſent this misfortune to remind them of it. After all, he concludes, that the caſe of that reverend and moſt worthy perſon deſerved commiſeration and moſt tender handling, for who can prevent ſuch unexpected caſualties? Yet may the conſequence prove ſo miſchievous, both to himſelf, and thoſe that are to receive their conſecration from him, as of neceſſity it muſt be carefully lookt into, and provided for. And becauſe, ſays he, we are fallen into a caſe, wherein perhaps ſome extraordinary conſecration may be required, I will relate two which I have met with. The firſt is of Eadmer, a monk of Canterbury in the time of Henry I, who being elected to be Biſhop of St Andrew's in Scotland, then in the dioceſe of York, was conſecrated by taking the Staff from the Altar, which had been laid ſolemnly thereon; and William Wallaſton, the good Biſhop of Worceſter, both reſigned his Biſhopric, by laying the Staff thereof upon the Shrine of St Edward the Confeſſor, by the agreement of a Council holden under Lanfranc, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in ann. 1095, and in like manner received the ſame from thence in the preſence of King William, Lanfranc, and many others; if we may believe Matthew Paris * not without a miracle.

(21) Sir Henry refers to this paſſage under the words Muta Canem in his Gloſſary.

of Saxon original, he despaired of accomplishing his design for want of understanding that language; at least he was certain, that the knowledge of it must needs lead him to a clearer interpretation of many obscure passages, and enable him, throughout the whole work, to deliver his opinion with greater perspicuity and certainty. This language was not to be learned at that time without great difficulty; little assistance was to be expected in that age upon the subject of a language which few people regarded [T]. However he set about the task, and made himself a tolerable master of it. And thus, after he had made large collections, and acquired a pretty good knowledge of the Saxon tongue, he resolved to go on with his undertaking. But his modesty not suffering him to rely upon his own judgment, he printed one or two sheets by way of specimen about the year 1621 (o). These he communicated to his friends to have their opinion of his design. And he was encouraged in it by the most learned persons of that age; at home, by Mr Camden, Archbishop Usher, Bishop Williams, then Lord Keeper, Sir Robert Cotton, and Mr Selden; abroad, by Peireskius, Rigaltius, Salmasius, and others. He was likewise assisted in it by Cowel, Skene, and Lydia at home; and abroad by Bignonius, Meursius, and Lindenbrogius; whose favours he gratefully acknowledges. Upon these encouragements he prepared part of it for the press, and offered it to Mr. Bill the King's Printer. He was very moderate in his demands, desiring only five pounds in consideration of his labour, and that sum too to be paid him in books: but the Bookseller refusing to give that small rate for the copy, he ventured to print part of it, to the end of the letter L, at his own charge (p). This he published in 1626, under the title of Archæologus, &c. [U]. In 1627, he compiled a history of the civil affairs of the kingdom from the conquest to Magna Charta, taken from our best historians, and generally set down in their own words [W]; and the following year he was very active

[T] Few people then regarded the Saxon Language.] The Bishop of London tells us (22), that Sir Henry had neither the directions of grammar or dictionary, as we, says he, at this day are accommodated with, both very accurate in their kinds. By which he must mean, that Sir Henry had not so good helps in this kind, as were to be had at the time of writing his Life by Mr Gibson. For it is certain, and could not but be well known to that writer, who was so great a proficient in the Saxon language, that something of this kind had been wrote in Sir Henry's time, as particularly a Vocabularium Saxonicum, or A Saxon English Dictionary, by Laurence Nowel (23), and could have hardly escaped the diligence with which Sir Henry applied to this Study. For though this manuscript, which was written in 1567, lay in private hands in the time of Sir Henry Spelman, yet the author, Mr Nowel, must have come to his knowledge, as he was Tutor to the famous William Lambard in the Saxon language, and particularly because Mr Camden (24), our Author's old acquaintance, in his Britannia, the last edition of which by himself was published in 1607, mentions this Laurence Nowel, and says, that he was a man of good note for his singular learning, and was the first in our age that brought into use again and revived the language of our Ancestors, the Saxon, which, through disuse lay forlorn and buried in oblivion. It is true, it is not hence certain that this manuscript did ever come to the knowledge of Sir Henry Spelman; neither, I presume, did Mr Gibson mean to take upon him to assert, it did not, notwithstanding his words seem to imply so much; and for that reason it is, that the above stricture is made upon them, to prevent the Reader of them from being led thereby into too hasty a conclusion. The remark which Mr Gibson makes afterwards, though I think, says he, Sir Henry never perfectly conquered it [the Saxon tongue], may undoubtedly be depended upon, and is closed with a very pertinent and just observation, that yet under so many great inconveniencies, it is a greater wonder, that he attained so good a knowledge in it, than that he did not make himself absolute master of it.

[U] He published under the title of Archæologus.] In an advertisement prefixed to the book, he gives the reason of his chusing this title rather than Glossarium, as we commonly call it: a glossary, strictly speaking, being no more than a bare explication of words, whereas this treats more especially of things, and contains entire discourses, and dissertations upon several heads. Before this edition is the following remarkable dedication:

Deo, Ecclesiæ, Literarum Reipublicæ
Sub protestatione de addendo, retrahendo, corrigendo, poliendo,
Prout opus fuerit, et consultius videbitur,
Deo clementissime annuente,
HENRICUS SPELMANNUS
Omni supplex humilitate, D. D. (25).

(25) This dedication being omitted in the editions of 1664 and 1687, we thought proper, with Mr Gibson, to preserve it, as a mark of our Author's modesty and love of truth.

Mr Gibson tells us why Sir Henry went no farther than the letter L, is not known, nor, says he, has Sir Henry so much as hinted the cause of it, either in his Preface, or in any part of his works, as we know of. M. du Fresne, who very much laments that he did not publish the second part himself, fancies that his design of publishing the English Councils, might be the occasion of his breaking off in the middle of his Glossary; and it has been affirmed by others, that he stopt at the letter M, because he had said something under Magna Charta and Maximum Consilium, that his friends were afraid might give offence. This opinion the Bishop of London, Dr Gibson, agrees with, and observes further, that it was not a season to speak freely, either of the prerogative of the King, or the liberty of the subject, both which would, upon many occasions, fall in his way. Yet after all, the true reason why Sir Henry went no further in the impression, was very plainly hinted by him (though not in any of his works) to Sir William Dugdale afterwards, who about the year 1637 acquainted him, that many learned men were very desirous to see the second part published, and requested of him to gratify the world with the work intire. Upon which Sir Henry shewed him the second part, as also the improvements which he had made in the first, which was interleaved with blank leaves, wherein he had added and altered much, as also in the second part in manuscript; but withal told him the discouragements he had met with in publishing the first part, mentioned in the text; and indeed so little was the work regarded at its first coming out, as the printer Bill had rightly presaged, that eleven years after, the greatest part of the impression remained unsold, till in the year 1637 two booksellers, viz. Stephens and Meredith, took it off his hands. Upon his death all his papers came into the hands of his eldest son, Sir John Spelman, a gentleman who had sufficient abilities to complete what his father had begun, if death had not prevented him. After the restoration of King Charles II, Archbishop Sheldon and Lord Chancellor Hyde inquired of Sir William Dugdale what became of the second part of the Glossary, or whether it was ever finished. He told them, that it was finished by the Author, and that the copy was in the hands of Mr Charles Spelman, grandson to Sir Henry. They expressed their desire that it might be printed, and that he would prevail upon Mr Spelman to do it, which he did, and Mr Spelman offered it to the Booksellers; but finding they would give nothing for the copy, and not being willing to do it at his own expence, the two Lords procured a good number of subscriptions, and referred it to Sir William Dugdale to agree with the Printer to perform the work, who willingly undertook the management of that part.

July 7, 1640. Many of theſe inſtruments are printed in the ſecond volume of the Councils, and it has been ſince printed by Dr David Wilkins, at the end of his edition of the Saxon Laws.

[X] Upon which occaſion he wrote his treatiſe De ſepultura.] The particular fact that immediately gave occaſion to it, was this. A complaint was brought before the Commiſſioners, of a Churchman, ſince deceaſed, and his Clerk, that came together to the houſe of a perſon in their pariſh, then newly dead, and ſpeaking with the executors, would not ſuffer the body to be brought out of the houſe till he had 14 l. paid to him and the pariſh-officers, according to the bill of particulars then ſhewed unto them; nor could the executors compound with them for any abatement more than 10 s. in the Clerk's ſhare, and paid them thereupon 13 l. 10 s. We here ſee ſeveral ſuch corrupt practices of the Clergy in thoſe times in extorting their fees, which our Author has not ſpared to cenſure very ſeverely. He ſhews, from the Canon-law, that the Clergy had no claim to any money, either for the grave, or for the office of burial. For this he alledges ſeven different Councils, where it is declared, 1. To be a vice, and a vice of Covetouſneſs; a bad cuſtom that may be ſaid to be moſt irreligious, as a ſelling of the Church; a cauſe of joy to the Parſon when men die, a reaping of commodity out of the carcaſſes of the dead, and the ſorrow of the living. 2. A diſcourteſy to the dead by him that muſt die, a ſelling of earth by him that is earth, a ſelling of that is none of his own, a ſelling of what was given freely to give freely, a denying of burial. 3. A thing too horrible, that bringeth the portion of Gehazi upon the offender, that is, the brand of Simony, as the Gloſſary expounds it; a Curſe, an uncleanneſs, and cauſe of ſeparation from common Society. And, laſtly, as maladies are the moſt grievous and contagious that continue longeſt, ſo in theſe Councils the Fathers conclude this to be ſo much the more grievous, by how much the longer it hath continued, and declare it to be abolendæ conſuetudinis perverſitas, the perverſity of a cuſtom that muſt be aboliſhed. He then proceeds to give the ſum of their cenſure, which is, 1. That nothing be exacted, or required for any ſepulture; which words the Gloſſary declares to comprehend the ground or place of burial, and the miniſtry of the Prieſt or Parſon about the ſame: and in ſome of the Councils it is particularly ſo expreſſed. 2. That all cuſtoms for ſuch taking, are evil, impious, and void. 3. That the offence in taking is Simony. 4. That the cognizance thereof belongeth to the Biſhop of the place. 5, That gifts of piety for the uſe of the Curch may notwithſtanding be taken. 6. That none ſhall be buried in the body of the Church. He diſtinguiſhes ground into three kinds, 1. Locus purus, ſecular ground, never uſed in burial, for which a fee may be taken; 2. Locus religioſus, when once any corpſe has been buried in it, after which, by the Canons, nothing may be taken for burial. Some ſuch places, ſays he, I ſuppoſe are about this city, adjoining to Churchyards for enlarging thereof: and ſome of them, for which the Owners do take a yearly rent of the pariſh that uſeth it, let it unto them to ſow dead men's carcaſſes in, as they were to ſow corn, and as though the carcaſſes would grow, like the Fable of Cadmus, and bring them a crop to pay the rent with: this the Canons do merely forbid, as doth alſo the Civil law and law of humanity, the Fathers, the Councils, and St Jerome, in the caſe of Ephrem. For my own part, continues he, I take it to be a kind of uſury, to let that for money, whereof the hirer can make no kind of profit. 3. Locus ſacratus, is that which is ſettled by the Donor upon God and the Church, as Churches and Churchyards, the fee ſimple of which is in nubibus and abeyance. He then proceeds to ſhew ſeveral inſtances of the exaction of theſe fees, as follows. Give me leave, ſays he, to preſent unto you what I find in a Veſtry conſtitution, lately made (26), and ſubſcribed by the Churchwardens, with twenty-three more of the aſſembly, confirmed by the Biſhop, approved by his Chancellor, declared to be a laudable cuſtom of that pariſh, and in teſtimony thereof, entered as a ſolemn Act in the principal regiſtry of the Lord Biſhop of the dioceſe, and finally ratified with the Chancellor's hand and ſeal of office, I may ſay, vidi pudetque vi-

dere (27). Whoſoever will be buried in the chancel ſhall pay to the Parſon as ſhall be agreed . . . . for interring the corpſe. In the iſles of the chancel. To the Churchwardens for the ground, 2 s. 8 d. To the Parſon for interring the corpſe, 6 s. 8 d. In the body of the Church, 20 s. To the Parſon, &c. 6 s. 8 d. In the Churchyard. To the Parſon, 26 s. 8 d. and the ſame for every child under ſeven years. Theſe if coffined, if uncoffined, 2 s. 4 d. each. All theſe double to every ſtranger. In another pariſh I find 6 s. 8 d. to the Parſon for the duty of burial in the Church, when himſelf doth it not, but his Curate, who for his pains, by the ſame certificate, 10 s. beſides other, 10 s. for a ſermon, though there be none. Upon this Sir Henry thus exclaims. The grave is the only inheritance that we are certainly born to, the inheritance which our grandmother hath left to deſcend to us in gavelkind among all her children; ſhall one enter and hold another out, and drive him to pay a fine pro adeunda hereditate, as they ſay in the Feudal Law, or pro ingreſſu habendo, as we now ſay in the Common Law? Is our tenure baſe, like a Copy-hold, ad voluntatem Domini, or not rather noble by frank almoigne, free from all payments and ſervices? And how do the dead reſt from their labours, if they be taxed with payments? how go they to their grave in peace, if they pay for their peace? laborat ære alieno qui debito tenetur; and his peace is not worth thanks, if he muſt pay for it; he payeth for his peace, if he payeth for the place where his peace cannot otherwiſe be had; he payeth for his reſt, if he may not enjoy it without payment; he payeth for his inheritance, if he cannot enter into it without paying a fine pro ingreſſu, his inheritance ſettled upon him by the great charter, terram dedit filiis hominum, a royal gift, but as it is uſed, male collocatum, ill diſtributed; the poor man, alas! hath nothing of all this but the grave, and may not now have that, unleſs he pay for it. Well, to whom ſhould he pay? reaſon anſwers, if to any, to the Owners of the land; true, but the Owner of the ſoil was the founder of the Church, and he, out of piety and charity, gave the Church freely for prayer, the Churchyard freely for burial, abſque allo tenemento, without any rent, any ſervice, any reſervation; nor could he if he would have done otherwiſe, for the Canons would not ſuffer him; not, though he were the abſolute Owner, yet if he had reſerved but a pepper-corn out of a grave, it had been not only void, but execrable. A pepper-corn? what talk we of a pepper-corn? no ground in the kingdom is now ſold ſo dear as a grave, that poor little Cabinet, that is not commonly above ſix feet long, and a foot and a half in breadth, where is no room to ſtir either hand or foot, and the roof (as St Bernard ſays) laid ſo low, as it toucheth the noſe: this ſilly cabinet is ſometimes in the Churchyard ſold to the prieſtman for 16 d. ſometimes for 2 s. 8 d. ſometimes 3 s. ſometimes 6 s. In the Church it is at 10 s. 20 s. 40 s. 3 l. 4 l. 5 l. yea 10 l.; and yet the purchaſer has no aſſurance of it, but is conſtrained to hold ad voluntatem Domini, or is a tenant for ſeven or ten years, within which term, he is ſometimes caſt out, and another put into his room; no writ of quare ejecit infra terminum lieth for him. Shall I tell what I was aſhamed to hear. A grave or burying place, let to farm at 20 s. a year, the rent duly paid for divers years, and being then behind, the Parſon threatened to uncaſe the corpſe, by pulling down the monument, if he were not ſatisfied, and ſhame was ſo far from him, as he ſpared not to defend it even before the Commiſſioners; to whom it was teſtified, that another had paid 40 l. for one grave in ten years, by 10 l. at a time; a ſtrange thing to me, what to others I know not: but I ſuppoſe cinctutis non exaudita Cethegis, the oldeſt living has not heard the like. Is it not time that his Majeſty ſhould do as he doth? that, like Joſias, he ſhould reform the Temple, the Houſe of God? God be bleſſed, that put it into his heart, and grant him well to finiſh the work in hand, being ſo noble, ſo pious, and ſo full of neceſſity. He obſerves, that the Clergy grounded themſelves much upon a law of Canutus the Dane, cited by Mr Fox, which would be a very good voucher, if true; but Mr Fox, he ſhews, has given a wrong tranſlation of that law in theſe words. It is meet and right that no funeral money be given for opening the earth; therefore if any body of corpſe be carried from his own pariſh unto another, tion of Biſhop (afterwards Archbiſhop) Laud, one of the Commiſſioners for that purpoſe, and their power extended to all the Courts and Offices of England. To this buſineſs he gave his conſtant attendance for many years with great integrity as well as application; and the Government was ſo ſenſible of his good ſervices, that the Council procured his Majeſty's writ of Privy ſeal for three hundred pounds to be preſented to him, not as a full recompence (for ſo they declared) but only as an occaſional remembrance, till they ſhould have an opportunity of doing ſomething for him, that might be a more ſuitable conſideration for his diligence in that and other public affairs. In reality, this Attendance obliged him to neglect his own private affairs, to the great prejudice of his family; and his eldeſt Son, Sir John Spelman, repreſented to the Privy Council, how much his Father's eſtate had ſuffered by it, appealing, for a proof of his great pains therein, to the knowledge of ſeveral of their Lordſhips, to the Journals of that commiſſion, and to his papers and collections relating to the ſame (r). In the mean time Sir Henry ſpared no pains in carrying on and improving his Gloſſary; and before that work was quite finiſhed he entered upon another, which was The Hiſtory of the Engliſh Councils. To this he was particularly encouraged by Dr George Abbot and Dr William Laud, ſucceſſively Archbiſhops of Canterbury, and above all by the moſt learned Primate of Armagh, Archbiſhop Uſher. He was likewiſe much incited in this deſign by what he had heard from Dr Matthew Wren, firſt Biſhop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, who told him, that Dr Andrews, the then late Biſhop of Winchester, had been reflecting with great concern upon the diligence of the Germans, French, Italians, and other nations, in publiſhing the hiſtories and decrees of their reſpective ſynods, whilſt the Engliſh, who had greater plenty of evidences, both in Eccleſiaſtical and Civil affairs, than any of their neighbours, had not ſo much as attempted any thing of that kind. Upon this occaſion he deſired Dr Wren, that, for the honour of our religion and the ſervice of our nation, he would think of ſuch an undertaking; and, leſt it ſhould prove over tedious for any ſingle hand, to engage a competent number of perſons of ſufficient Learning and Judgment to aſſiſt in the work. That thereupon he [Dr Wren] promiſed to conſider of it; and had proceeded in it, but that the Biſhop excuſed him, upon an aſſurance that Sir Henry Spelman was engaged in the ſame deſign. Sir Henry, having been told this paſſage by the Biſhop of Norwich, did with great modeſty expreſs his concern at taking the work out of much abler hands: but, ſince it had happened ſo, he did not any longer look upon it as a matter of choice whether he ſhould go forward or no, but thought himſelf bound in juſtice to make the beſt ſatisfaction he was able, for depriving the Church of the joint labours of ſo many learned men (s). As ſoon as he had digeſted the materials into ſome form, he communicated the manuſcript to Archbiſhop Abbot a little before the death of that Prelate [Y], who earneſtly deſired him to prepare the work for the preſs another, the money of the burial ſhall be due to his own pariſh Church, whereas the ſenſe is: It is juſt that the ſoul-ſhot, or money given for praying for the ſoul, be always paid at the opening of the grave, and if the corpſe be buried elſewhere than in its own pariſh, yet let the ſoul-ſhot be paid to the Church to which it belongeth. Hence it appears how this grave ſilver, or money for graves, grew up to be taken. It was firſt given for praying for ſouls, and ſuch like; but that being aboliſhed, and given to the King, the Parſon, it ſeemeth, taketh it for the grave: and to ſay what I think, do now take that which was given for praying for the ſoul, under their fee for their office of burying the corpſe, and thoſe for the grave beſides; for they take them both. After all, he aſſerts the Parſon's right to a fee in the following words. Somewhat, ſays he, doubtleſs, may be due to the Parſon upon the burial of the dead; for why elſe ſhould the Canons provide, that the bodies of thoſe which die be not carried to burial out of their pariſhes, leſt the Prieſt ſhould thereby loſe what is due unto him; and the Canon ad Apoſtolicum approves of godly and laudable cuſtoms, theſe are not uſually defined, but according as devotion hath begotten them in any pariſh. My drift is only to ſhew, that they muſt not be thoſe now in uſe, to take money for the grave, or office of burial; for thoſe cannot be ſaid to be godly and laudable cuſtoms, ſince ſo many Canons have declared them to be vicious, impious, injurious, irreligious, too too horrible, and the more grievous by their longer cuſtom and continuance, and therefore damneth and annulleth them by expreſs words, how ancient and how general ſoever they be; yet laudable cuſtoms are due, ſuch as this, that for every one that dies there, ſo much as hath uſually been given unto the Parſon or the Church. This it is will hold water. But, I fear me, none of our Parſons can maintain it in this form. It cannot be a mortuary, for that is provided for by expreſs ſtatute of the twenty-firſt year of Henry VIII. c. 6. turning them into a certain ſum of money, and forbids any thing to be taken otherwiſe, either for mortuary or corpſe. Other laudable cuſtoms, 1. for lights in the Church; 2. praying for the ſoul; the Parſon, it may be, doth enjoy it, not mentioning the original, and ſo it behoveth him to do, leſt the King be intitled to it by the ſtatute of ſuperſtitious uſes. But I ſay no more. It hath fallen upon me to be an unworthy member of that moſt noble and moſt gracious commiſſion of exacted fees and innovated offices, and thereby to have notice by certificate of divers Perſons of worth, and chief Pariſhioners of the greateſt pariſhes in London; yet none of them hitherto, to my remembrance, hath made any ſuch claim, nor know I how they ſhould approve it, if they did. It is hatched of late within this city of London againſt the Canons of the Church. Upon the whole it is obſervable, that Sir Henry at laſt comes to this concluſion; that they may take this money as a cuſtom to be given for the uſe of the Church, and that is the footing upon which it ſtands at this day.

[Y] A litrle before that Prelate's death.] To the firſt volume of the Councils is prefixed, the following atteſtation. *Atteſtatio Cl. Viri Edm. Scot Eq. Aurat Rev. in Chriſto Patris Dom. Scot. 13 Feb. 1633. Here we find the Archbiſhop both ſaw and approved this work before it was finiſhed; and hence, by a paſſage in another work of Sir Henry, it ſeems not improbable that this happened in 1632. In which year he was at Lambeth with the Archbiſhop, as appears from his Hiſtory and Fate of Sacrilege, where he tells us (29), that he dined with the Archbiſhop at Lambeth, Nov. 13, 1632, and had much diſcourſe with him. Hence, by the bye, likewiſe, we ſee the Archbiſhop either knew nothing of Sir Henry's anſwer to the preſs as ſoon as poſſible, that the public might ſpeedily be poſſeſſed of ſuch a valuable treaſure. Thus encouraged, he proceeded, and branched his undertaking into three parts, aſſigning an entire volume to each diviſion: (1) From the firſt plantation of Chriſtianity to the coming in of the Conqueror in 1066; (2) From the Norman conqueſt to the caſting off the Pope's Supremacy by K. Henry VIII. (3) The Hiſtory of the Reformed Engliſh Church from Henry VIII. to his own time. Every one of theſe Sir Henry expreſsly and ſeparately declares that he had completed; and the firſt volume, containing the firſt of theſe heads, was publiſhed by him in 1639 [Z], about two years before his death, with his own annotations upon the more difficult places. He had been brought, about a year or two before, into the acquaintance of Mr (afterwards Sir William) Dugdale, who then, at the requeſt of ſeveral learned men, informed him, that the ſecond part of his Gloſſary was much deſired by them; whereupon he ſhewed Mr Dugdale the ſecond part, as alſo the improvements which he had made in the firſt; but withal told him the diſcouragements he had met with in publiſhing that which we have already mentioned. However, Meſſrs Stephens and Meredith, two bookſellers in St Paul's church-yard, did this year, 1677, purchaſe the remainder of the impreſſion then lying upon his hands (t). In proſecuting that work [the Gloſſary] he went to Cambridge, in order to conſult ſeveral Saxon manuſcripts in that Univerſity, eſpecially ſome in the public Library. In this buſineſs the Principal Librarian, Mr Abraham Wheloc of Clarehall, very readily gave him all the aſſiſtance that lay in his power (u). This gentleman was Profeſſor likewiſe of Arabic, and knew ſo much at leaſt then of the Saxon, that he could read it to Sir Henry, which was of great uſe to him, being now almoſt fourſcore years old; and he was the more ſenſible of this help, as he met with very few that were capable of doing even ſo much for him. He had himſelf found the excellent uſe of that language in the whole courſe of his ſtudies, and much lamented the neglect of it both at home and abroad, which was ſo general, that he did not then know one man in the world who perfectly underſtood it. Hereupon, this ſame year 1639, he ſettled a Saxon Lecture in the Univerſity of Cambridge [AA], and appointed Mr Wheloc his firſt Profeſſor (w), allowing him an annual ſtipend of ten pounds, and preſenting him to the Vicarage of Middleton, near Lynn in the county of Norfolk, giving him likewiſe the impropriate Rectory of the ſame (x), both which were intended by him to be ſettled in perpetuity as an endowment of that Lecture; but this deſign was defeated. Our Author had likewiſe at this time an opportunity of diſplaying his profound knowledge in our old Feudal law, in the great caſe of Tenures upon the commiſſion of defective titles, argued by all the Judges of Ireland, publiſhed, after their reſolution, by order of the Lord Deputy Viſcount Wentworth this year. It fell out, upon the fourth point of the caſe, to be affirmed, that Tenures had their original in England before the Norman conqueſt; and, in purſuit of this aſſertion, it was concluded, that Feuds were then and there in uſe. In proof whereof divers laws and charters of the Saxon kings, and ſome other authorities, were alledged, which being conceived to have cleared the point, it was followed in the report. And therefore it was ſaid that Sir Henry Spelman was miſtaken, who in his Gloſſary (verbo feudum) refers the original of feuds in England to the Norman conqueſt, to which their corollary (y) adds theſe words; neither is the bare conjecture of Sir Henry Spelman ſufficient to take away the force of thoſe laws (z). Being thus, by way of Voucher, made an Antagoniſt, as he himſelf obſerves, to the reverend opinion of thoſe learned Judges, he humbly deſires them to pardon his miſtakings where they fall, and to hear without offence what may lead him to his conjectures, which they ſpeak of. To this purpoſe he publiſhed a piece, intituled, The original growth, propagation, and condition of Tenures by knight ſervice in England (aa) [BB], wherein he confirms what he

[AA] He ſettled a Saxon Lecture at Cambridge.] As there is no ſuch lecture at preſent in that Univerſity, it will be proper to give ſome account how ſo worthy a deſign came to be defeated. Dr Gibſon's account is, that Sir Henry and his eldeſt ſon both dying in the compaſs of two years, and the civil wars breaking forth, and their eſtates being alſo ſequeſtered, the family became incapable of accompliſhing the deſign. But we have another account of this matter from Mr Somner, who, in the Dedication to his Dictionarium Saxonico-Latino-Anglicum, takes notice, that when by the death of Mr Wheloc, in 1657, the diſpoſal of that lecture fell to Roger Spelman of Hulm, Eſq; eldeſt ſon of Sir John, and grandſon of the Founder, he had deſigned to beſtow it upon a learned Divine, named Mr Samuel Foſter, but that Archbiſhop Uſher recommended him [Mr Somner] to the Patron for the ſtipend of ten pounds, to enable him to proſecute his Dictionary (in which he had then made a conſiderable progreſs), which would more improve the Saxon language, than bare Academic Lectures. Mr Spelman, who had not before heard of Mr Somner, being thus informed of his particular merits in the Saxon tongue, was prevailed on to comply with Archbiſhop Uſher's recommendation, which was likewiſe conſented to by Mr Foſter; who, upon Mr Somner's application to him, was content to enjoy the living without the lecture. How long the ſtipend was paid to Mr Somner after he had finiſhed the Dictionary, I know not; but the lecture being thus unfortunately ſeparated from the endowment, was never heard of afterwards. Dr White Kennet (32), in relating this affair, obſerves, that herein the Prelate [Uſher] was, like himſelf, judicious; for the endowments of public lectures, ſays he, has often met with this ill ſucceſs, to make the Readers neglect, and the Hearers deſpiſe them: whereas, were the ſame rewards given on condition of printing thoſe lectures, or publiſhing ſome other remains of that Art or Science, men's induſtry would be greater, and the republic of letters much better ſerved. 'This, continues he, ſeems to 'be the intention of the Founder, Sir Henry Spelman, 'in eſtabliſhing his lecture, the words of his founda-'tion being to promote the Saxon tongue, either by 'reading it publickly, or by the edition of Saxon ma-'nuſcripts and other books.' This writer tells us likewiſe, that the reaſon of the thing, and the will of his grandfather, inclined Mr Spelman to comply with the advice of Archbiſhop Uſher. We have ſeen what this concluſion is grounded upon, viz. a paſſage in Somner's Dedication of his Dictionary, and another in Wheloc's Preface to Bede; but the reflection herein occaſionally raiſed againſt the Univerſities, has no other ground to ſupport it, except the writer's ill-will to thoſe learned Bodies. In the mean time it is obſervable, that he could not be ignorant, that the caſe of this lecture of Sir Henry Spelman was, among others, a remarkable exception to his general cenſure, ſince what he has turned, at the expences of the Univerſities in favour of Mr Somner, whoſe panegyric he was writing, is borrowed from the Preface to Bede, a Saxon book, which Mr Wheloc, the Editor, aſſures us was undertaken and publiſhed in purſuance of Sir Henry Spelman's Will in the foundation of his lecture, to ſay nothing of Mr Wheloc's appeal in that Preface to Archbiſhop Uſher, who, he there aſſures us, had actually heard him read lectures upon the Saxon language in the Univerſity. Neither can it well be ſuppoſed, that though Sir Henry's firſt and principal intent in this foundation, was to promote the knowledge of our Saxon Antiquities, yet that he had not an eye in the next place to advance the honour and intereſt of the Univerſity; or at leaſt that he judged his deſign was moſt ſecure from being, either dropt, or diverted to other uſes, by being committed to the truſt of that Community. And I hope I may obſerve without offence, ſeeing it is remarkably to the preſent point, that in the larger work of the Tythes, Sir Henry declares his opinion very warmly againſt changing that way of ſupport for the Clergy into any other whatſoever, though never ſo fair ſeemingly, and promiſingly advantageous. And one of the principal reaſons he gives for it, is the danger thereby of having that ſupport diminiſhed by degrees, till at laſt the Clergy would be left with very little, or even no ſupport at all, which he ſaw would be a ſure way of ruining that religion itſelf, of which they are the Teachers and Profeſſors. Dr Gibſon ſeems to have been ſenſible of the objections to which Mr Kennet's opinion lay expoſed, and therefore gave that aforementioned; and it is certainly much more candid and unexceptionable, and for that reaſon alone, if he had no other, deſerves, in my mind, the greater credit.

[BB] The original of Tenures by knight ſervice in England.] The particular caſe that gave occaſion for this treatiſe was, that Lord Dillon, in the county of Mayo, upon inquiry at this time into the title of his Majeſty King Charles I. to that county, found there was an Act of State publiſhed, commanding all thoſe who had any lands therein by letters patent from the Crown, in purſuance of the commiſſion granted by James I, as abovementioned (33), to produce the letters, or an enrollment thereof, before the Lord Deputy and Council, by a certain day, to the end that they might be ſecured in the quiet poſſeſſion of thoſe Eſtates, in caſe the ſaid letters were allowed by that board to be good and effectual in law. In purſuance of theſe orders, ſeveral letters patents were produced, and particularly thoſe granted to the Lord Viſcount Dillon, which laſt, upon the peruſal and conſideration thereof by his Majeſty's Council, were thought to be void in law, and therefore it was ordered by the Lord Deputy and Council, that the doubt ſhould be drawn up into a Caſe, and that Caſe to be openly argued at the Council board. It was drawn up accordingly in theſe words: 'King James, by 'com-

he had aſſerted in his Gloſſary; but obſerves, that the miſtake was committed by the perſon that drew the breviate for the judge; for that he himſelf had no where referred the original of feuds in England to the Norman conqueſt. On the contrary, in ſpeaking of them he ſaid, habentur plurima, quæ huc apprime conducunt, in Anglo-Saxonum noſtrorum legibus, which he ſtill affirmed, and that the paſſage in his Gloſſary had been much perverted. It being

' commiſſion under the great ſeal, did authorize certain ' Commiſſioners to grant the manour of Dale, by ' letters patents under the great ſeal of the kingdom, ' to A. and his Heirs; and there is no direction given ' in the ſaid commiſſion touching the tenure to be re- ' ſerved.—There are letters patents, by colour of the ' ſaid commiſſion, paſſed unto A. and his Heirs, to ' hold by Knight Service, as of his Majeſty's caſtle of ' Dublin.' Here it was agreed on all hands, that the letters patents were void, as to the tenure; and that the Commiſſioners had acted beyond their commiſſion, in reſerving a mean tenure to the prejudice of the Crown; when they ought, either to have reſerved an expreſs tenure by Knight Service in Capite, or have mentioned no tenure at all, but have left the law to imply a tenure in Capite. The queſtion therefore was, whether the deficiency of the tenure did ſo far affect the grant, as wholly to deſtroy the letters patents, or whether the letters patents might not be good as to the land, and void only as to the tenure. The caſe was argued ſeveral days by Council on both ſides, and was afterwards referred to the Judges, who were required by the Lord Deputy and Council to conſider of it, and to return their reſolution. But they, upon a private conference, not agreeing in their opinions, it was thought neceſſary, for the public ſatisfaction, to have it argued ſolemnly by them all; which was accordingly done: and when it came to be debated, whether the reſervation of a tenure, ſo different from that intended and warranted by the commiſſion, could make void the whole grant, this led them to a more general inquiry, what the reſervation of a tenure is to the grant? whether it be part of the grant, and the modus conceſſionis, or whether it be a diſtinct thing, aliud, from the grant; for (as the printed caſe repreſents their opinion,) if the reſervation of the tenure, and the grant of the land, be aliud et aliud, two diſtinct things in the conſideration of the whole grant made, and the authority given by the ſaid commiſſion for the making thereof, then the letters patents may be void as to the tenure, and yet good for the grant of the land; but if the reſervation of the tenure be incident unto the authority, and inſeparably joined with it, and the reſervation of the tenure, and the grant of the land, make up but one intire grant, ſo that the one is a part of the other, and the reſervation of the tenure be modus conceſſionis; then the grant of the land reſerving a diverſe and contrary tenure to that which their [made] authority did warrant them to reſerve, is a doing of idem alio modo, and ſo the whole Act is void. They who pleaded for the validity of the letters patents as to the land, and their being void as to the tenure, urged, among other arguments, that tenures in Capite were brought into England by the conqueſt; but grants were by the Common Law, and therefore grants being more ancient than tenures, theſe muſt of neceſſity be aliud, from the thing granted: and to prove that theſe tenures came in with the Conqueror, they cited Mr Selden in his Spicilegium ad Eadmerum, p. 194, where he has that out of Bracton de acquir. rerum domin. b. 2. forinſecum ſervitium dicitur regale ſervitium, quia ſpectat ad Dominum Regem et non ad alium, et ſecundum quod in Conqueſtu fuit adinventum. But this argument, and the authority, were both overruled; and it was affirmed, that tenures were not brought into England by the Conqueror, but were common among the Saxons. As to Selden, it was anſwered, that in that place, he barely recites Bracton's words, not delivering his own opinion; for in that book cited, p. 170, and in his Titles of Honour, laſt edition, p. 612, we find he was of another opinion. What were the Thani Majores, or Thani Regis, among the Saxons, but the Kings immediate Tenants of lands, which they held by perſonal ſervice, as of the King's perſon by Grand Serjeanty, or Knight's Service in Capite? The land ſo held, was in thoſe times called Thane-land, as land holden in ſocage, was called Reve-land, Coke's Inſtit. § 117. Sometime after the coming of the Normans, the title of Thane grew out of uſe, and that of Baron and Barony ſucceeded for Thane and Thane-land. Hence the true reaſon of Coke in Lord Cromwell's Caſe, p. 81. That every Barony of ancient times was held by Grand Serjeanty. It is true, the poſſeſſions of Biſhops and Abbots were excepted by the Saxons, and turned into Baronies by the Conqueror, and ſo their tenure may be ſaid in Conqueſtu adinventum: but Thane lands were held by that tenure before. What was that Trinodia neceſſitas, which ſo often occurs in grants of the Saxon Kings, under this form, Exceptis iſtis tribus, Expeditione, Arcis, & Pontis extructione (34), but that which was afterwards expreſſed by ſalvo forinſeco in Bracton (35)? It is moſt manifeſt, that Capite tenures, Tenures by Knight Service, Tenures in ſocage, Frank almoigne, &c. were frequent in the time of the Saxons: and if we will believe what is cited out of an old French Cuſtumary, in a manuſcript treatiſe of the Antiquities of tenures in England (36), many, if not all theſe tenures, were in uſe, even in the time of the Britons. There, it is ſaid, the firſt Britiſh King divided Britain into four parts, and gave one part to the Arch-Flamines, to pray for him and his poſterity. The ſecond part he gave to his Earls and Nobility, to do him Knight's Service. The third he divided among Huſbandmen, to hold of him in ſocage. The fourth part he gives to mechanical perſons, to hold of him in burgage. But that teſtimony was waved, there being little certainty or truth in the Britiſh Story before the time of Cæſar. Neither did they make uſe of that, which we are taught by William Roville of Alençon in his Preface to the Grand Cuſtumary of Normandy, that all theſe cuſtoms (among which are theſe tenures) were firſt brought into Normandy out of England by Edward the Confeſſor. Beſides what hath been ſaid, they found feuds, both name and thing, in the laws of theſe times. Among the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, cap. 5, where it is thus provided, debent enim univerſi liberi homines, et ſecundum fœdum ſuum et ſecundum tenementa ſua, arma habere, et illa ſemper in promptu conſervare, ad tuitionem regni et ſervitium dominorum ſuorum (37). This law was afterwards confirmed by William the Conqueror (38). As theſe tenures were common in thoſe times, ſo were all the virtues of them, homage, fealty, ſocage, relief and wardſhip for relief, &c. (39). That wardſhips were then in uſe, and not brought in by the Normans, as Camden in his Britannica (40), nor by Henry III, as Ranulph Higden in his Polychronicum (not underſtanding him) had perſuaded. Among the privileges granted by Edward the Confeſſor to the Cinque Ports, that their Heirs ſhall not be in Ward (41), and in the cuſtoms of Kent, which are in Magna Charta of Tottel's edition, and in Lambard's Perambulation, there is a rule for the Wardſhip of the Heir in Gavelkind, and that he ſhall not be married by the Lord; and theſe cuſtoms ſay of themſelves, that they were devant le conqueſt et en le conqueſt. For the Antiquity of Wardſhip in England and Scotland, ſee alſo Hector Boetius, lib. 11. Buchanan Rerum Scoticarum, lib. 6. and the Laws of Malcolm, 11. which prove the Antiquity of Wardſhip in Scotland, and therefore in England, before the Norman Conqueſt; for in thoſe times, it is probable the laws of both nations did not much differ, as for the times after, it appears they did not by comparing their Regiam Majeſtatem with our Glenvil. Upon theſe, among other reaſons, they did conclude, that upon conſideration of the Authority given, and grants thereupon made, the reſervation of the tenures cannot be ſaid to be aliud, i. e. a ſeparate and diſtinct thing from the authority of granting the land, but rather concluded within it; and that the reſervation of the tenure, though it be not ipſa conceſſio, the grant itſelf, yet it is modus conceſſionis, and a part of the grant; and therefore the authority being not purſued in that, the whole grant is void. Theſe were the arguments, which our Author has conſidered ſeverally, both as to the truth and force of them; not ſtrictly confining himſelf to their reaſons and reflections, but taking occaſion from thence to draw up a very elaborate treatiſe of the nature and origin of feuds and tenures; wherein he has clearly ſhewn, that theſe tenures, ſuch as were granted in the letters patents by himſelf and the other Commiſſioners in Ireland, were not in uſe before the Conqueſt, and therefore the grants being made before that time, the tenures muſt of neceſſity be aliud from the thing granted, and conſequently the Patents were good, as to the lands.

neither his words, nor his meaning to ſay, that William the Conqueror firſt brought in the feuds or military ſervice, in a general ſenſe: but that he brought in the ſervitudes and grievances of feuds, as wardſhip, marriage, and ſuch like, which to this day were never known to other nations that are governed by the feudal law. He obſerves there is a great difference between ſervitia militaria and ſervitutes militares. The one noble, heroic, and full of glory, which might not therefore be permitted to any that was not born of free parents, no not to a king's ſon (as appears in Virgil), wherein our Saxon laws were very cautious, and wanted a ſoldier's ſhield to be inſigne libertatis. The other not ignoble only and ſervile, but derived even from very bondage (bb). This ſeems to have been the laſt of our Author's performances in his ſtudy; and it is an illuſtrious inſtance of the vigour both of his ſpirits and underſtanding, ſuch as is not ordinarily met with at his years, being then upon the verge of fourſcore. He had paſſed the latter part of his life very agreeably with his ſon-in-law Sir Ralph Whitfield in Barbican (cc), at whoſe houſe he died in 1641, having paſſed the eightieth year of his age (dd). From this place his corpſe was carried with great ſolemnity, by order of K. Charles, to Weſtminſter Abbey, where it was interred in the South iſle, near the door of St Nicholas's chappel, at the foot of the pillar, oppoſite to the monument of his ancient friend Mr Camden. The late biſhop of London gives the following ſhort ſketch of his character: 'A gentleman, ſays he, of great learning, and a hearty promoter and encourager 'of it. In his temper calm and ſedate, and in his writings grave and inoffenſive; a true 'lover of the eſtabliſhed church, and a zealous maintainer of her rights and privileges;' to which I will venture to add, that he was not leſs hearty in wiſhing well to the rights and liberties of his country in general. The firſt article of this character, which is taken upon a peruſal of his works, will be abundantly confirmed by the general voice of the nation in particular. Since every one that looks into the hiſtory of his own country, cannot but obſerve, from the ſeveral quotations from Sir Henry Spelman, that his works have been, and to this day continue to be, a neceſſary ſtorehouſe to every writer of the Engliſh hiſtory ſince his time [CC]. How much he had the advancement of learning at heart is ſeen, as in other inſtances, ſo particularly by his foundation of a Saxon lecture at Cambridge, by which he merited the title of being The Reviver and Reſtorer of that branch of literature; and the encouragement he gave to men of letters, beſides what has been already taken notice of in regard to Mr Speed, both in the ſupplies which he furniſhed to that collection of records made by Mr Dodſworth relating to the foundation of monaſteries in the Northern parts of England, and eſpecially afterwards, when, becoming ſenſible that thoſe might be improved into a monaſticum Anglicanum, leſt that deſign ſhould miſcarry by Mr Dodſworth's death, he prevailed with Mr Dugdale to join Mr Dodſworth in ſo commendable a work, promiſing to communicate his tranſcript of foundation-charters belonging to ſeveral monaſteries in Norfolk and Suffolk, and, for Mr Dugdale's further encouragement, recommended him to Thomas Earl of Arundel, then earl marſhal of England, as a perſon well qualified to ſerve the King in the office of arms; by means of which recommendation, ſeconded by Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, Mr Dugdale arrived to a good ſkill in them, was ſettled in the Heralds office (ee), which gave him an opportunity to fix in London, and, from the many aſſiſtances there, to compile thoſe and the other laborious volumes afterwards publiſhed by him. Sir Henry likewiſe not only firſt adviſed Dr Watts (the celebrated editor of Matthew Paris) to the ſtudy of Antiquity, but was the principal Author of the Doctor's undertaking a new edition of that valuable hiſtorian (ff). His zeal for the honour and intereſt of the clergy does not ſtand ſo much in need of an illuſtration, as ſome humanities that were incident to it ſeem to do of an apology. But, on the other hand, he was ſo much diſtinguiſhed by the ſteadineſs of his loyalty both to K. James and K. Charles I, and was ſo highly in their favour (gg), as might have given room for ſome perſons to think him not ſo hearty, as he really was, in the cauſe of liberty, did not that heartineſs appear to be a juſt part of his character from a letter of his to Archbiſhop Uſher, which has been preſerved by Dr Richard Parr [DD]. Upon Sir Henry's death, all his papers fell into the hands of his eldeſt ſon, Sir John Spelman, after whoſe deceaſe Sir Ralph Whitfield had them in his poſſeſſion (hh). In 1647, Mr Jeremiah Stephens, in purſuance of his truſt, printed a piece upon tythes, under the following title, Sir Henry Spelman's larger treatiſe concerning tythes [EE]: whereunto

[CC] A ſtorehouſe to every writer of the Engliſh Hiſtory ſince his time.] We have a late inſtance of the truth of this obſervation in Mr Carte's Hiſtory of England. That Hiſtorian makes frequent uſe of Sir Henry's works; but he ſeems to have neglected this ſtore, in ſpeaking of the unction, and rejecting the common opinion, that our Kings were endowed with their eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy by virtue of their unction, he declares, that ſuch a power is inherent to Royalty, which, though true enough, yet is not ſo much to the purpoſe of an hiſtorian, as what Sir Henry obſerves, that our Kings actually exerciſed that authority before the unction was performed in England, or before King Alfred, viz. in the year 850, whereas Alfred was not crowned at Rome by Pope Leo, who gave him the unction, till the year 860 (42).

[DD] In a letter preſerved by Dr Parr.] This letter is dated from Barbican, July 1, 1628 (43), and begins thus: 'I here preſent your Grace with the firſt printed 'Copy of the Petition of Parliament to his Majeſty for 'their ancient rights and liberties, with his Majeſty's 'gracious anſwer thereto: and by much inſtance I have 'got, even in this hour, from Mr Bill, before they are 'yet become public, and to the laming of the book from 'whence it is taken.' This ſhews his zeal to ſerve his friend, who had deſired the petition to be ſent. And his zeal for the cauſe of liberty further appears from another letter [Numb. CXXVIII.] dated May 26, the ſame year, wherein Sir Henry acquaints him, that the Houſe of Commons had admirably evinced the rights of the ſubject in every part of that petition.

[EE] His larger treatiſe concerning Tythes.] This piece had been long expected, and was much deſired in Sir Henry's life-time by his friends, to whom he conſtantly excuſed himſelf (44) upon one account or other. In his Apology for the tract De non temerandis Eccleſiis, he writes thus: 'As to aſſerting Tythes to be due Jure divino, 'and his anſwers, my purpoſe is not here to meddle with 'them. They require a more ſpacious diſcourſe than 'either that volume admitted, or I now mean to enter 'into, it being not a queſtion between him and me only, 'but long controverted by greater Clerks, and left at 'this whereunto is annexed, An answer to a queſtion of a gentleman of quality, by a reverend and learned divine living in London, concerning the ſettlement or abolition of tythes by the parliament, which cauſed him to doubt how to diſpoſe of his ſon whom he had deſigned for the miniſtry; (2) Some animadverſions on a late pamphlet called The country's plea againſt tythes, diſcovering the ignorant

'this day as queſtionem vexatam non judicatam. The 'truth is, the courſe of my argument led me upon it, 'and I therefore produced ſome arguments tending to 'the maintenance thereof, but referring the point unto (45) 'a greater work (45), and forbearing to deliver myſelf 'therein without ample, and more laborious examina- 'tion of ſo great a controverſy (46).' But perhaps nothing had raiſed the curioſity of his friends (ſuch I mean as were inclined to reverence his judgment) more than what he had there dropt concerning Tythes, in quoto. Upon which point, having declared that he could not ſay the law of nature had determined the ſet portion of a tenth, he ſubjoins the following note. 'Yet there 'be diverſe natural reaſons that commend this number '(for this purpoſe) above others.' We have already obſerved, that he expreſſed an inclination to have explained the words in this note, had it conſiſted with his deſigned brevity in that piece. This therefore appears in the fourteenth chapter of his large work, now before us, which being not a little curious, we ſhall give the ſubſtance of. He ſets out with an honeſt declaration, that in all his inquiries upon this article of tythes, he had never met with any thing concerning this point of limitation to the number ten; (47) 'from the nature of it therefore, ſays he (47), wanting 'a guide to direct me, I ſhall walk this way the more 'reſpectfully. He then proceeds to declare, that in 'his apprehenſion there are two reaſons thereof, one 'myſtical, the other political. Firſt, Reaſon teacheth 'that God ſhould have the beſt and the chiefeſt, and 'that is myſtically contained in this number ten. For 'it is the number appointed in Scripture, and St Auſtin 'teacheth, that we do not perfectly underſtand many 'things there for want of having the myſtery of num- 'bers; and both he and St Jerom obſerve, that in 'numbers there are great ſecrets. The number ten is 'ſaid to ſignify the firſt and the laſt, the beginning and 'the ending. It is, finis ſimplicium et initium compoſi- 'torum, the firſt radical number, and the laſt number 'of ſingle dimenſion; the number wherewith the pro- 'greſs of numeration, running as it were circularly, 'always endeth and beginneth again: repreſentat, 'ſaith Bartholomæus, merito ipſum Chriſtum, qui eſt et 'ALPHA ET OMEGA, PRINCIPIUM ET FINIS. In this, 'and ſuch other reſpects, it is alſo ſaid to be like a 'circle, the greateſt and the perfecteſt body in Geo- 'metry, having neither beginning nor ending, as in 'the attributes of God. Hermes, juſtly ſtiled Treſ- 'megiſt, labouring to deſcribe God by the moſt ſigni- 'ficant reſemblance that man's wit could attain unto, 'ſaid, God is like an imaginary circle, whoſe cen- 'ter is every where, and circumference no where; 'and as the circle or ſphere of all forms, is moſt 'ſpacious and of the greateſt capacity, comprehend- 'ing all other, and itſelf comprehended of none; 'ſo the number ten comprehends all numbers, and is 'itſelf comprehended of none of them; neither is there 'any number beyond it, but that ariſeth out of it. It 'is the foot and baſis whereon all of them are founded, 'and it containeth not only all dimenſions, but, to be 'ſhort, all the reaſons of arithmetick, geometry, and 'muſick; therefore Philo Judæus ſaith, they who firſt 'gave names unto things, ſeemed to me to have 'named decadem quaſi δεκάδα, i. e. capacem ἀπὸ τοῦ δέ- 'χεσθαι, quod capiat et amplectatur omnia genera numerorum 'reliquorum ex numeris collectorum proportione harmoniarum 'rurſus et concentuum proprie appellaſſe. In this manner 'the number ten repreſents to us (as ſuch things may) 'the nature of God, the moſt perfect and greateſt, 'comprehending all, and comprehended of none, the 'beginning and the ending, yet infinite and without 'beginning or ending. So that the number ten, this 'tribute money in queſtion, hath in all theſe reſpects 'the apparent image of God; and therefore let us ſee 'whether it hath his inſcription or not. For ſure if it 'hath his image and inſcription, it is due unto him 'by his own word, and his own argument. Firſt then; 'the Hebrews and the Greeks expreſs this number by '9 and ι, the firſt letter of his greateſt, and moſt eſſen- 'tial name. The Romans, and other Weſtern nations, 'by the letter X, which ſtands always for the name of 'Chriſt. The arithmetical figures 1 and 0, 1 ſignifies 'the ſame that alpha does in Greek, and o omega; 'therefore the figure of the number ſignifies the firſt 'and the laſt, the beginning and the ending; but as the 'cypher o, in this reſpect, ſignifies the end, we muſt 'mark, that it is a circle, and hath no end; being 'therefore joined to the figure of one, which ſignifieth 'the beginning, it ſheweth unto us, that the beginning 'is without end, and the end itſelf without beginning 'or end, both infinite, and without any limit. The 'firſt character in the figure of 10, viz. 1, begetteth 'all numbers, for it is ſemen numerorum, and is be- 'gotten of none, ſo that it is Unus et Omnis, one and 'all, and ſo the very figures ſignify in notis Antiquorum, 'according to Valerius Probus and Paulus Diaconus. 'Therefore to conclude, it hath both the image of 'God in ſignification of his Eſſence, and the Inſcrip- 'tion of his name in the form of the characters and fi- 'gures in all languages, and in all nations, after one 'manner or other; ſo that nature herſelf had taught 'them, that this part belongeth to God, which by no 'wit, or any learning, can be applied to, or found in 'any other number between one and millions of thou- 'ſands.—God will have ſuch a part as comprehendeth 'all; therefore, as in the ſacrifices, he eſpecially did 'require the head and tail, as comprehending all the 'reſt; ſo the laws of our land did anciently reckon 'theſe parts for all; for that the whole fiſh-royal be- 'longs to the King, yet Bracton ſaith it ſufficeth if 'he had the head and tail, for that in theſe parts the 'whole is implied: and, conſequently, when we give 'God the tenth part, we put him in poſſeſſion of all. 'This number is the number of fulneſs, and expreſſeth 'the greateſt things; and it has been of old obſerved, 'that in natural things the tenth is uſually the fulleſt 'and greateſt. Vaſtius inſurgens decimæ ruit impetus 'undæ (48), and Valerius (49) Flaccus terms it, decimæ 'tumor ardens undæ. So likewiſe it is noted by Silius 'Italicus, Lucan (50), and Seneca (51). And this 'obſervation among the Ancients hath been ſo noto- 'rious and remarkable, that they commonly uſed the 'word Tenth in Latin, to expreſs the greateſt things— 'decumanum limitem, decumanam portem ſerte fluctus 'ova, as Cicero in Verrem et accipenſerum; and for 'the like reaſons they uſed the word decimare for 'chuſing and culling out the choiceſt and principal 'things, as Perrot obſerveth. And becauſe in the 'procreation of man and other living creatures, the 'number ten is moſt happy and moſt effectual, as the 'tenth month in ſome, and the tenth week in others, 'the Romans admired the ſecret virtues of this num- 'ber ſo ſuperſtitiouſly, as they canonized it among 'their Gods by the name of Decima, as Tertullian and 'Gellius inform us; and for this cauſe Romulus cloſed 'the year within the compaſs of ten months, as the 'time of fulneſs and perfection. Laſtly, therefore, for 'more of this ſort of obſervations, de ratione decima- 'rum et denarii numeri, he refers to Philo (52), and 'concludes with this ſmart epigram upon the letter X.

We have given this reaſoning as an inſtance of a very great weakneſs in a truly great mind. Whoever conſiders how full the Canon Law abounds with ſuch flowers, and how much Sir Henry read and admired the ſanctity of that law, and the makers of it, and at the ſame time reflects how much real ſervice and honour his country reaped from his ſtudies in this law, will eaſily excuſe one failing. Beſides, we are aſſured by Mr Stephens (53), that this piece was left imperfect by Sir Henry; and moreover, that he had been plundered of ſome of the papers: upon which account, he was forced to omit divers additions material to the argument committed to him by the learned Knight.

miſtakes of the authors of it touching the maintenance of the miniſtry by ſuch means; (3) Animadverſions on the Kentiſh petition, publiſhed by Jeremiah Stephens, B.D. according to the appointment and truſt of the Author. In this treatiſe Sir Henry ſhews the danger of changing tythes for any other way of maintenance, as of a pecuniary ſtipend, from the alteration in the value of money; and obſerves, that the change of the laws, which have continued for above a thouſand years, and of a right ſettled by common law, will produce many miſchiefs, eſpecially to the crown, in payment of tenths and firſt-fruits. He likewiſe takes notice of the peculiar fitneſs of this way of ſupport above all others, from the Clergy's ſharing the ſame fortune with the people, according to the times of plenty or ſcarceneſs. In 1656 came out a piece, intituled Villare Anglicanum, or A view of the towns of England, collected by the appointment, at the charge, and for the uſe, of that learned antiquary Sir Henry Spelman [FF]. In 1663, the ſame truſtee, Mr Stephens, entered upon the execution of the other part of his truſt, and began to print The Hiſtory of Sacrilege [GG]; but, being forbid to [FF] Villare Anglicanum.] By the title it does not appear, whether our Author had any, or what ſhare he had in this work; but the point is, in ſome meaſure, cleared up by Biſhop Nickelſon, who tells us (54) it was ſaid to be compoſed by Mr Henry and Mr Dodſworth: though he thinks the greateſt part of it was drawn out of the alphabetical tables on the back of the maps in Speed's Theatre of Great Britain. .

(54) In his Hiſtorical Library, part 1. p. 13. Edit. 1696.

[GG] The Hiſtory of Sacrilege was burnt in the fire of London.] Mr Wood tells us, that both the whole Copy, and all the ſheets printed off, were then deſtroyed. That account, it ſeems, made it generally believed at Oxford that the whole book was irrecoverably loſt, till the manuſcript given by Biſhop Barlow came into the Bodleian library in 1693; not long after which, Mr Gibſon, then of Queen's College, upon examining thoſe manuſcripts, happened to meet with a part of it among them, which putting him upon a further enquiry, he found other parts in other places, and throwing all together into order, brought the work, as ſeemed to him, to be pretty intire; and in 1695 printed a kind of plan of it, as we have already mentioned, when he publiſhed our Author's poſthumous works, amongſt which he tells us, this might have appeared, had not the ſame reaſon ſtill continued in force, which he had been told by a learned Biſhop put a ſtop to the firſt attempt for publiſhing it, ſtill ſubſiſted, ſince ſome perſons, ſays he, in the preſent age would be apt to interpret the mention of their Predeceſſors in ſuch a manner, and upon ſuch an occaſion, as an unpardonable reflection upon their families (55). But three years afterwards, in 1698, it happened, that the copy of the manuſcript fell into the hands of (it ſeems) a leſs diſcreet perſon (56), who reſolved to let the world make what uſe of it they pleaſed. And, at the ſame time, to prevent all ſuſpicion of any indirect dealing with Mr Gibſon, does him the juſtice to aver, that he was no way, either by advice or conſent, or ſo much as connivance, privy to the publication of it. The Editor likewiſe pays another office of reſpect due, he ſays, to the aſhes of the author, which is, that his rare talents and pen are not to be meaſured by this one performance; for indeed, ſays he, this Hiſtory of Sacrilege ſeems to be the moſt abortive of all his poſthumous works. This is ſo amply true, and it is ſo very rude a draught, that I cannot forbear thinking it might be one, if not the chief reaſon why Mr Gibſon contented himſelf with giving the general plan of it, by which his Reader might form ſome idea what the ſtructure would have been, had Sir Henry found leiſure to compleat it, or had not Mr Stephens, to whom it was left to perfect and complete, been prevented in the execution of his truſt. As it is now printed, the Author having firſt laid down a general definition of ſacrilege, then reckons up the various kinds of it, as to places, perſons, and things, and thence enumerating at large the many ſignal puniſhments of it in Heathens, Jews, and Chriſtians, in general, proceeds afterwards to the Hiſtory of England in particular, beginning ann. 996, with Egbert, the third King of Kent from Ethelbert, and ſo proceeds through the Saxon, and then the Norman race, ſufficient to incite the curioſity of Perſons of the ſame turn with the Author to peruſe it, without expoſing him to the deriſion of the generality. He gives an account of Edward I's ſeizing the revenues of the Priories aliens, and the riches of the Monaſteries, for the ſupport of his wars, as alſo the ſame of Edward III; and afterwards he relates the attempt, together with the defeat of it, upon the lands of thoſe Priories, made by Henry IV, which, he takes notice, was at the time of Wickliff's attempt to introduce a change in the religion. From thence he deſcends to the actual ſuppreſſion of thoſe Priories by Henry V, and ſo to the general diſſolution under Henry VIII (57), which, in reſpect of the reſt, (ſtiled rivers) he calls the ocean of iniquity, and mentioning the calamities that enſued upon that King and his Poſterity, he makes this ſingular remark, that as the Iſſue of Nebuchadnezzar was extinct, and his kingdom given to another nation the Sixty-Sixth year after he had rifled the Temple of Jeruſalem; ſo about the ſame period that King Henry VIII. began to ſack the Monaſteries, with their Churches, was his whole iſſue extinct, male and female, legitimate and illegitimate, and his kingdom transferred to another Nation. However, that ſection is not concluded without declaring, that the extinguiſhment of Henry's iſſue by the immortally renowned Queen Elizabeth, was a golden period. This affinity dwelt much upon our Author's mind. He takes notice of it, both in his Great work of Tythes, and in the tract De non temerandis Eccleſiis (58), with the ſame application of it to King James, in theſe elegant Latin words; Neſcio quo fato ut eadem temporis periodo, viz. ann. 68, poſt ereptas a Nebuchad. et Hen. VIII, res templorum ſtirps utriſque regia extincta ſit, imperium ſublatum et ad aliam gentem devolutum. Ulterius igitur ſperemus Cyrum noſtrum Jacobum Regem, qui Sceptra diſſidentia compeſcuit, reſtitutionis etiam munus aliquando aggreſſurum (59). After relating the fate of the King and Royal Family, he extends his remarks to the principal Agents in that affair, and ſo to the new Owners of the lands, and to the Lords who promoted and paſſed the Diſſolution Act (60). Whereupon Mr Gibſon juſtly obſerves, that he is far from affirming that the Perſons being concerned in the affair (either as Promoters of the alienation, or Poſſeſſors of the lands) was directly the occaſion of the calamities that enſued. On the contrary, he declares more than once, that he will not preſume to judge, but only relates plain matters of fact, and leaves every man to make his own application. But though he was wiſe enough not to wade ſo far out of the depth of human reaſon, in attempting to convince the underſtanding by a method liable to unanſwerable difficulties; yet his profeſſed deſign is to incline the will, and govern the actions, by poſſeſſing the mind with a fixt belief and perſuaſion, without ſuch conviction. This is a common weakneſs, and indeed the bulk of mankind in moſt things are, and muſt unavoidably be, governed by theſe kind of reaſonings. In the mean time, it is through this weakneſs, that the corruptions of the Church of Rome crept in, and took ſure hold of the people. And it is owing to the ſame weakneſs (inherent to human nature) that in England we are not yet, and perhaps never ſhall be, purged from a fond belief of the continuance of miracles, even to the third and fourth centuries. An illuſtrious inſtance of this has been lately given by a very celebrated Author, who, though purged from the lump, yet retains ſome crums of the old Leaven. The late Biſhop of London, Dr Gibſon, likewiſe has not omitted to puſh this engine of government, in the caſe now before us. After he had taken notice, that our Author relates rem geſtam only, without making particular applications, he proceeds in theſe words. 'Though it muſt be granted, 'that many of the Inſtances, and thoſe too well atteſted, 'are ſo terrible in the event, and in the circumſtances 'ſo ſurprizing, that no conſidering perſon can well paſs 'them over.' The miſchief that has formerly, and may ſtill accrue from this method of leading the people by that mixture of enthuſiaſm, which enters into the compoſition of every Engliſhman, has extorted theſe animadverſions. Otherwiſe it muſt (if ever) be excuſable in the caſe of reſtoring tythes to the Church, the right being aſſerted by ſo many much better, not to ſay convincing, arguments. In the laſt chapter of this Hiſtory of Sacrilege containing an account of ſome Monaſteries in Norfolk, our Author obſerves (61), that having having gotten his information privately, many things, no doubt, had been miſtaken by his Informers, and therefore he deſires, that wherever it ſo falleth out, his credit may not be ingaged on it. I ſhall therefore take the liberty to mention one notorious miſtake, which however, by the account of it, could not well be wilful, and that is, in the Inſtance of Walſingham Abbey, which, ſays our Author, was Sir Thomas Greſham's, who died (as was ſaid) ſuddenly in his kitchen, without Iſſue male, which is confirmed by Holingſhead (62). But what follows, that his daughter and heireſs was married to Sir William Read, who had this Abbey, wants correction. For this William Read, who was firſt huſband to Sir Thomas Greſham's wife, had by that Lady Iſſue William Read, Eſq; who was knighted in the beginning of King James's reign, and was heir to his mother, Lady Greſham, whence his ſon, Sir Thomas Read, became poſſeſſed of Oſterley-park, and died without Iſſue, having married Mildred, ſecond daughter of Thomas Cecil Lord Burleigh (63), as is related by our Author.

[HH] The ſecond volume of his Councils.] This, together with the ſecond part of his Gloſſary, was put, by the direction of Archbiſhop Selden and Lord Chancellor Hyde, into the hands of Sir William Dugdale, who made conſiderable additions to it out of the Archbiſhop's Regiſters, and the Cottonian Library; inſomuch, that he affirms, in a letter to Mr Spelman, Sir Henry's grandſon, that of the two hundred ſheets in that book, not above fifty-ſeven were of his grandfather's collection. And it appears from ſome papers in the Bodleian Library, under the hands of Sir William Dugdale and Sir Henry Spelman, that the latter had left little more towards the ſecond volume, than hints and references, where the Councils were to be met with. In this edition of 1664, there are abundance of faults, occaſioned by the negligence, either of the Copyer, or Corrector, or both. Mr Somner, ſenſible of this, took great pains in collating the printed copy with many of the original records, and corrected the errors in the margin of his own book (64). This book is now in the library of the Church of Canterbury, and will be a good help, as Mr Gibſon obſerves (65), towards a more accurate edition, as well as thoſe collections of Mr Junius, which were in the poſſeſſion of the Reverend Mr Jones, Rector of Sunningwell, not far from Oxford. Accordingly, a complete edition of the Engliſh Councils was publiſhed by Dr David Wilkins, in 1737, in four volumes folio. To which he was further encouraged, doubtleſs, by what Archdeacon Nicholſon obſerves (66) concerning ſuch an undertaking. 'The truth is, ſays he, we much want a 'new edition of that volume [of Sir Henry Spelman,] 'the greateſt part of the impreſſion having been burnt 'in the Fire of London, ſo that the book is hardly 'to be met with, and incorrect as it is, hath ever ſince 'borne an immoderate price. I know no work, that 'would be a greater ſervice to our Church, than an intire 'Hiſtory of all the Councils before the Reformation, '(for the account of them which we have already, is 'far from being intire) with the addition of a Third 'Volume, to contain the public affairs of our reformed 'Church. The great diſcoveries of manuſcripts, the 'many obſervations made by the learned Biſhop of 'Worceſter [Dr Stillingfleet], and others upon the conſtitution of the Britiſh and Saxon Churches, and the 'general approbation that the work muſt needs meet 'with, are all of them very good aſſiſtances, as well as 'encouragements to ſuch an undertaking. It is probable, that toward the laſt part, ſome aſſiſtance may 'be had from that manuſcript of Sir William Dugdale, 'intituled Papers to be made uſe of for a Third Volume 'of Councils, in Muſæo Aſhmoleano Oxon. Though 'I fear not ſo much as the title promiſes.'

[II] The ſecond part of his Gloſſary was publiſhed by the care of Sir William Dugdale.] The ſhare that Sir William had in the publication of this ſecond part, has been made the ground of a ſuſpicion, that he inſerted many things of his own, which were not in Sir Henry Spelman's copy, and particularly ſome paſſages which tend to the enlargement of the prerogative, in oppoſition to the liberties of the ſubject. The objection was raiſed on occaſion of a controverſy between Mr Petyt and Dr Brady, about the Antiquity of the Commons in Parliament. The authority of Sir Henry being urged to prove, that there was no ſuch thing as a Houſe of Commons till the time of Henry III, it was agreed on both ſides, that this learned Knight was a very competent Judge of that Controverſy; that as he had thoroughly ſtudied our Conſtitution, ſo he always wrote without partiality or prejudice; and that he was not engaged in a party, nor had any other deſign, but to publiſh the truth fairly and honeſtly, as he found it aſſerted by the beſt hiſtorians. Upon theſe grounds his opinion in matters of this nature has ever been thought conſiderable, and his bare judgment will always be valued, when we can be ſure that it is his own. And there can be no doubt but that his aſſertions under the word Parliamentum, upon which the controverſy was raiſed, are his own, and not an Interpolation by Sir William Dugdale. For the very copy, from which it was printed, is now in the Bodleian Library, in Sir Henry Spelman's own hand-writing, and agrees exactly with the printed book; particularly in the paſſages under that diſpute, they are the ſame word for word. So far then as that copy goes (for it ends at the word Riota) it is a certain teſtimony, that Sir William Dugdale did no more than mark it for the Printer, and tranſcribe here and there a looſe paper. And though the reſt of the Copy was loſt before it came to the Oxford Library, and ſo we have not the ſame authority for the Gloſſary's being genuine after the letter R; yet it is not likely that Sir William had any more ſhare in theſe laſt letters of the alphabet, than he had in any of the reſt; for all the parts of ſuch a work muſt of neceſſity be carried on at the ſame time; and therefore the Author could not but leave nearly equal materials for the whole. But what puts it beyond all doubt is, that Dr Brady, who was concerned to prove the ſecond part all genuine, appealed for the truth of this aſſertion to Sir William Dugdale himſelf, who was then alive. Moreover, Mr Gibſon aſſures us (67), 'that he had 'ſeen a letter from Sir William to Mr Charles Spel- 'man, giving him an account of the great loſſes which 'he had ſuſtained by the Fire of London, and the pains 'he had taken in the publication of the Councils and 'Gloſſary: as to the firſt, he expreſsly lays claim to 'the better half of it, as his own work and collection; 'adding, that if the impreſſion had not periſhed, in 'all right and reaſon he ought to have had a conſide- 'ration for the ſame; and alſo, continues he, for my 'pains in fitting the copy of the Gloſſary for the Printer, 'by marking it for the difference of letter, and introducing 'and tranſcribing thoſe looſe papers, left by your Grand- 'father without fit directions where they ſhould come in. 'This is all that he claims as to the Gloſſary, and if 'he had had any further ſhare in it, it is likely he 'would have inſiſted upon it on this occaſion, to con- 'vince Mr Spelman more effectually of the good ſer- 'vices he had done him in that affair.'

(67) In the Life of Sir Henry, ubi ſupra.

It was neceſſary to be more particular in this matter, becauſe if it ſhould appear, that Sir William Dugdale had taken the liberty of adding, or altering; every ſingle page would be liable to ſuſpicion, and the whole much weakened: for though he was extremely well verſed in our Engliſh affairs, yet it muſt be owned, that Sir Henry Spelman was a better Judge of our ancient Cuſtoms and Conſtitutions, and conſequently whatever he delivers as his opinion, will always be allowed a proportionable authority. 'Had he put, 'ſays Mr Gibſon, his laſt hand to the ſecond part, the 'Gloſſary, as it is now printed together, would have 'made a much nobler work; but the latter part, in 'compariſon of the other, is jejune and ſcanty, and 'every one muſt ſee, that it is little more than a collection of materials, out of which he intended to compoſe ſuch diſcourſes, as he has all along given us in 'the firſt part, under the words of greateſt import

'and

He told them that it was finiſhed by the Author, and that the copy was in the hands of Mr Charles Spelman, Grandſon to Sir Henry. They expreſſed a deſire to have it printed, and that he would prevail upon Mr Spelman to do it; but the grandſon excuſing himſelf on account of the expence, the two Lords procured a good number of ſubſcriptions, and referred the management of printing it to Sir William Dugdale, and the work was publiſhed in 1607, with a dedication to Lord Chancellor Hyde, by Mr Charles Spelman. This part, as was likely, met with a much better reception from the public than had been given to the firſt; and in ſome years was become ſo ſcarce (ll), that it was thought worth while to print another edition. Our Author alſo left in manuſcript, A ſcheme of the abbreviations, and ſuch other obſolete forms of writing, as occur in our ancient manuſcripts, to facilitate the reading of ancient books and records; and another Of ancient deeds and charters; a third alſo Of the original of teſtaments and wills, and of their probate to whom it anciently belonged; a fourth, Of the admiral's juriſdiction and the officers thereof. There was likewiſe found among his papers, A diſcourſe of the ancient government of England in general, and another of parliaments in particular; and laſtly, A catalogue of the places and dwellings of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of this realm, now or of former times, in which their ſeveral owners have ordinary juriſdiction, as of a parcel of their dioceſe, though they be ſituate within the precinct of another Biſhop's dioceſe. This appeared to be drawn up in the reign of K. James I, for the uſe of the then Archbiſhop of Canterbury-(mm). In 1625 there was publiſhed in folio, by Mr Edmund Gibſon, afterwards Biſhop of London, a collection of tracts, intitled The Engliſh works of Sir Henry Spelman. This was followed by another collection from the ſame hand, intituled Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, The Poſthumous works of Sir Henry Spelman, Knt. relating to the laws and antiquities of England, publiſhed from the original manuſcripts in 1698, folio. Theſe two collections were reprinted together in 1723, in one volume folio. In relation to Sir Henry's children, already mentioned, we have only to add, that Mr Wheloc (nn) aſſures us, the daughter, who was married to Sir Ralph Whitfield, was a Lady of uncommon talents, and every way worthy of her father; of his ſons, the youngeſt, named Clement, being bred to the law, was made a puiſne baron of the Exchequer upon the reſtoration of K. Charles II; and Mr Wood informs us (oo), that he publiſhed ſome pieces relating to the government, beſides a large preface to his father's book De non temerandis Eccleſiis [KK]. He died in June, 1679, and was interred in St Dunſtan's Church in Fleetſtreet, London. Our Author's eldeſt ſon, Sir John Spelman, was a gentleman of great learning, inſomuch that we are told (pp), if he had lived, he would have excelled his father, who ſeems to have taken extraordinary care of his education, and expreſsly left him the heir of his ſtudies. He was bred at Trinity college in Cambridge, and travelled abroad afterwards for further improvement (qq). It was at his father's requeſt, that he publiſhed Alfred's Saxon Pſalter, under the title of Pſalterium Davidis Latino-Saxonicum vetus in 1640 in 4to (rr). He had great encouragement and aſſurance of favour from K. Charles I, who, having ſent for his father, offered him the maſterſhip of Sutton's hoſpital, with ſome other advantages, in conſideration of his good ſervices both in church and ſtate: but, after his humble thanks to his Majeſty, Sir Henry told him, that he was very old, and had one foot in the grave, and that it would be a much higher obligation, if his Majeſty would pleaſe to conſider his ſon. Accordingly, very ſoon after Sir Henry's death, the King ſent for Mr Spelman, and immediately conferred on him the honour of knighthood at Whitehall, December 18, 1641 (ss). After the civil war broke out, his Majeſty, by a letter under his own hand, commanded him from his houſe in Norfolk to give his attendance at Oxford, where he was often called to private council (tt), and employed to write ſeveral pieces in vindication of the proceedings of the court, among which one was A view of a printed book, intituled Obſervations upon his Majeſty's late anſwers and epiſtles, printed at Oxford, 1642, in ſix ſheets 4to (uu). He was the author likewiſe of another piece, intituled The caſe of our affairs in law, religion, and other circumſtances, briefly examined, and preſented to the conſcience, printed in 1643, in five [KK] A Preface to De non temerandis Eccleſiis.] Mr Gibſon rightly obſerves (68), that it contains many things relating to Impropriations, and ſeveral things relating to the Judgments of God upon Sacrilege, which ſeems to be taken from his Father's Hiſtory and Fate of Sacrilege; and hence it appears, that Mr Gibſon had peruſed that treatiſe thoroughly, which makes it ſtill more unaccountable, that he ſhould take no notice of that paſſage in it, where Sir Henry mentions his being a boy at Winchelſea (69) School. The ſon, in this Preface, adds another Inſtance to thoſe of the deſtruction of the families of Nebuchadnezzar, and Henry VIII, within the fatal period of ſixty-eight years; obſerving, that what the Author notes of Nebuchadnezzar and Henry VIII, is alſo true of William the Conqueror; for that in the ſixty-eighth year after his deſtroying St Peter's Church at York, which was in his ſecond year, his name is extinct, and his kingdom devolved to another nation, Plantagenet takes his Crown (70).

Mr Spelman lived in great friendſhip, and was much reſpected by Dr John Berwick, who upon the dawn of the Reſtoration, having a correſpondence with Chancellor Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, took an opportunity to mention him in one of his letters to that Miniſter, then in the higheſt favour with King Charles II, and the Chancellor returned the following anſwer, in a letter dated February 20, 1660. 'I do thank you 'with all my heart, for giving me an opportunity of 'ſending my ſervice to Clement Spelman, whom I 'know to be a very worthy perſon, and whoſe affec-'tion the King is obliged to reward, which he re-'ſolves to do. I pray remember my ſervice very kind-'ly to him, and let him know, that I did receive the 'books long ſince, with a very great ſenſe of the obli-'gation, and did return my acknowledgments by the 'laſt three letters to Dr Ryves, which it ſeems he never 'received. I have had froward fortune with reſpect to 'Clement Spelman, to whom I heard, a gentleman 'without any authority from me did very impertinently and abſurdly deliver a compliment in my 'name; and all thoſe ways by which I did, in truth, 'endeavour to let him know how much I am his ſer-'vant, have been diſappointed.

'I pray know of him, whether his father left any 'advance in the Gloſſary (71).

[LL] The Life of King Alfred.] It is dedicated to the Prince, afterwards King Charles II, and divided into three books. The Author intended to put ſome additions by way of Appendix; as particularly the Preface to Ælfred's tranſlation of Gregory's Paſtoral, directed to Wicefort, then Biſhop of London (72); but as no ſuch thing appeared in the manuſcript, Mr Obadiah Walker put it to the end of his Latin tranſlation, as alſo a pedigree from that King to King Charles II, in two parts; one from Ælfred to Henry II, of the Engliſh line; and the other from Henry II, to King James I, of the Scottiſh line, and thence to King Charles II: of which deſcent Mr Spelman had taken notice, both in his Dedication to the King, then Prince of Wales, and at the end of his Hiſtory. Mr Hearne, ſpeaking of theſe additions by Mr Walker in the Appendix, ſays (73) he had ſeen them quoted by ſome learned men, as being the addition of Sir John Spelman himſelf. This hiſtory occaſioned ſeveral things to be wrote, and one eſpecially by Anthony Wood, in his Hiſt. et Antiquat. Univ. Oxon. in defence of the Antiquity of the Univerſity of Oxford, which he will have (as well as Mr Hearne) to have been a Nurſery for Academical Learning before the time of King Alfred, who, they both ſay (74) after Mr Camden, was only the Reſtorer of it: contrary to what is here largely argued by Sir John Spelman (75), who maintains that Ælfred was not the Reſtorer (there being no ſuch thing as an Univerſity before him) but abſolutely the Firſt Founder of it. Our Author ſhuts up his hiſtory with theſe elegant Latin Verſes, well worthy of a place here, as follows.

SPENCER, [Dr JOHN] a learned Divine in the XVIIth Century, was a native of Boſton under Bleane in Kent, where he was baptized October 31, 1630 (a). While an infant, he loſt his father, who leaving him in very narrow circumſtances, the care and expence of his education was undertaken by an uncle; and being ſent to the free-ſchool at Canterbury, he made a very quick proficiency, became King's ſcholar, and, at the age of fourteen, was recommended by Mr Jackſon, then the only Prebendary of that church, to a ſcholarſhip of Archbiſhop Parker's foundation in Corpus-Chriſti college in Cambridge [A], into which he was admitted on the 25th of March, 1645 (b). He applied himſelf diligently to his ſtudies, under his Tutor, Mr Richard Kennet [B]; and, having taken both his degrees in

'This great ſtorme hath ſo ſcattered the members 'of this ſociety, that my poore ſelf hath long been left 'alone, to the great prejudice of the church, both in 'domeſtick and forrein occaſions; among others, we 'have heard, (though not after the wonted legall and 'loving reſpect) that there is a Scholar's place voide in 'your college (to preſent whereunto you have been 'pleaſed to afford the Dean and Prebendaries of this 'Church the honour and reſpect.) If ſo, I cannot but 'humblie commend to your pious and charitable con'ſideration this Bearer, John Spencer, a King's Schollar 'in this our Cathedral Schoole; wherein, as he hath 'bene commendably proficient, ſo his Parents and 'Friends are of that worthe and reſpecte, that theyr 'help concurring, may afford him a competencye to 'traine him up for that he moſt deſyreth. [B] Under his Tutor, Mr. Richard Kennet.] Our Author always retained a great regard for this gentleman, and not without good reaſon. In reality his perſonal worth, though an Antiroyaliſt, was ſuch as deſerves ſome memorial of it. He was a native of Kent, and educated at the King's School at Canterbury, was admitted a Sizer of Bennet College, 3 Feb. 1636, and nominated to a ſcholarſhip belonging to that ſchool by Archbiſhop Laud, 7 July, 1640, with the character of a ſtudious and towardly young man (2). He took the degree of A. B. ſoon after, and proceeded to A. M. in 1644, being about that time put into a fellowſhip upon the ejectment of one Tonſtall by the Aſſembly of Divines, when he commenced Tutor, and had Dr Spencer for one of his Pupils. He was Taxer of the Univerſity, and one of their Preachers in 1648, but was removed from his fellowſhip in 1650 for refuſing the engagement, telling the Viſitors he had always been faithful to the Parliament, and was preferred by them, and is now of the ſame principles he was, but could not ſatisfy himſelf in this particular (3). However, he was reſtored to his fellowſhip in 1654, by an Ordinance of Parliament (4). He commenced B. D. the following year, and preſented Buxtorf's Hebrew Lexicon and Concordance to the Library of the College, which he probably left upon his inſtitution to the vicarage of Eaſt-Hatley in Cambridgſhire; from whence, upon another change of times, he was ejected, by the Bartholomew Act, in 1663. Whereupon his friend Mr Stillingfleet (afterwards Biſhop of Worceſter, but) then Rector of Sutton in Bedfordſhire aſſiſted him in taking a large houſe in his pariſh, where having provided a Conformiſt Teacher, he ſet up a private ſchool, and had many Gentlemen's ſons committed to his care. And ſo well was he reſpected by them, that upon his in Arts at the regular periods (c), he was choſen Fellow of his college about the year 1655. In this ſtation, the ſtraitneſs of his fortune ſtill requiring induſtry to provide a competent ſupport [C], he undertook the inſtruction of pupils; and, entering into holy orders, he ſerved the cures, firſt of St Gyles, and then of St Benedict, in Cambridge. Theſe employs put him upon exerting his talents in the pulpit, and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much there, that, after ſome time, he was appointed Univerſity Preacher. In 1659 he proceeded Bachelor of Divinity; and, as I do not find that he met with any diſturbance in the poſſeſſion of his Fellowſhip, it is probable that he followed the example of Dr Love, then Maſter of the College (d), who is ſaid to have acquieſced in moſt of the meaſures that were taken during the Uſurpation, without any wiſe approving them [D]. Accordingly, Mr Spencer joined heartily in the general joy at the Reſtoration, and June 28, 1660, being appointed a Day of Thankſgiving for it, he preached the ſermon on that occaſion before the Univerſity, which was printed the ſame year at Cambridge in 4to, under the title of The Righteous Ruler. In the ſame ſpirit he drew up a Preſervative againſt the malicious attempts of the Nonconformiſt Fanatics, who, in a periodical paper, entituled Mirabilis annus, printed in 1660, and the two following years, with a deſign to overturn the newly reſtored ancient eſtabliſh-

Aſſiſtant's leaving him, he was connived at in taking the whole charge upon himſelf, with only his Wife's ſon for an Uſher. He was excellently fitted for this employment, and his death, which happened on the 23d of January, 1670, was accordingly lamented. He was buried in the chancel of Sutton Church, and Mr Stephens, the Miniſter thereof, preached his funeral ſermon, wherein he gave him the character of a moderate man, both in principles and practice, who was generous in his temper, free and communicative in his converſation, and although he did not chuſe to conform in all things, yet was a conſtant attendant upon the public ſervice of the Church. He bore his laſt ſickneſs, which was a fever, with great patience and ſubmiſſion to the Divine Will; and as his life had been upright, ſo his end was peace. He was nearly related to Mr Baſil Kennet, Vicar of Poſtling in Kent, the Father of White Kennet, Biſhop of Peterborough, and of Baſil Kennet, Preſident of Corpus Chriſti College in Oxford. He left a widow behind him in low circumſtances, to whom Dr Spencer was very kind for his ſake, having frequently viſited him as long as he lived (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 167.

[C] His narrow fortune required induſtry to provide a ſupport.] This is not ſaid with any view of detracting from the juſt merit of his induſtry, of which it is certainly no diſparagement to ſuppoſe it to be quickened by the ſpur of neceſſity, ariſing from the extraordinary criſis of his affairs at this juncture. We have already obſerved, that his Father leaving him young, and in very narrow circumſtances, he was brought up at the expence of an Uncle. But this Uncle, who had kept an exact account of all the diſburſements for his education, dying ſoon after he was choſen Fellow, and in a way of getting his own living, without having cancelled this legal demand upon him, it was made by the Uncle's Sons and Executors in ſo rigorous a manner, that not being able to raiſe the money himſelf, he was forced to communicate his diſtreſs to his friends in the Society (among whom was Dr Teniſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury) who generouſly made a loan, which diſcharged the debt (6).

(6) Ibid. p. 168. note (k).

[D] He ſubmitted to the Uſurpation, without approving it.] We have already given one remarkable inſtance of our Author's conduct, which ſhews that no change was made in his firſt friendſhips to deſerving perſons, by their differing from him in the ſubject of Conformity to the Eccleſiaſtical Eſtabliſhment. And as this is not the leaſt amiable part of his character, we ſhall here produce another proof of it in the perſon of one Mr Thomas Hill, of whom we have the following account. That he was educated at Repton School in Derbyſhire, his native country; was ſent thence to Bennet College, and admitted a Sizer in September 1645, where after performing the office of Chapel-clerk, and a continuance of four years, he proceeded A. B. But upon the Engagement, which he did not approve, being impoſed upon ſcholars, he choſe to leave the Univerſity to avoid it, and became Chaplain to the Counteſs of Cheſterfield at Tamworth-Caſtle. He was ordained by the claſſical preſbytery at Wirkſworth in 1652, commenced a Preacher firſt at Elvaſton in Derbyſhire, from whence he was called to Orton on the Hill in Leiceſterſhire, where he continued (allowing the fifths to the ſequeſtered Miniſter, Mr Porter) till the Reſtoration, when the latter was again put into poſſeſſion by an Order from the Houſe of Lords. But the ſmall Living of Shathington in Warwickſhire being vacant about that time, he was preſented to it by the ſon of his Patroneſs abovementioned; which, although the five miles Act and ſome others ſoon rendered him incapable of ſerving perſonally, yet he got it ſupplied by another, of whoſe nonconformity no notice was taken whilſt his Patron continued to him the Corntythes belonging to himſelf, and all other profits. He removed however to a houſe of his own at Lee-Grange, near Orton, where he frequently preached to a crowded audience; and by uſing prudence, gained an opportunity of exerciſing his miniſtry, without diſturbance; whilſt ſome others were moleſted, and met with ſuch treatment as diſcouraged both them and their people. His labours of this kind after his ejectment, (which happened when his parts were well ripened and ſtrengthened) were ſuppoſed to haſten his death (although otherwiſe of a firm and healthy conſtitution) which overtook him about the fiftieth year of his age. In his perſon he is deſcribed of ſtature ſomewhat low, with black hair, a graceful countenance and features, ſeeming indications of the capacity and virtues of his mind; wherein he was diſtinguiſhed by a profound judgment, and a general knowledge in literature: at his firſt admiſſion in the College, his ſkill in the learned languages was ſuperior to moſt, and afterwards the errors in philoſophy, ſince inſiſted on by Mr Lock and others, did not eſcape his obſervation. Nor was he unacquainted with the Mathematics, although Metaphyſics was his favourite ſtudy. He was well verſed in Hiſtory in general, and Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity in particular; and ſuch a thorough knowledge had he of the Scriptures, that in his Sermons (wherein was nothing ordinary, but ſomething always new) he had a mighty felicity in unfolding its more recondite parts, to the no ſmall Entertainment as well as Edification of his Auditors. But his Labours were not confined to the pulpit, for being deſirous of doing all the good he could, he alſo inſtructed his people privately and perſonally, which he thought the duty of every Overſeer of a flock. He was much reſpected by his neighbours and many other conſiderable perſons, whether Conformiſts or Nonconformiſts, who all agreed in acknowledging his worth, and always paid the greateſt deference to his opinion. He never indeed printed any thing himſelf, but he frequently gave his ſentiments upon the writings of others; and ſo much was he admired for the maſculine and unaffected eloquence in his diſcourſes, as well as for his clear and pleaſing voice, that he was invited to ſucceed Mr Blake at Tamworth, which however he thought fit to decline: and ſo great a contempt had he for the world and its emoluments, that when he was ſollicited to preach before the Protector, and offered to be recommended to his favour, he refuſed it. In ſhort, he was a perſon of true piety, candour, and ſincerity; who to an indefatigable induſtry in his Studies and the buſineſs of his Calling, added an univerſal charity (7).

(7) Calamy, as before, Vol. II. P. 745. and Continuation, Vol. IV. p. 845. Kennet's Hiſtor. Reg. 896, 917.

With this gentleman, who was admitted of Bennet College about the ſame time with himſelf, Dr Spencer contracted an early and intimate acquaintance, which, notwithſtanding their differing notions about Conformity, continued to the end of Hill's life; as appears by a correſpondence of Letters referred to by Calamy, wherein the Doctor expreſſes a high regard and affection for him; and made him ſome kind and generous offers, whenever he ſhould have a ſon fit to ſend to the Univerſity. His charity indeed to Nonconformiſt miniſters, if good and pious men, was, it ſeems, ſo extenſive, that he, with the learned Dr Henry More, made one of them [Mr Robert Wilſon] their Almoner, in this branch of it (8).

ment of the church and ſtate, as a ſcheme which was bringing down God's judgments on the Nation. Dr Spencer's preſervative was publiſhed under the title of, A diſcourſe concerning prodigies: wherein the vanity of preſages by them is reprehended, and their true and proper uſe aſſerted and vindicated [E], in 1663, 8vo; and, to complete this view, he added a further

[E] A Diſcourſe concerning Prodiges, &c.] However mouldy with age this vulgar error may be grown at preſent, ſo as to have loſt every inducement to handle it; yet that was far from being the caſe, when it was expoſed in this piece, by our Author. He declares, that his thoughts were engaged upon the argument by a conſideration of the ſeaſonableneſs thereof. 'We 'have of late, ſays he (9), been perſuaded by three 'or four ſeveral impreſſions of books (more than were 'ever vented in any ethnick or Chriſtian Common-'wealth, in a much longer period of time) that Eng-'land is grown Africa, and preſents us every year, 'ſince the return of his Majeſty, with a new ſcene of 'monſtrous and ſtrange ſights; and all held forth to 'the people, like black clouds before a ſtorm, the 'harbingers of ſome ſtrange and unuſual plagues, ap-'proaching to the ſtate. And this by Perſons (for the 'Prefaces ſpeak in the plural) pretending an intimacy 'with Scripture, Fathers, Greek and Latin, Ancient 'and Modern Writers; an example more juſtly me-'riting the public wonder, than any thoſe books con-'tain; but that the nation (like the womb of Rebeckah) 'carries ſuch ſtriving and conteſting parties therein. 'The Poets (proceeds he) feign the Giants, the Sons 'of Earth, to have bidden battle to the Gods, and to 'have periſhed by a thunderbolt, in the confidence of 'that attempt; and the Earth, their mother, to re-'venge the death of her ſons, to have brought forth 'their laſt ſiſter, Fame. A fable expounded by the 'excellent Verulam, of unquiet and ſeditious perſons '(a kind of Filii Terræ, the creatures of the people, 'uſually envious againſt their Rulers, and ſoon weary 'of the preſent ſtate of things) who when cruſhed and 'ruined in their attempts againſt the Gods on earth, 'their rightful Governors, their fall is avenged by a 'Fama querula et ſeditioſa (a feminine ſedition), popular 'clamours, libels, odious repreſentations of them to 'derive upon them the common envy; with which 'may be numbered the report of ſtrange prodigies or 'prophecies, giving hopes of ſome approaching change 'of affairs: an obſervation which I am ſure will offend 'none that are ſtudious of that ſacred character, Perſons 'which are quiet in the land.' Here we ſee the treatiſes, mentioned above, plainly intimated; but they are expreſsly named in the body of the work, which he opens with a diviſion of prodigies in general, into ſignal and penal; after which, entering into particulars, he begins with Comets, as generally thought the moſt plauſible pretenders to the honour of prophetic ſymbols, eſpecially with regard to public calamities, as the deaths of ſovereign Princes, &c. And having ſhewn this to be a very unſafe pretence, he proceeds to maintain, that it is alſo a very falſe one. 'For, ſays he, there ſure have 'happened many deaths of Princes never honoured 'with the ſolemnity of any precedent Comet, or other 'objects of wonder, and many Comets which never 'ſeemed to blaſt the affairs of the world by any envious 'and malignant aſpect thereupon: Almoſt four years 'and a half, continues he, are paſſed from us ſince the 'Nation was firſt alarmed with the dreadful news of 'ſtrange ſights in heaven and earth, and yet (with all 'due thankfulneſs to God be it ſpoken) never did theſe three 'national felicities, PEACE, HEALTH, PLENTY, more 'bleſs our habitations in any much longer period of time: 'ſo that we have almoſt ſeen the ANNUS MIRABILIS

In purſuing the ſubject, alluding to the ſtory of Samſon, he obſerves, that it was much more difficult to find out the lock in which the ſtrength of this error (11) Chap. V. Sect. 1. p. 505.
lay, than it was, when found, to cut it off (11). To make this diſcovery is therefore his firſt and principal taſk; and, in that inquiry, having, with no ordinary ſagacity and inſight into human nature, laid open the ſeveral weakneſſes and foibles therein, which give root to this pernicious weed, he proceeds to ſhew how abundantly it is watered from the ſpring of Authority. In which reſpect he obſerves, that it may be called the error of the world, having been juſtified by the united ſuffrages of Jews, Gentiles, Chriſtians, ancient, modern, learned, and ſimple. 'As for the Jews, ſays he, if a 'good law be any indication of bad manners, we may 'conclude them not free from the infection of this error. 'God enjoyned that there ſhould not be found among 'them any that uſed divination, or an obſerver of times (12), 'מְעוֹנֵן, which the LXX renders by τηρητὴν καιρῶν, 'a regarder of prodigies and ſtrange accidents. And 'we find them, upon the appearance of armed troops 'in the air, a little before the approach of Antiochus, 'praying that the omen might be turned to good (13).' However the Heathens were leavened with this fond notion, the very names and titles, Monſtra, Oſtenta, Prodigia, Portenta, whereby they uſed to expreſs any anomalous inſtances of nature, are but too pregnant a demonſtration, all of them carrying in their original a promiſe of foreſhewing ſomewhat future (14). Among thoſe he expreſsly cites Herodotus (15), Livy (16), Valerius Maximus (17), Plutarch in his Lives (18), Dio Caſſius (19), Pliny (20), Tacitus (21), Ammian. Marcell. (22), and affirms it of all the other Hiſtorians, Polybius only excepted; and he too, upon the expectations of an encounter with Hannibal, tells us (a matter not uſual with him) that every temple was full of ſigns and prodigies (23): as alſo of Virgil (24), Lucan (25), Ovid (26), among the Poets. Of the Chriſtians he produces Tertullian, who calls a Vulcano teſtimonium igni æterno; and St Auſtin (27), though, to do him right, ſays he, I find none ſo expreſs as Origen, who, ſpeaking concerning Comets, tells us, it hath been obſerved, Ἐπὶ μεγάλοις τεθνήξεσι παράλημασι, &c. that ſo often as any eminent changes happen in the earth, ſuch ſtars have been known to ariſe; foreſhewing the tranſlation of kingdoms, or wars, or whatever may happen of force ſufficient for any great commotions here below (28). Among learned, modern Authors, to paſs over ſome of our firſt Reformers, as Luther, Melanchthon, and others, he finds Grotius himſelf ſpeaking of Comets, Vulcanoes, and the like, as ſigns which uſually precede great changes of affairs (29). Nay even Machiavel and Pomponatius (the latter an avowed Atheiſt, and the former generally thought a more faſt retainer to Atheiſm than Superſtition) both abetted the obſervance of prodigies (30). Laſtly, as to the ſimple and common ſort of people, Prodigy hath always appeared to them as a word clothed about with Death, and a Comet creates them more ſolemn thoughts than Hell. With theſe may be ranked the Compilers of the Sibylline Oracles, whoſe heads are for the moſt part ſo full crammed and ſtuffed with reading, as to leave no room for common judgment (31); but are occaſionally mentioned by our Author, without, as not worthy of, any further notice: of the ſame ſtamp are alſo the Authors cited in the margin (32). But being apprehenſive that the authority of a Divine of our own Church, Dr Jackſon, on account of his ſignal piety and great learning, might have a greater influence, than all the reſt put together, upon the people, whom he was endeavouring to undeceive, he taſks himſelf to diſcuſs the reaſoning at large of that worthy Author, who ſo far received prodiges ὡς Θεῖα κηρύγματα, as God's viſible Sermons of Repentance, that we are informed he wrote a juſt treatiſe (loſt in his life-time) concerning Prodigies, or Divine Forewarnings betokening Blood (33).
'As to which, ſays Dr Spencer, I profeſs myſelf not 'greatly tempted to follow its caſual loſs with any 'deep ſighs, and that not only becauſe men's under-'ſtandings have been too much undervalued by books 'of that nature, already extant, to a number ſufficient 'to a cure of the moſt troubleſome curioſity in ſuch 'inquiries. But becauſe the few prodigies and ſigns 'of the times, commended with great ſeriouſneſs to 'our notice in his Sermons on Luke (34) (taken for the 'moſt part out of Herodotus, Livy, Valerius Maximus, 'and Machiavel) will appear to any man that does not 'uſe to ſtart at ſhadows, too thin and weak to bear 'up any ſuch weighty and ſerious concluſions, as he 'teacheth his Reader to build upon them (the know-'ledge whereof I had rather ſhould be owing to the 'Reader's curioſity, than to my rehearſal.) Now, I 'think, we may make ſome judgment of the value of 'the whole piece, by the coarſeneſs of a remnant 'thereof (35). Becauſe it deſigned an Errorum Apo-'teoſis, a kind of conſecration of the greateſt part of 'the errors and follies of the Gentile Superſtition, as 'appear, in a high degree of probability, from thoſe 'words which fall from him in the forecited papers; 'where (ſpeaking of ſuch kind of portenta and ſigns of 'heaven, at which the Heathens uſed to be diſmayed) a further reproof of their pretended Prophets in A ſhort treatiſe concerning Vulgar Prophecies [F], which was ſubjoined to the ſecond edition of the former piece in 1665, 8vo. He

' he thus delivers himſelf. Though to believe as much concerning the ſigns of the times as the Heathens did; though to make as good, or better uſe of them than they did, be not ſufficient to acquit us from ruin and deſtruction foreſignified; yet not to believe as much as they did, not to make ſo good uſe as they did, not to be ſo much affected as they were, is enough, and more than enough, to condemn us, enough to bring that ruin and calamity, which they portend or foreſignify, inevitably and in full meaſure upon us. A ſtrange ſpeech! What is this at beſt, but to ſet Chriſtians aurum colligere ex ſtercore (36), to gather the gold of devout fears, and chriſtian foreſights from the dung and droſs of all the ethnic Oſtenta, and auſpicious obſervations, wherever occurring? In proceeding, our Author enumerates the many bad uſes, inſtead of any good ones, which the Heathens made of theſe things, and then aſks, Where did we ever find that theſe pretended alarms from heaven did waken them out of that profound ſleep, into which in the darker times of Gentiliſm they were fallen, and perſuade them, or any others into a correction of their lives and manners? Upon theſe accounts, continues our Author, were I inclined to an obſervation of Omens and Prodigies, I ſhould (as Prodigies uſed to be differently interpreted) make an inverted uſe of the Reverend Publiſher of the Doctor's Work, [Reader, write this Prodigy, That this treatiſe alone concerning Prodigies ſhould be loſt, and that in the Author's life-time (37),] and conclude, that God in favour to the underſtandings of men, provided that, like the dead body of Moſes, it ſhould lie buried, none knowing where, that ſo it might not be made an Idol of, which perhaps the reverence of ſo great a name, might have inclined ſome unto. For the prevention of which miſchief, having declared further, that the Doctor's Error might be eaſily pardoned to his ſingular piety and learning, the light and luſtre of which, like that of the ſun, may eaſily hide any of his ſpots and blemiſhes from the ſeverer eyes and notices of the world; he obſerves, that great minds, like the heavenly bodies, though they are moved, for the main, with the force of the primum mobile, the weight and evidence of truth; yet they appear ſometimes to have their declinationes proprias, ſome private motions and declinations of their own, to which their peculiar genius, impreſſions from the age, or their education, may very fatally betray them. This opinion of Prodigies and Signs of Events future, which the general ſtrain of his writings ſpeaks his mind hugely poſſeſſed and dyed withal, I am ready to reckon among thoſe Idola ſpecus, falſe notions, which the black and melancholy manſion his excellent ſoul appears to have dwelt in, did abuſe his mind withal. Any Events extraordinary in the world, ſeem all along to have had a great impreſſion upon his ſoul, and ſeem expounded ſometimes with a little more ſolemnity, than their juſt value and moment will well warrant and allow. Melancholy is of a very impreſſive temper, and poetick nature, and is apt, like a dark room, to receive in the images of objects without, in very monſtrous and antick figures, and repreſentations. The Greek Phyſician (38) hath noted of perſons acted by it, that εἰς δεισιδαιμονίαν τρέπονται, they are eaſily turned to ſuperſtition.' Our Author concludes theſe animadverſions with the following Apology. ' I ſhould not have here ſpoken ſo much, not to his, but my own prejudice, of ſo reverend a Perſon, but that I am deſirous to cut off all the locks, wherein I can but conceive the ſtrength of this ſuperſtitious perſuaſion may lie, which (as weeds do by good grounds) tends but to eat out the heart and ſtrength of that devout fear, from which it ſeems to ſpring (39).' In like manner, this extract of it, long as it is, may, it is hoped, not be thought tedious or impertinent, as it ſupplies an omiſſion in Dr Jackſon's Article, where this weakneſs or defect in that great and good man's Judgment being paſſed over in a dead ſilence, might ſerve to impeach our work of want of impartiality in reſpect to his character. At the ſame time, to avoid the like imputation with regard to the ſubject of this Article, let it be obſerved, that Dr Spencer himſelf, while he is labouring to ſhame this ſpecies of ſuperſtition, will ſeem, to ſome perſons at leaſt, not to have purged his mind wholly from the leaven of every tincture of it, whilſt he is found, for inſtance, in ſpeaking of the Appearances of Good Angels (40), which he maintains to be rarely given; ' I ſay, continues he, rarely, not never, leſt I ſhould ſpeak without book. To omit ſome very probable relations of this nature, that apparition is uſually thought an Herald from heaven, which amidſt a great attendance came and adviſed James the Fourth of Scotland, in whoſe Councils at that time the concerns of a nation were wrapt, to forbear ſome evil practices, but eſpecially the fighting of his intended battle with the Engliſh, in theſe words, Rex ego ad te miſſus ſum, ut te admoneam ne quo inſtituiſti progrediaris; quam admonitionem ſi neglexeris, non erit e Re Tua nec Eorum qui te comitabuntur, which council he neglecting, himſelf with moſt of his Nobles and Army fell in that fatal battle (41).' Neither will that opinion, although eſpouſed and defended painfully by a late learned and ingenious writer (42), paſs altogether without the cenſure of a too eaſy credulity from ſome, where he aſſerts, that when the Jews, in the aſſiſtance of Julian the Emperor, aſſayed the reſtoring of their ruined Temple, and ſo to oppoſe Moſes to Chriſt, God miraculouſly determined the controverſy. It is ſupported too by the ſame argument, which is chiefly inſiſted on by his Follower in anſwer to ſome other alledged inſtances of a like Divine Interpoſition, viz. ' that none of theſe (to uſe our Author's own words) reach this ſingular one in any points and angles of ſimilitude, and that the diſpute at Jeruſalem was not (as in thoſe) between Paul and Cephas, but between God and Belial; and thirdly, that Judaiſm and Gentiliſm were cauſes evidently devoted in Scripture, and the Judgments following them, were but the accompliſhments of its predictions, and the executions of a Scripture Sentence upon them (43).' To the like charge of credulity in our Author is liable his aſſertion, that the Earthquake, Thunder and Lightning, by which the Heathen Temple was deſtroyed, were produced by a miraculous Divine Interpoſition, as alſo that terrible fire, as he juſtly calls it, which iſſued out of the ground in the ſecond year, not long after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem and the Jewiſh Temple, and laid in aſhes the Temples of Jupiter Capitolinus, Neptune, Iſis, Serapis, the Pantheon, and their other devoted places; ' ſo ſtrange an inſtance, ſays he, that the Ethnick Hiſtorian makes this Judgment thereupon Malum id Divinum potius quum humanum videtur fuiſſe (44).' However, theſe ſlips, if they are ſuch, may be eaſily pardoned upon ſo arduous a ſubject as that of tracing the various ſteps of Providence in the moral government of the world. Whilſt we ſee the general, the pernicious error, ſo incident to human nature, of preſaging by Prodigies, completely hunted through all its many windings, and ferretted out of every cover, which either a perverſe wit, or an abuſed learning, could ſuggeſt to ſkreen it. To do this effectually (as it is done by our Author) required a larger ſtock of Learning, directed by a more ſolid Judgment, and pointed with a brighter Wit. And in doing this, he has alſo occaſionally interſperſed the work with ſeveral collateral remarks, and dropt ſuch excellent hints, as have proved highly ſerviceable to the reputation of thoſe who have proſecuted them. For inſtance, in ſpeaking of the ſeveral ſtrange alterations conſequent to the murder of Cæſar, and precedent to the battle at Philippi, recorded with the moſt ſolemn regards of the Heathen Poet (45); he obſerves, that theſe Prodigies as much commanded the ſerious fears, and ſolemn obſervations of many Chriſtians, at the time of his writing this book, as they did of the Heathens heretofore; and having aſcribed this to the great power and authority of a traditional ſuperſtition, as the moſt eaſy and natural account of it, he proceeds thus: ' But that which might poſſibly much aſſiſt this tradition, was the ſucceeding of Rome Chriſtian as into the place, ſo into very many of the rites and uſages of Rome Pagan, as might be eaſily made appear at large, were that our buſineſs (46).' I doubt not but the Reader's eye is already caſt upon Dr Conyers Middleton's Letter from Rome, ſhewing an exact conformity between Popery and Paganiſm, &c. which is eſteemed the beſt performance of his upon the ſubject of Religion (47).

[F] A Diſcourſe concerning Vulgar Prophecies, &c.] The whole title runs thus, A Diſcourſe concerning Vulgar Prophecies, wherein the Vanity of receiving them as the certain Indications of any future Event, is diſcovered, and ſome Characters of diſtinction between true and pretended Prophets, are laid down. In the Preface he obſerves, ' that among the many giddy fancies and errors of the ' late

(47) It will ſcarcely admit of a queſtion that he had read this, as well as the other pieces of Dr Spencer, ſince he cites his grand work, De leg. Heb. in the Pref. to this very Let. as well as in ſeveral other of his Works, as he does alſo the Diſcourſe of the Vanity of Vulgar Prophecies at the end of the Diſcourſe upon Prodigies of near affinity to it.

He proceeded Doctor of Divinity the ſame year, and was preſented by his College to the rectory of Landbeach All-ſaints in Cambridgſhire, July 23, 1667. In this preſentation he ſucceeded Dr Wilford, then Maſter of the College, who, dying on the 18th of July this year, was alſo ſucceeded in that poſt by Dr Spencer, after a long ſucceſſion by Royal Mandamus, who was unanimouſly elected by the Society to preſide over them on the 3d of Auguſt following, as he did with great prudence and reputation for twenty-ſix years. In September the ſame year he was preferred by the King to the Archdeaconry of Sudbury in Suffolk, upon the promotion of Dr Sparrow to the Biſhopric of Exeter, as he was in like manner to a Prebend in the church of Ely, upon that of Dr Pearſon to the ſee of Cheſter in 1672, and to the Deanery thereof about five years after, upon the death of Dr Mapletoft, into which he was inſtalled on the 29th of September, 1677 (e). He publiſhed a Latin diſſertation concerning Urim and Thummim the following year. In the interim he had been choſen Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity in 1673 (f); and being in that office when the Duke of Monmouth was elected their Chancellor, his Grace was received, upon his inſtalment at Worceſter-houſe, September 3, 1674, with a ſpeech by Dr Spencer, which is inſerted below [G]. In September, 1683, the Doctor reſigned the rectory of Landbeach in favour of 'late times, bred like the worms in the manna, out 'of the body of our government and diſcipline, this 'was the πρῶτον ψεῦδος, leading impoſture, that the 'true ſeculum ſpiritus ſancti was now coming upon 'the world, wherein the immediate Teachings of 'God ſhould antiquate the more dead and obſcure 'Teachings of the Goſpel, as thoſe did the more 'weak and cloudy Inſtructions of the Law; that the 'minds of Holy Men ſhould conceive, like the Virgin 'Mary, by the ſole overſhadowing of the Holy Ghoſt, 'without any aſſiſtances from Man, or human Litera-'ture. That men ſhould be authorized and aſſiſted 'to the due performance of the duties of publick 'preaching and praying by the incitements of God up-'on the place. That God was about no new work, 'but his ſecrets were ſtill made known to the Faithful. 'That the mighty impreſſions and propenſions upon 'the ſpirits of the Faithful, was an interpretative voice 'from Heaven, a kind of Bath-Col to ſupply the de-'fect of Scripture-Prophecy, in diſpenſations more 'dark and enigmatical. Whence it came to paſs, 'that every morbid heat of paſſion, and blind zeal, was 'chriſtened by the name of Ignis Sacer, the ſacred im-'preſs and diſcovery of the Holy Ghoſt, and every 'crazy fancy and dream, dubbed a Prophetick Viſion.' In the concluſion he intimates, 'that his deſign in this 'piece was to further and facilitate a dutiful obedience 'to the penal ſtatutes, enacted to prevent the ſpreading 'of ſeditious prophecies. Since while good laws are the 'beſt ſecurity of the peace, ſober principles laid down 'in the minds of the people, are the beſt ſecurity of the 'laws.' This profeſſed loyal motive for the undertaking, is ſpecified as being another inſtance, added to that of the preceding diſcourſe, of that particular merit, which drew upon him the regards of his Majeſty, who rewarded it ſhortly after with the preferments mentioned in the Text. In general, the ſeaſonableneſs of both theſe diſcourſes at the time of publiſhing them, is manifeſt; and there is one remark, at leaſt, that may be thought not unſeaſonable in the preſent time, in this latter piece, only by taking the word Prophecy in its larger ſenſe, as it denotes teaching and inſtructing the people in ſacred matters, our Author's Obſervations may be truly applied to the Methodiſt Teachers and their Followers, where he obſerves, that Prophecy had been wiſely reſerved to the cognizance of Perſons of more exerciſed minds; 'becauſe human nature un-'diſciplined, is ſo extremely prone to meet things 'pompous and vehement with very ſacred and ſolemn 'thoughts, and to think (as the Frogs in the Fable by 'the block which fell upon them) if the Perſon make 'a great noiſe and buſtle, come attended with flaming 'expreſſions, pathetical devotions, ſingularities of 'geſture and phraſe, affected ſilences and ſeverities, 'that he is Διοπετὴς, ſent from God extraordinary to 'rule their minds and lives (48).' To the ſame purpoſe is the remark he makes in his former diſcourſe, that 'it had been the great error of moſt times, that be-'cauſe men ſaw the people to be weak and eaſy; there-'fore they choſe to inſtruct them to piety, either by pic-'tures and rites, or elſe by fantaſtical fears, legends, pa-'thetical orations, odious or faſhionable phraſes, tones 'and geſtures, all which made them worſe fools than 'they found them, giving them furious zeal, ungover-'nable ſpirits, flatulent religions, talkative tempers, 'giddy and unſettled heads (49):' which the Methodiſts and their Followers would do well to conſider.

'May it pleaſe your Grace,

'We come not hither in confidence of ſo vain a 'thought, that all our addreſs and ceremony can de-'rive any honour upon your Grace's perſon; your own 'great actions have put ſuch a glory about your head 'abroad, and your excellent virtue and temper have 'given your Grace ſo great a place in the hearts of 'men at home, that we can have as little deſign, as 'we have power, to add luſtre to ſo great a name; nor 'do we approach this preſence to give any aſſurances 'to your Grace's fortune, that in the credit of our nu-'merous and united ſuffrages, your Grace might bear 'yourſelf the better againſt the zeal and envy of a mi-'ſtaken multitude. It is your Grace's happineſs, that 'your fortune is ſolid as your virtue, and that, like the 'ſun, though moving in ſo high an orb, you have no 'angry creatures to open their mouths againſt you; 'but numbers that rejoice in your riſing, and pay you 'a hearty worſhip and obſervance; nor do we come to 'barter our praiſes, or that by the arts and enchant-'ments of a little oratory, we might poſſeſs your 'Grace with a good opinion of us; for we need no 'charms to provoke a flaming and an eaſy love, and 'it is our happineſs, that we have a Chancellor now, 'whoſe mind is great as his place, as liberal and inge-'nuous as the arts and ſciences he is pleaſed to pa-'tronize; and in this aſſurance, we approach your 'Grace's houſe as we do a temple, not to crouch and 'flatter, but to pay a Debt, and expreſs our Joy; and 'becauſe we have nothing better, we preſent ourſelves 'to your Grace in a great and juſt reſentment of your 'goodneſs in receiving us to the honour of your care 'and patronage, and pawning your virtue and intereſt 'for our future happineſs, which toucheth us already 'with the better and more affecting pleaſure, becauſe we 'have the freſh remembrance of an Iliad of evils to en-'dear it to us. Thoſe unhappy days are not far removed 'from our thoughts, in which as the other eye of the 'nation was blood-ſhot, ſo this, which your Grace 'ſecures, was clouded, and in danger of being put out. 'We can eaſily remember, when our gowns were anti-'chriſtian, our charters and privileges the eaſy triumph 'of our envious neighbours, when to profeſs igno-'rance was not only a piece of philoſophy (as of old) 'but of religion, and when to ſpeak reaſon, was ſuſ-'pected; but to defend it, was heretical. But your 'Grace's particular affection and concernment have 'placed us above the fear of a returning cloud, and 'aſſured our Mother, the Univerſity of Cambridge, 'that it ſhall be difficult now for her Adverſaries to 'foreſee her end, as it is for her friends to diſ-'cover when ſhe did begin. Nor can we have cauſe to 'doubt but we ſhall hold theſe privileges in effect and 'truth, which we have often held before but in parch-'ment and imagination; and we can as little doubt, 'but knowledge ſhall thrive and flouriſh, while your 'Grace (like Pallas) is the great Patron of Arts as well 'as Arms. The advancement of learning and inge-'nuity, is the moſt noble and humane work, and uſe-'ful ſtudy and buſineſs of all civil nations in a time of 'a peace; and your Grace's charter makes us eaſily 'believe, you'll acquit yourſelf as a great maſter of 'the arts of Peace, as you have of War, and as fit to 'deſign and conduct the conqueſt of the intellectual 'world, as you are of the ſenſible and material. In of his kinſman, Mr William Spencer, A. M. and Fellow of the college *; and in 1685 he publiſhed at Cambridge, in two Tomes Folio, his famous Work, intituled De legibus Hebræorum ritualibus, & earum rationibus libri tres (g) [H], which met with ſuch general approbation, that it was reprinted, cum Indice rerum et verborum, at the Hague, 1686, 4to, and again in 1705 at Leipſic [I]. That, after a life ſpent in the cloſeſt application to his ſtudies [K], the aſthma, to which he had been moſtly ſubject, put a period to it, at his

'an eaſy proſpect of ſuch great felicities, we could not 'reſt aſſured of your Grace's pardon, nor of our own, 'if we ſhould not bow our heads, and kiſs the hands 'which conveyed them to us; we think it a leſs treſpaſs againſt good manners to trouble your Grace a 'little further, than to ſay nothing of the fountain of 'our and your Joys, though we can never ſay enough.

'His Majeſty's letter is the charter whereby we hold 'our preſent happineſs, and have an honour equal to 'the biggeſt ambition we could conceive: it is his 'royal favour, to which we muſt intitle the advantages 'we can promiſe ourſelves from your Grace's power and 'goodneſs; by which eminent and ſurprizing favour, 'his Majeſty hath made a great and wiſe proviſion for 'the advantage of learning and knowledge in his 'kingdoms, and hath given us a full aſſurance, that he 'hath no deſign to ſerve upon an ignorant and unde'ſerving people; that he deſires to be King of Men, 'and to appear the Defender of Reaſon, as well as 'Faith, and profeſſes a religion that dares come, not 'only where men can believe, but where they can diſ'cern, and judge. For ourſelves, we can return ſo 'great a grace and favour only with our thankfulneſs, 'and moſt hearty wiſhes, that your Grace may long 'enjoy this office amongſt us, with a ſatisfaction (if it 'were poſſible) equal to that with which you were elected 'to it; and that your Grace's government may have 'ſo kind an influence upon our minds and ſtudies, 'that his Majeſty's reign may be bleſſed like that of 'Solomon's, with a general peace, and men of wiſdom 'and learning, eminent beyond all the examples of 'foregoing times.'

[H] De legibus Hebræorum.] His deſign, in this elaborate work, is to prove, by a detail of the particulars, that all the rights and ceremonies of the Jewiſh religion were inſtituted in oppoſition to the practices of the idolatrous nations round about them. The ſubject had been long upon his mind, as appears from ſeveral paſſages in his diſcourſe concerning prodigies; in one of which he expreſsly declares, 'that many of the critical 'rites and uſages appointed the Jewiſh nation will be 'found to reſolve into the Divine purpoſe to croſs and 'thwart, by his commands, the rites of the Zabii, the 'Egyptians, and other neighbouring nations, which had 'the Devil for the great maſter of their religious cere'monies (51).' The opinion is entirely ſpeculative, in which the eſſentials of the religion being no way concerned, it has been argued pro and con by various learned writers, particularly Huetius (52), Sir John Marſham (53), Calmet (54), as alſo incidentally by Dr Conyers Middleton (55) on the ſame ſide with our Author, and Mr Samuel Shuckford (56) on the other ſide, as beſt ſuited their preſent deſign. However, it is agreed, I think, on all hands, that Dr Spencer has examined the queſtion with more diligence, and treated it with more learning and judgment than any author whatſoever.

[K] A life ſpent in the cloſeſt application to his ſtudies.] In a letter from Cambridge, dated Feb. 25, 1738, we have the following account of the Doctor's way of life, as related by one Mrs Trevor, who had been a ſervant to him: That he uſed to riſe by five or ſix at fartheſt in a morning, and go to bed at ten; that his chief time for ſtudy was in the forenoon. He had not much acquaintance; but the chief that ſhe remembered were Biſhop Teniſon, Biſhop Moore, and Biſhop Greene. That he was a plentiful eater himſelf, and lived in a very hoſpitable and charitable manner. The only exerciſe he uſed was the dumb bell. He bought a horſe ſome time before he died, but never uſed him. That he died of the aſthma, to which diſtemper he was chiefly ſubject. This letter was ſent to Dr Alured Clerke, who had been bred at Bennet College, and apparently had made the inquiry, ſince he had ſome connection with our Author's familiar friends, as will be ſeen in the account we have of him, which, becauſe he was a Divine of merit, cannot be deemed unworthy of a place here; as follows: He was the ſon of Alured Clerke, Gent. of Godmancheſter in Huntingtonſhire, by Anne, the fourth daughter of Charles Trimnell, Rector of Abbots-Ripton in Hampſhire, and a ſiſter of Charles Trimnell, Biſhop of Wincheſter; and having gone through St Paul's ſchool (58), under Mr John Poſſlethwayte, he was admitted Penſioner at Bennet College, April 1, 1713, where, after taking the degree of A. B. he was made Fellow in 1718, and proceeded A. M. two years after, when he became a candidate for the Rhetoric Profeſſor's place at Greſham College, with Mr Ward, who carried the election. In May, 1723, he was collated to the rectory of Chilbolton in Hampſhire, and inſtalled Prebendary of Wincheſter on the 23d of the ſame month (59). He was appointed one of the chaplains to K. George I, and ſo continued to the late King, who, upon his viſit to the Univerſity in April, 1728, honoured him with the degree of D. D. and promoted him to a Prebend in the church of Weſtminſter, in which he was inſtalled May 8, 1731, being then one of the Deputy Clerks of his Majeſty's cloſet. He was alſo further advanced to the Deanery of Exeter, May 12, 1740. But, being always of a very weak and infirm conſtitution, after a ſhort enjoyment of it, he quitted this life for a better, before he had completed the forty-ſixth year of his age, upon May 31, 1742, and was interred, without any monument, in Weſtminſter-abbey. His benevolent and generous diſpoſition was ſuch as rendered him truly worthy of theſe and much greater preferments, which he ſeemed even not to deſire with the mean view of heaping up wealth to raiſe a family (for this he held in utter contempt) but only for the ſake of enlarging his ſphere of doing good: which he had ſo much at heart, that he ſpared neither labour nor expence in getting a county-hoſpital for ſick and lame perſons, erected at Wincheſter in 1736 (60), the firſt of the kind that was ſet up any where out of London; and he afterwards began the like upon his removal to Exeter (61) (where he had expended a large ſum of money upon the repair of his deanery-houſe) but lived not long enough to ſee his laudable deſign fully executed. So little value had he for money, that he ſpent the whole ſurplus of his annual income in works of charity or hoſpitality; and determined with himſelf never to have in reſerve (how great ſoever his revenue might be) more than a ſum ſufficient to defray the expences of his funeral. Beſides, the ſermons mentioned in the margin, we are aſſured, that in 1738 he publiſhed, in 8vo, (though without his name, and by ſome aſcribed to Lord Hervey) An eſſay towards a character of Queen CAROLINE, whom he highly reverenced, and with whom he had long been a conſiderable favourite. The Dean had a brother, who was admitted at the ſame college under his care in 1719, and, applying himſelf to the Law in Lincoln's-Inn, became an eminent Counſellor, and was enabled by his practice to enlarge his paternal inheritance, and rebuild the houſe at Godmancheſter in an elegant manner. He was choſen Recorder of Huntington in 1731, and member of parliament for that borough in 1740. The following year he was elected for Whitchurch in Hampſhire, upon the recommendation of his patron, the Earl of Portſmouth, and his lodge in the college, on the 27th of May, 1695, in his grand climacteric. As to his funeral, his expreſs orders were, that it ſhould be only decent, and not pompous, and that the whole expence ſhould not exceed two hundred pounds. Accordingly, the reſpects ſhewn thereby to his memory were nothing more than what became his character and ſtation in life. The chief rooms of his lodge, with the hall and chapel, were hung with mourning; and his corpſe was attended to the grave by the Biſhops of Ely and Lincoln, by fourteen Heads of Houſes, by ten Doctors of Divinity, by four Doctors of Law, two Phyſicians, two Profeſſors, by the Maſter elect, and Fellows of the College, and by the Officers of the Univerſity, with many others, who had all of them rings, ſcarves, and gloves. The whole ſolemnity ended with a funeral Oration by the learned Dr Joſeph Beaumont, Maſter of Peter-houſe, and Regius Profeſſor of Divinity. He was alſo, according to his own directions, interred in the College-chapel, near his immediate predeceſſor, Dr Wilford, by the aſcent to the altar (h), under a plain ſtone of black marble, with a Latin inſcription upon it, which may be ſeen in remark [L]. He married Hannah, the daughter of Iſaac Puller, of Hertford, who, dying in 1674, left him only one daughter, named Elizabeth, and one ſon, John; the former of whom lived till the year 1688, when ſhe was buried by her mother, in the chancel of the church of St Benedict in Cambridge. But the latter, his ſon, probably died before. The Atchievement, wherein his arms are impaled, with thoſe of the church of Ely, the college, and his wife, viz. Azure a chevron or, between three eagles diſplayed argent, is ſtill remaining in the antichapel of this college. But he ſtood not in need of ſuch means as theſe to preſerve his memory, ſince the many Acts of benevolence, performed both in his life-time and by his laſt will [M], will be ſo many laſting and was nominated a Baron of the Exchequer in 1742, in the execution of which office, ſitting as one of the Judges, upon the trials of the priſoners in Newgate, at the Old-Baily in 1750, he and the Lord-Mayor, Sir Samuel Pennant, Sir Daniel Lambert, Sir Thomas Abney, Mr Cox the Underſheriff, with ſome others, are ſuppoſed to have caught an infectious diſtemper, which put a period to their lives. He died in May, and was buried at Godmancheſter, where his father, after having lived with his ſecond wife upwards of fifty years, had been interred not long before. He married Anne, a daughter of Biſhop Green, by whom he had one ſon, Thomas, who was a ſtudent in Bennet College, but quitted it for the army in the time of the rebellion in 1745, and has now a commiſſion in the guards (*). The Baron's ſecond wife was Jane, a daughter of Major Mullins, of Winchester, who, with four of her ſons, and two daughters, ſurvived him. He raiſed a laſting monument to his memory in the cauſeway leading from his native town to Newmarket, whereof he was not only the firſt deſigner, but the principal agent in putting it in execution, to the no ſmall emolument both of that and the neighbouring counties (62).

[M] Acts of Benevolence and Charity in his life-time, and by his laſt Will.] Mr Maſters obſerves, that in the point of liberality to the Colleges, he far exceeded all former Benefactors; for in 1687 he purchaſed an eſtate at Elmington, a Hamlet belonging to the pariſh of Oundle in Northamptonſhire, which coſt him 3600 l. in yearly value being upwards of 200 l. This he ſettled upon the College by a deed of gift, dated 1693. In which he appropriated, firſt 20 l. per ann. to the Maſter, and 6 l. more for keeping the Accounts, and viſiting the Eſtate at leaſt twice in three years, with the nomination of a ſcholar, to be called the Maſter's Scholar, and to have 10 l. per ann. paid him quarterly, ſo long as his behaviour ſhall be approved by the Maſter. Dr Spencer alſo doubled the ſtipends of the three ſcholars of Archbiſhop Parker's foundation, to be named by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury; and gave beſides, 5 l. per ann. to the Pincerna (one of the Bible Clerks) with 40 s. to the Puer Cubiculi. The yearly payment of 10 l. is moreover ordered to his Niece, Mrs Elizabeth Spencer, during her life, with 10 l. each to two of his ſervants; after whoſe deceaſe, the whole 40 l. to be equally divided every year upon All-Saints day among ſo many of the Fellows as ſhould have been ſtatutably reſident in the College the foregoing year, and who have not diſcontinued from the College, except in caſe of ſickneſs, above ſixty-three days in that year. And at the Audit, which is to be diſtinct from that of the College, within ten days before or after the firſt of March, every Fellow preſent is to receive 10 s. for his attendance, at which time 10 s. per meſs is to be ſpent in exceedings.

2. The Butler, Pincerna, Cook, and Porter, 5 l. per ann. each (63). And the Overplus of the rents and profits to be put into a ſtrong cheſt, with three locks and keys, and afterwards to be diſpoſed of at the diſcretion of the major part of the Maſter and Fellows (whereof the Maſter to be one) in ſome pious or charitable Acts in relieving the ſick and indigent ſcholars, in repairing the houſes, in buying books for the College-Library, &c. with this reſtriction only, that there ſhall be never leſs than 40 l. remaining in the cheſt. He ordered, that upon any doubts or diſputes which might ariſe, the determination of the Vice-Chancellor, and the two ſenior Doctors of Divinity, ſhould be final, and that each of them ſhould have 13 s. 4 d. for his labour therein.— The Eſtate was veſted in the hands of five Truſtees, two of which, after the death of the others, were to convey the premiſes to three other perſons, being Doctors of Divinity in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and two of them at leaſt Maſters of Colleges (64). Beſides this Deed, the Doctor made a Will, dated the 20th of April, 1693 (65), wherein he appointed his old Friend, Dr Teniſon, then Biſhop of Lincoln, his ſole Executor: and in this he bequeathed 50 l. to ten of the moſt indigent and induſtrious Lads of the College, with the like ſum toward repairs (66), above what he had given in his life-time, and ſuch books as his Executor ſhould think proper for the Library, with the furniture of the parlour and lobby (before the little Eaſt-chamber abutting upon the School-lane) to the lodge, if his Succeſſor would accept of them, and 20 l. to each of the Fellows for a funeral ring. He left likewiſe 100 l. to the Univerſity, to be laid out in books for their uſe; for which he has been ſince enrolled among their Benefactors. And indeed every place, to which he had borne any relation, had ſome ſhare of his bounty. For he gave 200 l. to the Church of Ely, half of which he ordered to be laid out upon a Font, which was accordingly executed in fine marble, curiouſly wrought, with this inſcription round it, Legatum Johannis Spencer, S. T. P. Decani hujus Eccleſiæ. Alſo 50 l. and the furniture of his Deanery-houſe to the petty Canons and ſinging Men, with ſome ſmall legacies to the Vergers, Choriſters, &c. He gave moreover to the poor of the pariſhes of St Mary and Trinity, in Ely, 20 l. and to each of thoſe where he had been a preacher, viz. Landbeach, St Benedict's, and St Gyles's, Cambridge, 5 l. To manifeſt his kindneſs and tenderneſs toward his ſervants, he left them all handſome Legacies, and to ſome Annuities for life. And for his Relations and Friends, he likewiſe made ſuch proviſion, as either their circumſtances or deſerts called upon him to do (67). And laſting teſtimonies of his charitable and munificent diſpoſition, whilſt his writings will ever beſpeak him one of the greateſt ſcholars and divines of the age in which he lived. He ſucceeded in his Fellowſhip by Mr Daniel Scargill, and in the maſterſhip by Dr William Stanley, of whom ſome account is given below [N], for the reaſon therein contained.

And directed further, that if there were any ſurplus of his perſonal Eſtate, after diſcharging his funeral expences, debts, and legacies, it ſhould be diſtributed among his legatees: or diſpoſed of in other Acts of Charity at the ſole direction of his friend and executor, to whom he bequeaths a hundred guineas, with his ſmall repeating-watch, for his trouble.

[N] Some Account of Scargill and Stanley.] To begin with Scargill, who ſucceeded our Author in his Fellowſhip in 1667. He was ſuſpended the year following from his degree of A. B. and expelled both the College and Univerſity for Hobbiſm and Atheiſm, although afterwards reſtored by the latter, upon his public Recantation, which being ſomewhat ſcarce, we ſhall inſert as follows.

'December 7, 1668. Dr Boldero, Vice-Chancellor, 'with eight Heads preſent. Scargill is permitted to 'make a publick Recantation in the Batchelors Schools, 'on Friday next, and to bring a true Copy thereof to 'the Vice-Chancellor, and his Suſpenſion is continued 'till after the Commencement next. But I imagine, 'upon his refuſal to comply with this, they proceeded to ex- 'pell him.

'March 12, 1668. Whereas Daniel Scargill, late 'B. A. of this Univerſity, and of Corp. Chriſti Coll. 'hath been convented, and legally convicted in the 'Conſiſtory, before the Vice-Chancellor and the major 'part of the Heads, to have aſſerted ſeveral Impious 'and Atheiſtical Tenets, to the great Diſhonour of 'God, the Scandal of the Chriſtian Religion and of 'the Univerſity, it is unanimouſly aſſented to by the 'Vice-Chancellor and Heads, that he be forthwith 'expelled the Univerſity—He was actually expelled at 'the ſame time—However upon his ſhewing a Diſpoſition 'to retract his Errors, he was commanded to draw up a 'Recantation, which after being peruſed by the Vice- 'Chancellor and Heads, and ſome Alterations made therein, 'was ſpoke as follows, and afterwards printed at the 'Univerſity Preſs.

'The Recantation of Daniel Scargill, publickly made before 'the Univerſity of Cambridge, in Great St Marie's 'July 25, 1669.

'Whereas I Daniel Scargill, late Batchelour of Arts, 'and Fellow of Corpus Chriſti Colledge, in the 'Univerſitie of Cambridge, being, through the inſti- 'gation of the Devil, poſſeſſed with a fooliſh proud 'conceit of my own wit, and not having the fear of 'God before my eyes: Have lately vented, and pub- 'lickly aſſerted in the ſaid Univerſitie, divers Wicked, 'Blaſphemous, and Atheiſtical poſitions, (particu- 'larly, That all right of Dominion is founded onely 'in Power; That if the Devil were omnipotent, he 'ought to be obeyed; That all moral Righteouſneſs is 'founded onely in the poſitive Law of the Civil Ma- 'giſtrate; That the Scriptures of God are not Law 'further than they are enjoyned by the Civil Magi- 'ſtrate; That the Civil Magiſtrate is to be obeyed, 'though he ſhould forbid the worſhip of God, or 'command Theft, Murder and Adultery, profeſſing, 'that I gloryed to be an Hobbiſt and an Atheiſt; and 'vaunting, that Hobbs ſhould be maintained by Da- 'niel, that is, by me: Agreeably unto which prin- 'ciples and poſitions, I have lived in great licentiouſ- 'neſs; ſwearing raſhly; drinking intemperately; boaſt- 'ing my ſelf inſolently; corrupting others by my per- 'nicious principles and example: To the high diſho- 'nour of God; the Reproach of the Univerſitie; 'the Scandal of Chriſtianitie; and the juſt offence of 'mankinde. And whereas, the Vice-Chancellour 'and Heads of the ſaid Univerſitie, upon notice of 'theſe my foul enormities, upon a full examination 'and clear conviction of theſe premiſed offences, after 'ſuſpenſion from my degree, did expel me out of the 'ſaid Univerſitie: Now I the ſaid Daniel Scargill, 'after frequent conſideration, ſtrict examination, and 'ſerious review of the ſaid Poſitions, do finde, by the 'grace of that God, whom I had denyed, that they are 'not onely of dangerous and miſchievous conſequence, 'inconſiſtent with the being of God, and deſtructive 'to humane ſociety; but that they are utterly falſe, 'the ſuggeſtions of a lying ſpirit, wholly againſt my 'own judgement, reſolved upon better conſideration, 'as well as againſt the common ſenſe of mankinde: 'And I do freely acknowledge the proceedings and 'ſentence of my Governours, the Vice-Chancellour 'and Heads of the Univerſitie, to be juſt and equal, 'agreeable to the Duty of their place, and the Truſt 'repoſed in them; That they could not have done 'leſs to vindicate the Divine honour, and ſuppreſs that 'miſchief growing up in this age, which no former 'hath known.

'And now I Adore and Bleſs the higheſt Majeſty of 'God in his infinite mercy to me, that he hath not 'ſuffered me to go on unreclaimed in my enormous 'principles and practices; but hath made my face to 'be aſhamed, that I may ſeek his name. Righteouſneſs 'belongeth unto thee O Lord, but unto me, and to thoſe 'who have ſeduced me, and to thoſe who have been 'ſeduced by me, ſhame and confuſion of face. Oh what 'height of wickedneſs had I arrived unto! For I 'muſt confeſs my ſelf guilty of impleading the Divine 'Majeſty at the Tribunal of humane wit, making man 'judge whether God ſhould be God or no. Nay, where- 'as the Devil, my tempter, to whom I had harkned, 'doth beleeve and tremble, I, vile wretch, have been 'void of the Faith and Fear of God in the manifold 'manifeſtations of him. Wherefore I humbly aſk 'pardon of God above all, whom I have blaſphemed; 'of my Governours in the Univerſitie, whom I have 'diſturbed; of all Chriſtians, and all men, for the 'great offence I have given unto all; more eſpecially 'of ſo many as have been miſled into any errour or 'vice by me. And I do alſo humbly and earneſtly 'beſeech all men, eſpecially ſo many of the younger 'Scholars as have been ſeduced by me (who now abhor 'what I formerly boaſted to aſſert) that they beware 'by my example of the moſt ſubtile inſinuations of the 'Devil, in the vain oſtentation of their own wit. That 'they lean not to their own underſtanding, but conſult the 'Holy Scriptures, the lively Oracles of God; that 'from thence they may learn φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, to 'be wiſe unto ſobriety, as the holy Apoſtle with great 'wiſdom requires. And now I humbly hope and truſt 'in the infinite mercy of that God, againſt whom I had 'audaciouſly opened my unhallowed mouth, that He 'who hath promiſed that all ſin and blaſphemy ſhall 'be forgiven unto men (excepting onely that reſolved 'malicious blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt) will be 'graciouſly pleaſed to glorifie his mercy in the forgive- 'neſs of my moſt deteſtable errours, and abominable 'ſins. And I thank God that he hath awakened me 'in good meaſure to a juſt deteſtation of the accurſed 'Poſitions aſſerted by me, and of all other like wicked 'principles.

'Wherefore, I do here in the preſence of God, An- 'gels and Men, caſt my ſelf down in a deep dread of 'the juſt judgements and Vengeance of God upon the 'accurſed Atheiſm of this age, acknowledging my ſelf 'to be highly guilty of the growth and ſpreading 'thereof, having contributed what my profane wit 'could deviſe, or my foul mouth expreſs, to inſtill it 'into others, or confirm them therein. And I do 'profeſs, I beleeve (and judge it moſt reaſonable ſo to 'beleeve) that the openly profeſſed Atheiſm of ſome, 'and the ſecret Atheiſm of others, is the accurſed root 'of all that abounding wickedneſs, perjury, ſacriledge, 'debauchery and uncleanneſs in this preſent age: That 'in a deep ſenſe of that wretched part I have acted in 'the propagating thereof, I do now abhor my ſelf in 'duſt and aſhes, and that from the bottom of my heart, 'I do diſclaim, renounce, deteſt and abhor thoſe exe- 'crable Poſitions aſſerted by me or any other: par- 'ticularly,

'1. That all right of Dominion is founded onely in power.

'2. That all moral Righteouſneſs is founded only in the 'Law of the Civil Magiſtrate.

'3. That the Holy Scriptures are made Law onely by 'Civil Authority.

'4. That whatſoever the Civil Magiſtrate commands, is 'to be obeyed, notwithſtanding contrary to Divine moral 'Laws.

'5. That there is a deſirable glory in being and being re- 'puted an Atheiſt; which I implied when I expreſsly 'affirmed, that I gloried to be an Hobbiſt and an 'Atheiſt.

'For theſe unhallowed aſſertions and expreſſions, I 'now find ſuch inward contrition and remorſe, that I 'pray God his mercy may withhold me from Relapſe, 'or his judgements prevent it. But do I think that a 'bare Recantation can ſatisfie for my prodigious offen-'ces? No, Let me do penance all my days, ſubmitting 'my ſelf to God's will, and the charity of pious minds: 'And whatſoever my portion may be in this world, let 'me live and die in the fear of God, and the faith of 'Chriſt. Amen.

'Now leſt any one ſhould miſtake, or ſuſpect this con-'feſſion and unfeigned renunciation of my ſinful and 'accurſed errours, for an act of civil obedience or ſub-'miſſion in me, performed according to my former 'principles, at the command of my Superiours, in 'outward expreſſion of words, though contrary to my 'judgement and inward thoughts of my heart; or that 'I have not now expreſſed the moſt ſincere and ſecret 'ſenſe of my ſoul; I call the Searcher of all hearts to 'witneſs, that I loath and abhor ſuch practices as the 'baſeſt and moſt damnable hypocriſie: That from my 'heart and ſoul I deteſt ſuch principles in all perſons, 'as worſe than the baſeſt villanies and reſervations, 'which the Jeſuites are ſaid to practice or allow. And 'I openly avow, that I do acknowledge, that all per-'ſons ſo principled, ought to be held by all mankinde 'as the moſt dangerous and declared enemies of the 'common faith amongſt men. That they are not to 'be truſted upon any obligation of their faith, or 'pretenſions to piety, loyalty, or common honeſty, 'in any Corporation, Colledge, Univerſitie, City, 'Common-wealth or Kingdom: but, that by thoſe 'principles, deſtructive to all ſociety and commerce 'amongſt men, they may and do delude and defeat all 'Oaths and Proteſtations, all faith given to God or 'man: They may and will comply, if their own In-'tereſt or Advantage prompt them to it, with any In-'vader or Uſurper; with any Faction or growing Sect, 'however deſtructive to all order and the very being of 'humane ſociety in the world. I beleeve alſo, and 'openly avouch, That no power upon earth; no per-'ſwaſion or imagination about natural Right; no opi-'nion in pretended Philoſophie concerning ſelf-pre-'ſervation, can free me from the obligation that is now 'upon me, in this my open profeſſion of Repentance 'for my accurſed errours and grievous ſins, to ſpeak 'the truth in ſincerity before God and man.

'This Recantation and ſincere Profeſſion I make 'willingly and freely, of my own minde and choice: 'not in compliance with the command or will of any 'other; not upon deſign to gain a better opinion 'amongſt men in the world; nor for any worldly ad-'vantage, profit, or ſelf-end of my own: but out of a 'hearty deteſtation of my ſoul errours and ſins; and I 'am glad of this opportunity to diſburden my ſoul, op-'preſſed with the weight of the ſame.

'So help me God.

'DANIEL SCARGILL.

'After the Performance of this Recantation, he was to 'be abſolved by the Vice-Chancellor, when and where he 'pleaſed, and was accordingly abſolved, as the following 'Certificate teſtifies.

'Theſe are to certify whom it may concern, that 'whereas D. S. B. A. late Fellow of C. C. C. C. 'was ſuſpended of his Degree, and expelled the Uni-'verſity, for aſſerting erroneous Tenets, tending to 'Atheiſme, and the ſaid D. S. was abſolved from his 'Suſpenſion, and reſtored to the Univerſity upon his 'Recantation in Great St Marie's Church, July 25, '1669, by Dr Edm. Boldero, Vice-Chancellor.

Sept. 1, 1671. 'Ita teſtor Matt. Whinn, Reg^r.

'He was a native of Cambridge, and after leaving 'the Univerſity, preſented by Edwin Rich to the 'Rectory of Mulbarton in Norfolk, where he married 'Sarah, the daughter of Thomas le Neve of Aſlacton, 'Gent. a woman, as he tells us in her Epitaph, re-'markable for her Piety and Devotion. His Arms 'impaling her's, upon the Monument erected to her 'memory, are Erm. a Saltire Gul. (68). In 1690 'Dudley Scargill, Gent. preſented him to the Vi-'carage of Swerdeſton, which he held by union with 'Mulbarton: but how long he continued poſſeſſed of 'theſe, or what afterwards became of him, I could 'never learn (69).'

(69) Maſters, in the Appendix, No. LI.

Dr Stanley, who ſucceeded our Author in the Maſterſhip of Bennet College, was the ſon of William Stanley, Gent. of Hinkley, in the county of Leiceſter; but his father dying while he was very young, he was left to the ſole care of his mother, who put him to ſchool at Aſhley in Lancaſhire, and afterwards ſent him, in 1663, at the age of ſixteen (70), to St John's College in Cambridge, where he ſtaid till he was choſen into a Fellowſhip of Bennet College, upon the expulſion of Scargill, upon the joint recommendation of his tutor and Biſhop Gunning, then Maſter of St John's, where his County was at that time full. His firſt ſtep out of the Univerſity, and that a very fortunate one, was to the curacy of Much-Hadham in Hertfordſhire, as it placed him not only under the eye and direction of that excellent Divine, Dr Goodman (71), but as it gave him an opportunity of being known to the Earl of Eſſex (whoſe ſeat was there) who made him his Chaplain, and then preſented him, October 29, 1681, to the Rectory of Raine-parva in Eſſex (72); but this he voided ſoon after, viz. October 30, 1682, by ceſſion, for St Mary-Magdalen in Old Fiſh-Street, London, which he quitted in like manner for that of Much-Hadham, beforementioned; being collated thereto, Auguſt 30, 1690, by Biſhop Compton, upon the death of his friend Dr Goodman. Theſe were the only parochial benefices he ever had. But on the 18th of September, 1684, he was preferred to the Prebend of Colington-Major, in the Cathedral of St Paul London, whereof he became a Reſidentiary in 1689, as alſo Archdeacon of London March 5, 169$\frac{1}{2}$, upon the promotion of Dr Teniſon to the See of Lincoln; and he was made Dean of St Aſaph December 7, 1706, which he rather accepted to ſet his Uncle, Biſhop Beveridge, at liberty from the powerful ſollicitations of others, than that he either ſought for, or deſired it. He went over, about 1687, to be Chaplain to the Princeſs of Orange, upon the Diſmiſſion of Dr Covel, when a Clergyman of an unexceptionable Character in every repect, was to be provided by expreſs orders from Holland. Accordingly the Biſhop of London had it in Charge to recommend two ſuch perſons to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was to have the final approbation of one. The two thus recommended, were Dr Burnet, Maſter of the Charterhouſe, and Mr Stanley; to the latter of whom his Grace gave the preference, for this pleaſant reaſon, that although the former was a deſerving man, an ingenious divine, and a good Scholar; yet as Moſes and the Doctor could not agree about making worlds, he thought it was better to chuſe Mr Stanley; who after being further favoured by his Grace about this time, probably with his faculty for a Doctor of Divinity's degree, was forthwith ſent over, and ſoon became a favourite both at Court and with her Highneſs. He likewiſe contracted there a particular acquaintance with the two Huygens, as well as with other perſons of learning and character; being without doubt recommended and ſupported herein by his old friend and fellow-collegian, Mr Villiers, who had attended the Princeſs, upon her marriage, into Holland, and continued there till the Prince's coming over to England in 1688. As ſoon as his royal miſtreſs was ſeated upon the throne, ſhe advanced him to be Clerk of the Cloſet, with a Salary of 200l. per ann. ſettled upon him for life, and always had him in ſuch credit and eſteem, that moſt of her charities paſſed through his hands. She moreover offered him one or two Biſhoprics, which he then declined, as he did alſo the See of Lincoln, which was offered him upon Dr Teniſon's promotion to that of Canterbury; being content with the preferment he had, and his own private fortunes. He found a ſtation of leſs dignity and eclat, more agreeable to his inclinations, and ſuitable to his ſcheme of happineſs in life. However, the death of his old friend, Dr Spencer, brought him (though much againſt his will) into a more public ſcene of it in this Univerſity, being elected thereupon (but without his knowledge) into the Maſterſhip of Bennet College, which yet, upon the firſt notice of his choice, he poſitively refuſed to accept, and perſevered in it till the whole Society, for the ſake of preventing an irreconcileable diviſion among them, as they ſhould not be unanimous in their votes for any other perſon beſides himſelf. This motive had its deſired effect, even though he foreſaw the trouble that would follow, in being elected Vice-Chancellor the ſame year by the Univerſity, who paſſed an extraordinary grace for admitting him to the degree of D. D. with all its privileges, among them, to which an Archbiſhop's faculty could not intitle him. Conſidering upon what motive, and with what reluctance he took the Maſterſhip, it might be expected he would would resign it, as he did in 1698, because he could not be more constantly resident. However, while he held it, he made that valuable catalogue (73) of their manuscript library, which he afterwards printed at his own expence. The college, during his Mastership, being robbed of their communion-plate, he presented them with a set of silver gilt; which are still in use, with the Arms of the Orange family upon it, having belonged to the private chapel of Queen Mary, when Princess, who on her coming to the English Crown, gave it to him as a memorial of her favour and esteem. It pleased God to give him a very healthful, happy, and long life; for he did not die till October 9, 1731, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. When, according to his own directions, he was buried in the Vaulting of St Paul's Cathedral, under the south wing of the choir, among his old Friends, Bishop Beveridge, Dean Sherlock, Dean Younger, Dr Holder, and Sir Christopher Wren, who have none of them, except the last, any monument-stone, or even inscription over them. He married Mary, second daughter of Sir Francis Pemberton, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, who was living in 1753, by whom he had three sons, all educated at Bennet College. Thomas, the youngest, is dead; William, the eldest, is LL. B. and Official of the Archdeaconry of London, and is settled at Warwick; Francis, the second, was Fellow of Bennet College, and afterwards Vicar of St Leonard, Shoreditch, till his father resigned in his favour the Rectory of Hadham, September 30, 1723. Dr Stanley was engaged in many good and useful designs. Among which, was that of printing an Edition of the Councils, in 1692, with Protestant Annotations, by an annual subscription. Several sums were accordingly subscribed, by the two Archbishops 10 l. per ann. each, and by twelve Bishops 5 l. each; Dr Stanley not only did the same, but also, by his interest then at Court, was chiefly instrumental in obtaining a grant to import what papers should be wanting, custom free. Dr Allix undertook the care and management of this edition, and had great quantities of paper imported for it, which, when the design was laid aside, was sold to the Stationers for private gain, to the offence of the public, and regret of the learned world. The Doctor, before he went abroad, was concerned with several others in the scheme of printing an English Bible, with a plain and practical commentary, but more especially levelled against the errors and corruptions of Popery. His own province was to write that upon the Minor Prophets; a scheme that was superseded by the happy establishment of our Church and Nation at the Revolution. The Doctor, when Dean of St Asaph, was at the sole expence (74) of that Act of Parliament, ann. XII. of Queen Anne, which annexed Prebends and Sinecures to the Bishoprics of Bangor, Landaff, St David, and St Asaph, in order to relieve the widows and fatherless of the Welsh Clergy from the sore distress of paying Mortuaries to the Bishops, upon the death of every incumbent, within their respective Dioceses and jurisdictions, 'which Mortuaries (as the preamble to that Act sets forth) consisting of several of the best goods of the 'deceased, did oftentimes amount to a very considera- 'ble part of his estate, and the payment thereof did 'very much lessen that small provision, which generally 'the Clergy of those Dioceses were able to make for 'the support of their families, and tended to the great 'impoverishing of the same.' He likewise rebuilt what is now the best part of his Deanery-house, and made the whole of it habitable, convenient, and decent; where he often resided, and lived hospitably, so long as he was able to take such a journey. He settled a leasehold estate on a Charity-school in that town, and joined with Mr Carter in augmenting the perpetual Curacy of St George, in its neighbourhood. But his gifts towards the Augmentation of small livings by one or two hundred pounds at a time, with the aid of Queen Anne's bounty, were not confined to one County, but extended into different parts of the kingdom, as may be seen in Ecton's List, &c. He was not only a Contributer to the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, and a zealous Promoter of it; but was also the first Mover in the business of their charter (75). To his own church at Hadham he gave a clock, and to the building of the Regent-house at Cambridge, 100 l. Such gifts and benefactions as these could not be hid, though he was as secret, upon Christian principles, as he could be in doing his Alms. What charities therefore he distributed with his own hand, cannot be discovered, as he left no account of them. But so far is known of him, that it was his constant rule, all his life long, to bestow in good works a clear tenth part of his whole Income, whether from spirituals or temporals. Considered as an Author (76), though he published but few things, yet he entered early to take a share in the Popish Controversy, in an Anonymous Discourse concerning The Devotions of the Church of Rome, wherein they are compared with those of the Church of England. London, 1685, 4to. He published also another Anonymous Discourse, intituled The Faith and Practice of a Church of England-man. London, 1706, 12mo. Besides the following Sermons with his Name: 1. A Sermon preached at Lambeth-Chapel, on the Consecration of Dr Tenison, Bishop of Lincoln, January 10, 1691; 2. Another, preached at St Mary le Bow, before the Society for propagating the Gospel, February 20, 1707; and a third, to recommend A Public Collection for the Redemption of Captives. Such was the Character and History of Dean Stanley, which we were the rather inclined to insert here, in order to take off any prejudice that will be apt to arise in reading a paper in the Tatler, where that ingenious writer takes occasion, from the remarkably loud natural tone of the Doctor's voice, to exercise his wit upon him, under the name and character of Stentor.

(70) Biſhop Beveridge, who married his Aunt, was of that College, and which was perhaps a ſtronger motive, Mr Villiers, afterwards Earl of Jerſey (of a Leiceſterſhire family in his neighbourhood) went thither about the ſame time under the tuition of Dr Gower, who is ſaid never to have had any other pupils but theſe two.

SPENSER [EDMUND], frequently stiled the Father of the English Heroic poem, was descended from the ancient family of the Spencers in Northamptonshire [A], but born in London (a), probably about the year 1553 [B]. It is not known where he had the first part of his education;

(a) From Spenser himself in his Prothalamion.

[A] The family of the Spencers in Northamptonshire.] The present Duke of Marlborough is at the head of this family, which was first raised to the peerage in the first year of Jacob. I. in the person of Sir Robert Spencer, by the title of Baron Spencer of Wormleighton in the county of Northampton, who was then reputed to be the richest moneyed man in England (1). It is three of the daughters of his grandfather, Sir John Spencer, Knight, of whom our Poet sings in the following lines.

No lesse praise-worthy are the Sisters three,
The honour of the noble family,
Of which I meanest boast my self to be,
And most that unto them I boast my self so nere,
Phyllis, Charillis, and sweet Amaryllis (2).

(1) Collins's Peerage of Eng. under Spencer Duke of Marlborough.

Their real names were Elizabeth, Anne, and Alice. Elizabeth is the Lady to whom our Poet wrote that Sonnet, which appears before the Fairy Queen, addressed To the most vertuous and beautiful Lady, The Lady Carew. To the same Lady he also dedicated his Muiopotamos. She was married to George Lord Hunsdon. Anne was first the wife of Henry Lord Monteagle, next of Henry Lord Compton, and thirdly of Robert Sackville, Esq; son and heir of Thomas Lord Buckhurst, High Treasurer of England, from whom descended the present Duke of Dorset. She was a widow when Spenser printed his Colin Clout and his Fairy Queen; in both which, by Amintas, is probably meant Henry Lord Compton, her second husband (3). And the verses addressed to the Author of the Fairy Queen, signed R. S. seem to be written by her third Consort, Robert Sackville. Lastly, Alice is the Lady to whom Spenser dedicates The Tears of the Muses. She was first married to Ferdinando Earl of Derby, Ancestor to the present Earl, and afterwards to Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great-Seal of England, from whom is descended the present Duke of Bridgewater (4). Hence it appears, that our Poet was related to many that were then, or are become since, some of the greatest families of the Nation. Not to mention his alliances by the three other Sisters. Margaret married first to Giles Allington, Esq; of Herseheath in Cambridgshire, of the family of Lord Allington, whose estate descended to Charles late Duke of Somerset, as heir at law (5). Katharine married to Sir Thomas Leigh of Stonely, in the county of Warwick, Knt. from whom is descended the present Lord Leigh (6). And Mary married to Sir Edward Aston, of Tixall in Staffordshire (7).

education; but after that we find him at Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, where, his Parents being in low circumſtances, he was admitted a Sizer, and matriculated in 1569 (b). Without neglecting the neceſſary branches of Academical learning, he particularly followed the bent of his poetical genius, and became acquainted with Mr Gabriel Harvey, of Trinity-hall, a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed wit and good ſenſe, as well as a Brother Poet [C], with whom he cultivated an intimate friendſhip, which proved very ſerviceable to him afterwards. However, having continued in the Univerſity till he had taken both his degrees in Arts, he left it unwillingly, ſoon after completing that of A. M. in 1576 (c), not having a competency to ſupport himſelf there any longer, without ſome aſſiſtance from the College, which he had in vain expected [D]. In theſe unhappy circumſtances, it is ſaid, he retired for relief to ſome relations in the North of England (d). But, whatever was the occaſion of his journey, it is certain he had not been long there, before the tenderneſs of his nature drew him into a freſh misfortune; having the ill luck to fix his love upon a miſtreſs, who, though a country laſs (e), did not want the art of leading him into the Lover's paradiſe, in order to make an offering of him as a victim to a more favourite paſſion for his rival (f). For this cruel diſtreſs, finding no other remedy, he ſought a reſource in his Muſe, which naturally ſuggeſted to him the thoughts of venting his grief in paſtoral poetry, and thereby proved an occaſion of immortalizing both his miſtreſs and himſelf, under the appoſite names of Colin and Roſalinde [E]. In the mean time he continued ſtill happy in the friendſhip of Mr

Univerſity, ſuppoſes his admittance at Cambridge, in 1579, to have been at the age of ſixteen. The opinion has been followed by all Authors ſince, and indeed is ſufficiently grounded for a matter of no great moment. It is well known, that we owe moſt of the circumſtances of Spenſer's life to himſelf, and this point would be aſcertained from his Sixtieth Sonnet, where he ſpeaks of himſelf as forty years old, if the time of his writing that Sonnet were certainly known, but this is at leaſt equally uncertain with the time of his admittance at Cambridge. Dr Birch tells us (9), that the Sonnets were written about 1692, and Mr Ball (10) ſays, they were printed that year. It is true, Mr Church's (11) friend obſerves, that in either caſe, Spenſer muſt be born in 1550, that is, if the whole of them was either written or printed in 1692. But then, he ſuppoſes this to be a miſtake, ſince he agrees with Mr Fenton in the date of our Poet's birth in 1553.

[C] He became acquainted with Mr Harvey.] This gentleman, who was one of the prime Wits of his time (12), was born at Saffron-Walden in Eſſex, of mean parentage, but great alliances, like his friend Spenſer; his Father being a Ropemaker, and himſelf nearly related to Sir Thomas Smith, the great Stateſman. Mr Wood ſays (13), his firſt academical breeding was at Chriſt-Church in Cambridge (14), where in a ſhort time he made ſuch a proficiency, as aſtoniſhed his Tutor: taking both his degrees in Arts, he became Proctor of the Univerſity, and grew to be an excellent and learned Poet and Orator. In which way he wrote the following pieces. 1. Rhetor; ſive duorum dierum oratio de natura arte et exercitatione rhetorica; Lond. 1577, 4*to.* 2. Ciceronianus, vel Oratio poſt reditum habita Cantabrigiæ ad ſuos Auditores; ibid. 4*to.* 3. XAIPE vel gratulationem Valdenenſium libri iv. ad Eliz. Reginam; Lond. 1578. in Latin Verſe, preſented to Queen Elizabeth in her progreſs at Audley-End in Eſſex. 4. Smithus; vel Muſarum Lachrymæ pro obitu honoratiſſ. viri Thomæ Smith. 5. Tyranomaſtic. 6. Ode Natalitia. 7. Rameidos. 8. Philomuſos. 9. Anticoſmopolita. 10. A copy of Engliſh Verſes, ſigned Hobbinol, and prefixed to Spenſer's Fairy Queen, which Mr Upton declares are enough, if he had written nothing elſe, to render his name immortal; and Spenſer particularly takes notice how highly he was eſteemed, both by Sir Philip Sidney, and his Friend Mr Dyer. Several pieces of Oratory and Poetry were alſo dedicated to him. After ſome time he was elected a Fellow of Trinity-hall in Cambridge, and applying himſelf to the ſtudy of the Civil Law, he obtained his Grace for a degree in that faculty, and was admitted LL. D. at Oxford, October 13, 1585, to complete which, he ſtood in the Act, July 11, the following year, and practiſed as an advocate in the Prerogative-Court of Canterbury, at London. However, in his elder years, it ſeems, he turned his mind to Aſtrology, in which alſo he became eminent, and wrote Almanacs that were much eſteemed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. But in this way he had the ill luck to fall under the laſh of that noted and wreſtleſs Buffoon, Thomas Naſh, in his Apologie of Pierce Pennileſs, and Have with You to Saffron-Walden, which occaſioned Dr Harvey to publiſh A new Letter of notable Contents: with a ſtrange Sonnet, intituled Gorgon; Lond. 1593, 4*to.* 2. Pierce's Superexogations; or a New Praiſe of the Old Aſſe. A Preparative to certain large Diſcourſes, intituled Naſhes S. Fame; Lond. 1593, 4*to*; with ſeveral letters and ſonnets by the Poets of that time in praiſe of the Author. 3. An Advertiſement for Pap Hatchet, and Martin Marprelate, printed with the former with other things, wherein he tramples much (15) upon Robert Green, who had reflected upon him, and was a Poet, and maker of Ballads, much valued for their mirthful and jocund turn, the titles of which may be ſeen in Mr Wood; who informs us, that Green died about 1592, of a ſurfeit taken by eating pickled herrings, and drinking Rheniſh wine with them: at which fatal banquet Thomas Naſh was preſent, who, in his Apologie of Pierce Pennileſs, makes excellent ſport with him (16). Dr Gabriel Harvey had a brother Richard, who was alſo of Trinity-hall, and became a Divine of note (17); but giving into Aſtrology, ſuffered likewiſe the ſcourge of Naſh who called them both Falſe Prophets, Weather-Wizards, Fortune-Tellers, Mountebanks, Ballad-Makers, &c. Dr Gabriel lived to a great age, dying in the year 1630 (18).

[D] He expected aſſiſtance from the College in vain.] The ſtory of his ſtanding for a Fellowſhip againſt Mr (afterwards Biſhop) Andrews, and loſing the election, related in one account of (19) his life, has been long univerſally rejected (20); and perhaps he left Cambridge, as ſome think, before that election happened (21): however, it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that in his circumſtances, he did not puſh for ſome aſſiſtance, as an exhibition or the like, either in his own or ſome other College, unleſs he was overruled by his Tutor, or the Maſter of the College, which perhaps will not be thought incredible, if that Governor is meant in the following paſſage of a Letter from his Friend Mr Harvey (22). 'And will you, ſays this ſevere Wit, 'needs have my Teſtimonial of your old Controller's 'new behaviour. A buſy and dizzy head, a leaden 'brain, a wooden wit, a copper face, a ſattin breaſt, 'a factious and elviſh heart, a founder of novelties, a 'confounder of his own and his friends good gifts, a 'morning book-worm, an afternoon malt-worm, a right 'Juggler, as full of ſleights, wiles, fetches, caſtes of 'legerdemain, toyes to mock apes with, odd ſhifts and 'knaviſh practices, as his ſkin can hold.' But

——Vivendum eſt recte
Tum propter plurima, tum his præcipue cauſis,
Ut lingua mancipiorum contemnas.

Whatever may be thought of this conjecture, our Poet ſeems to have left Cambridge without any bitter ſpirit of diſappointment. See with what filial piety he remembers his Alma Mater (though to him ſhe proved a Stepmother) where he celebrates the river that runs by her.

There doth by Huntingdon and Cambridge flit,
My mother Cambridge, whom as with a crown,
She doth adorn, and is adorn'd by it,
With many a gentle Muſe, and many a gentle Wit (23).

Yet it is not impoſſible, as Mr Upton (24) conjectures, that this diſappointment might prevent Spenſer's taking holy orders, as was the caſe of Milton; and it is obſervable, that they both afterwards inveighed bitterly againſt the Pride and Luxury of the Clergy.

[E] He fixed his Love upon his Roſalinde.] This Lady's real name is ſtill a ſecret, as well as her family. Spenſer,

Mr Harvey, who, having a true ſenſe of his admirable genius, prevailed upon him to quit an indolent and hopeleſs life in the country, and remove to London (g), where they firſt introduced him to Mr (afterwards Sir) Philip Sidney [F]. This fortunate ſtep anſwered his fondeſt wiſhes: that generous patron of real merit of every kind, and of poeſy in particular, preſently took him into his favour and protection, and introduced him to Queen Elizabeth, who made him Poet Laureat [G]. After this, he was frequently invited to Penſehurſt, where, in company with Sir Philip, he ſtudied poetry and philoſophy, eſpecially the Platonic, which he made good uſe of in his writings. During this interval he finiſhed his ſer, it ſeems, kept it ſo from every body, except his two intimate friends, Mr Kerke and Harvey, who kept their truſt with inviolable fidelity. We are informed indeed by the former, that ſhe was a gentlewoman of no mean houſe, nor endued with any vulgar or common gifts, both of nature and manners, but ſuch as needed neither Colin [Spenſer] be aſhamed to have her made known by his verſes, nor Hobbinol [Harvey] be grieved, that ſo ſhe ſhould be commended to immortality for her rare and ſingular virtues: eſpecially deſerving it no leſs than either Myrto, the moſt excellent poet, Theocritus's darling; or Lauretto, Petrarchi's goddeſs; or Himera, the worthy Poet Stenchorus's Idol (25). We ſee it is here hinted that her name was known to Mr Harvey, which indeed is evident from a Letter of Spenſer to him (26), where having aſſured this friend, that by his advice, he had conſented to addreſs his Paſtorals to Sir Philip Sidney, he mentions the reaſons, which had till then hindered him from doing it, one of which is as follows. 'Then al-'ſo becometh the work too baſe for his excellent Lord-'ſhip, being made in honour of a private perſon un-'known, which by ſome well-willers might be up-'braided not to be worthy, as you know ſhe is.' Mr Kerke (27) goes ſo far as to tell us, that Roſalinde is a feigned name, which, if well ordered, will betray the very true name of his love and misfortunes; and Mr Upton thinks (28), that by well ordered is meant the replacing the letters in their true order, by reſolving the Anagram of which, according to the frequent practice of our Poet, the name of Roſalinde is fabricated. The conjecture is ingenious, and indeed naturally ſuggeſted by Mr Kerke's words. The worſt of it is, that it leaves us as much in the dark as ever. The knot is ſtill inextricable, it is true ſome of Spenſer's Anagrams, as Algrind for Grindal (29) the Archbiſhop, are obvious enough, where he did not aim at a poetical name: but who could have unlocked Hobbinol into Gabriel Harvey, except Spenſer himſelf, who made the Anagram, or his Friends Kerke and Harvey, to whom he revealed it, as he did this of Roſalinde, which, like that of Hobbinol too, was probably not made by a ſimple derangement of the letters of her true name, without the variation and addition of ſome others, as were neceſſary to reduce it to the true poetical name of Roſalinde, under which he wiſhed and intended his Miſtreſs's true name ſhould be concealed. In ſo forlorn a ſtate, Mr Church's friend ventures a conjecture, with a modeſty and diffidence ſuitable to it. He thinks it not impoſſible, that the true name of Roſalinde, which was invented in Kent, might after all be meerly Roſe Lynde, Roſe being a common Chriſtian name; and among the country names in Fuller's Worthies, under Henry VII, there appears at Canterbury the name of John Lynde.

[F] Mr Harvey introduced him to Sir Philip Sidney.] Mr Fenton ſuppoſes his introduction to be made by dedicating his Shepheard's Calendar to Sir Philip, and the ſame opinion is eſpouſed by Dr Birch, notwithſtanding the notorious inconſiſtency of it with ſeveral paſſages in the Calendar itſelf, explained in the notes upon them by Mr Kerke. For inſtance, in the Fourth Eclogue, Hobbinol ſays,

Colin, thou ken'ſt the ſouthern Shepheard's boy,
Him love hath wounded with a deadly dart.

To which lines E. Kerke hath the following note. 'It 'ſeemeth that Colin appertaineth to ſome ſouthern 'nobleman, and perhaps in Surrey or Kent, the rather, 'becauſe he often mentions the Kentiſh Downs.' Again, in the Sixth Eclogue, Hobinol thus ſpeaks of Colin,

Then if by me thou liſt adviſed be,
Forſake the ſoil that ſo doth thee bewitch,
And to the dales reſort, where Shepheards rich,
And fruitful vales been every where to ſee.

'This is no poetical fiction, ſays E. Kerke, but unfeignedly ſpoken of the Poet's ſelf, who for eſpecial 'occaſion of private affairs (as I have partly of himſelf 'been informed) and for his more preferment, re-'moved out of the partes, and came into the South, as 'Hobbinol indeed adviſed him privately.' The point is ſtill more evident from Spenſer's Letter, before cited (31), to Mr Harvey, where, beſides the reaſon there mentioned, he ſets forth the following. 'My 'principal doubts were, firſt, I was minded for a 'while to have intermitted the addreſs of my writing, 'left by overmuch cloying their noble ears, I ſhould 'get a contempt of my ſelf, or elſe ſeem rather for gain 'and commodity, to do it for ſome ſweetneſſe that 'I had already received——Your deſire to hear of 'my laſt being with her Majeſty, muſt die of itſelf. 'As for the two gentlemen, Mr Sidney and Mr Dyer, 'they have me, I thank them, in ſome uſe and fa-'miliarity.' However, Mr Fenton's conjecture is much more tolerable, than the ſtory that Spenſer was a ſtranger to Sir Philip when he had begun to write his Fairy Queen, and that he took occaſion to go to Leiceſter-houſe, and to introduce himſelf by ſending into Sir Philip a copy of the ninth Canto of the firſt Book of that poem. Sir Philip was much ſurprized with the deſcription of deſpair in that Canto, and after reading ſome Stanzas, turned to his Steward and bid him give the perſon who brought thoſe verſes, 50l.; but upon reading the next Stanza, he ordered the ſum to be doubled. The Steward was no leſs ſurprized than his maſter, and thought it his duty to make ſome delay in executing ſo ſudden and laviſh a bounty; but upon reading one Stanza more, Sir Philip raiſed his gratuity to 200l. and commanded the Steward to give it immediately, leſt as he read further he might be tempted to give away his whole eſtate. To ſhame this idle tale (32), we need only obſerve, that the Fairy Queen may be ſaid even to owe its birth to Sir Philip Sidney, who quickly after his acquaintance with our Poet, diſcovered his genius to be formed for higher ſubjects, than thoſe leſſer pieces which he had then wrote, and perſuaded him

For Trumpets ſterne to change the oaten reed.

To the ſame purpoſe alſo we find him in the verſes to the Counteſs of Pembroke, ſent with a copy of the firſt edition of the Fairy Queen, acknowledging that it was her Brother, Sir Philip Sidney,

Who firſt did liſt his Muſe out of the floor.

And in the ſame ſtrain ſings another Poet more expreſsly (33), who ſpeaking of the early part of Spenſer's life, has theſe lines:

To ſeem a Shepheard then he made his choice;
But Sidney heard him ſing, and knew his voice (34).
And as Ulyſſes brought fair Thetis' ſon
From his retired life to menage Arms;
So Spenſer was by Sidney's ſpeeches won
To bleſs her Fame, not fearing after harms.

(34) That is, found out the ſtrength of voice.

[G] Queen Elizabeth made him Poet Laureat.] This laurel however is ſaid to have proved a barren one to him, at leaſt for ſome time, through the ill humour and oppoſition of the Treaſurer Burleigh, who not only with-held the penſion, but intercepted ſome other fruits of the Queen's bounty to him. We are told, that her Majeſty, upon Spenſer's preſenting ſome Poems to her, ordered him a gratuity of a hundred pounds. But that Burleigh objecting to it ſaid, with ſome ſcorn of the Poet, What! all this for a Song. The Queen replied, Then give him what is Reaſon. Spenſer waited for ſome time, but had the mortification to find himſelf diſappointed of the Queen's intended bounty. Upon this, he took a proper opportunity to preſent a paper to her Majeſty, in the manner of a petition, wherein he reminded her of the orders ſhe had given, in the following lines.

I was his Shepheard's Calendar [H], and printed it in 1579 (b), with a dedication in verſe to this patron, who had recommended him to the Earl of Leiceſter, and procured him to be appointed Agent for that Miniſter in France and other foreign parts. And though this deſign, by ſome means or other not known, happened to prove abortive [I], yet he attended

I was promiſed on a time
To have Reaſon for my rhime,
From that time unto this ſeaſon,
I received nor Rhime nor Reaſon.

This paper produced the deſired effect, and the Queen, not without ſome reproof of the Treaſurer, immediately directed the payment of the hundred pounds, which ſhe at firſt ordered (35). Our Poet however ſent the three firſt books of his Fairy Queen, when printed, to Burleigh, with a ſonnet complimenting him as the Atlas of the State (36), yet at the ſame time ſhewing ſome diffidence of his Lordſhip's regard for Poetry, in excuſing his unfitly preſenting thoſe dull rhimes

The rugged forehead that with grave foreſight
Weild's kingdom's, cauſes, and affairs of ſtate,
My lower rhimes, I wot, doth ſharply wite,
For praiſing love.——

He alſo plainly alludes to this misfortune at the end of the ſixth book, where ſpeaking of detraction deſcribed as a monſter, he concludes with the following Stanza.

Ne may this homely verſe of many meaneſt
Hope to eſcape his venemous deſpite,
More than my former writs, all were they cleaneſt
From blameful blot, and free from all that wite,
With which ſome wicked tongues did it backbite,
And bring into a mighty Peer's diſpleaſure,
That never ſo deſerved to indite.
Therefore do you my rhimes keep better meaſure
And ſeek to pleaſe, that now is counted wiſe men's treaſure.

Among his other writings here mentioned, the moſt remarkable perhaps is his Poem intituled Mother Hubbard's Tale, where he has painted the misfortune of dependance on Court favour in the moſt lively colours, particularly in the following lines.

Full little knoweſt thou who haſt not try'd
What hell it is in ſuing long to bide,
To loſe good days that might be better ſpent,
To waſte long nights in penſive diſcontent;
To ſpeed to day, to be put back to morrow;
To feed on hope, to pine with fear and ſorrow;
To have thy Prince's Grace, yet want her Peers;
To have thy aſking, yet wait many years;
To fret thy ſoul with croſſes and with cares;
To eat thy heart thr' comfortleſs deſpaire;
To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run;
To ſpend, to give, to want, to be undone.

This, and the other reflections in the ſame Tale, are ſaid to be reſented by the Treaſurer, in the apprehenſion that he was ſtruck at in them. However that be, it is certain there are other parts of our Poet's works, where this diſcouragement by the Treaſurer is as ſtrongly marked. For inſtance, in the Ruins of Time, written ſome time after Sir Philip Sidney's death, he pours forth his complaints in the full bitterneſs of his ſoul.

O grief of griefs! O gall of all good hearts!
To ſee that Vertue ſhould deſpiſed be
Of ſuch as firſt were raiſed for Vertue's parts,
And now broadſpreading like an aged Tree,
Let none ſhoot up that nigh them planted be.
O let not thoſe of whom the Muſe is ſcorned,
Alive or dead be by the Muſe adorned.

Mr Church's friend obſerves (37), that in what Spenſer wrote after 1590 he ſeems never to have ſpared Burleigh. On the other hand, it has been urged in behalf of that Miniſter, that his uſage of our Poet might not proceed, either from a perſonal prejudice in particular, or a contempt of Poetry in general; but from the influence of party, Spenſer being attached firſt to the Earl of Leiceſter, and then to the Earl of Eſſex, both ſucceſſively heads of a party oppoſite to the Treaſurer (38). And indeed, after the Iriſh Grant, Spenſer's complaints were ſure ſomewhat unſeaſonable, and might have been huſhed by her Majeſty's bounty to him. In reſpect to Lord Burleigh, may it not be retorted upon him, That they were then Rhimes without Reaſon; and as ſuch, ſtood in need of the excuſe which has been made for them (39), that 'The moſt elegant minds have the quickeſt ſenſe 'of repulſes from the great and powerful, who ſhould 'countenance and protect them, and that therefore it 'is no wonder that the misfortune ſunk deep into his 'ſpirit, and even dwelt upon him for a great ſpace of 'his life.'

[H] He printed the Shepheard's Calendar in 1579.] Spenſer is univerſally allowed to be the Father of the true Paſtoral Poem in England. The true reaſon of his ſucceeding ſo well was unqueſtionably, that he felt and ſaw what he deſcribed Love and the Country, as is obſerved by Mr Hughes (40); though that Critic has made a ſlip in remarking, that in this work our Author was not miſled by the Italians, notwithſtanding Taſſo's Aminta might have been as good an Authority to him in the Paſtoral, as Arioſto in the greater kind of Poetry (41). Whereas, the Aminta, though compoſed in 1674, was not publiſhed till 1581, as we are informed from Niceron by Dr Birch (42), who likewiſe takes notice, that ſome faults in this Calendar were ſhewn by Mr Pope in his Diſcourſe of Paſtoral Poetry, which was written at ſixteen years of age. That excellent Bard, however unparalleled as he is in ſome other ſpecies of Poetry, it is certain did not excel in this. It is true, he aimed, after Virgil, at the more elevated kind of Paſtoral, which would exhibit the charming ſcenes of rural ſimplicity and innocence, without ſinking into the ruſtic. But in the attempt he carried it to exceſs: he was made ſenſible of his miſtake, and conſcious, as it ſhould ſeem, that the bent of his nature and genius did not lead him to ſtretch with equal wings after Spenſer in the ruſtical way, he gave a proof at once, both of his good ſenſe and diſcernment, in putting upon that taſk his friend Gay, who thereby became Spenſer's ſecond; et Primo vix, aut ne vix quidem, Impar (43).

[I] The deſign proved abortive.] The writer of his Life, prefixed to Mr Church's Edition of the Fairy Queen, thinks it probable, that the ſcheme never took place; in ſupport of which opinion he obſerves, that Spenſer in his Letter to his Friend Mr Harvey, dated at Leiceſter-houſe, October 5, 1579, having complained, that whereas he had hitherto lived in a manner agreeable, and not profitable to himſelf, he had now obtained a ſtation, which was profitable, but not agreeable; but that he was now grown weary of waſting any longer his youthful years in fruitleſs expectation, or mean complaints; and therefore had ſubmitted to the ſeeking of his fortune, by leaving his country for long and tedious journeys in foreign parts. He adds in the poſtſcript, that he expected to ſet out the week following, 'If I can, ſays he, be diſpatched of my Lord. I go 'thither as ſent by him, and maintained moſtwhat of 'him; and there am to employ my time, my body, 'my mind, in his Honour's ſervice.' And yet, in the concluſion of another Letter to the ſame Friend, dated October 16, which, from many circumſtances, muſt be the ſame year, he writes as follows. 'Thus much 'was written at Weſtminſter yeſternight; but coming 'this morning, being the 16th of October, to Mrs 'Kerkes (44) to have it delivered to the Carrier, I 'received your Letter ſent me the laſt week, whereby 'I perceive you continue your old exerciſe of verſifying Engliſh, which glory I had now thought ſhould 'have been ours at London, and at the Court.' It is true, this is not deciſive. However, it is certain, that attended the Lord Grey of Wilton, appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland (i), in the quality of his Secretary, the following year [K]. Spenſer diſcharged the duties of this poſt with great abilities that if he did go abroad at all, his ſtay was ſo ſhort, that the main deſign muſt have proved in a great meaſure abortive, ſince another Letter ſhews him to be in London when the Earthquake happened there, in the beginning of April, 1580; and in July or Auguſt the Lord Grey ſet out for Ireland. Perhaps this traverſe might be owing to that unlucky miſtake, which threw him for a while under Leiceſter's diſpleaſure, though it was committed unwillingly; and to ſhew emblematically, that with honeſt intention, he erred like Virgil's harmleſs gnat, he ſent his Lordſhip a haſty tranſlation of that Poem, with a ſonnet prefixed, by way of dedication, in which he expreſſes himſelf thus.

Wronged, yet not daring to expreſs my pain,
To you, great Lord, the Cauſer of my care,
In cloudy tears my caſe I thus complain,
Unto your ſelf that only privy are.

(44) See his Life of Spenſer, ubi ſupra.

Mr Upton (44) thought this Lord's diſpleaſure was owing to ſome kind of officious ſedulity in Spenſer, who much deſired to ſee his Patron married to the Queen of England. Whatever it were, it ſeems to have been blown over before the writing of the Fairy Queen, if, as Mr Upton conjectures, the Earl is meant by Prince Arthur in that Poem. It is certain, that our Poet had early framed ſome ſcheme of an heroic Poem, of which his Lordſhip was to have been the Hero, as appears from the following lines.

Abandon then thy baſe and vile clowne;
Lift up thy ſelf out of the lowlie duſt,
And ſing of bloodie Mars, of Wars, or Gifts:
Turn thee to thoſe that wield the awful Crown,
To doughty Knights whoſe woundleſs armour ruſts,
And helms unbruiſed waxen daily brown.
There may thy Muſe diſplay her fluttering wing,
And ſtretch her ſelf at large from Eaſt to Weſt.
Whether thou liſt on fair Eliza, reſt;
Or if thou pleaſe in bigger notes to ſing,
Advance to Worthy (45). Him ſhe loveth beſt;
That firſt the white bear to the ſtake did bring.

(45) So he often ſtiles that Lord.

(46) See Spenſer's Lat. Verſes to Harvey, dated Octob. 5, 1579, which verſes, as Mr Upton obſerves, were certainly written in haſte, and not intended to be publiſhed, having ſeveral faults in them.

This our Poet writes in his tenth Eclogue, which therefore is another convincing proof, that it was not the Dedication of the Shepheard's Calendar that firſt introduced him to Sir Philip Sidney. Though, at the ſame time, it is more than probable, that ſo much of the Poem as was (and it is evident that ſome of it was) (46) written before the Author left the North, might be ſhewn on his Introduction by Mr Harvey to that gentleman.

[K] He was made Secretary to Lord Grey.] Among Sidney's papers, there is a Letter of Sir Henry Sidney to the Lord Grey, on his appointment to Ireland, dated September 17, 1580, where he particularly mentions, that his ſon Philip had preſſed him much to ſend him a letter of advice as to that government, which he had adminiſtered himſelf about eleven years either as Lord Juſtice, or Lord Deputy. And ſince Sir Henry married Lord Leiceſter's ſiſter, and Lord Grey was allied to Sir Henry, it is eaſy to conceive how cordially Spenſer might be recommended to him, and accepted by him. And our Poet omitted no fitting opportunity of teſtifying his gratitude. For inſtance, he ſent his Lordſhip a copy of the firſt edition of the Fairy Queen (47), with the following Sonnet.

(47) They are prefixed to that Poem.

Moſt noble Lord, the pillar of my life,
And Patron of my Muſes pupillage;
Through whoſe large bounty poured on me rife,
In the firſt ſeaſon of my feeble age,
I now do live, bound your's by vaſſalage,
Sith nothing ever may redeem nor reave
Out of your endleſs debt ſo ſure a gage.
Vouchſafe in worth this ſmall gift to receave,
Which in your noble hands for pledge I leave
Of all the reſt that I am ty'd t'account;
Rude rymes, the which a ruſtic Muſe did weave
In ſavadge ſoile, far from Parnaſſe Mount,
And roughly wrought in an unlearned loome,
The which vouchſafe dear Lord your favourable doom.

But he raiſed afterwards a much larger monument of his gratitude, in his Review of the State of Ireland, where he undertakes to defend his Lordſhip's Government there, with the warmeſt zeal. The Queen was diſpleaſed with ſome parts of his conduct, which occaſioned his recall in the ſhort ſpace of two years. Particularly he had been repreſented to her Majeſty, as exerciſing ſo much cruelty, as drove the Rebels to deſperation; and to prevent the ill conſequences ariſing from ſuch a diſtemperature, a general pardon was granted ſoon after the death of the Earl of Deſmond. Our Author's piece is drawn up in the way of a dialogue, between Eudoxus and Irenæus. And Eudoxus having mentioned theſe reports of Lord Grey's miſconduct, Irenæus anſwers:

'Too true, Eudoxus, the more the pity; for I may 'not forget ſo memorable a thing, neither can I be ig-'norant of that perilous advice, and of the whole 'means by which it was compaſſed, and very cunning-'ly contrived, by ſowing diſſention between him and 'another noble perſonage, wherein they both at length 'found how notably they had been abuſed, and how 'thereby underhand, this univerſal alteration of things 'was brought about; but then too late to ſtay the 'ſame. For in the mean time, all that was formerly 'done with long labour and great toil, was, you ſee, in 'a moment undone; and that good Lord blotted with 'the name of a bloody man, whom we that well 'knew, knew to be moſt gentle, affable, loving, and 'temperate: but that the neceſſity of that preſent ſtate 'of things inforced him to that violence, and almoſt 'changed his natural diſpoſition. But otherwiſe he 'was ſo far from delighting in blood, that oft times 'he ſuffered not juſt vengeance to fall where it was de-'ſerved; and even ſome of them, which were after-'wards his Accuſers, had taſted too much of his mercy, 'and were from the gallows brought to be his Accu-'ſers. But his courſe indeed was this, that he ſpared 'not the heads and principals of any miſchievous prac-'tices, or rebellion; but ſhewed ſharp judgment on 'them chiefly for example's ſake, that all the meaner 'ſort, which alſo were generally infeſted with that evil, 'might by fear thereof be reclaimed and ſaved, if it 'were poſſible. For in the laſt conſpiracy of ſome of 'the Engliſh Pale, think you that there were not 'many more guilty than thoſe that felt the puniſhment: 'yet he touched only a few of eſpecial note, and in 'the trial of them alſo, to prevent the blame of cruelty 'and partial proceedings, and ſeeking their blood, 'which he, as in his great wiſdom it ſeemeth, did 'foreſee would be objected againſt him, for the 'avoiding thereof uſe a ſingular diſcretion and re-'gard; for the Jury that went upon their trial, he 'made to be choſen out of their own neareſt kinſmen, 'and their Judges he made of ſome of their own Fa-'thers, others of their Uncles and deareſt Friends, 'who when they could not but juſtly condemn them, 'yet he uttered their judgment in abundance of tears; 'and yet he even herein was called bloody and cruel.

'Eudoxus. In that ſharp execution of the Spaniards 'at the fort of Smerwick, I heard it eſpecially noted, 'and if it were true, ſurely it was a great touch to him 'in point of honour, if he promiſed them life, or put 'them in hopes thereof.

'Iren. Both the one and the other is moſt untrue. 'For this I can aſſure you myſelf, being as near them 'as any, that he was ſo far, either from promiſing, or 'putting them in hopes, that when their Secretary, 'called, as I remember, Signor Jeffery, an Italian, be-'ing ſent to treat with the Lord Deputy for grace, he 'was flatly refuſed; and afterwards their Colonel, 'named Don Sebaſtion, came forth to intreat, that 'they might part with their arms like ſoldiers, at 'leaſt with their lives according to the cuſtom of war, 'and law of nations; it was ſtrongly denied them, 'and told to him by the Lord Deputy himſelf, that 'they could not juſtly plead either cuſtom of war, or 'law of nations; for that they were not any lawful 'enemies, and if they were, he willed them to ſhew 'by what commiſſion they came thither into ano-'ther Prince's dominions to war, whether from the 'Pope, or the King of Spain, or any other; to which, 'when they ſaid they had not, but were only Adven-'turers, that came to ſeek foreign bread, and to ſerve 'in the wars among the Irith, who deſired to entertain 'them, it was told him, that the Iriſh themſelves, as abilities and integrity, equally reſpectful of and reſpected by his Lordſhip, who being recalled in 1682 (k), our Secretary returned with his Maſter to England, where he ſeems to have continued till the much lamented death of his patron, Sir Philip Sidney, in 1586, a loſs which he felt and grieved for all his life afterwards (l), and which would perhaps have ſunk him beyond the hopes of a recovery, had it not been very much alleviated a few months before (m), by receiving, as a reward for his ſervices, and in honour of his excellent talents, a grant from the Queen of upwards of three thouſand acres of land (n) in the county of Cork in Ireland. This royal bounty carried him again, in 1587, to that kingdom, where he entered upon his eſtate, and paſſed his days in a happy tranquillity, having for his houſe the caſtle of Kilcolman, a ſeat of the Earl of Deſmond, whoſe rebellion had been lately quelled (o), and the pleaſant river Mulla running through his ground [L]. In this ſweet leiſure he reſumed his great work, the poem of the Fairy Queen [M], and was thus happily employed in 1580, when Sir Walter Raleigh, with whom he had been ſeveral years acquainted (p), touching, in his return from the Portugal expedition, upon Ireland, in order to take a view of his much larger grant (q) from the Crown, made a trip to Kilcolman to ſee his old friend and brother poet. Spenſer had then finiſhed the three firſt books of his laſt mentioned work, and,

(l) See ſeveral of his poems, and particularly his Aſtrophel, a paſtoral elegy on that occaſion.

(m) Sir Philip died Oct. 17, and Spenſer's grant is dated June 27, 1586.

(n) The whole was 3028 acres; rent 17l. 7s. 6d. Cox's Hiſtory of Ireland. They were called Undertakers, being obliged by the patent to cultivate the lands granted to them.

(o) The Earl of Deſmond and his accomplices had forfeited 574628 acres, partly in Cork.

(q) His grant was no leſs than 30000 acres.

'the Earl and John of Deſmond, with the reſt, were 'no lawful enemies, but Rebels and Traitors, and 'therefore they that came to ſuccour them, no better 'than rogues and runnagates, eſpecially coming with 'no licence nor commiſſion from their own King. 'So as it would be diſhonourable for him, in the name 'of his Queen, to condeſcend to make any terms with 'ſuch Rebels; but left them to their choice, to yield and 'ſubmit themſelves, or no. Whereupon the ſaid Colonel 'did abſolutely yield himſelf and the fort, with all 'therein, and craved only mercy; which it being not 'thought good to ſhew them, for danger of them, if 'being ſaved, they ſhould afterwards join with the 'Iriſh; and alſo for fear of the Iriſh, who are much 'emboldened by theſe foreign ſuccours, and alſo put 'in hopes of more e'er long; there was no other way, 'but to make that ſhort end as was made. Therefore 'moſt untruly and maliciouſly do theſe evil tongues 'backbite and ſlander the ſacred aſhes of that moſt juſt 'and honourable perſonage, whoſe leaſt vertue, of 'many moſt excellent that abounded in his heroic 'ſpirit, they were never able to aſpire unto (47).' We have given this defence at length, as well worthy of it in that light: but there are two other remarks, which may perhaps be thought not leſs worth notice. Firſt, hereby ſome light is thrown into the occaſion of the quarrel between Lord Grey and Sir Walter Raleigh, which is left ſo dark by his hiſtorian (48), and which we ſee here, was occaſioned by the malicious and injurious miſreports of ſome informers, the not unfrequent bane of the beſt friendſhips. The other uſe to be made of this paſſage of Spenſer, regards himſelf. For to this faithful attachment to Lord Grey, after he was in diſgrace, may fairly be aſcribed, in ſome meaſure, the ſmall favour he met with at Court by his Fairy Queen, though the original of every Knight was then living in the Court, and he attributed to each of them that virtue which he thought was moſt conſpicuous in them; an ingenious piece of flattery, which turned not much to his account (49).

[L] A pleaſant Seat in Ireland.] A late Author (50) has given us the following deſcription of Kilcolman. 'It is, ſays he, two miles north-weſt of Doneraile. 'It was a caſtle of the Earls of Deſmond, now almoſt 'level with the ground. It was ſituated in the north 'ſide of a fine lake, in the midſt of a vaſt plain, ter'minated to the Eaſt by the mountains of the county 'of Waterford; Bally-howra hills, or, as Spenſer terms 'them, the mountains of Mola, to the North; Nagle 'mountains to the South; and thoſe of Kerry to the 'Weſt. It commands a view of above half the breadth 'of Ireland, and muſt have been, when the adjacent 'uplands were cloathed with woods, a moſt pleaſant and 'romantic ſituation.'

[M] The Fairy Queen.] Notwithſtanding the many groſs faults that have been found both in the original plan, and in the execution of this Poem; yet Mr Hughes rightly obſerves (51), Spenſer has by it become the Father of more Poets, than any other of our writers in that way; and I believe it will not be diſputed, that the ſame Gentleman has given the true reaſon for it, which is our Poet's peculiar talent in the embelliſhments of deſcription, rich and laviſh in him beyond compariſon. As this is the moſt ſtriking part of Poetry, eſpecially in young minds, being firſt engendered in the imagination, and youth moſt ſuſceptible of theſe impreſſions, it will not ſeem very ſtrange therefore, that Cowley, as himſelf tells us, firſt caught this flame by reading Spenſer; that the great Milton owned him for his original, as Dryden aſſures us; and that Dryden ſtudied him, and has beſtowed more frequent commendations on him, than on any other Engliſh Poet. However, theſe three were all born with ſuch poetical talents, as would have made a figure in the Art, had Spenſer never been. The force of whoſe power, as a Father in begetting poetical children, will perhaps be thought more conſpicuouſly diſplayed in the inſtance of Dr Henry More (52), who informs us, that he owed all his Poetry to hearing his Father read the Fairy Queen to his children, in the winter evenings. In this taſte a young Critic writes, that 'though the Fairy Queen 'does not exhibit the œconomy of plan, and exact 'arrangement of parts, which Epic ſeverity requires; 'yet we ſcarcely regret the loſs of theſe, while their 'place is ſo amply ſupplied by ſomething which more 'powerfully attracts us, as it engages the affection of 'the heart, rather than the applauſe of the head; and 'if there be any Poem whoſe graces pleaſe, becauſe 'they are ſituated beyond the reach of art, and where 'the faculties of creative imagination delight us, be'cauſe they are unaſſiſted, and unreſtrained by thoſe 'of deliberate judgment, it is this, of which we are 'now ſpeaking (53). To ſum up all in a few words; 'Though in the Fairy Queen we are not ſatisfied as 'Critics, yet we are tranſported as Readers.'

But if Spenſer may be ſtiled the Father of our Poets, he has aſſuredly an equal claim to be the Father of the Critics. The ſubſtance of all thoſe who flouriſhed before Mr Hughes, is collected and thrown by him into ſome continued diſcourſes, prefixed to his edition of Spenſer's Works, in 1715. Since that Mr Jortin publiſhed Remarks on Spenſer's Poems, in 1734. 8vo. which have been well received. Mr Spence, in his Polymetis (54), hath alſo entered into our Poet's manner of allegorizing, and the conduct of his Allegories, which, as the book is not in very many hands, we ſhall lay before the Reader. The general plan of the Polymetis is the ſame with Lord Bacon's Wiſdom of the Ancients, being to recommend their ſimplicity and clearneſs in ſymbolical repreſentations. He aſſures us he had read the Fairy Queen with the particular view of informing himſelf from the beſt Allegoriſts among all the modern Poets, how far they have deviated from the Ancients. He reduces Spenſer's faults, in relation to his Machinery or Allegories, under three general heads. 1. Mixing the fables of Heatheniſm with the truths of Chriſtianity. 2. Miſrepreſenting the Allegories of the Ancients. 3. From ſomething that is wrong in the Allegories of his own invention. 'Under the firſt, he inſtances in 'that ſhort view which our Poet gives of the infernal 'regions (55), where he ſpeaks of Jupiter and Tanta'lus, and of Pontius Pilate and our Saviour, almoſt in 'the ſame breath. With regard to the ſecond fault, 'he ſpeaks of Eſculapius as being in hell torments (56), 'in the view of Hell. Under the third fault is ranged, 'Spenſer's introducing a company of Satyrs, as ſaving 'a Lady from a Rape (57); and makes Sylvanus, the 'God or Governor of Satyrs (58), a Dignity which 'the Ancients never provided for him any more than 'the Jews girdle, which he gives him round his 'waiſte (59). He deſcribes the day, or morning, with 'purple hair (60). The Syrens as half Fiſh (61). 'The figures of the Syrens are not uncommon in An'tiques, and are never repreſented there with a fiſh's 'tail, that I know of, but with the upper part human, 'and the lower like birds: the Poets deſcribe them in 'the the same manner (61). Spenser describes Bacchus to be fat (62), a misrepresentation very common among the modern Artists. He makes Clio to be Apollo's Wife (63), and Cupid the Mother of the Graces (64). He represents in one place Orion as flying from a snake into Heaven (65); and in another, as a watry God, and one of the Attendants upon Neptune. Among the faults of this kind noted, the alterations in Spenser's account of the marriage of the Thames and the Medway, in which he has greatly increased Neptune's court, and added several Deities as Attendants upon that God, which were never regarded as such by any of the Ancients (66). These instances may be sufficient to shew, that where Spenser does introduce the Allegories of the ancient Poets, he does not always follow them so exactly as he might; and in the Allegories, which are merely of his own invention (and his invention is one of the richest and most beautiful that perhaps ever was) I am sorry to say, that he does not only fall very short of that simplicity and propriety, which is so remarkable in the works of the Ancients, but runs now and then into thoughts that are quite unworthy of so great a genius. I shall mark out some of these faults to you, which indeed thus separated from the work, and laid together by themselves, will appear very gross; but if they should prejudice you against so fine a writer, read almost any one of his entire Cantoes, and it will reconcile you to him again. The reason of my producing these instances, is only to shew what faults the greatest Allegorists may commit. He then proceeds to observe, that the first sort of faults in the Allegories of Spenser's own invention, is their being sometimes too complicated or overdone; such, for example, are his representations of scandal, discord, and pride. Scandal is what he calls the Blatant Beast, and he has made a very strange beast of him. His mouth was as wide as a peck (67), and he had 4000 tongues in it of dogs, cats, bears, tygers, men, and serpents (68). Again, the Dragon killed by the Knight of the red Cross, in the last Canto of Book I, is described with a tail that wanted very little of three furlongs in length, the blood that gushes from his wounds is enough to drive a water-mill, and his roar like a hundred hungry lions. Another fault is in fixing such filthy ideas to some of his personages, as is enough to turn any stomach to read it, as in that of error (69); to which we may very well retort the Poet's own words on the like occasion, Such loathsome matter were small lust to speak or think. III. His Allegories are sometimes so far stretched, that they appear rather extravagant than great, and sometimes so minute in pointing out every particular, that the object is in danger of becoming ridiculous, instead of being admirable. IV. They are not well invented in some particulars; first, In personifying such things as are not fit to be represented as a person, as in his description of the Cave of Care (70); and in making Gifts or munera a Woman (71). 2. In representing things under a human personage, with somewhat inconsistent with that form and nature. The greatest instance of this kind in him, is that where he turns the human body into a Castle, the Tongue into the Porter that keeps the Gate, and the Teeth into thirty two Warders dressed in white, Appetite the Marshal of the Hall, Digestion the Clerk of the Kitchen, Concoction the Master-Cook, the Stomach the Caldron, the Lungs the Bellows, and the Sink Port-Esquiline (72). 3. In making the Person perform such things and actions as no man in his senses would do. Thus he describes Desire, as holding coals of fire in his hands, and blowing them up into a flame, which last particular is something worse than Ariosto's bringing in Discord with a flint and steel to strike fire in the face of Pride (73). V. His allegorical personages, though well invented, are not well marked out, of which there are many instances. Thus in one Canto, Doubt is represented walking with a staff that shrinks under him (74). Hope with an Aspergeoire (75), the utensil used by the Papists to sprinkle sinners with holy water. Dissimulation as twisting two clues of silk (76). Grief with a pair of panniers (77); and Pleasure with a humble bee in a phial (78). And in another, in the procession of the months and seasons, February is introduced in a waggon drawn by two fishes (79). May as riding on Castor and Pollux (80). June is mounted on a crab (81). October on a scorpion (82). And November comes on a centaur all in a sweat, because, as the Poet observes, he had just been fattening his hogs (83). Others may be well ranked under ridiculous imaginations. Such, I think, is that idea of Ignorance, moving with the back part of his head foremost (84); and that of Danger with Hatred, Murder, Treason, &c. on his back (85), as also the sorrowful Lady with a bottle for her tears, and a bag for her repentance, which are running out almost as fast as she puts them in (86). A huge fat Giant swelling into an empty form, like a bladder (87). The horses of the Sun foaming tar (88). Sir Guyon's putting a padlock upon the tongue of Occasion (89). And Remorse nipping St George's heart (90). There is so much of the ridiculous in the representations of the manners, that I can't help thinking this excellent Poet might possibly have formed some of his ideas in it, even from so low a thing as the old Pageants, which were in great vogue about the time he lived (91). Had Spenser formed his Allegories on the plan of the ancient Poets, and reformed such as he had from Ariosto, and the Italian Allegorists, he might have followed nature much more closely, and would not have wandered so often into such strange and inconsistent images. I am apt to believe, that Spenser considered Ariosto's Orlando Furioso as a Poem wholly serious, though the Author certainly wrote it partly in jest. It is a work of a mixed nature, between the gravity of Tasso, and the broad laugh of Berni. Perhaps Spenser taking some things serious, which Ariosto meant for ridiculous, may have led him now and then to have said things that are ridiculous, when he meant to be very serious. However that be, we may reasonably conclude, from so great faults as I have mentioned to you, from so great a man (whether they arise from his too much indulging the excellence of his own fancy, or from his copying after so singular a pattern) that it would be extremely useful for our Poets in general to follow the plan of Allegories so far as it is settled to their hands by the Ancients. At least till some Modern may have invented and established some better plan for them to go upon.'

A little before Mr Spence, there appeared a piece, intituled Observations on the Fairy Queen of Spenser, by Thomas Warton, A. M. Fellow of Trinity-College, Oxford, wherein that Critic speaks more largely than is seen in some of his Brother Oxonian's Remarks (92). Among other things, he takes notice, that though the Fairy Queen was formed upon Ariosto; yet the adventures of his Knights are a more exact and immediate copy of those which we meet with in old romances and books of chivalry. They are particularly engaged in revenging injuries, and doing justice to the distressed. That his first book is a regular and precise imitation of such a series of action as we frequently meet with in those books: for instance, a King's daughter applies to a Knight, that he would relieve her father and mother, who are closely confined to their castle upon account of a vast and terrible dragon, that had ravaged their country, and perpetually laid in wait to destroy them. The Knight sets forward with the Lady, encounters a monster in the way, is plotted against by an Enchanter, and after surmounting a variety of difficulties and obstacles, arrives at the country which is the scene of the dragon's devastations, kills him, and is presented to the King and Queen, whom he has just delivered; marries their daughter, but is soon obliged to leave her on account of fulfilling a former vow. He then observes, that the circumstance of each of Spenser's twelve Knights setting out from one place, by a different way, to perform a different adventure, exactly resembles that of the seven Knights proceeding forwards to their several expeditions in the well known Romance, intituled The Seven Champions of Christendom. That in fact, these miraculous books were highly fashionable, and the chivalry in them was still practised in the age of Queen Elizabeth (93). Another Romance particularly made use of by Spenser, is that intuled Morte Arthur. The Lyf of King Arthur, of his noble Knightes, of the round Table, and in th'ende the dolorous Death of them all. Of this he gives many instances in his second Section, particularly in regard to the names, especially that of Sir Tristram, (91) Mr Warton gives many instances of the truth of this remark. In his Observations on the Fairy Queen, Sect. X.

(92) For instance, to Spence's three general heads of our Author's faults in allegorizing, he has added a fourth, that he frequently introduces an Allegory under which no meaning is couched, as in B. II. C. IX. St. 21. Observations &c. p. 222, 223, in the note †.

to her Majesty by Sir Walter, who was at that time in high favour at court. The sense of this kindness made a lasting impression upon Spenser's mind; and he took the first opportunity of testifying his gratitude by such ways as he knew would be best accepted by his friend. In this spirit he addressed an explanation of the fable of the Fairy Queen to Sir Walter, in the form of a letter, which appeared at the head of the first edition in 1590; and the compliment was accordingly returned by Sir Walter in two copies of verses (s), which usher in several others of the like strain, that are prefixed to that edition. Spenser, we may imagine, was much pleased with so interesting a respect to his fame; and, returning to Ireland the following year, 1591, he gave a fresh testimony that year of his gratitude (t), in a way that must needs have been most sensibly felt by this worthy Friend [N]. In the interim, notwith-

Tristram, the circumstances of whose birth and education he has copied with much exactness from this book. Spenser informs us, that Sir Tristram was born in Cornwall, and was Heir of Meliograss, King of that County, &c. And it may be observed, that this name Tristram is given to the Hero of a Romance, just now published (*). The story of the Mantle made of the Beards of Knights, and Locks of Ladies (94), which he apprehends to be drawn from that Romance, and not, as might be supposed, from Geoffry of Monmouth (95), of whom the same story is borrowed by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, Song 4; Spenser's circumstances tallying more exactly with those in the Romance. Another Romance which Spenser borrows from, is Bevis of Southampton: as in Prince Arthur's combat with the Dragon (96), in which encounter he follows the incidents made use of by the Romance Writers, with all the punctuality of a close copyist. In the same Section, we find that Spenser was Father of several Poets nearer his own age, than those beforementioned (97). In the third Section Mr Warton has added several examples of Spenser's copying from the Classics and ancient Mythology to those which had been collected before by Mr Jortin, and declares his opinion, that in the comparison of the Peacock and the Rainbow (as they occur together B. III. C. XII. St. 23.) Spenser imitated Tasso's Gierus. Lib. B. XVI. St. 24. He had before (98) apologized for our Poet's following Ariosto, as being, with all his extravagancies, preferred to Tasso at that time, insomuch that the superiority of the Orlando Furioso to the Gierusaleme Liberata was at length established by a formal decree of the Academicians della Crusca, who held a solemn court of enquiry concerning the merit of both Poems. In the midst of this bad taste, Spenser began to write his Fairy Queen. In what sense these last words are true, will be seen by the following Remarks. Spenser in his Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, explaining the plan of the Fairy Queen, says, ' In the person of Prince Arthur, ' I set forth Magnificence.' This Magnificence, it is highly probable, was frequently alluded to in the Cambridge Correspondance. In the few letters that remain of it, we find Mr Harvey, in 1580, using this expression, ' I fear your Magnificence will hold us ' in suspence so long for your Nine Comedies, &c.' meaning apparently, that Spenser being employed about Arthur, would hinder other things. Again, in Spenser's Latin Verses to Harvey, dated October 5, 1579, he says, ' You banter me, so great is your Magnificence ' Tu tamen illudis (tua Magnificentia tanta est;') a good deal of that Letter alludes to this scheme. Lastly, in April 1580, Spenser says, ' I will now in hand forth- ' with with my Faerie Queen, which I pray you send me ' with all expedition, and your friendly Letter and ' long expected Judgment withal;' so that probably what he had now done of it was in Harvey's hands. Our Poet went to Ireland as Secretary to Lord Grey, in a few months after this; we need not wonder therefore that in the Dedication-Verses, both to that Lord and the Earl of Ormond, he speaks of writing this Poem in Ireland, since he probably wrote most of it there. But from what has been said, it is evident that the plan of the Fairy Queen was not only laid, but some part of it executed, before the Gierusaleme Liberata made its appearance in public, that Poem not being printed till the year 1583; which shews the impertinence of all the Apologies that have been offered in behalf of Spenser for not following Tasso.

Besides the three Critics upon the Fairy Queen, already mentioned, we have met with three others, Mr Hughes, Mr Upton, and Mr Church, each of whom have been consulted, and are quoted, as the Reader will observe in the course of this memoir. But one ought not to be surprized that so many gentlemen should have turned their thoughts upon the Fairy Queen, after reading the conclusion of Mr Warton's Observations. ' I cannot, says this Critic, take my final leave ' of the Reader, without acknowledging that this task ' has been peculiarly delightful to me; though the ' business of criticism is generally laborious and dry, ' yet it has here more frequently amused, than fatigued ' my attention in its exercises upon an Author, who ' makes such perpetual and powerful appeals to the fan- ' cy. The pleasure which Spenser received in com- ' posing the FAIRY QUEEN must necessarily be shared ' by its Commentator, and the Critic, on this occasion, ' may venture to exclaim with the Poet,

' The waies thro' which my weary steps I guide,
' In this delightful Land of Faerie,
' Are so exceeding spacious and wide,
' And sprinkled with such sweet varietie
' Of all that pleasant is to ear or eye,
' That I nigh ravish'd with rare thoughts delight
' My tedious travel do forget thereby,
' And when I 'gin to feel decay of might,
' It strength to me supplies, and chears my dulled [' spright (99).'

[N] He expressed his gratitude to Sir Walter Raleigh, &c.] We need not say, that Colin Clout's come home again is here meant; and it would be more than needless to enter into the display of the excellencies of a Poem so well known. But that is not the case with respect to the æra of its first appearance in public. A late writer (100) has shewn, that the date put to it of 1591 must be a mistake, as the Poem now stands, for the following reasons: first, Amarillis, that is Alice, daughter of Sir John Spencer, is there mentioned as a widow; but her first husband was Lord Strange, afterwards Earl of Derby, who died in 1595:

But Amaryllis, whether fortunate,
Or else unfortunate, may I read,
That freed is from Cupid's yoke by fate;
Since which she doth new bonds adventure dread.

(100) The Author of Spenser's life, prefixed to Church's edition of the Fairy Queen.

Another unanswerable reason is, that Sir Walter Raleigh, the shepherd of the ocean, is introduced as singing a song, the substance of which is thus represented:

His song was all a lamentable lay
Of great unkindness, and of usage hard,
Of Cynthia the lady of the sea,
Which from her presence faultless him debarr'd.

We have before given a particular account of this disgrace of Sir Walter (101), wherein some of the dates differing a little from those of this writer, the present opportunity is gladly embraced of inserting his account, in which he proceeds to observe, ' that, in the Sydney papers, ' Vol. I. p. 377. we find Rowland White writing thus: ' There is great means made for Sir Walter Raleigh's coming ' to the Court. He lives at London very gallant. His voyage ' goes forward; and my Lord Treasurer ventures 500l. in ' money; Sir Robert Cecil ventures a new ship, perfectly ' finished, the very hull stands in 800l.

' At Court this Saturday, Decemb. 13, 1595. (102) Sir Walter certainly failed on this voyage, which was to Guaiana, Feb. 6, 1595-6; and he returned time enough to sail with the fleet the same year on the expedition to Cadiz, where he had a noble share in the action. We imagine therefore, that, as Astrophel was printed in 1595, Spenser was in London in the beginning of that year, when Sir Walter was in high favour, and was introduced by him to the Queen, or that the favours he speaks of were in a former journey to London. The fact must be true of Colin Clout's being printed after his disgrace; and had the disgrace been over, it is likely it had never been mentioned here by (101) Under his article.

(102) Camden, in his preface, professes to begin each year on the first of January, and has inserted this expedition in 1595.

notwithſtanding the cruelty and ill uſage of his firſt miſtreſs, he preſently gave way, upon her death, a ſecond time to the tender paſſion (u); in which however he prov'd more ſucceſsful than he had been with Roſalinde; and he celebrated the happy progreſs of this laſt amour in a ſpecies of poetry which was then, and long after, eſteemed by the greateſt maſters to be the moſt conſummate in its kind [O]. He was probably married about the year 1592, or the following year (w), upon which occaſion he wrote an excellent Epithalamium (x), which no one indeed was ſo capable of doing as himſelf. Some time after this new engagement, he made another viſit to England, where he printed his Aſtrophel, and Colin Clout's come home again, in 1595. During that interval he wrote ſeveral other ſmall poems, which are printed in his works. The affairs of Ireland were then embroiled again by the Earl of Tyrone, who, after the death of the Earl of Deſmond in 1593, broke out into a freſh rebellion, which probably was one, if not the chief, cauſe of our Poet's coming to England. He muſt needs have been not a little anxious about the ſafety of his own ſettlement at Kilcolman, which, being involved in that of the kingdom, put him upon exerting his political abilities, by laying down a complete plan for reducing that kingdom in the ſpace of two winters at fartheſt. This too he finiſhed the following year, 1596, under the title of A View of the State of Ireland [P]. The deſign was undeniably well concerted (y), and is a noble monument, not only of the Author's gratitude, but an illuſtrious proof, that it is not out of the compaſs of nature to unite the man of buſineſs with the moſt fanciful poet in the ſame perſon. But, feaſible as this propoſal was, yet it was never carried into execution; and what was the conſequence of that neglect will be ſeen preſently. In the mean time, our Poet and Politician was forced to return to his reſidence at Kilcolman, dubious as ever of his fate. He reſolved however to make uſe of the preſent moments of quiet; and in that ſpirit he continued to proſecute his grand work with vigour and ſpirit; and accordingly we find him in England once more in the year 1596, when the ſecond part of The Fairy Queen, containing the fourth, fifth, and ſixth books, was printed at London in 4to, together with the four Hymns of Beauty, dedicated to the Counteſs of Cumberland. In 1597 he went back to Kilcolman; but had not been there above twelve months, when, after many treacherous ſubmiſſions, the Earl of Tyrone broke out into open rebellion (z), and, having diſperſed the forces which were ſent againſt him by the Earl of Ormond, he ravaged and ſpoiled the whole county of Cork; ſo that Spenſer was forced to ſeek his ſafety, together with his wife, in his native country, leaving his eſtate in Ireland to be plundered by the rebels [Q], who, it is ſaid (aa), having carried off his goods, burnt his houſe, and a little child in it. However that be, it is certain he did not long ſurvive this irretrievably ruinous calamity, which, reducing him to a ſtate of abſolute dependance, with the additional weight of a family, entirely broke his heart, and he languiſhed under it by Spenſer. Upon the whole, this writer conjectures that the Poem was printed in 1595-6. After all, this difficulty is not unconquerable, without charging any miſtake in the date of Spenſer's letter in 1591. We need only ſuppoſe, that either Colin Clout was firſt written, if not printed, without the particular lines here mentioned; or elſe, that they were added after the firſt finiſhing of the Poem, and before it was printed with Aſtrophel in 1595.

[O] To be the moſt conſummate in its kind.] This is the Sonnet. It is of Italian invention, and conſiſts generally of one thought, always turned in a ſingle ſtanza of fourteen lines, of the length of our heroics, the rhime being interchanged alternately, in which it differs from the Canzone, which is not confined to any number of lines or ſtanzas. The origin of it is derived from Petrarch, who filled a whole book with it in honour of his Laura, with whom he was in love, as himſelf tells us, for twenty-one years, and whoſe death he lamented with the ſame zeal for ten years afterwards. The uncommon ardour of his paſſion, as well as the fineneſs of his wit and language, eſtabliſhed him the maſter of love-verſes among the moderns. We find him copied by the wits of Spain, France, and England: and the ſonnet grew ſo much into faſhion, that Sir Philip Sidney himſelf, who had written a great number on his beloved Stella, has pleaſantly rallied his contemporaries in one, which is a perfect pattern of this kind. It conſiſts in a natural tenderneſs, ſimplicity, and correctneſs, beauties which are to be found in moſt of Spenſer's ſonnets. Milton is the laſt who has given, in our own language, any examples of the ſonnet, which is not much in vogue at preſent (103).

(103) This was written in the year 1761.

[P] His view of the ſtate of Ireland.] It was firſt printed, 1633, in folio, from a manuſcript in Archbiſhop Uſher's library, by Sir James Ware, who, in the dedication to Lord Wentworth, remarks, that the calamities of that kingdom were fully ſet forth, and to the life, by the Author, with a diſcovery of their cauſes and remedies, being, for the moſt part, excellent grounds of reformation. In the preface he obſerves, 'that this diſcourſe ſufficiently teſtifies Spenſer's learning 'and deep judgment; but it were to be wiſhed, that 'ſome paſſages had been tempered with more moderation; though the troubles and miſeries of the time 'when he wrote may partly excuſe him. That his proofs '(though moſt of them conjectural) concerning the original of the language and cuſtoms of the nation, and 'the firſt peopling of the ſeveral parts of the iſland, are 'full of good reading, and ſhew a ſound judgment. And 'that with reſpect to the general ſcope intended by him 'for the reformation of the abuſes and ill cuſtoms; 'though many perſons had taken pains on the ſame ſubject in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and ſome before (as 'the Author of the Salus populi under Edward IV, and 'Patrick Finglas, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and 'afterwards Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas in 'England in the reign of Henry VIII) yet none 'came ſo near to the beſt grounds of a reformation as 'our Author, except in a few paſſages, has done.' But the Editor of Sir James's works in Engliſh owns indeed, "that there are ſome things in it very well written, particularly as to the main deſign of reducing Ireland into due obedience of the crown of England; yet, in the hiſtory and antiquities of the country, he is often miſerably miſtaken, and ſeems rather to have indulged the fancy and licence of a poet, than have ſhewn the judgment and fidelity required in an hiſtorian; beſides his want of moderation. And this makes the loſs leſs regretted of another treatiſe which he propoſed to write of the antiquities of Ireland, but was never finiſhed by him."

[Q] His eſtate was plundered in the Earl of Tyrone's rebellion.] After many years treacherous ſubmiſſion, as abovementioned, this Earl broke out into an open rebellion on a ſudden, and preſently beſieged Blackwater, near Armagh in Ulſter in 1598. The Earl of Ormond, then General, ſent a detachment againſt him, Auguſt 14, moſt of which Tyrone cut to pieces, and diſperſed the reſt, and Blackwater ſurrendered. This was a ſignal to the whole party, throughout Munſter eſpecially. The rebels were inſtantly in arms, and the commander there, being weakly ſupported, ſhut up himſelf in Cork. The fury of the rebellion ſpread every where; and we are told, that 15000 Engliſh were deſtroyed, in Munſter eſpecially, and through all the forfeited eſtates of the Earl of Deſmond. In the midſt of this deſolation we have always been aſſured that Spenſer ſuffered (104).

[R] Camden, in his Elizabetha, dates it in 1598, and Sir James Ware (105) in 1599; perhaps it was in 1598-9; for Camden, as has been already obſerved (106), though he profeſſes to begin the year on the firſt of January, yet ſometimes deviates in his work from that rule. However, if his life was continued till 1599, he muſt have died early in that year, if the authority of Ben. Jonſon may be relied on, who told Mr Drummond of Hawthornden, that Spenſer refuſed, a little before his death, twenty pieces that were ſent him by Lord Eſſex, ſaying he had no time to ſpend (107): for his Lordſhip's patent of Viceroy of Ireland was dated March 12, 1598-9, and he ſet out for his government the 27th of that month (108).

The Author of the Purple Iſland is Mr Phineas Fletcher, ſon of Dr Giles Fletcher, of whom an account is inſerted in this work (113). He was probably a Kentiſh man, as he lived at Brenckly, within a few miles of Penſehurſt. He was bred at Eton ſchool, from whence he was choſen to King's College in Cambridge, and became Fellow there. He had afterwards the living of Hilgay in Norfolk. He ſeems to have been of Spenſer's own turn of mind, paſſing his days moſt likely at Hilgay, privately and unambitiouſly, and with all the modeſt ſentiments with which he every where abounds. We cannot but think of him and love him, when he mentions

And we cannot but revere and envy him when giving us advice:

‘ To reaſon's yoke thy furious paſſions bring;
‘ Thrice noble is the man who of himſelf is king.’

His poems were publiſhed in 1633, in 2 volumes 4to. Mr Wood tells us (114), he was the author of ſeveral books, one of which was intituled, A father's teſtament, written for the benefit of his particular relations. Lond. 1670, 8vo (115), at which time he had been dead ſeveral years. He was nephew to Dr Richard Fletcher, and conſequently couſin to John Fletcher the famous playwriter; each of whom have been thought worthy of a particular article in this work (116): to which we ſhall take this opportunity of making ſome additional remarks (117). To begin with the father, Dr Richard Fletcher: it is true, he is generally ſaid to have been a native of Kent, and as ſuch is placed by Fuller among the worthies of that county, where the name has been very common: however, there is ſome room for doubt. It is certain he was one of the firſt Fellows of Bennet College in Cambridge, upon Archbiſhop Parker's foundation; according to which he muſt have been born in Norfolk, to which county thoſe Fellowſhips are ſolely appropriated. He was ſcholar of Trinity College in 1563, where (as he proceeded A. M. and removed to Corpus-Chriſti in 1569) he had probably been admitted the year before, viz. in 1562. Upon this removal he entered upon the buſineſs of pupils, and other offices of Bennet College. He obtained the prebend of Iſledon in the church of St Paul, upon the preſentation of Matthew Parker gentleman, ſon to the Archbiſhop, who probably had the patronage of that turn made over to him by Biſhop Grindal, in order to carry on his father's ſcheme of annexing Prebends to the Fellowſhips he had founded. Accordingly he held this with his Fellowſhip, and was made Preſident of the College the year following; but ſeems to have left the college ſoon after, with a teſtimonial of his learning and good behaviour, as well as his having acquitted himſelf with credit in the offices of the college, in the public ſchools, and in the pulpit (118). He proceeded however D. D. in 1581, and became Chaplain to the Queen, to whom he had been recommended by Archbiſhop Whitgift for the Deanery of Windſor; but ſhe rather choſe to beſtow upon him that of Peterborough, upon the deceaſe of Dr Latymer in 1583. In 1586, he was preſented by Sir Thomas Cecil to the church of Barnack, the Biſhop having betrayed his right of patronage. He made a very affecting and zealous prayer at the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots (119). Whilſt Dean of Peterborough he was choſen, Jan. 27, 1588, Proctor for that church, both in parliament and convocation, tam ad parliamentum quam ad convocationum Cleri (120). Upon his promotion to the ſee of Briſtol in 1589, the Queen made him her Almoner. He ſtands cenſured in Archbiſhop Laud's metropolitical viſitation of the church of Peterborough in 1635, wherein an injunction is given to make an enquiry after the executors or adminiſtrators of Dean Fletcher, that ſome ſatisfaction may be had from them, either by a fair compoſition or by compulſion of the law, for that great bell, which through his means, and in his name, was taken away. Soon after he had obtained the ſee of London, he gave out twenty-ſeven articles of enquiry to the churchwardens upon his primary viſitation, whereby, as Neal informs us (121), the priſons, which had been lately cleared, were filled again by Nonconformiſts, to the number was made to his fame at laſt: his corpſe being interred in Weſtminſter, near Chaucer, as he had deſired, and his obſequies attended by the Poets of that time, and others, who paid the laſt honours to his memory. Several copies of verſes were thrown after him into his grave: and Robert Devereux, Earl of Eſſex, who had married the widow of Sir Philip Sidney, was at the expence of the funeral (cc). number of eighty-nine. Beſides the favours conferred in his life-time upon Bennet College (122), by his will (123) he left that ſociety the Eſtrick's egg: To the pariſh of Watford in Hants, 10 l. to thoſe of Cranbroke-Hythe, Chelſea, and ſome others, 5 l. each: and to his nine children his fortunes, to be equally divided among them, with his books to his ſons, Nathaniel and John. But theſe were found to be ſcarce equal to his debts, inſomuch that his brother, Dr Giles Fletcher, the Civilian, was obliged to have recourſe to her Majeſty, by means of Mr Anthony Bacon and the Earl of Eſſex, for her favour and benevolence, who ſeemed to be inclined to grant them ſome relief. The petition, where we ſee an account of the ſtate of his ſlender circumſtances, and the cauſes alledged for it (124), was drawn up in the following terms:

1. 'That the Biſhop was tranſlated from the ſee 'of Worceſter to that of London within two years, 'and ſo entered into new firſt-fruits, before he had 'fully paid the old; by which her Majeſty's good 'and gracious meaning for his preferment was rather 'turned to his great hinderance, and the diminution 'of his temporal eſtate, having paid, within three 'years, or not much more, into the Exchequer, for 'his firſt-fruits, tenths, and ſubſidies, the ſum of '1458 l.

2. 'He beſtowed, in allowances and gratifications to 'divers attendants about her Majeſty, ſince his prefer-'ment to the ſee of London, the ſum of 3100 l. or 'thereabouts, without any regard made to himſelf, as 'appeared by his ſtate of particulars; which money 'was given by him, for the moſt part of it, by her 'Majeſty's direction and ſpecial appointment.

3. 'Finding the building and manſion-houſes of the 'ſee of London greatly decayed, and in a manner 'ruined, he beſtowed great ſums of money in repara-'tions upon the Epiſcopal houſes at Wickham, Had-'ham, London, and Fulham; in which laſt he was at 'an extraordinary charge, out of reſpect as well to 'his duty and neceſſary uſe, as to her Majeſty's ſatis-'faction, hoping one day, as himſelf would ſay, after 'the end and pacification of her diſpleaſure, and the 'recovery of her gracious favour, which of all worldly 'things he moſt deſired, to ſee her Majeſty in his houſe 'at Fulham.

4. 'He employed himſelf and his whole revenue in 'hoſpitality, and all other duties of his vocation, 'as for conſcience, ſo with a ſpecial regard of her 'Majeſty's liking, and to provoke her reconciliation 'and favour towards him.

5. 'He ſatisfied the error of his late marriage, with 'his untimely and unlooked for death, which pro-'ceeded eſpecially from a ſenſe of her Majeſty's diſ-'pleaſure and indignation conceived againſt him; 'bearing a moſt loving and reverent affection towards 'her Majeſty, as ever ſubject did towards his Prince, 'which might move her Majeſty's royal heart to ſome 'compaſſion towards his poor and fatherleſs children, 'of whom he left eight behind him, divers of them 'very young. His debts, due to her Majeſty and 'other creditors, were about 1400 l. and his whole 'eſtate but one houſe, in which his widow claimed her 'thirds: his plate was valued at 400 l. and his other 'ſtuff at 500 l. (125).

The Biſhop's ſon, John Fletcher (126), the famous fellow play-writer with Beaumont, is ſaid to have been born in Northampton, whilſt his father was Dean of Peterborough, and to have been educated at Bennet College; but as this does by no means correſpond with his age at the time of his death (*), ſo it is more probable he was a native of London, a perſon of that name and place being admitted penſioner there, October 15, 1591, when he muſt have been about fifteen years of age, the uſual time of admiſſion in thoſe days. He was made one of the Bible clerks in 1593: but whether it was he, or Edward of the ſame name and place, who proceeded A. B. the following year, and afterwards A. M. cannot eaſily be determined. How long he ſtaid at the College is equally uncertain, as well as how he diſpoſed of himſelf after his removal; it is moſt probable however he went up to London, where he afterwards cultivated an acquaintance with Beaumont; for it could not be at the Univerſity, although they were both of the ſame, by reaſon of the diſparity of their years (127).

[T] A monument was erected by the Counteſs of Dorſet.] This honour to our Poet's memory, was invariably aſcribed to the Earl of Eſſex, till the miſtake was rectified by Mr Fenton (128), who not many years ago diſcovered that it was ſet up, above thirty years after Spenſer's death, by Stone, maſter maſon to King Charles I. (129), as appears from his Diary, which coming into the hands of Mr Vertue the Engraver, the following article was literally tranſcribed from it. I alſo mad a monument for Mer Spencer the Pooett, and ſet it up at Weſtminſter. For which the Contes of Dorſit payd me 40 l. Mr Fenton further obſerves, that this Lady about the ſame time beſtowed a monument on Daniel the Poet and Hiſtorian. Upon there being an epitaph that begins like Spenſer, he was inclined to believe the Lady recommended both the Inſcriptions to Stone, and that he undertook to compoſe them himſelf, as from the ſtile and ſpelling we may reaſonably conclude he did, which will account too for the little exactneſs obſerved in the dates. The Inſcription, as it now ſtands, is thus.

Heare lyes (expecting the ſecond comminge of our Saviour, Chriſt Jeſus) the body of Edmond Spencer, the Prince of Poets in his tyme, whoſe divine ſpirit needs noe other witneſs than the works which he left behind him. He was borne in London in the yeare 1510, and died in the yeare 1596.

Mr Church's friend (130) confirms the exactneſs of the tranſcript, from Stone's Diary by Mr Fenton, but aſcribes the Inſcription to the Counteſs of Dorſet; in ſupport of which he obſerves, that this Lady married Richard Earl of Dorſet in February $16\frac{08}{18}$, and he dying in March 28, 1624, ſhe continued his widow till June 1630, when ſhe married Philip Earl of Pembroke, and became his Dowager in January $164\frac{3}{4}$ (131). Now as Stone was paid for Spenſer's monument by the Counteſs of Dorſet, that muſt be before her ſecond marriage, in 1630. So that ſhe could not put up Daniel's monument about the ſame time, ſince that was done when ſhe was Dowager of Pembroke. It is agreed, ſhe erected her own monument, and probably compoſed her own epitaph, leaving a blank for the date of her death; but this begins with much the ſame words that introduced both Daniel's and Spenſer's, viz. Heare lyes expectinge the ſecond comminge of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt (†). With regard to the ſtile of Spenſer's epitaph, this writer obſerves, that it is full and ſhort, and in a much better manner, than that of ninety-nine epitaphs in a hundred of that time. However, the dates of 1510 and 1696 could not be Lady Dorſet's, but muſt be imputed to the Carver. And we could produce many inſtances of epitaphs, where Blunders as enormous as theſe, have been made by Carvers. But this Writer did not ſufficiently advert, that what he has ſaid of the other part of the inſcription, ſomewhat invalidates all his reaſoning brought to prove that it was compoſed by the Counteſs. 'The Inſcription, ſays he, and the table 'are very fair, yet the reſt of the monument is like a 'honey comb, and indeed ſeveral agree that the table 'ſeems to have been made afreſh, and of late years let 'into the reſt of the monument, after the former In-'ſcription had been much defaced.' We may remember too, that it ſtands near a door of continual paſſage, and till lately (when it became defended by the preſent ſcreen) was much expoſed to the weather, and that Spenſer, probably in the laſt grand Rebellion, had, on account of his deſcription of the blatant beaſt, &c. much offended the Puritans, to whom, in B. VII. C. VII. St. 35. l. 8. he compares Barge-men

Bending their force contrary to their face,
Like that ungracious crew, which feigns demureſt grace.

Dr Fuller indeed, and others, tell us, that the original Inſcription was in Latin, grounding themſelves probably illuſtrious by her birth than by her excellent endowments. We have no account of our Poet's widow after this; but ſhe muſt have brought him one other child at leaſt beſides that which periſhed in the fire at Kilcolman; ſince, after the reſtoration of King Charles, his great grandſon, Hugolin Spenſer, was reſtored by the court of claims to ſo much of the lands in Ireland as could be found to have been his anceſtor's (dd). And in the reign of K. William III. a perſon came from Ireland into England to ſollicit the ſame affair, and brought with him letters of recommendation as a deſcendant of Spenſer. His name procured him a favourable reception; and he applied himſelf particularly to Mr Congreve, by whom he was recommended to the Earl of Halifax, who was then at the head of the Treaſury, and by that means obtained his ſuit. This perſon was ſomewhat advanced in years, and might be the ſame mentioned before, having perhaps recovered ſome part only of the eſtate at firſt, or been diſturbed in the poſſeſſion of it. However, he could give no account of the works of his anceſtor, which are wanting (ee), and which in ſome meaſure favours the opinion of Mr Fenton, that the Fairy Queen was never finiſhed by our Author, and that the ſtory of the ſix laſt books being loſt in their paſſage from Ireland is no better than a fiction [U]. Some of his deſcendants, it is ſaid, are ſtill living in that kingdom; and there is an original picture of him in the poſſeſſion of John Love, Eſq; at Caſtle-Saffron, in the neighbourhood of Kilcolman (ff). We ſhall give a liſt of his works below [W].

bly upon the account given of it in a ſmall Latin tract, deſcribing the monuments of Weſtminſter in the year 1600 (122), and aſcribed to Camden, where the words are, EDMUNDUS SPENSER Londinenſis, Anglicorum Poetarum noſtri ſeculi facile Princeps, quod ejus Poemata, ſaventibus Muſis et victuro Genio, conſcripta, comprobant. Obiit immatura morte, anno ſalutis 1598. et prope Galfridum Chaucerum conditur, qui fœliciſſimè Poeſin Anglicis Literis primus illuſtravit. In quem hæc ſcripta ſunt Epitaphia.

Hic prope Chaucerum ſitus eſt Spenſerius, illi
Proximus ingenio, Proximus ut tumulo.
Hic prope Chaucerum, Spenſere Poeta, Poetam
Conderis, et verſu quam tumulo propior;
Anglica, te vivo, vixit plauſitque Poeſis;
Nunc moritura timet, te moriente, mori.

(122) Keepe's Monumenta Weſtmonaſt.

Here the words obiit immatura morte are uſed with ſufficient propriety, as Spenſer, according to our calculation, muſt have died at forty-five years of age. But though Winſtanly and Sir Thomas Pope Blount have tranſcribed the whole as Spenſer's epitaph, yet this is inconſiderately done; for beſides that the proſe part has not the form of a monumental Inſcription, it is an Elogium intended only to guide the curious to that part of the Abbey in which the remains of ſo famous a perſon were depoſited, for at that time he had no monument erected, 'of which, ſays Mr Fenton, 'the Latin Verſes ſubjoined are an acceſſory proof, having been probably ſelected from thoſe, that were 'written by the Poets who attended his Funeral, as 'being the moſt pertinent to inform poſterity, that he 'was buried near Chaucer; which I think is all the 'merit they can juſtly pretend, being a ſervile imitation of Cardinal Bembo's epitaph on Sannazarius, and 'the immortal painter of Urbino (123).'

(123) The ſame may be ſaid of Sir Godfrey Kneller's epitaph upon his monument in Weſtminſter Abbey, by Mr Pope.

[U] The ſtory of his loſing his laſt books, &c. is a fiction.] 'Inſtead of deploring the fate, ſays Mr Fenton (124), of thoſe ſix books which are ſuppoſed to be 'loſt, I am intirely of opinion with Mr Dryden, that 'upon Sir Philip Sidney's death, Spenſer was deprived both of means and ſpirit to accompliſh his deſign. The ſtory of their being loſt in his voyage 'from Ireland, ſeems to be a fiction borrowed from 'the fate of Terence's Comedies, which itſelf has the 'air of a fiction, or at beſt is but a hearſay, that paſſed 'upon the Biographers without due examination.' This cenſure apparently put Dr Birch upon enquiring further into the matter. And that induſtrious Biographer having found it aſſerted, in Sir James Ware's Hiſtory, that theſe laſt books periſhed by the neglect or abuſe of a ſervant, who was ſent to England by Spenſer, in 1598, before his own laſt voyage thither; thereupon remarks, that Mr Fenton, though an ingenious Poet and Commentator, will ſcarce convince his Readers that the death of Sir Philip Sidney was ſufficient to prevent Spenſer from finiſhing his Poem, when it is evident he gave the world, after the loſs of that Patron, ſix books of it, at the ſame time promiſing the reſt, of which we actually have two Cantoes upon Mutability, equal, if not ſuperior, to any of the reſt, beſides two Stanzas of another Canto. And the authority of ſo conſiderable a writer as Sir James Ware, who lived near the time, and was in a ſituation of informing himſelf about the fact, cannot juſtly be rejected as a mere unſupported hearſay, propagated without due examination. 'It is true, continues the Doctor, that in the thirty-'third Sonnet of his Amoretti, written about 1592, 'Spenſer ſpeaks of the finiſhing of the Fairy Queen, as 'prevented by the cruelty of his Miſtreſs, and in the 'eightieth he requires a little refreſhment after ſo long 'a work as that of compiling the firſt ſix books of that 'Poem, and leiſure to ſing of his love's ſweet praiſe, 'the contemplation of whoſe beauty would raiſe his 'ſpirit, and enable him to undertake his ſecond work.

'With ſtrong endeavour, and attention due.

'But theſe Sonnets, allowing the ſubjects of them to 'be real facts, and not poetical fiction, were com-'poſed at leaſt five or ſix years before the laſt ſix 'books of the Fairy Queen are ſuppoſed to be loſt, 'an interval long enough for ſo ready and inexhauſtible a genius as Spenſer's to compleat them, whoſe years bear no 'proportion to the number and perfection of his works. 'For the loſs of thoſe books could not have happened 'till after 1596, becauſe he mentions in the title-page 'of the edition of the Fairy Queen that year, that the 'Poem would contain twelve books (125).' I believe the Reader is beforehand with me in his cenſure of this reaſoning, which is ſo notoriouſly inconſiſtent with the fact. The Fairy Queen, as has been already ſhewn, was begun in 1579 at leaſt, the firſt three books were finiſhed in 1590, and the next three in 1596. This laſt, not to inſiſt on the whole ſpace, is an interval of ſix years, which is above twice the length of Spenſer's life after 1596. Thus the Doctor's argument we ſee, inſtead of ſtrengthening the teſtimony of Sir James Ware, ſerves rather to weaken it, and at the ſame time confirms the opinion of Mr Fenton, that they were never finiſhed; which therefore we have embraced.

[W] A liſt of his Works.] We ſhall mention them in the order of their publication, as follows.

I. The Shepheard's Calendar; Lond. 1579. and Lond. 1586. and again Lond. 1590. all by the Author. Long after theſe came out an elegant Latin tranſlation, by Theodore Batburſt, Fellow of Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, in 1653, 8vo; which was reprinted with the Engliſh original, and a ſhort account of Spenſer's Life and Writings in Latin, by Mr. John Ball, Lond. 1732, 8vo.

II. The Faerie Queen; diſpoſed into twelve books, faſhioning twelve Moral Vertues. Part 1. Lond. 1590. fol. containing the three firſt books; the ſecond edition with alterations and additions, containing three new books (126), intituled The Second Part of the Faerie Queen; Lond. 1596. both by the Author; after his death came out a third edition, intituled The Faerie Queen, containing two new Cantoes, the only remains of a loſt book intituled The Legend of Conſtancy; Lond. 1609. This edition was republiſhed with a new title only in 1611, and again in 1617, and in 1629; another edition with cuts, by Kent, and an Account of the Author's Life and Writings, by Dr Thomas Birch, came out at London 1751, in three volumes, 4to. There were alſo three more editions of this Poem printed in the year 1758. One at London, in two volumes 8vo, by Anonymous. Another by Mr Upton, in two volumes 4to, ibid. And a third by Mr Church, at Oxford, in four volumes 8vo. To each of theſe there is annexed, An Account of the Author's Life and Writings, together with a Gloſſary.

III. Muiopotamos; or The Fate of the Butterfly; Lond. by the Author.

IV. Complaints containing ſundry ſmall Poems of the World's Vanity, as 1. The Ruines of Time. 2. The Teares of the Muſes. 3. Virgil's Gnat. 4. Proſopopœia; or Mother Hubbard's Tale. 5. The Ruines of Rome, by Bellay. 6. Muiopotamos. 7. Viſions of the World's Vanity. 8. Belley's Viſions. 9. Petrarch's Viſions (127): to which is annexed, an Advertiſement by the Printer declaring, that the ſucceſs of his late publication of the Fairy Queen had put him upon uſing all good means to procure theſe Poems, which had been diſperſed ſo as not eaſily to be recovered by the Author himſelf, ſome of them having been purloined from him ſince his departure over ſea. Beſides theſe, continues he, the Author had written ſeveral others, as A Tranſlation of Eccleſiaſtes, and Canticum Canticorum; A Se'ennight's Slumber; The Hell of Lovers; and Purgatory; all dedicated to Ladies, which together with ſome other Pieces ſcattered abroad, as The Dying Pellicane; The Hours of the Lord; The Sacrifice of a Sinner; The Seven Pſalms; which the Printer, when he could obtain them from the Author, or otherwiſe, intended to publiſh. But this deſign proved abortive, and all theſe pieces have been long irrecoverably loſt, as well as his Pageants; his Stemmata Dudleyana; The Court of Cupid; and A Tranſlation of Mocha's Idyllion on Wandring Love, all mentioned, either in his literary Correſpondence, or in other parts of his Works.

(127) Theſe ſeveral Viſions were probably the ſame with his Dreams, mentioned in a letter to Mr Harvey, who ſays they were in imitation of Petrarch's Viſions.

V. Aſtrophel; an Eclogue, or Paſtoral Elegy, on the Death of Sir Philip Sidney; Lond. 1595.

VI. Colin Clout's come again; ibid. 1595.

VII. Four Hymns on Love, dedicated to the Counteſs of Cumberland; Lond. 1596.

VIII. A View of the State of Ireland, 1633, by Sir James Ware. This is the only treatiſe written by Spenſer in proſe, except that loſt piece, intituled The Engliſh Poet, mentioned by his Friend E. K. in his Notes on The Shepherd's Calendar.

IX. The firſt Collection of his Works came out anonymous, under this title of The Works of that famous Engliſh Poet, Mr Edmund Spenſer, viz. The Fairy Queen, The Shepherd's Calendar, The Hiſtory of Ireland, &c. whereunto is added, a ſhort Account of his Life, with other new Additions never before printed. This edition contains, beſides other pieces before printed, the following: 1. Daphnaida. 2. An Elegy upon the death of the Noble and Virtuous Douglas Howard. 3. A Viſion upon the Concert of the Fairy Queen. 4. A Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, explaining the Author's whole Intention in the Courſe of this Work, [Fairy Queen] dated Jan. 23, 1589. 5. The Mourning Muſe of Theſtylis. 6. An Elegie, or Friend's Paſſion for his Aſtrophel. 7. The Epitaph upon Sir Philip Sidney, Lord Governour of Fluſhing. 8. Prothalamion, or a Spouſal Verſe, &c. 10. Amoretti, or Sonnets, &c. with the Epithalamium on his marriage. 11. Britain's Ida, which is falſely aſcribed to him. 12. Calendarium Paſtorale, &c. a Theod. Bathurſt, &c. with the Dedication to Francis Lane, Eſq; by William Dillingham, Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, dated 1 Calend. Julii, 1653. SPRAT [THOMAS], late Biſhop of Rocheſter, generally eſteemed one of the moſt elegant and correct of our Engliſh writers, was a clergyman's ſon, and born at Tallaton in Devonſhire, in the year 1635, or 1636 (a). He was entred a commoner of Wadham-College in 1651, and admitted Scholar of the ſame 25 Septemb. 1652, being aged ſeventeen years. Under the influence of the moſt ingenious Dr John Wilkins, then Warden of that college, he made a great progreſs in all branches of the moſt valuable Learning, eſpecially Mathematicks; and became a great admirer of Dr Seth Ward, Dr Ralph Bathurſt, the incomparable Mr Chriſtopher Wren, and other great promoters of true Philoſophy (b). He took the degree of Batchelor of Arts January 29, 165$\frac{4}{5}$, and that of Maſter June 11, 1657 (c), and was choſen Fellow of his college. Upon the death of Oliver Cromwell in 1658, he wrote a fine Pindarick Ode to the happy memory of that Uſurper [A]; wherein if [A] He wrote a fine Pindarick Ode to the memory of Oliver Cromwell.] It was printed at London 1659, 4to. among others, under this title, 'Poems upon the death 'of his late Highneſſe Oliver Lord Protector of England, 'Scotland, and Ireland, written by Mr Edm. Waller, 'Mr Jo. Dryden, Mr Sprat of Oxford.' Our author's appearing in ſuch good company, is what makes us ſay, that, 'if he erred, he erred among his Seniors and 'betters.' This juvenile performance was indeed often objected to him, and expoſed him afterwards to frequent cenſure (1). Even J. Oldmixon (2) obſerves, that he 'has carried the panegyric on Oliver, in this poem, as 'far as any of the French panegyriſts have done in 'praiſe of the French King.' It is actually carried to a conſiderable highth, as will appear from theſe two or three inſtances.

From the forgetfulneſs and rage
Of Death, or Envy, or devouring Age;
Thou canſt the force and teeth of Time endure:
Thy fame, like Men, the elder it doth grow,
Will of itſelf turn whiter too,
Without what needleſs Art can do;
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Thou fought'ſt not out of Envy, Hope, or Hate,
But to refine the Church and State;
And like the Romans whate'er thou
In the field of Mars didſt mow,
Was, that a holy Iſland hence might grow.
. . . . . .

Thou fought'ſt not to be high or great,
Nor for a Scepter or a Crown,
Or Ermin, Purple, or the Throne;
But as the Veſtal Heat,
Thy Fire was kindled from above alone.
. . . . . .
Nor did thy battles make thee proud or high,
Thy Conqueſt rais'd the State, not thee:
Thou overcam'ſt thyſelf in every Victory.

Our Author's Dedication of this Poem to Dr Wilkins, ſhall be his own Apology. It is in theſe words: 'Sir, 'Seeing you are pleaſed to think fit that theſe Papers 'ſhould come into the publick, which were at firſt 'deſigned to live only in a deſk, or ſome private 'Friend's hands; I humbly take the boldneſs to commit 'them to the Security, which your Name and Protection 'will give them, with the moſt knowing part of the 'world. There are two things eſpecially in which they 'ſtand in need of your defence: One is, That they fall 'ſo infinitely below the full and lofty Genius of that 'excellent Poet, who made this way of writing free 'of our nation*: The other, That they are ſo little 'proportioned and equal to the Renown of that Prince, 'on whom they were written. Such great Actions and 'Lives, deſerving rather to be the Subjects of the nobleſt 'Pens and divine Fancies, than of ſuch ſmall Beginners 'and weak Eſſayers in Poetry as myſelf. Againſt 'theſe dangerous prejudices, there remains no other 'Shield than the Univerſal Eſteem and Authority which 'your Judgment and Approbation carries with it. The 'right you have to them, Sir, is not only on the ac-'count of the Relation you had to this great Perſon, 'nor of the general favour which all Arts receive from

if he erred, he erred among his ſeniors and betters. The next production of his promiſing genius, was another Pindarick Ode deſcribing The Plague of Athens, which happened in the ſecond year of the Peloponneſian war [B]. After the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he entered into holy orders (d), and became Chaplain to George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, whom he is ſaid to have aſſiſted in his witty compoſitions [C]. He was alſo made Chaplain in ordinary to his Majeſty (e): and Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1667, he did due honour to this learned body, by publiſhing the much admired Hiſtory of it [D]. And the year following, he very handſomly vindicated the Engliſh Nation, againſt the inſolent Reflections of one Sorbiere [E]. He alſo publiſhed Mr Cowley's Life.

[B] Another Pindarick Ode deſcribing The Plague of Athens, &c.] We are told (3), that this 'performance 'ſtood the teſt of the ſevereſt Criticks, and, without 'partiality to the author, it was given as the opinion 'of the beſt judges, That the manner of his great ori-'ginal was judiciouſly imitated, and that in the ſub-'ject he far excelled both the Greek hiſtorian and the 'Latin poet.' There is, indeed, in this Ode a great deal of the ſublime; the deſcriptions are ſtrong; and the painting lively and moſt affecting. But it ſinks, in ſome places, into the low and the trifling; particularly in ſtanza the eighth in theſe verſes.

[D] By publiſhing the much admired Hiſtory of it.] He intitled it 'The Hiſtory of the Royal Society of 'London, for the improving of Natural Knowledge.' Firſt printed in 1667, 4to; a ſecond edition corrected came out in 1702, and another in 1734. It is divided into three parts. The firſt part treats of the Ancient Philoſophy; the ſecond peculiarly deſcribes the Royal Society; and the third chiefly contains a defence and recommendation of Experimental Knowledge in general. In the ſecond part are inſerted ſeveral curious pieces; as namely, Anſwers by Sir Philberto Vernatti, reſident in Batavia, to certain inquiries ſent thither by order of the Royal Society: A method for making a Hiſtory of the Weather, by Mr Hook: Mr Rooke's direction for the Obſervations of the Eclipſes of the Moon, and his Diſcourſe concerning the Obſervations of the Eclipſes of the Satellites of Jupiter: A propoſal for making wine; and Experiments of a Stone called Oculus Mundi, both by Dr Goddard: A relation of Pico Teneriffe: Experiments of the weight of Bodies increaſed in the Fire, made at the Tower: Experiments of the recoiling of Guns, by the Lord Brouncker: The hiſtory of the making of Salt-peter, by Mr Henſhaw: The hiſtory of making Gun-powder: An apparatus to the hiſtory of the common practices of Dying, by Sir William Petty: And the hiſtory of the generation and ordering of Green Oyſters, commonly called Colcheſter-Oyſters. — Notwithſtanding the Deſign was noble, and well executed, it was cavilled at by ſome, eſpecially by Henry Stubbe, a phyſician of Warwick, the H—— of the laſt century; who publiſhed, 'Legends no Hiſtories: or a 'Specimen of ſome Animadverſions upon the Hiſtory 'of the Royal Society. Lond. 1670, 4to. And, Cam-'panella revived, or an Enquiry into the Hiſtory of the 'Royal Society, whether the Virtuoſi there do not pur-'ſue the projects of Campanella for the reducing Eng-'land unto Popery. Being an extract of a letter to a 'perſon of honour from H. S. With another letter to 'Sir N. N. relating the cauſe of the quarrel betwixt 'H. S. and the Royal Society; and a Poſtſcript con-'cerning the quarrel between him and Dr Chriſtopher 'Merrett. Lond. 1670, 4to. H. Stubbe alſo pub-'liſhed, A Cenſure upon certain paſſages contained in 'the Hiſtory of the Royal Society, as being deſtructive to 'the Eſtabliſhed Religion and Church of England. 'To the ſecond edition of which is added, The Letter 'of a Virtuoſo in oppoſition to the Cenſure, a Reply 'unto the Letter aforeſaid, and Reply unto the præfa-'tory Anſwer of Ecebolius (Joſ.) Glanville, Chaplain to 'Mr Rouſe of Eaton (late Member of the Rump-'Parliament,) Rector of Bath, and Fellow of the Royal 'Society. Alſo an Anſwer to the Letter of Dr Henry 'More, relating to Henry Stubbe Phyſician at War-'wick.' Oxford 1671, 4to.——A late author (6) is pleaſed to ſtyle The Hiſtory of the Royal Society, 'a fuſtian Hiſtory,'——and adds, that 'it was 'eſteemed an excellent compoſition by the metaphor '—hunting mob of ſilly writings in Charles the Se-'cond's reign.' A hard, and indeed unjuſt, cenſure.

For, much truer, as well as handſomer, is the Character given of it in A. Wood (7); that 'it is penned 'in ſo very fine, neat and graceful a ſtyle, as that 'ſome account it to be one of the moſt exact pieces 'for curiouſneſs and delicacy of Language, that was 'ever yet extant in our tongue.' And the ingenious Mr Cowley, in his Pindaric Ode prefixed thereto, and addreſſed to the Royal Society, pays this fine compliment to the Author.

[F] He alſo wrote Mr Cowley's life.] He wrote it firſt in Latin, and prefixed it to Mr Cowley's ſix books De Plantis, printed at London 1668. 8vo. Afterwards he drew it up in a fuller manner in Engliſh, and placed it at the head of Mr Cowley's Poems, who had recommended to him, in his will, the care of his printed works and manuſcript papers. But the pious Mr Edmund Elys, of Exeter-College, Oxford, taking umbrage at ſome paſſages in it, publiſhed, 'An Exclamation to all thoſe 'that love the Lord Jeſus in ſincerity, againſt an apo-'logy, written by an ingenious perſon, for Mr Abra-'ham Cowley's laſcivious and profane verſes.' Lond. '4to (10).

[G] By drawing up the account of the Conſpiracy, known by the title of the Proteſtant Plot.] It was printed in 1685. fol. with this title, 'A true Account and De-'claration of the horrid Conſpiracy againſt the late 'King, his preſent Majeſty, and the Government: 'As it was ordered to be publiſhed by his late Majeſty.' Reprinted in 1686. 8vo. As this was a moſt odious taſk, and that expoſed our Author to the Reſentment of perſons of great titles and high ſtations, and indeed of the bulk of the nation; he found it neceſſary, after the Revolution, to write an Apology for himſelf, in a Second Letter to the Earl of Dorſet: wherein he thus ſpeaks upon the ſubject of this book.——'Firſt, my 'Lord, as for the book of the Conſpiracy, it is true, 'I have often heard that ſome noble and eminent 'perſons, whoſe Kindred or Friends were unhappily 'concerned in the ſubject of that Hiſtory, had enter-'tained a prejudice againſt me thereupon. But to 'them I ſhall make this equitable requeſt, that they 'would ſuſpend any farther cenſure of me for what 'I did write, till they ſhall be fairly informed how 'much there is that I have not written.

'I will not deny, that it was at the Requeſt, or 'rather the Command, of King Charles the Second, 'that I drew up a relation of that Plot: And to that 'end, I had free liberty to conſult the Paper-Office and 'Council-books, whence I was plentifully furniſhed 'with ſuch authentick Materials, either of Papers printed 'by Authority, or of ſworn Depoſitions and Confeſſions, 'as have been always thought the beſt ground for an 'Hiſtorian to work upon. But now, my Lord, I can 'ſtill alledg, that though a vaſt heap of ſuch matter 'was immediately ſupplyed to my hands; and though 'I often received earneſt Meſſages, and ſome ſharp 'Words from that gentle King to quicken my ſlowneſs, 'yet more than twelve months had paſſed before I could 'be brought to put pen to paper; out of my natural 'averſion to any buſineſs, that might reflect ſeverely 'upon any man: my own inclination rather leading 'me to the other extreme, that is, rather to commend 'too much what in the leaſt ſeems well done, than to 'aggravate what is ill done by others. However, up-'on King Charles's frequent commands, and continued 'importunity, I did at length obey; and the rather, 'becauſe I had formerly ſomewhat incurred that King's 'and his brother's diſpleaſure, by my declining to write 'againſt the ſtates of Holland, during the time of the 'firſt and ſecond Dutch wars. Being thus over-perſuaded, 'I made my Collections, and preſented them to that 'King: Which his Majeſty having himſelf peruſed, 'was pleaſed to direct me to put them into the hands 'of the Lord Keeper North, who carefully read and 'corrected what I had done, and added divers matters 'of fact, which had eſcaped my obſervation. Thus 'the work ſtood in preparation for the preſs, when the 'deplorable death of that King happened. And ſhort-'ly after King James the Second calling for the Papers, 'and having read them, and altered divers paſſages, 'cauſed them to be printed by his own authority, as is 'to be ſeen before the Book. But now, my Lord, 'I can truly declare, that during my compoſing thoſe 'collections, I earneſtly requeſted King Charles the 'Second, ... that few or no Names of perſons 'ſhould be mentioned, whatever probable ſuggeſtions 'might be againſt them, but only ſuch, upon whom 'publick Judgment had paſſed, which it could be to 'no purpoſe for me to conceal. I could indeed have 'wiſhed, that my Lord Ruſſel's, and ſome other Names 'of Perſons of Honour, might have been of the number 'to be omitted, upon that very account; but it was 'none of my fault that they were not. I could not 'hinder, nor did I in the leaſt contribute to their fall: 'Nay I lamented it, eſpecially my Lord Ruſſel's, after 'I was fully convinced by diſcourſe with the Reverend 'Dean of Canterbury *, of that noble Gentleman's 'great probity, and conſtant abhorrence of falſhood; 'but that was a good while after. All that I did, was 'the publiſhing, or rather indeed the putting together 'methodically, what before was ſufficiently publiſhed 'in printed Papers that were licenſed: And out of 'them to draw the ſubſtance of a Declaration of State, 'in vindication of that which the Authority of the 'nation, at that time, called, The Publick Juſtice of 'the Kingdom. But, my Lord, to return to what 'I was ſaying. King Charles having granted my deſire 'of concealing divers Names, according to this allow-'ance I proceeded, leaving out ſome, and abbreviating 'others; endeavouring all along to ſpare Parties and 'Families, and particular Perſons, as much as would 'be allowed. All which may be demonſtrated from 'the Copies of the Depoſitions, as they went out of 'my hands, where there were ſeveral Names viſibly 'marked by my own pen, to be paſſed by in the pub-'lication. So that if ſome indifferent man ſhould now 'compare the informations as they are in print, with 'the Originals in the Secretary's, or the Paper-Office, 'he would, it may be, be apter to ſuſpect me of con-'nivance, than of calumny on that ſide. If I have 'now given your Lordſhip any ſatisfaction touching my 'fair dealing in my part of that Book, I doubt not but 'what follows will give you more; when I ſhall aſſure 'you of my having refuſed to write a Continuation of the 'ſame Hiſtory. For, my Lord, it was ſome time after 'the Duke of Monmouth's overthrow and execution, 'that King James the Second required me to undertake 'ſuch another taſk, and preſently to ſet about a Second 'Part. To that purpoſe his Majeſty gave me a ſight 'of multitudes of Original Letters and Papers, together 'with the Confeſſions of ſeveral perſons then taken in 'England and Scotland; who did indeed ſeem all to 'outvie one another, who ſhould reveal moſt, both of 'Men and Things, relating to the Old Conſpiracy, 'as well as to the Duke of Monmouth's, and the Earl 'of Argyle's invaſion. But finding the Innocence of 'divers Perſons of Worth and Honour touched in thoſe 'Papers, and by that time beginning vehemently to 'ſuſpect, things were running apace towards the en-'dangering of our Laws and Religion, I muſt ſay, 'I never could be induced by all his Majeſty's reiterated 'commands, to go on with that work. Inſtead of that, 'though I had all the Materials for ſuch a Narrative 'within my power, for above three years, and might 'eaſily have finiſhed it in a month or ſix weeks ſpace, 'yet I choſe rather to ſuppreſs and ſilence, as much as 'I could, all that new Evidence; which, if openly 'produced, would have blemiſhed the Reputation of 'ſome honourable perſons. Give me leave, my Lord, 'only to add, That I am confident there are ſeveral 'Original Papers ſtill in being, which would be more 'than enough to convince all impartial men, how 'moderate and tender I was in that cauſe.'—There is ſomething very ſtinging in what he ſays of the Lord Ruſſel; 'that he was carried away into this traiterous 'enterprife, by a vain Air of popularity, and a wild 'Suſpicion of loſing a great Eſtate by an imaginary re-'turn of Popery;'—meaning the Abbey-lands (11).

[H] In two Letters written to the Earl of Dorſet.] The firſt begins thus, 'My Lord, I think I ſhould be 'wanting to myſelf at this time, in my own neceſſary 'Vindication, ſhould I forbear any longer to give my 'Friends a true account of my Behaviour in the late 'Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. Though I profeſs, what 'I ſhall now ſay, I only intend as a reaſonable Mitiga'tion of the Offence I have given, not entirely to juſtify 'my Sitting in that Court; for which, I acknowledg, 'I have deſervedly incurred the Cenſure of many good 'Men; and I wiſh I may ever be able to make a ſuffi'cient amends to my Country for it. Yet thus much, 'my Lord, I can juſtly alledg for myſelf, That the 'Commiſſion was made, and my Name put into it, 'altogether without my knowledg; when I happened 'to be at Saliſbury, holding an Archiepiſcopal Viſita'tion with the Biſhop of Chicheſter, and other Com'miſſioners .... At my return from thence to London, 'I found I was appointed to be one in a new Com'miſſion: But I could never ſee a copy of it, nor did 'I ever hear its contents, or know the powers granted 'in it, till the time of its being publickly opened at 'Whitehall; whither I was ſent for, on purpoſe, in 'haſte, that very morning from my houſe in the coun'try..... Upon the firſt publiſhing the Commiſſion, 'I confeſs through my ignorance in the Laws, I had 'little or no objection in my thoughts againſt the 'Legality of it; eſpecially when I conſidered, that 'having paſſed the broad Seal, it muſt needs, accord'ing to my apprehenſion, have been examined and 'approved by the King's learned Council in the law, 'men generally eſteemed of eminent ſkill in their 'profeſſion. Beſides, I was farther confirmed (though 'too raſhly I grant) in my Error, when I ſaw two 'Gentlemen of the long robe, perſons of the greateſt 'place and authority in Weſtminſter-hall (12), joined 'with us; who, I ſhould have thought, would never 'have ventured their fortunes and reputations, by 'exerciſing a juriſdiction that was illegal. And I be'lieved I had reaſon to conclude, that this very argu'ment might prevail alſo with ſome others of the tem'poral Lords that ſat among us: particularly the Earl 'of Rocheſter has often aſſured me, it was that which 'induced him to accept of the Commiſſion; and that 'he did it, as I myſelf did, with a purpoſe of doing as 'much good as we were able, and of hindering as 'much evil as we poſſibly could, in that unfortunate 'juncture of affairs. As for my own part, I was 'ſtartled when I perceived my Lord of Canterbury (13) 'ſcrupled to be preſent with us; whoſe Example, it is 'true, I ought rather to have followed than the greateſt 'Lawyers in all matters of Conſcience. Yet I hope his 'Grace will excuſe me, if I declare, that I did not at 'firſt know he made a matter of Conſcience of it. Nor 'did I underſtand his Grace took exception at the Law'fulneſs of the Commiſſion itſelf, till after my Lord 'of London (14) was cited, and had appeared and 'anſwered, and the unjuſt ſentence was paſt againſt 'him. For it was on the very day the Commiſſion was 'opened, immediately, as I remember, after it was 'read, that my Lord of London was informed againſt 'for not ſuſpending Dr Sharpe: Which, though it 'exceedingly ſurprized me at firſt, yet obſerving with 'what heat the proſecution was like to be carried on 'againſt him, that very conſideration did the more in'cline me to ſit and act there, that I might be in ſome 'capacity of doing right to his Lordſhip. And whe'ther I did him any ſervice through the whole proceſs 'of his cauſe, I leave it to my Lord himſelf to judge. 'That I gave my poſitive vote for his Acquittal, both 'the times when his ſuſpenſion came in queſtion, I 'ſuppoſe I need not tell the world. Having thus, in 'the beginning of that court, and the higheſt fer'ment of it, freely diſcharged my conſcience, by en'deavouring to clear my Lord of London, I muſt 'own I thenceforth unawares took a reſolution, which, 'how hurtful ſoever it may now prove to myſelf, yet 'I am ſtill apt to believe, did the Church of England 'no diſſervice in the main, my deſign, by conti'nuing longer among them, was to make ſure of one 'Vote at leaſt, and to do my part, to the utmoſt of 'my ſmall intereſt and ability, to leſſen the blow which 'I feared was coming on the Clergy, ſince it could not 'altogether be avoided. And I was the more perſuaded 'to take this courſe, not only becauſe the Legality or 'Illegality of the Commiſſion ſeemed at firſt rather a 'moot-caſe, than a determined point either way; 'divers of the principal Lawyers, as I was told, being 'divided in their opinions concerning it; but alſo 'becauſe I ſaw ſome other perſons were ready to fill 'my chair there, as ſoon as it ſhould be empty; Men 'of whoſe principles and practices I was ſo well aware, 'that I knew they would not have the ſame regard as 'myſelf for the Churches preſervation. And perhaps 'I might add this further for the extenuation of my 'fault, that I was not diſcouraged by ſome grave and 'worthy perſons, for this very purpoſe, to keep in 'ſome longer time; but I forbear to name them, that 'I may not involve any good man in my infelicity. 'However, upon theſe motives I acted, and, in purſu'ance of this deſign, God knows, I voted as long as 'I remained at the board; where all my opinions were 'ſo contrary to the humour of the Court, that I often 'thought myſelf to be really in as much hazard from 'the Commiſſion itſelf, by my not complying, as any 'of my brethren could be that were out of it. I appeal 'to all that were acquainted with the tranſactions there, 'whether ever I gave my conſent to any irregular or 'arbitrary ſentence; whether I did not conſtantly and 'firmly declare againſt every extravagant decree. I could 'almoſt preſume to affirm, that I was, as far as in me 'lay, ſome way or other, a common ſollicitor, or ad'vocate, for all that were unjuſtly proſecuted before 'them. And I might exemplify this beyond all contra'diction, if I ſhould enumerate every particular cauſe 'that came under their cognizance. After my Lord 'of London was ſentenced, his Lordſhip knows, I was 'always upon the watch to obſtruct all farther proceed'ings againſt him: Nay, his Lordſhip well remembers, 'I had once obtained to have his ſuſpenſion taken off, 'if he would but have made an ordinary ſubmiſſion. 'Then I was zealous for Exeter-College, in their defence 'againſt Father Petre, in a buſineſs of ſo great import'ance, that if the college had been overcome in the ſuit, 'that whole Society muſt ſoon have been abandoned 'to Popery. I did my utmoſt to oppoſe the violent 'perſecution upon the whole univerſity of Cambridge, 'when the Vice-Chancellor was ſuſpended his office, 'and his Maſterſhip of Magdalen-College; becauſe a 'Popiſh Prieſt, who was one of the Miſſionaries to 'pervert the Scholars, was denied a degree in their 'Convocation. I faithfully aſſiſted and ſerved Chriſt-Church in Oxford, when they were in danger of hav'ing new ſtatutes impoſed upon them, which would 'infallibly have laid open that royal College, to the 'ruine of their good learning and religion. I abſolutely 'reſiſted all the alterations in the Statutes of Sidney-'College, and all other changes and abrogations of 'Oaths, that were then made or deſigned in the ſtatutes 'of either Univerſity, for the advantage of Popiſh 'Prieſts and ſtudents, and for the freer courſe of Man'damus's in their favour. I ever gave my advice for 'all ſorts of buſineſs, to be returned into the common 'courſe of juſtice; as that all eccleſiaſtical matters ſhould 'be referred back to the ſeveral Biſhops from whoſe 'dioceſes the complaints were brought; and that all 'informations againſt Colleges and Hoſpitals ſhould be 'recommitted to their proper viſitors. I perſiſted un'moveable in my diſſent from every vote that paſſed 'againſt Magdalen-College in Oxford; from their very 'firſt citation before that court, to the cruel incapaci'tating of the Preſident and Fellows. I could mention 'many other particulars, wherein I ſucceſsfully laboured 'to relieve divers of the inferior and greater Clergy 'from oppreſſion; to prevent ſome from being called 'before us at all; to preſerve others after they were 'accuſed by malicious ſycophants and informers, that 'ſwarmed then every where: ſome in the caſe of Tythes; 'ſome the Queen's being with child of the pretended Prince of Wales (p) [I]. But Auguſt 15, 1688, he withdrew himſelf from the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion [K], and thenceforth concurred

' ſome for not reading, ſome for preaching againſt the ' King's declaration. But there are two eminent in-
' ſtances, which I cannot omit. 'The one, that when () Dr T. Barlow. ' —— the Biſhop of Lincoln (), was petitioned ' againſt by his Archdeacon, and there was, at that ' time, inclination enough in the Court to purſue him
' to extremity, yet our Author ſays, that he ſo effectu' ally wrought with the Commiſſioners, that the proſe-
' cution againſt him was diſcountenanced and fell to ' the ground.' But the author of the Complete Hiſtory (15) Vol. III. p. 507. note. of England informs us (15), that Biſhop Barlow's engaging to write in favour of the Diſpenſing Power, proved his beſt ſecurity and protection.——' The other
' inſtance (as our Author's Apology goes on) concerns
' my Lord of Canterbury; and I am confident his Grace
' will readily give me this teſtimony, That I ſerved him
' honeſtly and induſtriouſly on ſome occaſions, wherein
' he was like to be embroiled with the Commiſſion;
' which muſt inevitably have ended in his Grace's ſuſ' penſion at leaſt, ſince he was reſolved, whenever he
' ſhould be brought before them, whatever the pretence
' had been, to deny the whole Power and Juriſdiction
' of the Court. As for the laſt ſcene tranſacted there,
' which was in order to cenſure the whole Clergy, for ' refuſing to read the Declaration: In that I hope I need
' ſay nothing in my defence, it being publickly known ' to the whole Nation, how I then demeaned myſelf;
' how I broke looſe from the Commiſſion, in a time
' when I was convinced I could do the Church no far' ther ſervice there, and when the Popiſh party was in ' the height of their power and rage. Then it was ' that I joined myſelf again to the common intereſt of ' the honeſt Clergy, juſt when they were on the very ' brink of deſtruction, before we ever dreamt of this ' glorious Deliverance. . . . . Upon the whole matter
' therefore, though as to the legal part of the Com-
' miſſion, which belonged to Lawyers to judge of, I was
' miſtaken, for acting in it at all: Yet in the conſcien-
' tious part, which properly concerned me as a Divine,
' to act in it honeſtly and ſincerely, according to the
' beſt of my judgment; in that, if I ſhall not be thought
' to deſerve thanks, yet I hope I may obtain pardon
' from all men of candour and ingenuity.'—As this Letter contains the moſt plauſible Excuſes that could be made for the moſt exceptionable part of our Prelate's conduct, we thought it a point of juſtice due to him, to lay this long Extract of it before the Reader.

[K] He withdrew himſelf from the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion.] In his Second Letter to the Earl of Dorſet (17), he declares, that his attendance at the Tryal of the Seven Biſhops, was the critical Time when he came to be convinced of the Illegality of the Commiſſion, and took a reſolution to abandon it.——' For my part, ſays
' he, I muſt own, I was ſo fully ſatisfyed by the excel' lent Pleadings of thoſe great Lawyers at that tryal,
' that I confeſs I never had till then ſo clear a notion,
' what unalterable Bounds the law has fixed between
' the juſt Prerogatives of the Crown, and the legal ' Rights of the Subject. And therefore from that very ' day I haſtened to make what reparations I could for
' the Errors occaſioned by my former ignorance; and
' to act for the future, what I always intended, as be' came a true Engliſhman. Nor was it long after,
' that I met with a ſignal opportunity to put this my ' purpoſe in practice: For perceiving the rage of the ' Popiſh party againſt the Church of England was rather ' heightened than abated, by my Lords the Biſhops
' being acquitted; and fearing the Eccleſiaſtical Com-
' miſſion was next to be employed, to wreak the Papiſts
' revenge on the orthodox clergy, when Weſtminſter-
' hall could not do it, I preſently reſolved to deſert
' that commiſſion, from whence I had often before
' laboured and intreated in vain to be fairly diſmiſſed:
' And immediately I ſent the Commiſſioners the following
' Letter, whereof your Lordſhip may remember I then
' preſented you with a copy; as knowing how much
' you would be pleaſed, with my other friends, at my
' forſaking that board upon any terms.'——My Lords, I moſt humbly intreat your Lordſhips favourable interpretation of what I now write, That ſince your Lordſhips are reſolved to proceed againſt thoſe, who have not complyed with the King's commands in reading his Declaration, it is abſolutely impoſſible for me to ſerve his Majeſty any longer in this Commiſſion, I beg leave to tell your Lordſhips, that though I myſelf did ſubmit in that particular, yet I will never be any ways inſtrumental in puniſhing thoſe my Brethren who did not. For, as I call God to witneſs, that what I did was merely upon a principle of Conſcience; ſo I am fully ſatisfied, that their forbearance was upon the ſame principle. I have no reaſon to think otherwiſe of the whole body of our Clergy, who, upon all occaſions, have ſignalized their loyalty to the Crown, and their zealous affections to his preſent Majeſty's perſon in the worſt of times. Now, my Lords, the ſafety of the whole Church of England ſeeming to be exceedingly concerned in this proſecution, I muſt declare, that I cannot, with a ſafe conſcience, ſit as judge in this cauſe, upon ſo many pious and excellent men: With whom, if it be God's will, it rather becomes me to ſuffer, than to be in the leaſt acceſſary to their ſuffering. I therefore earneſtly requeſt your Lordſhips to intercede with the King, that I may be graciouſly diſmiſſed any farther attendance at your board, and to aſſure his Majeſty, that I am ſtill ready to ſacrifice whatever I have to his ſervice, but my Conſcience and Religion.

Bromley Aug. 15, 1688. My Lords &c.

' Your Lordſhip ſeeing what I have ſaid in this ' letter, concerning my ſubmitting in that buſineſs of ' the Declaration, upon a principle of Conſcience, as I
' then thought, you may expect my reaſon for doing
' ſo. I muſt frankly confeſs, I had then a doubt in ' my mind, ariſing from a Rubrick in the Common ' Prayer (which is as much as any other a law in the ' land) whether a Biſhop could lawfully deny the read' ing of whatever the King ſhould ordain to be read in ' Churches. And 'twas merely upon that miſtaken
' ſcruple of conſcience, I was induced not to oppoſe
' that command of the King in council; I ſay not to ' oppoſe it: Farther than that, I ſtill ſay, I went not ' in that buſineſs. For it is moſt true, that the Or' ders of Council, for publiſhing that Declaration in ' Churches, were diſperſed through the places of my
' juriſdiction immediately from the King's printing-
' houſe, without my injunction, or ſo much as my ' knowledge. And after they were ſent abroad,
' though I did not, 'tis true, revoke them, as not ' being then well determined in the caſe; yet I no
' where inſiſted to have them obeyed. Nay both in ' my own dioceſs of Rocheſter, and in that of London,
' where I had then very unwillingly ſome inſpection,
' there is no one Clergyman can upbraid me for urging
' any man to read, or reproving any for not reading
' the Declaration. If it ſhall be objected, that I per' mitted it to be read in Weſtminſter-abbey, I deſire it ' may be alſo conſidered, what dreadful Apprehen-
' ſions this Royal Church and School were then under,
' from our neighbours the Jeſuits at Court; who lay in ' wait to take any advantage, whereby they might
' ſtir up the King to ruin us. Beſides that a Quo
' Warranto was then actually iſſued out againſt us, and ' we were every day threatened, that as we were the ' neareſt, ſo we ſhould fall the firſt prey into the hands ' of the Popiſh Prieſts. But to go on; I need not re' mind your Lordſhip what wrath and indignation this ' Letter to the Commiſſioners produced againſt me
' from the Jeſuited Party at Court; for which yet I
' eſteemed myſelf abundantly recompenced by the ' Peace it gave me in my own mind, and I hope I ' may ſay by the good will it revived towards me in ' the hearts of good men; eſpecially of my Lord
' Archbiſhop, and the other perſecuted Biſhops,
' with whom I ever after acted in perfect con' junction for the publick Good.'—— curred with the reſt of the Biſhops, in ſuch ſalutary meaſures as were thought moſt for the advantage of the nation (q). He was one of the managers in the conference concerning the Abdication of King James II, and one of thoſe who voted againſt the throne's being vacant (r). Notwithſtanding which, he ſubmitted to the new government, and remained unmoleſted in his See; but undoubtedly he was forced to buy his peace, by giving up to the Court the diſpoſal of his beſt preferments, as the Biſhop of Durham was obliged to do (ſ). In 1692, a moſt villainous conſpiracy was formed againſt his life, and the lives of ſeveral other perſons of honor and diſtinction; by forging an Aſſociation under their hands, to reſtore King James, and ſeize the Princeſs of Orange [L]. But, after a ſhort confinement, and ſtrict examination before the Privy-Council, he was honorably acquitted. From thenceforth he ſpent the remainder of his days in a happy tranquillity, charitable and generous to all, eſteemed by the impartial and diſintereſted, and beloved by his acquaintance (t). He joined himſelf to thoſe who were looked upon as beſt affected to the Church, and voted with them; as in Dr Sacheverell's affair &c. (u). At length he dyed at Bromley in Kent, May 20, 1713, of an apoplexy, in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age; and was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a monument was afterwards erected to him (w). He left only one ſon named Thomas, who was Archdeacon of Rocheſter, Prebendary of the Churches of Rocheſter, Winchester, and Weſtminſter; and who dyed May 10, 1720, aged forty-one. Our learned Author, beſides his ſeveral works already mentioned, publiſhed ſome Sermons, and a few other pieces, of which an account is given in the note [M].

Elſewhere, the Biſhop more fully explains the great danger he expoſed himſelf to, by thus relinquiſhing the Commiſſion. 'This is certain (ſays he) that my leaving and defying the Commiſſion at that time, did 'apparently exaſperate the Popiſh Prieſts, and the 'Ringleaders of the Jeſuitical Faction againſt me, to 'the higheſt degree imaginable. Nay, ſome worthy 'men have made me almoſt ſo vain as to fancy, that 'my bidding the Commiſſion then farewel in ſo public and peremptory a manner, was no inconſiderable 'ſtroke towards the diſſolution of the Commiſſion itſelf. 'It is evident, that immediately upon the receipt of 'my Letter, wherein I renounced them, they adjourned 'in confuſion for ſix months, and ſcarce ever met afterwards. Thus far I am ſure, my perpetual behaviour therein was ſo much all of a piece, ſo directly 'againſt the vogue of the Court, and the counſels of 'Popery then prevailing; and the effects of it did ſo 'viſibly deſtroy my former intereſt with the King, that 'whereas it is manifeſt I was, when the Commiſſion 'began, in as fair a probability as any Clergyman in 'England, to receive great effects of his Majeſty's favour; yet after my oppoſing my Lord Biſhop of 'London's ſuſpenſion, and my other votes conformable to that, I fell by degrees under his ſevere diſpleaſure. I might add moreover, that it is very probable, I was at laſt in more imminent Danger than 'any of my Brethren; I ſay, my Lord, than any of 'my Brethren, the ſeven petitioning Biſhops, and my 'Lord of London only excepted (18).'——An Anſwer to each of theſe Letters was publiſhed in 1689, ſaid to have been written by one Mr Charlton (19).

[L] In 1692, a moſt villainous conſpiracy was formed againſt his life, and the lives of ſeveral other perſons of honor and diſtinction; by forging an Aſſociation, &c.] This moſt wicked Contrivance was formed, by one Robert Young, a Scotchman, (who had inſinuated himſelf into Deacon's orders by forged certificates, and afterwards had forged his Prieſt's orders, but had been degraded for Bigamy, and other the moſt heinous of crimes,) and Stephen Blackhead, both priſoners in Newgate; the latter for forging a Bond. They contrived an Aſſociation, to which they affixed the forged hands of W. Sancroft Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Tho. Sprat Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Earls of Marleborough and Saliſbury, Lord Cornbury, Sir Baſil Firebrace, and John Wilcoxe. The ſubſtance of the Aſſociation was, That they would contribute their utmoſt aſſiſtance towards King James's Recovery of his Kingdoms; would have 30,000 men ready to meet him at his landing; would ſeize the Princeſs of Orange dead or alive, &c. It was dated March 20—91. In order to come at the Biſhop's hand to counterfeit it, R. Young ſends by Blackhead, in April 1692, a Letter to the Biſhop then at Bromley, under the feigned name of one Robert Hookes, D. D. Rector of Windgrave in Buckinghamſhire; pretending, that one James Curtis had applyed to him to be his Curate; but, that having reaſon to ſuſpect his inſtruments were forged, he deſired the Biſhop to ſend him word, under his own hand, by the bearer his man, whether he had ordained ſuch a one, in ſuch, or ſuch years. The Biſhop, after ſearching his books, writes a letter, importing, that he had never ordained any ſuch perſon. This letter being brought to Young, he copies thence the Biſhop's hand to the Aſſociation. And then, in order to lodge it in the Biſhop's houſe, Young ſends Blackhead a ſecond time to Bromley; under pretence of telling his Lordſhip, that Dr Hookes had ſeized Curtis, and would have him ſeverely puniſhed. In reality, Blackhead's intention was, to leave the Aſſociation in the Biſhop's Study; and for that purpoſe earneſtly deſired to ſee the Houſe, particularly the ſtudy: But this not being granted him, he found an opportunity of dropping the Aſſociation into a Flower-pot in the chimney of the great Parlour, the door of which was without a lock. Immediately after, Young lodged an Information before the Privy-Council. In purſuance of which, May 7, 1692, Mr Dyve, Clerk of the Council, and Mr Knight, one of the King's Meſſengers, went to Bromley, and arreſted the Biſhop upon ſuſpicion of high-treaſon: who being brought to his lodgings in Weſtminſter, was put under the charge of the meſſenger and a guard of four ſoldiers night and day; and thus he continued eleven days.——In the mean time, the meſſenger having omitted ſearching the room wherein the Aſſociation was, Young ſent Blackhead a third time to Bromley, on Whitſunday, May the 15th, to try to recover it, being the original. Accordingly, getting privately into the parlour, unſeen by the family, he took the Aſſociation out of the ſame Flower-pot where he had laid it, and returned it back to Young.——The Biſhop was examined before the Council, May the 8th, and remained in confinement till the 18th, when, upon his petition, he was enlarged, and retired the next morning early to Bromley: But June the 9th he was ſent for again, and examined a ſecond time on the 10th, and again on the 13th, and being confronted with Blackhead and Young, his Innocence ſo plainly appeared, that he was honorably acquitted.—His Lordſhip publiſhed an Account of it under this title, 'A Relation of the late wicked Contrivance of Stephen 'Blackhead and Robert Young, againſt the Lives of ſeveral 'Perſons, by forging an Aſſociation under their hands. 'Written by the Biſhop of Rocheſter. In two Parts: 'The firſt Part being a Relation of what paſſed at the 'three Examinations of the ſaid Biſhop by a Committee 'of the Privy-Council. The Second being an Account 'of the two above-mentioned Authors of the Forgery.' Lond. 1692, and 1693. 4to. Upon the whole, it was one of the moſt horrid ſcenes of wickedneſs that ever was invented. And ſo thankful to Providence was the Biſhop for his happy Deliverance, that he kept a Thankſgiving day for it as long as he lived (20).

(20) See his Will; and the Concluſion of his Relation of that wicked Contrivance.

[M] Beſides his ſeveral works already mentioned, publiſhed ſome Sermons, &c.] The Sermons were publiſhed at ſeveral times, as they were preached, and reprinted together in 1710 and 1722, 8vo. They were preached before the King, the Houſe of Commons, at the anniverſary meeting of Clergymens ſons, before the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen, the Artillery-company, &c. The laſt mentioned, which is on Luke xxii. part of the 36th verſe, we are told (21), is almoſt word for word the ſame with a Sermon preached by Dr Smallwood in Flanders, upon the ſame text.——As to his other pieces, they were, A Diſcourſe to the Clergy of his Dioceſe at his Viſitation in the year 1695. As to his Character [N], we are informed, that he was a perſon of neat and bright parts, a good, charitable, and learned Divine; a commanding and eloquent preacher; an excellent poet; juſtly eſteemed a great maſter of our language; one of our correcteſt writers (x); and one who deſerves the firſt rank in hiſtory, for his maſtery in the art of Oratory [O]; and his raiſing the Engliſh tongue to that purity and beauty, which former writers were wholly ſtrangers to, and thoſe who came after him can but imitate (y). But the right honorable the Earl of Orrery hath paſſed a very different judgment upon his ſtyle and manner of writing [P].

[N] As to his character.] Some ſay, that 'he bore 'a dubious character as to his Principles in Divinity 'and Politicks, being ſaid to accommodate one to the 'other, and both to the times, and perſons in 'power (22).' And others, that 'his parts were 'bright in his youth, and gave great hopes; but 'theſe were blaſted by a lazy libertine courſe of life, 'to which his temper and good nature carried him, 'without conſidering the duties or even the decencies 'of his profeſſion (23).' But with ſome this will only paſs for ſlander.——On the other hand, the late author of his life (24), obſerves, that 'in the character of a 'dignified clergyman, he has a claim to be copied in 'thoſe retired and private virtues, in thoſe acts of be-'neficence and humility, and that unaffected and pri-'mitive piety, for which he was juſtly diſtinguiſhed.'

[P] The right honourable the Earl of Orrery hath paſſed a very different judgment upon his ſtyle and manner of writing.] It is in his Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr Swift (26); and what his Lordſhip ſays upon that occaſion, is in theſe words. 'Among our Engliſh 'writers, few men have gained a greater character for 'elegance and correctneſs, than Sprat biſhop of Ro-'cheſter, and few men have deſerved it leſs. When 'I have read his works, I have always wondered from 'whence ſuch a piece of good fortune might have 'ariſen, and could only attribute it to Mr Cowley, 'who, in a very delicate copy of verſes, has celebrated 'his friend Dr Sprat for eloquence, wit, and a certain 'candid ſtyle, which the poet compares to the river 'Thames, gliding with an even current, and diſplaying 'the moſt beautiful appearances of nature (27). Poets 'and painters have their favourites, whom they tranſ-'mit to poſterity in what colours and attitudes they 'pleaſe: but I am miſtaken, if, upon a review of 'Sprat's works, his language will not ſooner give you 'an idea of one of the inſignificant tottering boats up-'on the Thames, than of the ſmooth noble current of 'the river itſelf.'——Such is his Lordſhip's cenſure: But, on the other hand, it may be obſerved, That too ſmooth and uniform a ſtyle is apt to lull the reader aſleep; whereas a beautiful metaphor, or other awakening figure, well-placed, rouſes his attention, and makes him go on with freſh vigour and pleaſure. STANLEY [THOMAS], a very learned perſon, in the laſt century, was the ſon of Sir Thomas Stanley Knight, and born at Comberlow, within the pariſh of Clothall in Hertfordſhire (a) [A]. After having been educated in grammar-learning, in his father's own houſe, by the ingenious Mr Edward Fairfax [B]; he was admitted a gentleman-commoner of Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, at the age of thirteen, and became an early proficient in all ſorts of polite-literature, not without the aſſiſtance of Mr Fairfax, as well during his ſtay in the univerſity, as afterwards. In 1640 he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, having taken before that degree at Cambridge (b). Then he travelled for his improvement into foreign countries, and on his return [C] lived, during part of the civil wars, in the Middle-Temple; where he entered into an intimate friendſhip, and proſecuted his ſtudies, in the moſt induſtrious and ſucceſsful manner, with the learned Edward Sherburne, Eſq; (c), who had retired thither after the Surrender of Oxford to the parliament-forces.

[A] Was born at Comberlow.] He was born in the manor-houſe of Comberlow, a Seat built by John Comberlow. It might ſeem probable, that he was deſcended from the noble family of Stanley, Earls of Derby. But all we can learn, is, that, his grandfather Thomas (1) Stanley, Eſq; was a citizen and ſcrivener of London; and his father, Thomas Stanley, was knighted by King Charles I (2). He was born of this Knight's ſecond wife, namely, Mary, one of the daughters of Sir William Hammond, of St Albans in Nonington in the county of Kent, Knt, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter to Antony Awcher of Bourne, in Kent, Eſq; which Antony had married Margaret, daughter of Edwin Sandys, Archbiſhop of York, ſiſter to Sir Edwin Sandys of Bourne in Kent, Knt, and to George Sandys, Eſq; the famous traveller and poet (3).

And caſt ſome ſhadow o're mine eye?
Or do I noble Stanley ſee?
What! may I truſt you? Is it he?
Confeſs, and yet be gradual:
Leſt ſudden joy ſo heavy fall
Upon my ſoul, and ſink unto
A deeper agony of woe.
'Tis he, 'tis he: we are no more
A barb'rous nation: He brought o're
As much humanity, as may Well civilize America;
More learning than might Athens raiſe
To glory in her prowdeſt days.
With reaſon might the boyling main
Be calm, and hoary Neptune chain
Thoſe Winds, that might diſturbers be,
Whilſt our Apollo was at ſea,
And made her for all knowledge ſtand
In competition with the land.
Had but the courteous Dolphins heard
One note of his, they would have dar'd
To quit the waters, to enjoy
In baniſhment ſuch melody.
And had the mimick Proteus known,
H'had left his ugly herd, and grown
A curious Syren, to betray
This Ulyſſes to ſome ſtay.
But juſter fates denied, nor would Another land that genius hold,
As could, beyond all wonder hurl'd,
Fathom the Intellectual world.
But whither run I? I intend
To welcome only, not commend:
But that thy Virtues render it
No private, but a public debt.

So

So that in a ſhort time, He (Mr Stanley) became a very good Linguiſt and Philologer; an excellent Poet, as manifeſtly appears, not only by his own original Poems [D], but alſo by his ſeveral tranſlations from the Greek, Latin, Italian, Spaniſh, and French [E]; a compleat

[D] By his own original Poems.] They were printed at London in 1651, 8vo. dedicated to Love. For a ſpecimen of his manner of writing, we ſhall preſent the Reader with theſe two Poems of his.

Delay.

Delay? alaſs there cannot be
To Love a greater Tyranny:
Thoſe cruel Beauties that have ſlain
Their Votaries by their Diſdain,
Or ſtudied Torments, ſharp and witty,
Will be recorded for their Pitty.
And After-ages be miſled
To think them kind, when this is ſpread.

Of Deaths, the ſpeedieſt is Deſpair, Delays, the ſloweſt Tortures are.
Thy Cruelty at once deſtroys;
But Expectation ſtarves my Joys.
Time and Delay may bring me paſt
The Power of Love to cure at laſt:
And ſhould'ſt thou wiſh to eaſe my Pain,
Thy Pitty might be lent in vain;
Or if thou hadſt decreed that I
Muſt fall beneath thy Cruelty,
O kill me ſoon! thou wilt expreſs
More Mercy, ev'n in ſhewing leſs.——

The Depoſition.

Though when I lov'd thee thou wert fair,
Thou art no longer ſo;
Thoſe Glories all the Pride they wear Unto Opinion owe.
Beauties, like Stars, in borrow'd Luſtre ſhine,
And 'twas my Love that gave thee thine.

The Flames that dwelt within thine Eye
Do now with mine expire,
Thy brighteſt Graces fade and dye
At once with my Deſire.
Love's Fires thus mutual Influence return,
Thine ceaſe to ſhine, when mine to burn.

Then (proud Celinda) hope no more
To be implor'd or woo'd,
Since by thy Scorn thou doſt reſtore
The Wealth my Love beſtow'd.
And thy deſpis'd Diſdain too late ſhall find,
That none are fair, but who are kind.

Some of Mr Stanley's Poems were ſet to muſic by John Gamble, among his Ayres and Dialogues, to be ſung to the Theorbo or baſs Viol.——A copy of his verſes to Mr Edward Sherburne, is printed among ſome of that Author's.——And, 'A Regiſter of Friends,' in verſe, of his own compoſition, was preſerved in manuſcript, in the collection of the late Dr Fr. Bernard (5).

John Hall of Durham highly celebrates him, in the Dedication of his Poems to him in 1646. 12mo, which is as follows. 'To his truly noble and worthily honoured friend Thomas Stanley, Eſq;——My deareſt friend, ſince it is the hard fortune of theſe glow-worms to ſee day, I wiſh they might have paſſed your examination; for I know you to be a ſevere critick in Poetry, as well as in Philology and the Sciences: but ſince others importunities, and mine own preſſing occaſions have denied it, I muſt preſent them loaden with their own blemiſhes, that being fitter objects of pardon, they may draw in pardoning more demonſtrations of your candor, and add to my engagements, could they receive augmentation. I will not commit a rape upon your modeſty by any praiſes, though Truth herſelf might be your Panegyriſt, and yet continue naked; give me only leave to tell you from mine own experience, that Love is more than a mere Sympathy: for admiration did firſt attract my thoughts to you, and after fix them; though it were only your innate Sweetneſs that received them with an undeſerved entertainment. Sir, what I was firſt indebted to you at Durham, I endeavoured to acquit in part here at Cambridge; for the Totall, though it be rather above my ability than deſires, yet ſhould I hate the thought of a generall diſcharge. Let me only beg of you, that theſe Cherryſtones may draw from you your own Pearls, which cannot but break themſelves a day through that darkneſs, to which you now confine them. Let us once ſee Fancy triumph in the ſpoils of the richeſt Learning; there will many no doubt preſs to follow the Chariot, yet ſhall none be more forward than,

'Sir,

'Your moſt affectionately devoted Servant,

'J. Hall.'

He alſo greatly commends him, in the following verſes.

Who would commend thee (friend) and thinks't may be Performed by a feint Hyperbole,
Might alſo call thee but a Man, or dare
To praiſe thy Miſtreſs with the term of Faire.
But I, the choiceſt of whoſe knowledge is
My knowing thee, cannot ſo groſsly miſs,
Since thou art ſet ſo high, no words can give
An equal character, but negative.
Subtract the earth and baſeneſs of this age,
Admit no wild-fire in Poetick rage,
Caſt out of learning whatſoever's vain,
Let ignorance no more haunt Noblemen,
Nor Humour Travellers, let wits be free
From over-weening, and the reſt is Thee.
Thee, noble Soul! whoſe early flights are far Sublimer than old Eagles ſoarings are,
Who light'ſt Love's dying torch with purer fire,
And breath'ſt new life into the Teian lyre:
That Love's beſt ſecretaries, that are paſt,
Liv'd they, might learn to love, and yet be chaſte.
Nay, Veſtals might as well ſuch ſonnets hear
As keep their vows and thy black ribband wear:
So chaſte is all; that though in each line lie
More Amorettoes than in Doris eye;
Yet ſo they're charm'd, that look'd upon they prove Harmleſs as Charieſſa's nightly love.
So pow'rful is that tongue, that hand, that can Make ſoft Ionicks turn grave Lydian.
How oft this heavy leaden Saturnine
And never elevated ſoul of mine
Hath been pluck'd up by thee, and forc'd away,
Enlarged from her ſtill adhering clay?
How ev'ry line ſtill pleas'd? When that was o're,
I conceal'd it, and prais'd the other more.

compleat maſter of Philoſophy [F]; and, to add to his conſummate erudition, a very good Grecian. Of this laſt, he gave full proof in his beautiful and valuable edition of Æſchylus [G], and in his curious Manuſcripts which he left behind him [H]. This learned perſon dyed, on the 12th of April 1678, at his lodgings in Suffolk-ſtreet in the pariſh of St Martin's in the fields Weſtminſter; and was buried in the Church there (d), without any memorial that we can find. As to his character; He was endowed with eminent parts, a nimble fancy, an acute wit, and a facetious and generous humour, which rendered him a moſt accompliſhed Gentleman. When he was young, he married Dorothy, eldeſt daughter, and one of the coheirs of Sir James Enian (e), of Flowre in the county of Northampton, Bart. which brought him the acceſſion of a fair eſtate to his own. By her, he had Thomas, his ſon and heir [I], who ſold his ſeat and manor of Comberlow (f). The learned Dr William Wotton wrote an Elogium of our Author, which was publiſhed by Mr Henman, at Eyſenach, at the end of Scævola Sammarthanus's Elogia Gallorum; but we have not been able to procure it, at any rate.

[F] A compleat maſter of Philoſophy.] He moſt eminently ſhewed himſelf ſuch, in his very learned Book, intituled, 'The Hiſtory of Philoſophy: Containing 'the Lives, Opinions, Actions and Diſcourſes of the 'Philoſophers of every Sect. Illuſtrated with the Effigies 'of divers of them.' Fol. It was publiſhed in three volumes fol. at different times, in the following order. I. The Hiſtory of Philoſophy, containing thoſe on whom the Attribute of Wiſe was conferred. Lond. 1655. fol. in three parts. II. The ſecond Volume was printed in 1656, containing Five parts more. And, at the end of it, was the Doctrine of the Stoicks, in two parts. III. The third Volume came out in 1660, containing four parts. IV. The Hiſtory of the Chaldaick Philoſophy appeared in 1662, in five parts. All theſe ſeveral parts were reprinted together in 1687, and again in 1700, in one volume fol. and in 1743, in one volume, 4to.—Part 1, comprehends the Wiſe-men of Greece. Part 2, the Ionick Philoſophers. Part 3, the Socratick Philoſophers. Part 4, the Cyrenaick, Megarick, Eleack, and Eretriack Sects. Part 5, the Academick Philoſophers. Part 18, and 19, of the Sabæans, and their Doctrine.——He obſerves, in the Preface, that, 'Although ſome Gre-'cians have challenged to their nation the Original of 'Philoſophy, yet the more learned of them have ac-'knowledged it derived from the Eaſt. To omit the 'dark traditions of the Athenians concerning Muſæus, 'of the Thebanes concerning Linus, and of the Thra-'cians about Orpheus, it is manifeſt that the original 'of the Greek Philoſophy is to be derived from 'Thales, who travelling into the Eaſt, firſt brought 'Natural learning, Geometry, and Aſtrology, thence 'into Greece, for which reaſon the Attribute of 'Wiſe was conferred upon him, and at the ſame time 'upon ſix others for their eminence in morality and 'politicks. Thus learning in the ancienteſt times was 'by the Greeks called Sophia (wiſdom) and the pro-'feſſor thereof, who raiſed his ſoul to an eminent de-'gree of knowledge, Sophos (wiſe) Pythagoras firſt 'named it Philoſophy (love of wiſdom) and himſelf a 'Philoſopher, affirming that no man is wiſe, but only 'God.'——The learned John Le Clerc tranſlated the Hiſtory of the Chaldaick Philoſophy into Latin, and publiſhed it at Amſterdam, in 1690, 8vo, under this title, Thomæ Stanleii Hiſtoria Philoſophiæ Orientalis. Recenſuit, ex Anglica Linguâ in Latinam tranſtulit. Notis in Oracula Chaldaica, & Indice Philologico auxit Joannes Clericus. The reſt of the Hiſtory of Philoſophy was alſo tranſlated into Latin by Godfrey Olearius, and publiſhed at Leipſic in 1711, 4to.

The learned John Cornelius de Pauw reprinted it in 1745, in two Volumes 4to. without any omiſſion, as he teſtifies in theſe words, 'Edi-'tio hæc ad editionem Stanleii typis expreſſa eſt, & 'nihil in ea, quod hic omiſſum:' He hath added large notes of his own, at the end of the ſecond Volume, wherein he is full petulant againſt Mr Stanley; but he doth not ſeem to have known, or at leaſt to have made uſe of, Mr Stanley's Commentaries on Æſchylus, mentioned in the next Note.

STEELE [Sir RICHARD], famous for his numerous polite writings, was born probably about the year 1676 (a), at Dublin in Ireland, in which kingdom one branch of the family was poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate in the county of Wexford (b). His Father, a Counſellor at Law, was ſome time private Secretary to James the firſt Duke of Ormond (c) [A]. But he was of Engliſh extraction, and his ſon, while very young, being carried to London, he put him to ſchool at the Charter-houſe (d), whence he was removed to Merton College in Oxford, where he was admitted a Poſtmaſter in 1692 (e). His inclination and genius being turned to polite literature, he commenced Author during his reſidence in the Univerſity, and actually finiſhed a Comedy; which however he thought fit to ſuppreſs by the advice of one of his fellow collegians, who, upon the peruſal, condemned it as unworthy of his genius [B]. Mr Steele's ſubmiſſion to this cenſure ſets his good ſenſe and modeſty in the moſt amiable light. Accordingly he was well beloved and reſpected by the whole Society, and had a good intereſt with them after he left the univerſity [C], which he did without taking any degree, in the full reſolution to enter into the Army. This ſtep was highly diſpleaſing to his Friends; but the ardor of his paſſion for a military life, rendered him deaf to any other propoſal. He was abſolutely inflexible, ſo that not being able to procure a better ſtation, he entered a private gentleman in the Horſe-guards, notwithſtanding he thereby loſt the ſucceſſion to his Iriſh Eſtate [D]. However, the turn of his mind was very well adapted to the bent of his inclination: he had a flow of good nature, a generous openneſs and frankneſs of ſpirit, and a ſparkling vivacity of wit where there was no want of courage. Theſe qualities rendered him the delight of the ſoldiery, and procured him an Enſign's commiſſion in the guards (f). In the mean time he had made choice of a profeſſion, which ſet him free from all the ordinary reſtraints of Youth to an unthinking gaiety; and he ſpared not to indulge his genius in the wildeſt exceſſes, proſtituting the exquiſite charms of his converſation-talents to give his pleaſures a daintier and more poignant reliſh (g). Yet theſe revels did not paſs without ſome cool hours of reflection, and in theſe it was that he drew up his little treatiſe intituled The

[A] His father was private Secretary to the Duke of Ormond.] Our Author dedicates his play, called The Lying Lover, to the late Duke of Ormond, where he makes uſe of his connexion to that noble family as the beſt plea for that addreſs. 'Out of gratitude, ſays he, 'to the memorable and illuſtrious Patron of my infancy, 'your Grace's grandfather, I preſume to lay this co'medy at your feet.' From the turn of this expreſſion it ſeems not improbable, that Mr Steele ſent his ſon to the Charter-houſe ſchool by the direction of this Patron, who was one of the governours of that hoſpital (1), and conſequently, had he lived long enough, might have been of ſervice to him.

[B] He ſuppreſſed his play by the advice of a friend.] This friend's name was Mr R. Parker, afterwards Fellow of the College, who thought there was nothing extraordinary in it, falling much ſhort of his ſubſequent theatrical performances, which gained him ſo great reputation (2). His firſt appearance as an author in print was in a poem upon the death of Queen Mary in 1695, called The Proceſſion. The ſubject is ſublime, and the execution ſhews, that the writer's talent did not lie that way ſo much as to the familiar ſtile; yet the following lines are truly poetical, and ſeem not unworthy the Princeſs whom he ſtrives to adorn.

(2) Communicated by Mr John Allen of Eaſtwick in Hertfordſhire, ſome time a Fellow of Merton College.

The poor her firſt and deepeſt mourners are,
Firſt in her thoughts, and earlieſt in her care:
All hand in hand with common friendly woe,
In poverty, our native ſtate, they go.
Some whom unſtable terrors did engage
By luxury in Youth to need in Age:
Some who had virgin vows to wedlock broke,
And where they help expected found a yoke:
Others who in their want feel double weight
From the remembrance of a wealthier ſtate.
There mothers walk, who oft deſpairing ſtood,
Pierc'd with their infants deaf'ning ſobs for food,
Then to a dagger run, with threat'ning eyes,
To ſtab their boſoms, and to kill their noiſe;
But in the thought they ſtopt, their locks they tore,
Threw down the ſteel, and cruelly forbore.
The innocents their parents love forgive,
Smile at their fate, nor know they are to live.
Theſe modeſt wants had ne'er been underſtood,
But by Maria's cunning to be good.

[C] He had an intereſt in the ſociety after he left it.] One part of the charge againſt him, for which he was expelled the Houſe of Commons in 1713, being, that his writings were injurious to the Univerſities. In anſwer to this, in his Apology, having quoted a paſſage from the Engliſhman, No. 34, where the Univerſities are mentioned with reſpect, he proceeds in the following words, 'It appears by theſe and many other paſſages 'in my writings, that I have retained the greateſt ho'nour and eſteem for thoſe learned bodies; in one of 'which I received a part of my education, and where 'I can boaſt of much perſonal friendſhip and acquaint'ance [3].' This declaration by himſelf, being a kind of appeal to the world for the truth of what he aſſerts, and was never controverted, may be fairly deemed ſufficient to ſupport what is advanced in the text. But we have a further confirmation of it, which puts it beyond the reach of a doubt: About the year 1712, when Mr R. Breton, the preſent Archdeacon of Hereford, ſtood candidate for a fellowſhip in Merton College, having the honour to be known to our Author, he procured letters of recommendation from him to the then Warden, Dr Holland; as alſo to the beforementioned Mr Parker, to whom he recommended him as to his old friend and acquaintance. At the ſame time he likewiſe ſent to the Warden the four volumes of his Tatlers in the large octavo edition, deſiring he would give them a place in the library of his College, of which he had once the honour to be a member. To which may be added, that in one of Sir Richard's laſt journies to Wales, paſſing through Oxford, he made a viſit to that ſociety (4); which ſhews that he preſerved a good reſpect for it as long as he lived.

[D] He loſt the Iriſh eſtate.] In anſwer to a calumny thrown upon him by Mr Dennis (5), who, in diminution of his birth and breeding, had derived his deſcent from a trooper's horſe, he defends himſelf in the following words. 'It may perhaps fall in my way to give an 'abſtract of the life of this man, whom it is thought 'thus neceſſary to undo and diſparage. When I do, 'it will appear, that when he mounted a war-horſe 'with a great ſword in his hand, and planted himſelf 'behind King William III. againſt Lewis XIV, he loſt 'the ſucceſſion to a very good eſtate in the county of 'Wexford in Ireland, from the ſame humour which 'he has preſerved ever ſince, of preferring the ſtate 'of his mind to that of his fortune. When he cocked 'his hat, and put on a broad ſword, jack-boots, and 'ſhoulder-belt, under the command of the unfortunate 'Duke of Ormond, he was not acquainted with his 'own parts, and did not then know he ſhould ever 'have been able (as he has ſince appeared to be in 'the Caſe of Dunkirk) to demoliſh a fortified town 'with a gooſe-quill (6).'

Chriſtian

Chriſtian Hero, with a deſign, if we may believe himſelf, to be a check upon his paſſions [E]. For this uſe and purpoſe it had lain ſome time by him when he printed it in 1701, with a Dedication to Lord Cutts, who had not only appointed him his private Secretary, but procured for him a Company in Lord Lucas's regiment of Fuſiliers (h). The whole plan and tenor of our Author's book was ſuch a flat contradiction to the general courſe of his life, that it became a ſubject of much mirth and raillery: But theſe ſhafts had no effect; he perſevered invariably in the ſame contradiction, and though he had no power to change his heart, yet his pen was never made a victim to his follies. Under the influence of that good ſenſe, he wrote his Comedy called The Funeral, or Grief a-la-mode [F], which was brought upon the ſtage the ſame year. This play procured him the regards of King William, who reſolved to give him ſome eſſential marks of his favour [G]; and though upon his Majeſty's death the curtain dropt over all thoſe pleaſing ſcenes of hope, yet was it drawn up again in the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, when he was appointed Gazetteer [H]. He owed this Poſt to the friendſhip of Lord Halifax and the Earl of Sunderland, and he diſcharged the duties of it with the exacteſt fidelity to his Maſters. He had been recommended to thoſe Miniſters by his ſchoolfellow Mr Addiſon (i), and that gentleman lent him alſo a helping hand in promoting the Comedy called The Tender Huſband, or the accompliſhed Fools, which was acted in 1704, with great ſucceſs [I]. But his next play, The Lying (h) Dedication to this book.

(i) Morgan's New Political State, p. 7.

[E] A check upon his paſſions.] For this we have his own word, which, from what has been already obſerved (7), may perhaps paſs for no bad authority. He tells us, that 'when he was an enſign in the guards, being thoroughly convinced of many things, of which he often repented and as often repeated, he wrote, for his own private uſe, a little book, called The Chriſtian Hero; with a deſign principally to fix upon his mind a ſtrong impreſſion of virtue and religion, in oppoſition to a ſtronger propenſity to unwarrantable pleaſures.' This ſecret admonition was too weak. He therefore printed the book with his name, in hopes, that a teſtimony againſt himſelf, and the eyes of the world (that is to ſay of his acquaintance) upon him in a new light, might curb his deſires, and make him aſhamed of underſtanding and ſeeming to feel what was virtuous, and living ſo quite contrary a life. This had no other good effect but that, from being thought no undelightful companion, he was ſoon reckoned a diſagreeable fellow. One or two of his acquaintance thought fit to miſuſe him, and try their valour upon him; and every body meaſured the leaſt levity in his words and actions with the character of a Chriſtian Hero [8]. It will not be impertinent, now we are touching upon this untractable temper of our Author with regard to his moral character, to obſerve, that he was equally ungovernable in regard to his political conduct, notwithſtanding he had a conſtant check upon it in his friend Mr Addiſon. Having told us, that there never was a more ſtrict friendſhip than that between them, he proceeds to declare, that 'they never had any difference but what aroſe from their different way of purſuing the ſame thing; the one, with patience, foreſight, and temperate addreſs, always waited and ſtemmed the torrent; while the other often plunged himſelf into it, and was as often taken out by the temper of him, who ſtood weeping on the bank for his ſafety, whom he could not diſſuade from leaping into it (9).'

[F] The Funeral, or Grief a-la-mode.] He declares, that the rebuffs he met with, inſtead of encouragements for his declarations in regard to religion, laid him under a neceſſity of enlivening his character, which was the reaſon of his writing this comedy; where, though the incidents that move laughter be numerous, yet, virtue and vice appear juſt as they ought to do (10). The play was levelled at ſome enormities of the Undertakers, which, in the preface he obſerves, it is not in the power of any pen to paint better than they do themſelves. 'As for example, ſays he, on a door I juſt now paſſed by, a great artiſt informs us of his cures upon the dead. "W. W. known and approved for his art of embalming, having preſerved the corpſe of a gentlewoman ſweet and entire thirteen years without embowelling, and has reduced the bodies of ſeveral perſons of quality to ſweetneſs in Flanders and Ireland, after nine months putrefaction in the ground, and they were known by their friends in England. No man performeth the like. He muſt be ſtrangely in love with his own life, continues our Author, who is not touched with this kind invitation to be pickled; and the noble operator muſt be allowed a very uſeful perſon for bringing old friends together. Nor would it be unworthy his labour to give us an account at large of the ſweet converſation that aroſe upon meeting ſuch an intire friend as he mentions.' The other part of the play is aimed at the Lawyers, in ſpeaking of which part he takes occaſion to make a handſome compliment to Lord Somers, then in diſgrace, 'of whom, he ſays, he will mention in words 'that which of all men breathing can only be ſaid of 'him, It is he that is excellent:

After all, the ſucceſs of this performance was chiefly owing to the zeal of his fellow-ſoldiers, ariſing from the Author's intereſt in the army.

[G] King William had reſolved to give him ſome eſſential marks of his favour.] This we have from himſelf. 'Nothing, ſays he, ever makes the town ſo fond of a man as a ſucceſsful play; and this, with ſome particulars enlarged upon to his advantage, (for Princes never hear good or evil in the manner that others do) obtained him the notice of the King. And his name, &c. to be provided for, was in the laſt table book, ever worn by the glorious and immortal King William III (11).'

[H] He was appointed Gazetteer.] He calls this the loweſt Miniſter of State, and aſſures us, that he worked in the office faithfully according to order, without ever erring againſt the rule obſerved by all miniſtries, to keep that paper very innocent and very inſipid. 'It is believed, continues he, that it was to the reproaches he heard every gazette-day againſt the writer of it, that the Defendant owes the fortitude of being remarkably negligent of what people ſay which he does not deſerve (12).'

(12) Apology.

[I] The Tender Huſband was acted with great ſucceſs.] In this comedy, as well as the Funeral, our Author ſteadily preſerved the point of morality, of which he makes his dedication of it to Mr Addiſon a teſt, ſince he ſhould not have dared to offer it as a memorial of their inviolable friendſhip, had not he been careful to avoid every thing that might look ill-natured and immoral, or prejudicial to what the better part of mankind held ſacred and honourable. After Mr Addiſon's death, he took an occaſion of mentioning the aſſiſtance that gentleman gave him in this play. 'I remember, ſays he, when I finiſhed The Tender Huſband, I told him [Addiſon] there was nothing I ſo tenderly wiſhed, as that we might ſome time or other publiſh a work written by us both, which ſhould bear the name of The Monument, in memory of our friendſhip. When the play abovementioned was laſt acted, there were ſo many applauded ſtrokes in it, which I had from the ſame hand, that I thought very meanly of myſelf, that I had never publickly acknowledged them (13).' It is commonly ſaid, that this intimacy commenced ſo early as when they were ſchoolfellows at the Charter-houſe (14); if ſo, it is a memorable inſtance, both of the pregnant parts of the one, and the good-natured condeſcenſion of the other. Addiſon was full ripe for the Univerſity, and accordingly left that ſchool in 1687, when Steele, if there, muſt have been very low in it, as is evident from his not leaving it till 1692, five years afterwards. So great a diſtance of place in two ſchoolboys makes the intimacy then contracted, if true, almoſt unexampled; which likewiſe becomes more extraordinary, in viewing their very different tempers; the one remarkably gay, the other as remarkably grave.

Lover,

Lover, found a very different fate [K]. Upon this laſt rebuff from the ſtage, he turned the ſame humorous current into another channel, and early in the year 1709 he begun to publiſh The Tatler (k). That admirable Paper was undertaken in concert with Dr Swift [L]. Both the general uſefulneſs of the plan, and the inimitable humour and ſpirit, kept up in full bloom throughout the execution of it, were univerſally approved and admired [M]. His (k) The firſt paper is dated Tueſday April 12 that year.

[K] The Lying Lover met with a different fate.] Sir Richard, in his defence before the Houſe of Commons, mentions the event of this play, as an inſtance of his ſuffering for the cauſe of virtue. 'I have carried, 'ſays he, this inclination to the advancement of virtue 'ſo far, as to purſue it even in things the moſt indifferent, and which perhaps have been thought foreign 'to it. To give you an inſtance of this, Sir, I muſt 'mention a comedy, called the Lying Lover, which 'I writ ſome years ago, the preface to which ſays, 'Though it ought to be the care of all governments, that 'public repreſentations ſhould have nothing in them but 'what is agreeable to the manners, laws, religion, and 'policy, of the place or nation wherein they are exhibited; 'yet it is the general complaint of the more learned and 'virtuous amongſt us, that the Engliſh ſtage has extremely 'offended in this kind. I thought therefore it would be an 'honeſt ambition to attempt a comedy which might be no 'improper entertainment in a Chriſtian commonwealth. 'Mr Collier had, about the time when this was publiſhed, written againſt the immorality of the ſtage. 'I was (as far as I durſt for fear of witty men upon 'whom he had been too ſevere) a great admirer of his 'book, and took it into my head to write a comedy 'in the ſeverity he required. In this play I make the 'ſpark or hero kill a man in his drink, and finding 'himſelf in priſon the next morning, I give him the 'contrition which he ought to have on that occaſion. 'It is in alluſion to that circumſtance, that the preface 'further ſays as follows; The anguiſh he there expreſſes, 'and the mutual ſorrow between an only child and a 'tender father in that diſtreſs, are perhaps an injury to 'the rules of comedy; but I am ſure they are a juſtice 'to thoſe of morality. And paſſages of ſuch a nature 'being ſo frequently applauded upon the ſtage, it is 'high time that we ſhould no longer draw occaſions 'of mirth from thoſe images, which the religion of our 'country tells us we ought to tremble at with horror. 'But her moſt excellent Majeſty has taken the ſtage 'into her conſideration; and we may hope, from her 'gracious influence on the muſes, that Wit will recover 'from its apoſtacy, and that, by being encouraged in 'the intereſts of Virtue, it will ſtrip Vice of the gay 'habit in which it has too long appeared, and cloath 'it in its native dreſs of ſhame, contempt, and diſhonour. I acknowledge that I cannot tell, Sir, what 'they would have me to do to prove myſelf a churchman; but I think I have appeared one even in ſo 'trifling a thing as a comedy. And, conſidering me 'as a comic poet, I have been a martyr and confeſſor 'for the church; for this play was damned for its 'piety (15).'

(15) Apology, p. 259. et ſeq.

[L] He began the Tatler in concert with Dr Swift.] This is acknowledged by our Author, firſt in the dedication to the two firſt volumes, as follows. 'A work 'of this nature requiring time to grow into the notice 'of the world, it happened very luckily, that, a little 'before I had reſolved upon this deſign, a gentleman 'had written predictions, and two or three other pieces, 'in my name, which had rendered it famous through 'all parts of Europe, and, by an inimitable ſpirit and 'humour, raiſed it to as high a pitch of reputation as it 'could poſſibly arrive at.' This paſſage he refers to in the preface to the fourth volume, where, in purſuance of a promiſe in the laſt Tatler to give an account of the aſſiſtants he had in the work, he uſes the following words. 'I have, in the dedication to the firſt volume, 'made my acknowledgments to Dr Swift, whoſe 'pleaſant writings in the name of Bickerſtaff, created 'an inclination in the Town towards any thing that 'ſhould appear in the ſame diſguiſe. I muſt acknowledge alſo, that, at my firſt entrance upon this work, 'a turn in converſation peculiar to that agreeable gentleman, rendered his company very advantageous to one 'whoſe imagination was to be continually employed 'upon obvious and common ſubjects, though obliged, 'at the ſame time, to treat of them in a new and unbeaten method. His Verſes on the Shower in the Town, 'and the deſcription of The Morning, are inſtances of 'the happineſs of that genius, which could raiſe ſuch 'pleaſing ideas upon occaſions ſo barren to an ordinary 'invention.' Whoever compares this with his acknowledgments to Mr Addiſon, will ſee, that the firſt are exemplified by only two trifling juvenile deſcriptions, when, as Mr Pope obſerves, fond deſcription takes the place of ſenſe; while thoſe of the other are inſtanced in the moſt ſublime and important ſubjects of the whole work, The diſcourſes on the immortality of the ſoul, &c. Nay, as if that was not ſufficient to eclipſe the merit of Dr Swift in the Tatler, he declares, that he thinks 'the fineſt ſtrokes of wit and humour in all Mr 'Bickerſtaff's lucubrations, are thoſe for which he is 'alſo beholden to Mr Addiſon (16).' But this treatment of his quondam friend, Dr Swift, will eaſily be accounted for, when we recollect, that not only The Examiner, but The Whig Examiner, by Mr Addiſon (17), and The Medley, in which our Author had a ſhare (18), were begun ſome time before the laſt Tatler, and eſpecially before the preface to the laſt volume of that work was written; not to mention that the dedication of the firſt volume is addreſſed to Mr Mainwaring the Undertaker of The Medley.

[M] Approved and admired.] The general purpoſe of this paper, Sir Richard tells us (19), was to expoſe the falſe arts of life, to pull off the diſguiſes of cunning, vanity, and oſtentation, and to recommend a general ſimplicity in our dreſs, diſcourſe, and behaviour. Nothing more was aimed at while Dr Swift was engaged in it, nor did the papers riſe above this deſign, as it is planned out into its ſeveral branches in the firſt paper, till the change of the miniſtry, when Mr Addiſon had leiſure to engage more conſtantly in it, who raiſed it to a greater thing than our Author had intended it. This advanced its reputation in the view of becoming a more important work. The air of the familiar, which had never been tranſgreſſed before, was raiſed into the ſublime, and theſe ſubjects were ſet off with all the elegance, purity, and correctneſs, which they deſerved. But then the inoffenſiveneſs of the firſt plan was a little broke into. At the ſame time the change of the miniſtry was ſeen in the change of The Tatler, and objected to. The raillery in behalf of Mr Hoadly [the preſent Biſhop of Wincheſter] was too much pointed to be conſiſtent with that conduct which had been profeſſed and preſerved in the two firſt volumes, in which the amiable parts in the characters of Atterbury and Smallridge are drawn without any ſuch points of offence. But our Author owned [after the juſt-mentioned change] he could not be cold enough to conceal his opinion in politicks (20). However, as politicks are almoſt always, though not altogether, ſet apart, the exquiſite pleaſure he both felt and gave in framing the characters of domeſtic life, and to putting thoſe parts of it into an agreeable view which are leaſt obſerved, his enquiry into the ſeeds of vanity and oſtentation, added to his glorious attempt to extirpate the pernicious race of gameſters and duelliſts, were received with ſo much advantage to the Author, that, as he obſerves himſelf, there was hardly a name eminent among us for power, wit, beauty, valour, or wiſdom, which was not ſubſcribed for the encouragement of the Work.

(19) In the dedication to the firſt volume.

(20) The Examiner had fallen upon the Tatler in the paper of Sept. 28, 1710. No. 230. The Tatler replied in No. 239.

When the bill to prevent duelling was brought into parliament, Sir Richard took that occaſion of ſeconding his blow againſt the duelliſts, which at the ſame time gave him an opportunity of doing juſtice to one of his correſpondents in The Tatler, who was at that time unknown to him. Speaking of this bill in 1720, 'I can 'hardly conceive, ſays he, a more laudable act, than 'declaring an abhorrence of ſo faſhionable a crime [as 'duelling] which weakneſs, cowardice, and impatience 'of the reproach of fools, have brought upon reaſonable men. This ſort of behaviour cannot proceed but 'from a true and undaunted courage, and I cannot but 'have in great veneration a generous youth, who in 'public declared his aſſent and concurrence to this law, 'by ſaying, that, in ſpight of the prevailing cuſtom, he 'triumphed more in being a ſecond to prevent, than he ſhould 'have been in being one to promote, murder. A ſpeech 'thus ingenuous could come only from a heart that 'ſcorned reſerves in compliance to falſehood, to do 'injury to truth. This was true greatneſs of mind; 'and the man who did it could not poſſibly do it for 'his own ſake, but muſt be conſcious of a courage 'ſufficient for his own defence, who could thus candidly,

His reputation became perfectly eſtabliſhed by it, and during the courſe of it, he was made a Commiſſioner of the Stamp-Duties in 1710. Upon the change of the miniſtry the ſame year, he ſided with the Duke of Marlborough, who had ſeveral years entertained a friendſhip for him. And upon his Grace's diſmiſſion from all employments in 1711, Mr Steele addreſſed a Letter of thanks to him for the ſervices done to his Country (l). However as our Author ſtill continued to hold his place in the Stamp-Office under the new Adminiſtration, he forbore entering with his pen upon political ſubjects. But adhering more cloſely to Mr Addiſon, he dropt The Tatler (m); and afterwards, by the aſſiſtance chiefly of that ſteady Friend, he carried on the ſame plan under the title of The Spectator (n). The ſucceſs of this paper was equal to that of the former, which encouraged him before the cloſe of it to proceed upon the ſame deſign in the character of The Guardian. This was opened in the beginning of the year 1713 (o), and was laid down in October the ſame year. But in the courſe of it, his thoughts took a ſtronger turn to politics (p); he engaged with great warmth againſt the Miniſtry, and being determined to proſecute his views that way by procuring a ſeat in the Houſe of Commons, he immediately removed all obſtacles thereto. For that purpoſe, he took care to prevent a forcible diſmiſſion from his Poſt in the Stamp-Office by a timely reſignation of it to the Earl of Oxford [N]; and at the ſame time, gave up a penſion which had been till this time paid him by the Queen, as a ſervant to the late Prince George of Denmark [O]. This done, he wrote the famous Guardian upon the demolition of Dunkirk,

'ly, at his time of life, reſcue other men from the 'neceſſity of bearing contempt, or doing an ill action. 'The mind uſually exerts itſelf in all its faculties with 'an equal pace towards maturity; and this gentleman, 'who, at the age of ſixteen, could form ſuch pleaſant 'pictures of falſe and little ambitions of low ſpirits as 'Mr Fuller did, to whom we owe, with ſeveral other 'excellent pieces, The Vain-glorious Glutton, when a 'ſecret correſpondent of the Tatler, I ſay ſuch a one 'might eaſily, as he proceeded in human life, arrive 'at this ſuperior ſtrength of mind at twenty-four. 'The ſoul that labours againſt prejudice, and follows 'reaſon, ripens in her capacities and grows in her 'talents at the ſame time. As therefore courage is 'what a man attains by thought, as much as he im'proves his wit by ſtudy, it is only for want of oppor'tunity to call one or the other forth, and draw the 'reſpective qualities into habit, if ever a man of ſenſe 'is a coward (21).'

[N] By a timely reſignation of it to the Earl of Oxford.] The Paper was drawn up in theſe terms, the uncommon ſtrain of which will repay the Reader's attention in peruſing them.

'To the Right Honorable the Lord High Treaſurer of 'Great-Britain.

'Bloomſbury-Square,
'My Lord, 'June 4, 1713.

'I preſume to give your Lordſhip this trouble to 'acquaint you, that having an ambition to ſerve in the 'enſuing Parliament, I humbly deſire your Lordſhip 'will pleaſe to accept of my reſignation of my office 'as Commiſſioner of the Stamp-Revenues.

'I ſhould have done this ſooner, but that I heard 'the Commiſſion was paſſing without my name in it. 'I would not be guilty of the arrogance of reſigning 'what I could not hold. But having heard this ſince 'contradicted (22), I am obliged to give it up, as 'with great humility I do, by this preſent writing. 'Give me leave, on this occaſion, to ſay ſomething as 'to my late conduct with relation to the late men in 'power, and to aſſure you, that whatever I have done, 'ſaid, or writ, has proceeded from no other motive, 'than the love of what I think truth. For merely as 'to my own affairs, I could not wiſh any man in the 'Adminiſtration rather than yourſelf, who favours thoſe 'that become your Dependants with a greater liberality 'of heart, than any man I have ever before obſerved. 'When I had the honour of a ſhort converſation with 'you, you were pleaſed not only to ſignify to me, that 'I ſhould remain in this office, but to add, that if I 'would name to you one of more value which would 'be more commodious to me, you would favour me 'in it. I am going out of any particular dependance 'on your Lordſhip, and will tell you with the freedom 'of an indifferent man, that it is impoſſible for any 'man who thinks, and has any public ſpirit, not to 'tremble at ſeeing his country, in its preſent circum'ſtances, in the hands of ſo daring a genius as yours; 'if incidents ſhould ariſe, that ſhould place your own 'ſafety, and what ambitious men call greatneſs, in a 'ballance againſt the general good. Our all depends 'upon your choice under ſuch a temptation. You have 'my hearty and fervent prayers to Heaven to avert all 'ſuch dangers from you. I thank your Lordſhip for 'the regard and diſtinction which you have at ſundry 'times ſhewn me, and wiſh you, with your Country's 'ſafety, all happineſs and proſperity. Share, my 'Lord, your good fortune, with whom you will; 'while it laſts you will want no friends: but if any 'adverſe day happens to you, and I live to ſee it, 'you will find I think myſelf obliged to be your friend 'and advocate. This is talking in a ſtrange dialect 'from a private man to the Firſt of a nation; but to 'deſire only a little, exalts a man's condition to a level 'with thoſe who want a great deal. But I beg your 'Lordſhip's pardon, and am, with great reſpect,

'My Lord,

'Your Lordſhip's moſt obedient,

'And moſt humble Servant,

'Richard Steele.'

(22) This expreſſion ſeems to imply, that the deſign to diſmiſs him was ſuperſeded by the proſpect of his getting into Parliament, which would oblige him to reſign.

We ſee here our Author takes notice of the deſign to diſmiſs him, which indeed he had reaſon to have apprehended long before; for he had frequently attacked this Miniſter under borrowed names (23), and particularly in The Medley, where the pleaſant Narrative of the Ball at Wapping, in the twenty-fifth Number, was written by him (24).

(24) Life of Arthur Maynwaring, p. 193.

[O] He reſigned his penſion, &c.] When The Examiner afterwards made an attempt to conſume him in the fire of Ingratitude, this ſtep furniſhed him with cold water to throw upon that fire. It is entertaining enough to view the contraſt, in the words of each Antagoniſt: 'I believe, ſays The Examiner (25), ſpeaking of The 'Guardian, then juſt publiſhed, I may challenge all 'the nations of the world, and all the hiſtories of this 'nation for a thouſand years paſt, to ſhew us an in'ſtance ſo flagrant as what we have now before us, viz. 'whenever a ſubject, nay a ſervant under a ſalary, and 'favoured, in ſpite of ill behaviour paſt, with a con'ſiderable employ in the government, treated his Sо'vereign in ſuch a manner as The Guardian has done 'the perſon of the Queen, and went unpuniſhed. If 'the clemency of the Queen prevails to ſave ſuch a 'man; if her Majeſty thinks it below her to reſent an 'injury from ſo contemptible a wretch, by ſo much 'the rather ſhould every ſubject reſent it, and ſhew 'their duty and reſpect to their Sovereign, by trampling 'under their feet the very name and memory of the 'man, that can have boldneſs enough to inſult his 'Prince in a printed, and for that reaſon a ſcandalous 'libel, and can have ingratitude enough to do it, 'while he is eating her bread.' To this very warm charge, our Author makes the following very cool reply: 'The Examiner, ſays he, accuſes me of ingra'titude, as being actually under ſalary, when I writ 'the Letter to The Guardian; but he is miſtaken in 'that particular; for I had reſigned, not only my 'office in the Stamp-Duties, but alſo my penſion as 'Servant to his late Royal Highneſs, which her Ma'jeſty hath been graciouſly pleaſed to continue to the 'whole family of that excellent Prince. I diveſted 'myſelf of all that I was ſo happy as to enjoy by her 'Majeſty's goodneſs and favour, before I would pre'ſume

Dunkirk, which was publiſhed Aug. 7, 1713; and the Parliament being diſſolved the next day, The Guardian was ſoon followed by ſeveral other warm political tracts againſt the Adminiſtration [P]. Upon the meeting of the new Parliament, Mr Steele having been returned a Member for the borough of Stockbridge in Dorſetſhire, took his ſeat accordingly in the Houſe of Commons, but was expelled thence in a few days after, for writing ſeveral ſeditious and ſcandalous libels, as he had been indeed forewarned by the Author of a periodical Paper, called The Examiner [Q]. 'ſume to write any thing which was ſo apparently an 'advertiſement to thoſe employed in her ſervice (26).'

[P] The Guardian, and ſeveral other tracts againſt the adminiſtration.] In the Guardian of Aug. 7, 1713, our Author had ſaid twice, The Britiſh nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk, and a third time, pray Mr Ironſide repeat it again, that The Britiſh nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk. Upon which, in a few days came out, The honour and prerogative of the Queen's Majeſty vindicated, and defended againſt the unexampled inſolence of the author of the Guardian. In a letter from a country whig to Mr Steele. The writer of which, in ſpeaking to the juſt-mentioned paſſage of the Guardian, cries out, "See how the villain treats the beſt of ſovereigns, the beſt miſtreſs to him, whoſe bread he has eaten, and who has kept him from a Goal. Read it again. Put it into Engliſh, ſaid a neighbour of mine to me, Come make the beſt of it. Then he reads as follows, The Britiſh nation expect, &c. and again, The Britiſh nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk. And a third time, with a tone of threatening, The Britiſh nation expect it.—I would fain have pleaded for you, that this was not to be underſtood to be ſpoken to, or pointed at their Queen; but it would not do, they laughed at me. Come, ſays my neighbour, if you can't put it into words, I'll do it for you: The Britiſh nation expect the immediate demolition of Dunkirk. We all know her Majeſty has poſſeſſion of Dunkirk; and though the work is to be done by the French, her Majeſty may appoint the day. Now, ſays he, read the words; what is it but thus; Look you, Madam, your Majeſty had beſt take care that Dunkirk be demoliſhed, or elſe, &c. and again, Madam, We expect, and we would have you take notice that We expect, that Dunkirk be demoliſhed, and that immediately. Juſt thus an imperious planter at Barbadoes ſpeaks to a negro ſlave, Look you, ſirrah, I expect this ſugar to be ground; and look to it that it be done forthwith. It is enough to tell you I expect it, or elſe, &c. and then he holds up his ſtick at him." This Guardian was reprinted together with The Importance of Dunkirk conſidered, in a defence of that Guardian, in a letter to the bayliff of Stockbridge, which concludes with the following ſtory, by way of reply to that of his antagoniſt: "If I might make an abrupt digreſſion from great things to ſmall, I ſhould, on this occaſion, mention a little circumſtance which happened to the late King William. He had a Frenchman who took care of the gun-dogs, whoſe buſineſs it was alſo to charge and deliver the piece to the King. This miniſter once forgot to bring out ſhot into the field, but did not think fit to let ſo paſſionate a man, and ſo eager a ſportſman, as the King, know his offence; but gave his Majeſty the piece loaded only with powder; when the King miſſed his aim, the impudent cur ſtood chattering, admiring, and commending the King's ſkill in ſhooting, and, holding up his hands, ſaid, He had never ſeen SA MAJESTE' miſs before in his whole life. This circumſtance was no manner of argument to them (who afterwards found out the fellow's iniquity) againſt the King's reputation for a quick eye, and ſhooting very finely."

This piece was ſucceeded by The Engliſhman, a paper publiſhed three days in a week, the firſt of which is dated October 8, 1713. During the courſe of this paper came out The Criſis, or a diſcourſe, repreſenting, from the moſt ancient records, the juſt cauſes of the late revolution, and the ſeveral ſettlements of the crown of England, with ſome ſeaſonable remarks on the danger of a popiſh ſucceſſor. Our author tells us (27), that the plan of this treatiſe was firſt hinted to him by ſome incidental diſcourſe in a viſit to a friend of his; Mr More of the Inner Temple, a man perfectly ſkilled in the laws and conſtitution of this kingdom. This gentleman preſſed him likewiſe to the undertaking, and obſerved, that he thought Mr Steele, from the kind reception the world gave to what he publiſhed, might be more inſtrumental towards curing this evil [the diſaffection to the houſe of Hanover] than any private man in England; that in concluſion it was agreed for them both to join in writing the book, and ſhare the profits ariſing from the ſale equally between them.

(27) In his Apology, p. 301, 302.

[Q] He was expelled the houſe, as he had been forewarned by the Examiner.] The warning was publiſhed in the Examiner, before his election, in the following words. 'This man [Steele] was never ſo dear to the 'Whigs as ſince he let them know, that he durſt aſſault 'his Queen. This has made him their favourite, and 'one of their authors has made his dull panegyrick upon 'him already for it; while another ſet of them are to 'get him choſen for the next parliament, that he may 'carry on his inſults there, and obtain the honour, 'as another of their haughty leaders has already done, 'of being expelled the houſe.' The perſon here ſignified was the famous Mr Walpole; and there is room to think that our Author (like ſome others after him) (28) even courted this honour. Preſently after his election at Stockbridge he begun the Engliſhman, and printed the Criſis, which procured that honour for him. His great care, in drawing up this laſt treatiſe, ſeems to have been not to bring upon himſelf a heavier puniſhment. 'When the Criſis, ſays he, was written hand 'in hand with that gentleman [Mr More], I, who was 'to anſwer for it with my all, would not venture upon 'my own ſingle judgment; therefore I cauſed it to be 'printed, and left one copy with Mr Addiſon, another 'with Mr Lechmere, another with Mr Minſhull, and 'another with Mr Hoadly. From theſe corrected copies 'the Criſis became the piece it is. When I thought it 'my Duty, I thank God I had no further conſideration 'for myſelf than to do it in a lawful and proper way, 'ſo as to give no diſparagement to a glorious cauſe 'from my indiſcretion, or want of judgment. I was 'willing to ripen the queſtion of the ſucceſſion upon 'my own head.' When the parliament met, after two or three gentlemen had propoſed Sir Thomas Hanmer for Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Mr Steele took upon him to ſay he had the ſame honourable ſentiments of that gentleman in the following words:

(28) Particularly Mr Poultney, the preſent Earl of Bath. General Hiſtory of England.

'At the cloſe of the laſt parliament, her Majeſty 'was graciouſly pleaſed to declare from the throne, 'that the late rejected bill of commerce between Great-'Britain and France ſhould be offered to this houſe. 'That declaration was certainly made, that every 'gentleman, who ſhould have the honour to be re-'turned hither, might make himſelf maſter of that 'important queſtion. It is demonſtration that was a 'moſt pernicious bill; and no one can have a greater 'merit to this houſe, than he by whoſe weight and 'authority that pernicious bill was thrown out. I riſe 'up to do him honour, and diſtinguiſh myſelf by giving 'him my vote for that his ineſtimable ſervice to his 'country.'

'It will be impoſſible for the Reader, continues he, 'to conceive how this ſpeech was received, except he 'has happened to have been at a cock-match, and has 'ſeen the triumph and exultation which is raiſed, when 'a volatile, whoſe fall was ſome way gainful to part of 'the company, has been necked. At the mention of 'the Bill of Commerce, the cry began; at calling it per-'nicious, it increaſed; at the words doing him honour, it 'grew inſupportably loud.' In this ſtate of the houſe, on March 12, 1713, a complaint was made to them againſt certain paragraphs in three printed pamphlets; The Engliſhman, from Saturday January 16 to Tueſday January 19, 1713, wherein is a printed letter to the Engliſhman, to which is ſubſcribed the name Richard Steele; another, intituled The Criſis, in the title-page whereof it is ſaid by Richard Steele, Eſq; and another, intituled The Engliſhman, being the cloſe of the paper ſo called; in the title whereof it is alſo ſaid by Richard Steele, Eſq; as containing ſeveral paragraphs tending to ſedition, highly reflecting upon her Majeſty, and arraigning her adminiſtration and government. Upon which Mr Steele was ordered to attend. He did ſo on Saturday 13, and heard the ſeveral paragraphs, complained of; read; after which he ſtood up, and deſired time to make his defence, which, after great debates, was granted till Thurſday 18. In theſe debates Mr Auditor Harley moved for having him heard on the Monday following. In anſwer to whom we are told (29), that for writing the Hiſtory of the Duke of Marlborough [R]. At the ſame time he alſo wrote The Spinſter, and in oppoſition to The Examiner, he ſet up a Paper called The Reader, and continued publiſhing ſeveral other things in the ſame ſpirit, till the death of the Queen.

that Mr Steele, out of contempt of his adverſaries, who were known, ſays this Author, to have been rigid Preſbyterians, though they now ſided with the High-church, aſſumed their ſanctified countenance, and owned, in the meekneſs and contrition of his heart, that he was a very great ſinner, and he hoped the member who ſpoke laſt, who was ſo juſtly renowned for his exemplary piety and devotion, would not be acceſſary to the accumulating the number of his tranſgreſſions, by obliging him to break the ſabbath of the Lord in peruſing ſuch profane writings as might ſerve for his juſtification. On Monday 15, Mr Steele made the following motion, as of uſe, he ſaid, to his defence; That an humble addreſs be preſented to her Majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give directions, that the ſeveral repreſentations of her Majeſty's engineers, and others who have had the care and inſpection of the demolition of Dunkirk, and all orders and inſtructions given thereupon, be laid before the houſe. It paſſed in the negative, and from that moment Mr Steele deſpaired of his cauſe. On Thurſday the 18th, Mr Foley, the Accuſer, demanded the matter appointed for the day might be entered upon. This gentleman had, in the firſt debate, remarked, that the drift of the writings before them was to make a great number of the gentlemen of England appear Jacobites and enemies to their country. Mr Steele choſe to make his appearance near the bar of the houſe, and mentions one circumſtance in this ſcene that he ſays very much ſweetened his affliction, which was, that he had the honour to ſtand between Mr Stanhope and Mr Walpole (30), who condeſcended to take upon them the parts of his advocates. He was likewiſe aſſiſted by his friend, Mr Addiſon, member for Malmſbury, who ſat near him to prompt him upon occaſion (31). He began his defence with the uſual preface of beſpeaking favour to any miſtakes that might eſcape him therein, and, after complaining of the Examiner for abuſing him the Friday before, he proceeds to maintain the truth of the obſervations in the ſeveral paragraphs alledged as crimes againſt him. The firſt, in No. 46 of the Engliſhman, concludes thus: 'I own I have nothing to ſay 'for the liberty I take now, or the book I put out 'to-day, when nobody elſe talks in the ſame ſtile, 'but what the ſailor ſaid, when he fired out of the 'ſtage-coach upon ſome highwaymen before they cried, 'Stand, would you have me ſtay till they have boarded 'us;' and the laſt paragraph from the cloſe of that paper is in theſe words, 'I wiſh that his Electoral 'Highneſs of Hanover would be ſo grateful as to ſignify 'to all the world, the perfect good underſtanding with 'the court of England in as plain terms as her Majeſty 'was pleaſed to declare ſhe had with that houſe on her 'part. This laſt circumſtance, dear Jack, would be 'very pleaſing to all of us who are churchmen, becauſe, 'if the elector ſhould be any ways diſobliged, I am 'confident her Majeſty has given no cauſe for it. 'I cannot but attribute any miſunderſtanding, if ſuch 'there ſhould be, to the artifices of ſome new converts, 'who, for ought I know, may ſtill be Preſbyterians in 'their hearts (32).' After he was withdrawn, Mr Foley ſaid, Without amuſing the houſe with long ſpeeches, it is plain the writings we had complained of were ſeditious and ſcandalous, injurious to her Majeſty's government, the church, and the univerſities, and called for the queſtion. Thence aroſe a very warm debate, which laſted till eleven o'clock at night. The firſt who ſpoke for Mr Steele was Robert Walpole, Eſq; who was ſeconded by his brother Horace, Lord Finch, Lord Lumley, and Lord Hinchinbroke; but it was reſolved by a majority of 245 againſt 152, "That a printed pamphlet, entituled The Engliſhman, being the cloſe of the paper ſo called, and one other pamphlet, entituled The Criſis, written by Richard Steele, Eſq; a member of this houſe, are ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, containing many expreſſions highly reflecting upon her Majeſty, upon the nobility, gentry, clergy, and univerſities of this kingdom, maliciouſly inſinuating, that the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover is in danger under her Majeſty's adminiſtration, and tending to alienate the affections of her Majeſty's good ſubjects, and to create jealouſies and diviſions among them. It was reſolved likewiſe, for his offence in writing and publiſhing the ſaid ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, that he be expelled this houſe." How much ſoever he complained afterwards of this reſolution, as unjuſtly depriving him of his property in houſe, and his good name in the world, yet there reaſon to believe, that he was ſenſible he deſerved more and expected to have gone to this honour through the Tower, as Mr Walpole had done before him. In his Apology he declares, No man could help plainly ſeeing, that, in theſe writings he had gone as far as he could, with any ſafety to his liberty and life; and that he got into the Houſe of Commons for no other reaſon but to ſay more for the good of his deluded country.

[R] The Hiſtory of the Duke of Marlborough.] He gives an account of his deſign in the ſixth Number of The Reader, where he informs us, that it would be done from proper materials, in his cuſtody; that the relation would commence from the date of his Grace's Commiſſion of Captain General and Plenipotentiary, and to end with the expiration of theſe Commiſſions. 'It 'is not doubted, ſays he, but his hiſtory, formed 'from the moſt authentic papers, and all the moſt 'ſecret intelligence, which can be communicated with 'ſafety to perſons now living, and in the confidence 'of foreign Courts, will be very entertaining, and put 'the ſervices of her Majeſty's Miniſters, at home and 'abroad, in a true light. The Work is to be printed 'in folio, and Propoſals for the encouragement of it, 'may be ſeen at Mr Tonſon's, Bookſeller in the 'Strand.' But this Work was never executed; and the materials were afterwards returned to the Dutcheſs Dowager of Marlborough, who by her laſt Will, left for writing the Hiſtory of the Duke's Life, under the inſpection of Philip Earl of Cheſterfield, a thouſand pounds, to be equally divided between Mr Glover, Author of Leonidas, and Mr Mallet, Writer of the Life of Lord Bacon, and ſeveral Plays and Poems. The former of theſe Gentlemen having declined the offer, the papers have been many years in the hands of the latter; but what progreſs is made in the work, does not appear.

[S] He continued writing with the ſame ſpirit till the death of the Queen.] One of theſe pieces is intituled A Letter to Sir Miles Wharton, concerning occaſional Peers; written in 1713. In this pamphlet, to prevent the miſchiefs that might ariſe from the twelve Peers newly created, the liſt of which he ſays he was told was to be encreaſed with a dozen more, he propoſes that a Bill be brought into the Houſe to diſable any Peer to vote in any caſe, till three years after the date of his Patent. This is ſomething like the year of ſilence enjoined to the Advocates at Doctors Commons, at their firſt admiſſion, which he not improbably had in his eye; and ſome ſuch inſtitution, as he propoſes, might perhaps not be altogether abſurd, as a preſervative in ſuch extraordinary caſes, which require in the body politic, as well as the natural, extraordinary remedies. In order to recommend it, he makes an obſervation, which is pointed at the then preſent conjuncture, 'That when the minds of men are preju- 'diced, wonderful effects may be wrought againſt 'common ſenſe. One weak ſtep, continues he, in 'trying a fool for what he ſaid in the Pulpit, with all 'the pomp that could be uſed to take down a more 'dangerous and powerful man than ever England yet 'has ſeen, coſt the moſt able Miniſtry that England 'was ever honoured with, its Being. The Judgment 'of the Houſe of Lords was by this means inſulted and 'evaded, and the anarchical fury ran ſo high, that 'Harry Sacheverell ſwelling, and Jack Higgins laugh- 'ing, marched through England in a triumph more 'than military.'

Another of his pamphlets is called French Faith repreſented in the preſent State of Dunkirk; A Letter to the Examiner in defence of Mr Steele, in 1714. It was wrote after the delivery of Dunkirk to the French, who were building a new harbour at Mardyke. 'The 'Harbour of Dunkirk indeed, ſays he, was demoliſhed. 'But they have made a new one, and another ſort of 'harbour than it was before; but not a jot leſs com- 'modious to themſelves, or leſs terrible to us;' to evince which, he has given a map of the place as it then ſtood; whereupon he turns The Examiner's words upon himſelf, and his Friends the French. 'Your 'words, ſays he, are, in No. I. of your current 'Volume, in ſpeaking of theſe reſtleſs ſilly Rogues, 'the Whigs, They have made no diſcoveries, nor 'opened any new ſluices or ſtreams of Scandal; 'but

Immediately after which, as a reward for theſe ſervices, he was taken into favour by her Succeſſor to the throne, King George I, and appointed Surveyor to the Royal Stables of Hampton-Court, and put into the Commiſſion of the Peace in the County of Middleſex; and having procured a Licence for chief Manager of the Royal Company of Comedians, he eaſily obtained it to be changed the ſame year 1714 into a Patent from his Majeſty (q), appointing him Governor of the ſaid Company during his life, and to his Executors, Adminiſtrators, or Aſſigns, for the ſpace of three years afterwards [T]. He was alſo choſen but yet, like the ingenious Winſtanly and other Maſters in Hydroſtatics, they have laid their pipes ſo well, and diſpoſed their wheels and machines in ſuch order, that the ſame maſs and body of water, with good huſbandry and management, circulates and comes round again at proper periods, as they direct it (33).' He compares this artifice with another, which he had met with in a little treatiſe in French, the Author of which tells us, that in a treaty with Spain the French obtained an article, that whatſoever ſhould be found within the dominions of either State, at the time of the ratification, ſhall belong to the reſpective Sovereign. The French pillaged a wood, and carried the timber out of the bordering territories of Spain into thoſe of France, in order to profit, as they did, by the Article.

(33) This was publiſhed in May or June, 1714.

A third pamphlet wrote by our Author at this time, was intituled A Letter to a Member of Parliament, concerning the Bill to prevent the growth of Schiſm, dated May 28, 1714. It was written preſently after his expulſion from the Houſe of Commons, and he concludes in theſe terms: 'This, dear Sir, is all I have to trouble you with upon this occaſion; and though you accuſe me of being caſt down with my Expulſion, you ſee I have not dunned you to move that the other pamphlets may be examined as well as The Criſis, and The Engliſhman. Give my ſervice to poor Tom and Ned. I muſt confeſs, they were the laſt I forgave; but I have forgiven them too now: I am thoroughly convinced, ſince this Bill, that I was not worthy. For now you have taken upon you eccleſiaſtical matters; and I ſhould not have known how to behave myſelf among you as a Communion of Saints (34).'

(34) The draught put into his hands was the firſt ſketch of this Bill, it received many amendments, and was extended to Ireland, before it paſſed into an Act. See more of it in the article WAKE [WILLIAM].

Another treatiſe of our Author came out in this interval, intituled The Romiſh Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Late Years. This he obſerves, is no more than an account of ſome collateral and contemporary circumſtances and ſecret paſſages, joined to an account of the ceremony of the laſt Inauguration of Saints, by his Holineſs the Pope. 'This account, continues he, gives us a lively idea of the pageantry uſed in that Church, to ſtrike the imagination of the Vulgar, and needs only to be repeated to give any ſerious man an abhorrence of their Idolatry.' There is an Appendix, No. I. of which preſents us with a liſt of the Colleges, Monaſteries, and Convents, of men and women of ſeveral Orders in the Low Countries, with the revenues which they draw from England. No. II. exhibits an extract of the Taxa Cameræ ſeu Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ, the fees of the Pope's Chancery, a Book printed above a hundred years before by the authority of the Pope, being a table or liſt of the fees paid to him for Abſolutions, Diſpenſations, Indulgencies, Faculties, and Exemptions. No. III. is A Bull of the Pope in 1357, given to the then King of France, whereby the Princes of that nation have received an hereditary right to cheat all the reſt of mankind. No. IV. gives us a tranſlation of Pope Sixtus IV's Oration, as it was uttered in the Conſiſtory at Rome in 1589, defending the execrable fact of Jaques Clement, a Jacobine Friar, upon the perſon of Henry III, King of France, to be commendable, admirable, and meritorious. The fact was the aſſaſſination of that King (35), who in order to cruſh the Popiſh Party, then in open Rebellion againſt him (36), had lately joined the Proteſtants under the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, who was alſo aſſaſſinated by the Jeſuit Ravillac in 1610, which was likewiſe vindicated as a meritorious fact by that Religious Fraternity. No. V. contains a Collection of ſome Popiſh Tracts and Poſitions, deſtructive of Society and all the good ends of government.

[T] A Patent for the Play-houſe.] He obtained this by the intereſt of the Duke of Marlborough, who had long entertained a friendſhip for him. He firſt drew the Duke's regards by a pleaſant repartee, which he made upon his Grace's preferring his own relations, and which coming to the Duke's ear, had the good luck to be taken as the Author meant it. Upon the great change of the Adminiſtration, after the acceſſion of King George I, Mr Collier the former Patentee of the Company in Drury-Lane being no more heard of, and the Licence of the Managers of that Houſe expiring with the late Queen, they therefore applied to Sir Richard to uſe his intereſt for the renewal of their Licence, and begged him to do them the honour of getting their names to ſtand with his in the ſame Commiſſion. We have a full account of this matter from Mr Colley Cibber, who was then one of the Managers (37), and relates it in the following words, much to the honour of Sir Richard. He aſſures us, that this application to our Author was not only owing to the high favour he now ſtood in at Court, but to the obligations the Stage had to his Writings. There being ſcarce a Comedian of merit in their whole Company whom his Tatlers had not made better by his public recommendation of them, 'and many days, continues he, had our houſe been filled by the influence and credit of his Pen. Obligations of this kind, from a Gentleman with whom they all had the pleaſure of a perſonal intimacy, the Managers thought could not be more juſtly returned, than by ſhewing him ſome warm inſtances of their deſire to have him at the head of them. This they told him would put it ſtill in his power to ſupport the Stage in that reputation to which his lucubrations had already ſo much contributed, and that therefore he had better pretenſions to partake of its various ſucceſſes, than any other perſon whatſoever. He was highly pleaſed with the offer, and his ſpirits took ſuch a lively turn upon it, that had we been all his own ſons, no unexpected act of filial duty could have more endeared us to him. The Licence being obtained, the Managers agreed to give Sir Richard 700 l. per ann. as they had done before to Mr Collier. Soon after this, the Houſe in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields being finiſhed by the old Patentee who had been ſilenced, he procured, by the intereſt of Mr Craggs the younger, his ſuſpenſion to be taken off: upon which that Play-houſe being opened, proved at firſt a great drawback upon the profits of the Old Houſe: on this occaſion, the Managers remonſtrated to Sir Richard, that as he now ſtood in Collier's place, his penſion of 700 l. per ann. was liable to the ſame conditions, which was, that it was only payable during their continuance to be the only company permitted to act; but in caſe another was ſet up againſt them, this penſion was to be liquidated into an equal ſhare with them, and which they now hoped he would be contented with. While they were offering to proceed, Sir Richard ſtopt them ſhort, by aſſuring them, that as he came among them by their invitation, he ſhould always think himſelf obliged to come into any meaſures for their uſe and ſervice; that to be a burthen to their induſtry would be more diſagreeable to him, than it could be to them; and as he had always taken a delight in his endeavours for their proſperity, he ſhould be ſtill ready on their own terms to continue them. Every one, proceeds Mr Cibber, who knew Sir Richard in his proſperity (before the effects of his good nature had brought him to diſtreſs) knows that this was his manner of dealing with his Friends in buſineſs. Another inſtance of the ſame nature will immediately fall in my way. When we propoſed to put this agreement in writing, he deſired us not to hurry ourſelves, for that he was adviſed upon the late deſertion of our Actors (38), to get our Licence, which now ſubſiſted only during pleaſure, enlarged into a more ample and durable authority, and which he ſaid he had reaſon to think would be more eaſily obtained, if we were willing that a Patent for the ſame purpoſe might be granted to him only for his life and three years afterwards, which he would then aſſign over to us. This was a proſpect beyond our hopes, and what we had long wiſhed for. For though I cannot ſay, continues this Manager, we had ever occaſion to grieve at the perſonal ſeverities of any Lord Chamberlain; yet the ſeveral officers under them choſen one of the Repreſentatives for Boroughbrigg in Yorkſhire, in the firſt Parliament of that King, who conferred the honour of Knighthood upon him, April 28, 1715 (r). And in Auguſt following he received five hundred pounds from Sir Robert Walpole, for ſpecial ſervices [U]. Thus highly encouraged, he triumphed over his opponents in ſeveral Pamphlets wrote in this and the following year [W]. In 1717, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for 'them often treated us with all the inſolence of Office. 'But a Patent, we knew, would free us from ſo abſolute a ſtate of dependance. Accordingly we deſired 'Sir Richard to loſe no time.——A few days after 'Sir Richard told us, that his Majeſty being apprized, that others had a joint power with him in 'the Licence, it was expected that we ſhould under 'our hands ſignify, that his petition for a Patent ſhould 'be preferred by them all; ſuch an inlargement was 'immediately ſigned, and the patent thereupon paſſed 'the Great Seal (39). The form of it was drawn after 'that of Sir William Davenant's, in King Charles II's 'reign; after relating the abuſes of the Stage, both 'as to Religion, and Government, it declares, that for 'the purpoſe of redreſſing, this command is granted to 'the Patentee, not only on account of his public ſervices 'to Religion and Virtue; but of his ſteady adherence to 'the true intereſt of his Country: then his power is ſet 'forth in all the particulars of which it conſiſts. After 'which it concludes, with an injunction that no repreſentations be admitted, whereby the Chriſtian Religion in general, or the Church of England in particular, may ſuffer reproach, inhibiting every degree 'of abuſe and miſrepreſentations of Sacred Characters, 'enjoining the ſtricteſt regard to ſuch repreſentations 'as any way concern Civil Policy, or the conſtitution 'of the Government. And laſtly, commanding that 'no new Play, or any old revived Play, be acted, containing any paſſages of offence to Piety, before ſuch 'paſſages be corrected and purged out by the ſaid Governor. The Patent was received January 19, and 'the Patentee ſet out next morning for Boroughbrigg, 'where he was ſoon after elected Member for the new 'Parliament. So that the Managers were forced, that 'very night, to draw up in a hurry (till their Council 'might more adviſedly perfect it) his aſſignment to 'them of equal ſhares in the Patent, with farther conditions of Partnerſhip.' But this aſſignment (drawn by Cibber) was ſo unluckily worded, that it gave Sir Richard as clear a title to their property, as it had given them to his Authority in the Patent. Sir Richard, notwithſtanding, when he returned to Town, took no advantage of the miſtake, and conſented, on their ſecond agreement, to pay 1200 l. to be equally intitled to their property, which at his death they were obliged to repay: As they did to his Executors. Our Author, by this moderation, was 300 l. per ann. a Gainer; ſo that his Income from the Play-houſe amounted now to 1000 l. per ann. (40).

(39) This Author tells us too that Lord Cowper, then Lord Chancellor, in compliment to Sir Richard, would take no fee. He was made Chancellor the ſame day that the Patent was ſigned, viz. Jan. 19, 1714; Salmon's Chr. Hiſt. but the Patent appears to be ſigned, By Writ of Privy-Seal, Cocks, [W] He wrote ſeveral pamphlets in 1715 and 1716.] In 1715 he collected his pamphlets againſt the late miniſtry, and publiſhed them in one volume 8vo, with this title, The Political Writings of Sir Richard Steele. In the dedication to the Earl of Clare (42) he writes thus; 'The following papers were written to confront 'daring and wicked men in the proſecution of purpoſes 'deſtructive to their country.—The painful ſtruggle 'under ſo great a difficulty as explaining with a miniſtry 'in open contradiction to their proceedings, is what 'can be ſupported by nothing leſs than the teſtimony 'of a good conſcience, and a heart pure from avaricious 'ambition; and theſe are ſuch ſupports as will keep a 'man from languiſhing in diſcontent. Should he, 'among the proſperities of a cauſe he has endeavoured 'to ſerve, live to find zeal for the public, of all human 'virtues the moſt expoſed to the cool comfort of being 'its own reward; and that which was undertaken 'againſt the inclinations to mirth and pleaſure, out of 'a ſenſe of duty and honour, to have little other effect, 'than to become a man's characteriſtic, and by that 'means to give a hortulent air to all his other pretenſions, and even to ſink the agreeableneſs of the friend 'and companion in the appearance of ſomewhat ſuppoſed to be demanding in the patriot.'—Theſe words intimate, that he did not think his ſervices yet ſufficiently rewarded, to obtain which was apparently the chief motive for the publiſhing his merit with an address to a nobleman then in the higheſt favour at court.

Among theſe pieces he now firſt printed his apology, with this motto, Fabula quanta fui! It is dedicated to Mr Walpole, to whom he obſerves, that the member accuſed had not a harſh perſonal expreſſion uſed againſt him; though the miniſter who brought on the accuſation, in the midſt of all his power, was treated in a different manner; which confirms what we have before obſerved, that the heavieſt part of his puniſhment was the lightneſs of it; he was not conſiderable enough for any weightier notice. This he ſeems to reſent in the preface, as follows; 'The onſet was made in the pooreſt 'manner, and the accuſation laid with an inſipid action 'and cold expreſſion. The accuſer arraigned a man 'for ſedition with the ſame indolence and indifference 'as another man pares his nails; what was ſpoken appeared only a rheum from the mouth, and Mr Foley, 'as well as do what he did, might have blown his noſe 'and put the queſtion. But, though the choler of my 'accuſers was corrected by their phlegm, &c.' In the dedication he celebrates Mr Walpole on the two great talents for which he was eminently diſtinguiſhed; his admirable talent of ſpeaking in the houſe, and his happy ability in explaining the moſt difficult parts of buſineſs to men wholly unacquainted with negociations; and the character of an open honeſt Engliſh gentleman.

Our Author publiſhed alſo this year in 8vo, The State of the Roman catholic religion throughout the world, written for the uſe of pope Innocent XI. by monſ. Cerwic, ſecretary of the congregation DE PROPAGANDA FIDE; now firſt tranſlated from an authentick Italian MS. never publiſhed. To which is added, A diſcourſe concerning the ſtate of religion in England, written in French in the time of King Charles I, and now firſt tranſlated, with a large dedication to the preſent pope, giving him a very particular account of the ſtate of religion among the Proteſtants, and of ſeveral other matters of importance relating to Great Britain. The tranſlation of this account was done by Michael de la Roche, author of The Memoirs of literature; and the dedication to the pope was, upon good grounds, ſuppoſed to be done by another (*), and not by Sir Richard. In this laſt he rallies the notion, that the church may err but never does, maintaining, that the power and authority of the proteſtant church is as ſtrong upon this foundation as that of the pope founded upon infallibility (43). The ſame year Sir Richard publiſhed A Letter from the Earl of Mar to the King before his Majeſty's arrival in England, with ſome remarks on my Lord's ſubſequent conduct. Our Author alſo continued his Lover to this year, though it was begun in 1714 (44). The character of Sir Anthony Crabtree, of Goatham in Hereforddſhire, in No. 14. was deſigned for the Earl of Oxford (45). About the years 1715 and 1716 he wrote the paper called The Town Talk, and another intituled The Tea-Table, and ſome of the Paſquins. Alſo in 1716 he publiſhed the ſecond volume of the Engliſhman. In the preface of which he obſerves, 'that to inſinuate 'that there are evil purpoſes in the miniſters of any 'country is in itſelf a ſeditious and unwarrantable practice; but that the apparent tendency of the proceedings in the late times, juſtified the diſreſpect with 'which the officers of the ſtate were then treated in the 'former volume of the Engliſhman. That volume 'alarmed mankind of their purpoſes, and of the 'methods they had taken to accompliſh them. It is 'incumbent upon one who had treated them ſo frankly 'when they were only ſuſpected, to make good what 'he ſeemed to accuſe them of, now their actions are 'brought to light.' In anſwer to this it was maintained, on the other hand, that the late miniſtry had never entertained any ſuch evil purpoſes as they are here charged with, which is evident from the peaceful entrance of the Queen's ſucceſſor into the poſſeſſion of the throne; and that the practices and deſigns to diſturb him in that poſſeſſion afterwards, were entirely owing to the violent proceedings of his miniſters againſt their immediate predeceſſors in the adminiſtration. In reality, the violence on both ſides was the genuine effect of that never enough for enquiring into the Eſtates forfeited by the late Rebellion in Scotland. This carried him into that part of the united kingdom, where how unwelcome a gueſt ſoever he might be to the generality, yet he received from ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry, the moſt diſtinguiſhing marks of reſpect (s), inſomuch that he began to turn his thoughts upon the much to be deſired, but hopeleſs project of perfecting the Union between the two kingdoms, by extending it to the policy in Church as well as State. In this view, he had frequent converſations with ſome of the Preſbyterian Miniſters [X], concerning the reſtoration of Epiſcopacy, the ancient church government of that nation; and often lamented this diviſion in the eccleſiaſtical adminiſtration, which ſtill ſerves to maintain a kind of alienation between the people. Sir Richard wiſhed well to the intereſts of Religion, and as he imagined that Union would promote it, he had ſome thoughts of propoſing it at Court; but that, as was likely, proved abortive (t). In 1718 he buried his ſecond wife, who had brought him a handſome fortune, and a good eſtate in Wales [Y]; but neither that, nor the ample additions lately made to his income, were ſufficient to anſwer his demands. The thoughtleſs vivacity of his ſpirit, often reduced him to little ſhifts of wit for its ſupport [Z]; and the Project of the Fiſh-pool this year, owed its birth chiefly to the Projector's neceſſities [AA]. The following year he oppoſed the remarkable Peerage bill in the Houſe of Commons, enough to be lamented miſchief of party-rage. And we ſhall ſee our Author himſelf preſently groaning under a perſecution from the ſame cauſe in ſome of his now applauded miniſtry.

(43) The whole tenour of this dedication appears indeed to be above Sir Richard's reach in church matters. Yet the Author, whoever he was, here confounds (affectedly perhaps) the difference between popiſh infallibility and proteſtant certainty.

[X] He talked with ſeveral of the Scotch Miniſters.] Among theſe was one Hart, with whom Sir Richard commenced a friendſhip, and afterwards honoured him with his correſpondence. This Hart he uſed to ſtile the Hangman of the Goſpel; for though he was a facetious good-natured man, yet he had fallen into a peculiar way of preaching what he called The Terrors of the Law, and denounced Anathemas from the Pulpit without reſerve. Our Knight alſo, during his ſtay in Scotland, indulged his genius in ſearching into the humours of low life. In which view, he prepared a ſplendid feaſt at Edinburgh, and ordered his ſervants to pick up all the beggars and poor people they could find in the ſtreets for his Gueſts. The Servants obeyed, and Sir Richard ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of forty or fifty beggars, together with ſome poor decayed Tradeſmen. After dinner he plied them with punch and wine; and when the frolick was ended, he declared, that beſides the pleaſure of filling ſo many empty bellies, he had learned humour enough to make a good Comedy (46).

[Y] He buried his ſecond Wife.] She died on the 26th of December this year, at the age of forty years, and was buried in Weſtminſter Abbey. Sir Richard had teſtified his great eſteem for her in the Dedication to her, prefixed to the third Volume of The Lady's Library while ſhe was living (47), and after her death he laments his loſs of her as the beſt Woman that ever man had, intimating that ſhe frequently lamented and pined at his neglect of himſelf (48). The account of her birth and family is given at the cloſe of this Memoir.

[Z] He was often reduced to little witty ſhifts.] Among many inſtances of Sir Richard's good nature, his kindneſs to the unfortunate Mr Savage, natural ſon to Earl Rivers, was none of the leaſt. He declared in this Gentleman's favour with all the ardor and benevolence which conſtituted his character, promoted his intereſt with the utmoſt zeal, related his misfortunes, applauded his merit, took all opportunities of recommending him, and aſſerted that the inhumanity of his mother had given him a right to call every good man his Father. He propoſed to eſtabliſh him in ſome ſettled ſcheme of life, and to have contracted ſome kind of alliance with him by marrying him to a natural daughter, on whom he intended to beſtow a thouſand pounds. But though he was always laviſh of his future bounties, he conducted his affairs in ſuch a manner, that he was very ſeldom able to keep his promiſes, or execute his own intentions. However, he gave Savage a certain allowance till the ſaid marriage ſhould be conſummated (49). During this ſtate of things, he once deſired Savage in 1718, with an air of the utmoſt importance, to come very early to his houſe the next morning, which Savage did, and found the chariot at the door, Sir Richard waiting for him, and ready to go out. What was intended, and whither they were to go, Savage could not conjecture, and was not willing to enquire, but immediately ſeated himſelf with Sir Richard in the chariot. The Coachman was ordered to drive, and they hurried with the utmoſt expedition to Hyde-Park Corner, where they ſtopped at a petty Tavern, and retired to a private room. Sir Richard then informed him, that he intended to publiſh a pamphlet, and that he had deſired him to come thither that he might write for him. They ſoon ſat down to the work; Sir Richard dictated, and Savage wrote, till the dinner that had been ordered was ſet upon table. Savage was ſurprized at the meanneſs of the entertainment, and after ſome heſitation, ventured to aſk for wine, which Sir Richard, not without reluctance, ordered to be brought. They then finiſhed their dinner, and proceeded on their pamphlet, which they concluded in the afternoon. Savage then imagined his taſk was over, and expected that Sir Richard would call for the reckoning; but he was deceived, for Sir Richard told him, that he was without money, and that the pamphlet muſt be ſold before the dinner was paid for. Savage was therefore obliged to go and offer their new production to ſale for two guineas, which, with ſome difficulty, he obtained. Sir Richard then returned home, having retired that day only to avoid his Creditors, and compoſed the pamphlet only to diſcharge his reckoning. This was related by Savage himſelf, who alſo told another equally uncommon ſhift as follows: Sir Richard having one day invited to his houſe a great number of perſons of the firſt quality, they were ſurprized at the number of Liveries that ſurrounded the table; and after dinner, when wine and mirth had ſet them free from the obſervation of rigid ceremony, one of them enquired of Sir Richard how ſuch an expenſive train of domeſtics could be conſiſtent with his fortune? Sir Richard frankly confeſſed, that they were fellows of whom he would very willingly be rid. And being then aſked, why he did not diſcharge them, he declared, that they were Bailiffs, who had introduced themſelves with an execution, and whom, ſince he could not ſend them away, he had thought it convenient to embelliſh with Liveries, that they might do him credit, whilſt they ſtaid. His friends were diverted with the expedient, and by paying the debt, diſcharged the Attendance; having obliged Sir Richard to promiſe, that they ſhould never find him again graced with a retinue of the ſame kind. It will be proper to inform the Reader, before we diſmiſs this remark, the ſubſtance of which was furniſhed by Mr Savage, that his marriage beforementioned with a natural daughter of Sir Richard, never took place; for during the delay occaſioned by waiting till our Knight could raiſe the promiſed Fortune, he was informed, that Savage had ridiculed him, at which he was ſo much exaſperated, that he withdrew the allowance that he had paid him, and never afterwards admitted him to his houſe (50).

[AA] The Fiſh-pool.] Sir Richard had a patent for this invention (51). By which it appears, that this veſſel was intended to carry fiſh alive, and without waſting, to any part of the kingdom. The project was promiſing enough in the theory, and he accordingly built himſelf up with great hopes of ſuch ſucceſs as would make a handſome fortune. He even comforted himſelf with the proſpect of making up the loſs of his patent for the playhouſe by the profits of it. 'I ſhall 'not whine longer, ſays he, in the concluſion of The 'Theatre (†), about the hardſhips I have ſuffered, but 'advertiſe my friends and others, that, ſince a late judg-'ment in my favour concerning a certain ridiculed in-'vention, I want nothing but that men will ſupport 'a deſign of mine, by which they may divide ten per 'cent. ſix times a year, to be in poſſeſſion of a much 'greater income than any man living has merit enough 'to deſerve.' the scheme proved a ruinous one to him; for, after he had been at immense expence in contriving and building his vessel, besides the charge of the patent, it appeared upon the trial to be a meer project. His intention was to bring salmon alive from the coast of Ireland, where that fish abounded, to London, where it was very scarce (52). But these fish, though supplied by this contrivance with a continual stream of water in crossing the sea, yet, not brooking the confinement, battered themselves to pieces against the sides of the pool, so that when they were brought to market, they fetched little money. The great cheapness of this fish at present in London, where it is sold for a shilling a pound, is owing to the extraordinary plenty of it caught in the Trent and Severn, especially this last season, whence it is brought to London in the Cirencester and Gloucester stage-coaches (53).

(52) It was usually sold there for 5*s.* a pound.

(53) This was written in 1755.

[BB] He opposed the Peerage Bill.] Upon this occasion he wrote the following letter to the Earl of Oxford.

'My Lord,

'I am very glad of the occasion wherein I have the 'good fortune to think the same way with your Lord-'ship, because I have very long suffered a great deal 'of pain in reflecting upon a certain virulence with 'which my zeal has heretofore transported me to treat 'your Lordship's person and character. I do protest to 'you, excepting in the first smart of my disgrace and 'expulsion out of the House of Commons, I never writ 'any thing that ought to displease you but with a re-'luctant heart, and in opposition to much good-will 'and esteem for your many great and uncommon talents. 'And I take the liberty to say thus publicly to yourself, 'what I have often said to others on the subject of my 'behaviour to you; I never had any other reason to 'lessen my Lord of Oxford than that which Brutus had 'to stab Cæsar, the love of my country. Your Lord-'ship will, I hope, believe, there cannot be a more 'voluntary unrestrained reparation made to a man, 'than that I make to you, in begging your pardon 'thus publicly for every thing I have spoken or written 'to your disadvantage, foreign to the argument 'and cause which I was then labouring to support. 'You will please to believe, that I could not be so 'insensible as not to be touched with the generosity 'of part of your conduct towards me, or have omitted 'to acknowledge it accordingly, if I had not thought 'that your very virtue was dangerous; and that it was '(as the world then stood) absolutely necessary to de-'preciate so adventurous a genius, surrounded with so 'much power as your Lordship then had. I trans-'gressed, my Lord, against you, when you could make 'twelve peers in a day; I ask your pardon, when you 'are a private nobleman; and, as I told you when 'I resigned the Stamp-office, I wished you all prosperity 'consistent with the public good; so now I congratulate 'you upon the pleasure you must needs have in looking 'back upon the true fortitude, with which you have 'passed through the dangers arising from the rage 'of the people, and the envy of the rest of the world. 'If to have rightly judged of mens passions and pre-'judices, vices and virtues, interests and inclinations, 'and to have waited with skill and courage for proper 'seasons and incidents to make use of them for a man's 'safety and honour, can administer pleasure to a man 'of sense and spirit, your Lordship has abundant cause 'of satisfaction. In confidence that you will accept of 'my sorrow and repentance for the unprovoked liberties 'I have taken in my former writings, I make you my 'patron in this present discourse on the greatest occasion 'that has perhaps ever happened in England. Your Lord-'ship will see I write in haste; and the necessity of pressing 'forward to be time enough to be of any use, will excuse 'the failures in style and expression. I shall therefore 'immediately fall into the matter of the bill; which 'I fear may change this free state into the worst of all 'tyrannies, that of an Aristocracy. I shall support 'my reasons for that terror by running through the 'several parts of it, and making it appear, that this 'is more likely than any other consequence that can 'be supposed will attend such a law as this would be. 'The whole tenour of it is very unfortunately put 'together, if any thing but an additional power to the 'peers is intended by it.'

Sir Richard is also said to be the author of a paper, written in opposition to the same bill, called The Plebeian, which was answered by Mr Addison in The Old Whig. Concerning which, we refer to this last gentleman's article (54), with this remark, that the Plebeian is ascribed by Mr Oldmixon (55) to William Benson, Esq; late one of the Auditors of the Imprest, the great venerator of Milton. (56).

[CC] He did all he could to prevent such a loss, &c.] Our Author's pen, in every exigence, was an engine which, like Flavia's fan, was always ready at hand to serve the various purposes of the Engineer, and which, in the present case like that too, in raising a flame in every other breast, gave such a proper degree of coolness, as was necessary for preserving that gaiety of spirit, by which he had constantly procured the attention of the public. He opened his design in a Paper called The Theatre, with a display of the usefulness of the Stage, and the merit of good Actors in general. But he had proceeded on this general plan only a few weeks, when the first step was taken to perplex his government, by suspending Mr Colley Cibber, a principal Actor, and a Fellow-manager with him by the licence; he entered particularly into the defence of his character and merit. But this was cut very short by the succeeding direct measures that were taken to displace him Governor. A particular Account of which was immediately published, in a Letter from himself under his real name, to himself under the feigned name of Sir John Edgar, which he had assumed in this Paper, as follows.

'Sir,

'Your last Paper having descended to the case of 'particular men, who are concerned in the Theatre, 'I hope you will allow me the advantage of being 'represented to the Town by your means, and of con-'veying my thoughts to a Noble Person, who has 'forbid me, without any fault of mine, ever to ap-'proach him either by speech or writing, as long as we 'live; but you will understand me better by reading, 'what I know not how to convey to him, unless you 'will please to print it.

'My most honoured Lord and Patron,

'If your Grace believes that it is as great to undo 'as to make a man, I am the unhappy instrument in 'both kinds; and, if it is a gratification to you, I have 'some consolation in the wretched distinction of being 'the only man the Duke of Newcastle (*) ever injured. 'My high obligations to you temper my spirit; and, 'after some tumult of soul, and agony of the worst 'passions in it, I behold you in the pleasing light you 'have heretofore appeared to me. I make you allow-'ance for the disadvantage of youth and prosperity, 'and my benefactor covers my oppressor; as this last 'word must needs give offence to a noble nature, it 'stands upon me to make out my complaint, and shew 'all the world, for all the world will be curious in this 'case, as obscure as I am, for I have ceased to be so, 'since I have been distinguished by your Grace's dis-'pleasure. The patent which I have from his Majesty 'makes me the sole governor of a company of come-'dians for my life, and that franchise is to subsist in 'those who claim under me three years after my death; 'there is nothing in it, as to the bestowing part from 'the crown, but what are meer transcripts of the patent 'given by King Charles II. to Sir William Davenant; 'and, though I might have had it to myself as well as 'he, I made a conscience and scruple of asking for my 'heirs, an office that required a very particular turn 'and capacity to execute. It is not, my Lord, very 'common in Courts, for a man to ask less, when he 'knows he may obtain more; the very night I received 'it, I participated the power and use of it with relation 'to the profits, that should arise from it, between the 'gentlemen who invited me into the Licence upon his 'Majesty's happy accession to the throne; and it has 'flourished in all manner of respects to a degree un-'known in any former time. When your Grace came 'to be Chamberlain (57), from a generous design of 'making every office and authority the better for your 'wearing, your Grace was induced to send for me, 'and the other Sharers, and in an absolute manner 'offered
